MARY STEWART, sole Daughter and Heir to James V. King of Scots, began her Reign over the Realm of Scotland upon the 18th of December, 1542. being then not above 7 Days old, so as the Sun no sooner almost saw her an Infant, than a Queen; and no sooner was she a Queen, but she was desired of Henry, then King of England, to be assured in Marriage to Prince Edward his only Son, being then not much above 6 Years of Age. Upon this Overture the Governor of Scotland assembled the Nobility of the Realm at Edinburgh, where, after much Debatement of the Commodities or Discommodities like to ensue, they concluded in the End, That in March then next ensuing a Parliament should be held, to give Perfection and Form to that Business.

Sadler sent Ambassador to the King. In the mean time Sir Ralph Sadler Kt. was sent Ambassador from England to the Governor and other Lords of Scotland, who followed his Charge with so good Diligence and Advice, that in the same Parliament Authority was given to William Earl of Gloucestre, Sir George Douglas, Sir William Hamilton, Sir James Leirmouth, Kts. and to one of the Secretaries of State, to conclude this Marriage. These Commissioners came into England, with whom before the End of July, the same Year, all Covenants were concluded, Instruments of the Contract of Marriage interchangeably sealed and sworn, and a Peace established for Ten Years, which Time expired, both the Prince and the Queen should be of Age to consent.

The French King all this Time was so entertained with Wars against the Emperor, that he had no Sense of these Proceedings; but when he understood that these Agreements were passed as well for Marriage as for Peace, he bent his best Endeavour to dissolve them both: First with Intention to impeach both the Greatness and Strength of the English Nation; after with Desire to win this Marriage for Francis, who afterwards was King of France. To this purpose the French King sent for Matthew Earl of Levenox, who then served under his Pay in Italy, and furnished him with Money, Forces, and Friends; and, above all, with many Encouragements to take upon him bravely the Honour of his House and Ancestors, to remove the Earl of Arran from the Regency of Scotland, and to reverse such Pactions as he had made. The Earl at his first Arrival in Scotland was joyfully received, as a Man most engaged in Domestical Factions. He always used Courtesy and Modesty disliked of none, sometimes Sociableness and Fellowship well liked by many; generally he was honoured by his Nation, and well reputed by Strangers: In Favour of him the Pope sent the Patriarch of Apulia his Legate into Scotland, who, in the Pope's Name, did faithfully assure, That both Forces and Money should be sent into Scotland to resist the English. He drew the greatest of the Clergy on his side, who were most powerful to draw on others. On the other side, the King was not negligent to support his Party with Supplies, whereby great Troubles ensued in Scotland, which fell not within the Times that I have in hand.

In the End, the Earl of Arran abandoned the King of England, and applied himself only to the French; by reason whereof the Regency was confirmed to him, which otherwise he had been upon Adventure to lose. And as the Earl of Arran did forsake the English, and adjoin to the French; so the Earl of Levenox, being forsaken by the French, applied his Service wholly to the English, which did not only continue, but much encrease, the Calamities of Scotland, during the Time of King Henry's Reign.

King Henry, at the Time of his Death, gave a special Charge to the Lords of his Council, That they should omit no Endeavours, whereby the said Marriage might be procured to take Effect: Hereupon they pursued this Quarrel in the same State that the King left it. But before they attempted any thing by Arms, the Lord Protector assailed the Scottish Nobility with a friendly Letter; herein he remembered them of the Promises, Seals and Oaths, which by publick Authority had passed for concluding this Marriage, That these being Religious Bonds betwixt God and their Souls, could not by any politic Act of State be dissolved, until their Queen should attain unto Years of Dissent. He farther added, That the Providence of God did then manifestly declare it self, in that the Male Princes of Scotland failing, the Kingdom was left to a Daughter, and in that King Henry left only one Son to succeed: That these two Princes were agreeable both for Years and Princely Qualities to be joined in Marriage, and thereby to knit both Realms into one: That this Union

The Protector's Letter to the Scottish Nobility.

Anno 1547. Union, as it was like to be both easily done, and of firm Continuance, so would it be both profitable and honourable to both the Realms: That both the easiness and Firmness might be conjectured, for that both People are of the same Language, of like Habit and Fashion, of like Quality and Condition of Life, of one Climate, not only annexed entirely together, but severed from all the World besides: For as these are sure Arguments, that both descended from one Original, and had been under one Government, so (by reason that Likeness is a great Cause of Liking, and of Love) they would be most forcible Means both to join and to hold them in one Body again: That the Profit would rise by extinguishing Wars between the Two Nations; by reason whereof, in former Times, Victories abroad have been impeached; Invasions and Seditions occasioned; the Confines of both Realms laid waste, or else made a Nursery of Rapines, Robbers and Murthers; the inner Parts often deeply pierced, and made a wretched Spectacle to all Eyes of Humanity and Pity: That the Honour of both Realms would encrease, as well in regard of the Country's sufficient to furnish, not only the Necessities, but the moderate Pleasures of this Life; as also of the People, great in Multitude, in Bodies able, assured in Mind, not only for the Safety, but the Glory of their Common State: That hereby would follow, Assurance of Defence, Strength to Enterprise, Ease in sustaining publick Burthens and Charge: That herein the English desired no Preheminence, but offered Equality both in Liberty and Privilege, and in Capacity of Offices and Employments; and to that end, the Name of Britains should be assumed indifferent to both Nations: That this would be the Accomplishment of their common Felicity, in case by their evil, either Destiny or Advice, they suffered not the Occasion to be lost.

The Authority and Reasons of this Letter weighed much with Persons of most weighty Judgments; but others more powerful in that State, partly upon vain Hope, in regard of the young Years of the King, partly upon Fear of Alteration in Religion, and partly in favour of their ancient Amity with the French; and doubting to be brought under by the English, were altogether carried another way: Yet they dispatched an Ambassador into England; but neither was any thing done, neither do I find what was propounded to have been done.

Hostilities between the Two Nations.

Hereupon divers Hostilities began to be practised; and first, a small Ship of the King's, called the Penfy, hovering at Sea, was assailed by the Lyon, a principal Ship of Scotland. The Fight began afar off and slow; but when they approached, it grew very furious, wherein the Penfy so applied her Shot, that therewith the Lyon's Oar-loop was broken, her Sails and Tacklings torn; and lastly, she was boarded Anno 1547. and taken: But as she was brought for England, she was cast away by Tempest and Negligence near Harwich Haven, and most of her Men perished with her. I would not have stay'd upon this small Adventure, but that it seemed a Presage to the succeeding War, wherein the English acquired a glorious Victory, but lost the Fruit thereof, by reason of their stormy Disorders at home.

Many such small Actions were enterprised Preparations daily, which were but scattering Drops in regard of the great Tempest which did ensue: against Scotland. For in the mean Season an Army was prepared for Invasion of Scotland, under the Fortune and Command of the Lord Protector. The Soldiers first assembled at Newcastle, and were there mustered by the Earl of Warwick. Here they sojourned three Days, in which time the King's Fleet arrived, consisting of 65 Bottoms, whereof one Galley and 34 tall Ships were well appointed for Fight; the residue served for Carriage of Ammunition and Victuals. Of this Fleet, Edward Lord Clinton was Admiral, and Sir William Woodhouse his Vice-Admiral: In this Time also a general Muster was taken, and Order appointed for the March.

In the whole Army were between 12 and 13000 Foot, 1300 Men at Arms, 2800 Light Horse, being such Men for their goodly Personages, their ready Horses, their brave Apparel, their Armour and Weapons, as never before was an Army set forth into those Parts in all Points better appointed. The Lord Protector, being General, represented the Person and Majesty of the King: The Earl of Warwick was Lieutenant-General; the Lord Gray of Wilton was Marshal of the Field, and Captain-General of the Horsemen; Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the Men at Arms and Dimilances; Sir Ralph Sadler was General Treasurer: Other Gentlemen had their particular Charges. But upon the General, and the Earl of Warwick, both the Hopes and the Hazards of the main Adventure did wholly turn. And because much shall be said of these two hereafter, because during the Reign of King Edward they were the principal Actors in every Scene, I will briefly declare both what Persons and of what Demerits at that time they were.

Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, Lord General, was a Man little esteemed either for Wisdom or Personage, or Courage in Arms: (m) But being in Favour with King Henry, and by him much employed, was always observed to be both Faithful and Fortunate, as well in giving Advice, as in managing a Charge. About 5 Years before, he being Warden of the Marches against Scotland, the Invasion of James V. was by his Direction encountred and broken at Solome Mousse, whereof divers of the Scotch Nobility were taken Prisoners. The Year next after, he and the Earl of Warwick, with

(m) The Wrong the Author hath done the Name of this Good Duke (for so was he commonly stil'd) to Posterity, is interperfed through his Book: But he that shall but read forward through this Paragraph, where these undervaluing Words are bestow'd upon the Duke, will find the Author in a great measure confuting himself. Had there not been an Opinion in the Nobility and Great Men of the Court, of the Duke's Parts and Abilities, his Wisdom and Courage, they would never have consented, that he should have been not only Governor of the King's Person, and Protector of his Realms, but Lieutenant-General of his Armies both by Sea and Land, and Lord High Treasurer and Earl-Marshal of England, and Governor of the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey.

Annus 1547. a handful of Men to speak of, fired Lieth and Edinburgh, and returned by a leisurely March 44 Miles through the Body of Scotland. The Year next ensuing he invaded the Scotch Borders, wasted Tivedale and the Marches, and deformed the Country with Ruin and Spoil. The Year then next following, being appointed to view the Fortifications upon the Marches of Calais, he not only did that, but with the hardy Approach of 7000 English Men, raised an Army of 21000 French, encamped over the River before Bulleine, won their Ordnance, Carriage, Treasure, and Tents, with the Loss only of one Man, and returned from thence by Land to Guesnes, won in his Way, within Shot and Rescue of Arde, the Castle of Outing, commonly called the Red Pile. The Year next ensuing this he invaded and spoiled Picardy, began the Forces of Newhaven, Blackness, and Bullinberge, and so well applied his Endeavours, that in a few Weeks, and before his Departure, they were made tenable: Upon these and other like Successes his succeeding Fortunes were esteemed always rather new than strange, and his only Presence was reputed a sufficient Surety for an Army; and yet did he never rise hereby, either into Haughtiness in himself, or Contempt of others, but remained Courteous and Affable, choosing a Course least subject to Envy, between stiff Stubbornness and filthy Flattery, never aspiring higher than to be the second Person in State.

Character of Dudley
Earl of Warwick.

John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, was a Man of ancient Nobility, comely in Stature and Countenance, but of little Gravity or Abstinence in Pleasures, yea, sometimes almost dissolute, which was not much regarded, if in a time when Vices began to grow into Fashion, a great Man was not over severe. He was of a great Spirit, and highly aspiring, not forbearing to make any Mischief the Means of attaining his ambitious Ends. Hereto his good Wit and pleasant Speeches were altogether serviceable, having the Art also, by empty Promises and Threats, to draw others to his Purpose: In Matters of Arms he was both skilful and industrious, and as well in Foresight as Resolution present and great. Being made Lord Lieutenant of Bulloine, when it was first taken by the English, the Walls sore beaten and taken, and in very Truth scarce maintainable, he defended the Place against the Dauphin, whose Army was accounted to consist of 52000 Men: And when the Dauphin had entered the base Town, not without Slaughter of divers of the English, by a brave Sally, he cast out the French again, with the Loss of above 800 of their Men, esteemed the best Soldiers in France. The Year next ensuing, when the French had a great Fleet at Sea for Invasion of England, he was appointed Admiral, and presented Battle to the French Navy; which they refused, and returned home with all their Threats and Cost in vain. Hereupon he landed 5000 Men in France, fired Treport, and divers Villages thereabouts, and returned to his Ships with the Loss only of one Man. To say Truth, for Enterprises by Arms, he was the Minion of that Time, so as few Things he attempted but he achieved with Honour, which made him more proud and ambitious when he had done. He generally increased both in Estimation with the King, and Authority among the Nobility, doubtful whether by fatal Destiny to the State, or whether by his Virtues, or at least by his Appearances of Virtues.

Now the General in this Voyage was diligent and careful, as well to perfect all Practices which might serve to advance the Adventure, as to give good Contentment to all the Soldiers. These also were of good Confidence and Cheer, as well out of their own Courage, as for the Skill, Valour, and Fortune, of their Commanders. And first, every Soldier was commanded to take with him Provision for four Days, and so were let out of Berwick, and encamped about two slight Shoot off the Town upon the Sea-side towards Scotland. The Lord Clynton also put to Sea with his Fleet, always holding his Course with the Army, to relieve them if need should require. Here Proclamation was made in three Parts of the Field, declaring the Causes of his Journey, and offering not only Peace, but Love and Rewards, to all such as would either advance or favour the Marriage between the two Princes. Hereof it was conceived, that the Scots had good Intelligence, having some Factors, doubtless, at this Mart; albeit, (as Wisdom was) they did not openly Trade.

The next day they began to march, wherein the Lord Gray and Sir Francis Bryan led about 800 Light-Horsemen as a Scout a Mile or two before the Army, as well to give Advertisement of Appearance or Approach of Enemies, as to provide Lodging both Commodious and Safe. Sir Francis Bryan was so regardful of his Charge, as he never disposed any Matter of Weight, but first he acquainted the General therewith; neither did he at any time forsake his Saddle, until the Army were quartered, and seated in such Order, as, if any Alarm should be given, the Horse-men might issue forth without disturbance of the Foot, and the Avant-guard without shuffling with the Battail or Arrier; next to the Light Horsemen followed the Avant-guard, in number between 3 and 4000 Foot, 100 Men at Arms, and 600 Light Horse-men, led by the Earl of Warwick. The Battel followed, consisting of about 6000 Foot, 600 Men at Arms, and about 1000 Light Horse-men, conducted by the Lord General himself. Lastly, followed the Arrier, wherein were between 3 and 4000 Foot, 100 Men at Arms, and 600 Light-horse, under the Conduct of the Lord Dacres, a lively aged Gentleman, no less settled in Experience than in Years. Upon one Wing the Artillery was drawn, being 16 Pieces, every Piece having its Guard of Pioneers to plain the Way; the other Wing was made by Men at Arms, and Demilances for the Avant-guard, and half the Battail riding about two slight Shot from their side. The other half of the Battail, and the whole Flank of the Arrier, was closed by the Carriages, being 900 Carts besides Wagons. The residue of the Men at Arms and Demilances marched behind.

The English Army enter Scotland.

In this order, both beautiful and firm, they march'd two days using no Hostility, lest Peace thereby might happily be hindred. The second day they arriv'd at a place call'd the Peathes, a Valley stretching towards the Sea six Miles in length, about twenty score in breadth above, and five score in the bottom, wherein runs a little River. The Banks are so steep on either side, that the Passage is not direct, but by Paths leading slope-wise; which being many, the Place is thereupon call'd the Peathes. It was given forth in the Army, that here the Scots prepar'd to resist them: howbeit no Forces appear'd, only the Paths were cut in divers places with traverse Trenches, which much encumbred the Carriages till the Pioneers had level'd them again; assuredly a small Power join'd to the advantage of the Place might have troubled the English very much: For albeit no Resistance was made, yet the English had much to do in surmounting the natural Difficulties of the Place the greatest part of one day.

Passage being made, the General summon'd three Castles that were near; one desperate of Succour, and not desirous to dispute the Defence, presently yielded; but two stood upon their Adventure. So the Cannon was planted, a Breach made, and the Place enter'd: but then the Moderation of the General was both unusual and unexpected, in sparing the Defendants Lives; for it hath been a long observ'd Law of the Field, That if a small Company, of better Courage than Judgment, will, contrary to all military Discipline, maintain a feeble Place against Royal Forces; if they will offer to impeach the Purposes of an Army, which they have no reason to think themselves able to resist, after Battery presented, they put themselves out of all ordinary expectation of Mercy: And so Cesar answer'd the Adviatici, Civitatem conservaturum, si priusquam aries murum attigisset se dedissent. And so the Duke d' Alva much blam'd Prosper Columnus for receiving a Castle upon Conditions, after he had beaten it with the Cannon. And in this Case I conceive the Law of God to be understood, which spareth not those Citys that will not yield until they be besieg'd; meaning doubtless, when the Defendants have little reason to think themselves able to make defence. I will not involve in silence with what a sudden Stratagem of Wit, the Defendants of one of these Places escap'd Extremities: when they understood both that they were not able to defend themselves, and that their Obstinacy had excluded all hope of Pardon, they made Petition that they might not presently be slain, but have some time to recommend their Souls to God, and afterwards be hang'd: This Respite being first obtain'd, their Pardon did more easily ensue.

Upon the first News of the Approaches of the English, and all Truths enlarg'd by Report, the Governor of Scotland was somewhat appal'd, as neither furnish'd at that time with Foreign Aid, nor much trusting his Forces at home: yet resuming his accustomed Courage, well acquainted with both Fortunes, he sent his Heralds through all parts of the Realm, and commanded the Fire-crofts to be carried (an antient Custom in cases of Importance) namely, two Fire-brands set in fashion of a Crofs, and pitch'd upon the point of a Spear; therewith Proclamation to be made, that all Men above sixteen Years of Age; and under sixty, should resort forthwith to Muscle- borough, with convenient provision of Victuals with them.

Hereupon they flock'd to the place in so great Multitudes, that it was thought fit not only to stay further Resort, but making choice of the most serviceable, to discharge divers of the rest.

Now as the English directed their way towards the Place where they understood the Scots assembled, they came to a River call'd Lynne, cross'd with a Bridge of Stone. The Horsemen and Carriages pass'd through the Water, the Footmen over the Bridge, which because it was narrow, the Army was long in setting over: The Avant-guard march'd forth, and the Battail follow'd; but as the Arrier was passing over, a very thick Mist did arise. The Earl of Warwick having before espied certain plumps of Scottish Horsemen ranging the Field, return'd towards the Arrier to prevent such Danger as the thicknes of the Mist, the nearness of the Enemy, and the Disarray occasion'd by the narrowness of the Bridge might cast upon them. The Scots conjecturing (as it was) that some Personage of Honour stand to have a view of the Arrier, call'd to the English to know if any Nobleman were near, for that one whom they nam'd (well known to be of honourable Condition) would present himself to the General in case he might safely be conducted. Certain young Soldiers not us'd to such Trains, made rash and sudden answer, that the Earl of Warwick was near, under whose Protection he might be assur'd. Hereupon they pass'd the Water, placed two hundred of their Prickers behind a Hillock, and with forty more cast about to find the Earl. Now the Earl espying six or seven of them scatter'd near the Army, and taking them to be of the English, sent one to command them to their Array, and to that end himself rode an easy pace towards them, follow'd only with ten or twelve on Horseback: He that had been sent before was so heedless, either to observe or advertise what they were, that the Earl did not discover them to be Enemies until he was in the mid't among them.

Certainly a Commander should not carelessly cast himself into danger; but when either upon necessity or misadventure he falleth into it, it much advanceth both his Reputation and Enterprise if bravely he behave himself. Now the Earl espying where he was, gave so rude a Charge upon a Captain of the Scots, nam'd Dandy Care, that he forc'd him to turn, and chased him above twelve score at the Lance's point. Herewith the residue retir'd deceitfully towards the place of their Ambush, from whence issued about sixty more. Then the Earl gather'd his small Company about him, and with good Countenance maintain'd the Fight. But the Enemy in the end, whether perceiving some Succours advancing from the Army where the Alarm was then taken, or whether intending to draw the English further into their Ambush, turn'd away an easy pace. The Earl forbade his Men from following, fearing a greater Ambush behind the Hill, as in truth there was. At his return he was receiv'd with great Applause by the English Soldiers, for that he did so well acquit himself in the Danger, whereinto by Error and not by Rashness he had been carry'd. One of his Men was slain, another hurt in the Buttock, a third nam'd Vane so grievously hewn, that many thousands have

I may happily be thought tedious in setting down these Occurrences which may seem small. But besides that in Actions of Arms small Matters are many times of very great Moment, especially when they serve to raise an opinion of Commanders, I intend to describe this Battel fully, not to derogate thereby any thing from the one Nation, or to arrogate to the other. For what Honour riseth upon event of a Battel, when oftentimes the smallest Accident overthroweth a side; and when Victory doth more often fall, by Errour of the vanquish'd than by Valour of the victorious. "But my Purpose is to make it appear what Miseries both Nations have avoided, and what Quietness and Security they have attain'd by their peaceable Union, when as either of them being able to bring such Forces into the Field for their mutual Ruin, they may now do the like for their common either Glory or Necessity. Again, this Battel being partially describ'd heretofore by the Writers of either Nation, and not without uncivil Terms, I will now set it forth as indifferently and fairly as I can. Lastly, this Battel is not slightly to be slip'd over, being the last (wherein I pray that I may prophecy truly) that was or ever shall be struck between the two Nations. But I return to my Purpose.

A Fight at Salt-Preston.

Now the Scottish Horsemen began to hover much upon the English Army, and to come pricking about them sometimes within the length of their staves, using some Liberty of Language to draw the English from their strength. But the General of the English knowing right well, that the Scots were expert in tumultuous Fights, restrain'd his Horse from falling forth, and maintain'd a close March until they came to Salt Preston by the Frith. Here they incamp'd within View of the Scottish Army, little more than two Miles distant from them. About a Mile from the English another way, the Scottish Horsemen were very busy upon a Hill, and embolden'd much partly upon their former Approaches, and partly by the nearness of their Army, but chiefly upon an Opinion which they conceiv'd, that the English Horsemen were young and unskilful, and easy to be dealt with, came upon the English with increas'd Troops, to the Number of 1200 besides 500 Foot which lay in ambush behind the Hill. The Lord Gray and Sir Francis Brian impatient of Braveries obtain'd leave of the General a little to assay them; and so as they came scatter'd upon the spur within a stones cast of the English and were beginning to wheel about, the Lord Gray with some Troops of Lighthorsemen charg'd them home. These were forthwith seconded by certain numbers of Demilances, and both back'd with about a thousand Men at Arms. The Scots meant not to depart before they had done their Errand; wherefore turning their Faces, boldly maintain'd the Fight, three Hours and more. In the end overlaid with Numbers they were put to flight, and chas'd almost to the Edge of their Camp: in this Fight the chiefest Force of the Scottish Horsemen was defeated, to their great Disadvantage afterwards. The Lord Hume by a fall from his Horse lost his Life. His Son and Heir with two Priests and six Gentlemen were taken Prisoners, and about 1300 slain. Of the English one Spanish Hackbutter was hurt, and three Captains of the Light-horse, by unadvis'd Pursuit, were taken Prisoners.

The day next following the Lord General and the Earl of Warwick rode towards the Place where the Scottish Army lay, to view the manner of their encamping: as they were return'd an Herald and a Trumpeter from the Scots overtook them, and having obtain'd Audience the Herald began, That he was sent from the Lord Governor of Scotland partly to inquire of Prisoners, but chiefly to make Offer, that because he was desirous to avoid not only Profusio: but the least Effusion of Christian Blood, and for that the English had not done any unmanlike Outrage or Spoil, he was content they might return, and should have his safe Conduct for their peaceable Passage.

Then the Trumpeter, that the Lord Huntley his Master sent Message by him, that as well for brief Expedition, as to spare Expence of Christian Blood, he would fight upon the whole Quarrel either with 20 against 20, or with 10 against 10, or more particularly by single Combat between the Lord General and himself; which in regard the Scots had Advantage both for Number and Freshness of Men, in regard also that for Supply, both for Provision and Succors they were at home, he esteem'd an honourable and charitable Offer.

To the Herald the Lord General answer'd, That as his coming was not with Purpose or Desire to endamage their Realm, as he was there, he would neither intreat nor accept of him leave to depart, but would measure his Marches in advancing or retiring, as his own Judgment, guided by Advice of his Council, should deem expedient.

To the Trumpeter he return'd answer, That the Lord Huntley his Master was a young Gentleman full of free more Courage, but more desirous of Glory than Judicious, as it seem'd, how to win it. That for number of Combatants it was not in his Power to conclude a Bargain, but was to employ all the Forces put under his Charge to the best Advantage that he could: that in case this were a particular Quarrel between the Governour and him, he would not refuse a particular Combat, but being a difference between the two Kingdoms, it was neither fit, nor in his Power either to undertake the Adventure upon his own Fortune, or bearing a publick Charge to hazard himself against a Man of private Condition.

Then the Earl of Warwick said, I marvel, Trumpeter, that thy Master would make his Challenge so fond, as he might well know it could not be accepted. For tell me, Trumpeter, can he think it fit, that he, to whose Charge is committed the Command of all this Army abroad, and at home the King's Person and Protection of all his Realms, should undertake a Combat with a particular Man? But he might have found others his equals amongst us, by whom he might have been assur'd that he should be answer'd. And (therewith turning his Speech to the Lord General) under your Grace's favour, I accept the Challenge. And bring me word, Trumpeter, that thy Master will perform with me as thou hast said, and thou shalt have a thousand Crowns for thy Travel.

Nay, answer'd the Lord General, you have a great Charge in the Army, which upon a private Man's Challenge you must not abandon. But, Herald, tell the Lord Governor, and the Lord Huntley, That 1547. That we have entred your Country with a sober Company (for so the Scots term a thing that is mean) your Army is both great and fresh, but let them appear upon indifferent ground, and assuredly they shall have fighting enough. And bring me word, Herald, that they will so do, and I will reward thee with a thousand Crowns.

This Earl of Huntley was a Man young, bold, adventurous, of very good Resolution and Skill in Arms. But this Challenge was so far beyond the Point both of Discretion and Honour, that the English that knew his noble Spirit, did believe that his Name was therein abus'd, which he manifested to be true by disavowing it openly afterwards. For it is not fit that a Man should abandon his publick Charge to undertake both the Office and Danger of a private Soldier. And therefore the like Challenge of Tullus was refus'd by the Commander of the Albanes, for that the Contention was not between their Persons, but between the Cities of Alba and Rome. So Sertorius was refus'd by Metellus, Antonius by Augustus, and John Emperor of Constantinople by a King of Scythia: so Antonius Caracalla by reason of his often Challenges, was esteem'd not to be so valiant as vain. And hereupon the Histories of our times forbear not to blame Charles the Fifth, Emperor, Henry the Eighth, King of England, and Francis the First, King of France, for that they often adventur'd rather as Soldiers than as Commanders.

But doubtless the Lord Governor made a most honourable Offer, and the rather for that it was conceiv'd by the English, that he held himself no less assur'd of Victory than he was of his own Resolution to fight, whereto it seem'd that he wanted not good Reason, chiefly upon Confidence of his own Forces, and partly upon Expectation of twelve Gallies and fifty Ships well appointed out of France to assail the English at their backs. All the chief Captains yielded to the same Advice of giving Battel, as out of their own Judgments, because they saw it agreeable to that which the Lord Governor had determin'd. To these the Residue attributed so much, that albeit diverse were of a different Opinion, yet they chose rather to condemn their own Understanding than to question theirs.

During this Enterparlance the Scots discharged four great shots against the English Camp, without harm as it happen'd, but not without breach of the 'Laws of the Field, whereby not only publick Messengers are privileged to pass without either Danger or Scorn, but until they have discharged their Message all hostility should surcease. However this happen'd the General of the English Army unwilling to be behind in any equal or honourable Offer, sent Letters to the Lord Governor of Scotland: Wherein he desir'd him and the residue of the Scottish Nobility to consider, That both Armies consisted of Christians, to whom nothing should be more dear than Peace, nothing more detestable than Effusion of humane Blood. That the Cause of this War did not proceed from Ambition, Avarice, or Hate, but from desire of perpetual Peace between their People and Nations, which could no way so firmly be knit as by knitting their Princes together in Marriage. That many other respects set aside, their King, for his Birth, his Years, his Royal Estate, his Princely Personage, Education, and Qualities, 1547. was such a Marriage for their Queen, that a more convenient could not be found; that in case all the Nobility of Scotland were not of one Mind, the English would be content that their Queen should be brought up amongst them, until she should be of Age to make her own choice; provided that in the meantime she should not be transported to any foreign Country, or any Agreement made for any other Marriage. That upon this Condition there should be an Abstinence of Hostility for all that time; and they would in quiet manner withdraw their Army, and repair all Damages which indifferent Commissioners should adjudg.

No Answer was hereto return'd, but Rumors ran freely among the Scottish Soldiers, that the Intention of the English was to take away their Queen by force, and under pretence of Marriage to reduce the Kingdom under their Dominion: and verily it may seem almost incredible that all these fair Overtures, made by Men well esteem'd for honest dealing, could take no place; that nothing could move the Scots to forsake their distant and heavy helps, and to embrace Friends, both ready and at hand. But besides that the long continu'd Wars between the English and the Scots, had then rais'd invincible Jealousies and Hate, which long continu'd Peace had since abolish'd, I do herein admire the unsearchable working and will of God, by whose inflexible Decree the Union between the two Realms did not then take effect, when by the Death of King Edward it should have been of short continuance (as by the Death of Francis the Second, the Union between France and Scotland did suddenly dissolve) but was reserv'd unto a more peaceable and friendly time, so for a Person in whose Progeny it hath taken deep and durable root. And so for that time no Conditions of Peace being regarded, both sides address'd themselves to their Adventure.

The Places where the two Armies lay encamp'd, were divided by the River Eske, the Banks whereof were almost as deep as the Banks of the Peathes mention'd before. The Scots lay somewhat near the one side, and the English about two miles from the other. The English first rais'd their Camp, and began to march towards the River Eske, intending to possess a Hill call'd Under-Eske, which commanded the Place where their Enemies lay. The Scots conjecturing so much, cast their Tents flat upon the ground, pass'd the River and mounted the Hill before the English could come near. Hereupon the English turn'd aside to another Hill call'd Pinkenclench, which afterwards fell much to their Advantage, as well for that they were then in Place to be aided by their Ships which rode near in Edinburg Frith, as also for that they gain'd thereby the Advantage both of Wind and Sun, a great part of the strength of an Army, and lastly for that their Enemies were thereby cast into a cruel Errour.

For no sooner did they espy the English turning from them, but forthwith they were of Opinion that they fled towards their Shipping. This surmise was first occasion'd for that the English Ships remov'd the day before from Leith to Muscledborough Frith, which was conceiv'd to be for taking in their Foot and Carriages, that the Horsemen might with less incumbrance and more hast return back upon 1547. the spur. Hereupon they had appointed the same Night (whose Darknes would have encreas'd the Fear) to have given a Camifado upon the English. But understanding that they were well entrench'd, having good Scouts abroad, and sure Watch within, they brake that purpose; but upon this declining of the English from them, the Conceit did again revive, not only as a thing desir'd, but because the English were inferior to them in number, and had travel'd far, and were well known to grow short in their Provisions. Yea when they were discern'd to make stand upon the first ascent of Pinkenslench Hill, the Conjecture ran that their Flight was only defer'd, until they might cover their Disorders, by the dead Darknes of the Night. Marvellous Security and always dangerous, when Men will not believe any Bees to be in a Hive, until they have a sharp sense of their Stings.

And thus the Scots heav'd up into high hope of Victory, took the English fallen, for foolish Birds fallen into their Net; and seeming to fear nothing more than that they should escape, forsook their Hill and march'd into the Plain, directly towards the English. Here the Lord Governour put them in remembrance, how they could never yet be brought under by the English, but were always able either to beat them back, or to weary them away. He had them look upon themselves and upon their Enemies, themselves dreadful, their Enemies gorgeous and brave; on their side, Men, on the other, Spoil, in case either through Slowness or Cowardice, they did not permit them to escape, who (so now) already have begun their Fight.

The Scots Army.

The whole Army consisted of 35 or 36000 Men, of whom they made three Battalions. In the Vanguard commanded by the Earl of Angus, about 15000 were plac'd, about 10000 in the Battail, over whom was the Lord Governour, and so many in the Rear, led by the valiant Gordone Earl of Huntley. Hackbutters they had none, no Men at Arms but about 2000 Horsemen, Prickers as they are term'd, fitter to make Excursions and to chafe, than to sustain any strong Charge. The residue were on Foot well furnish'd, with Jack and Skull, Pike, Dagger, Bucklers made of Board, and Slicing Swords, broad, thin and of an excellent Temper. Every Man had a large Kerchief folded twice or thrice about the Neck, and many of them had Chains of Latten, drawn three or four times along their Hofes and doublet Sleeves; they had also to affright the Enemies Horses, big Rattles cover'd with Parchment or Paper, and small Stones within, put upon Staves about three Ells long. But doubtless the rattling of Shot might have done better Service.

The Earl of Angus led the Vanguard with a well measur'd march; whereupon the Lord Governour commanded him by a Messenger to double his Pace, thereby to strike some Terror into the Enemy. Himself follow'd with the Battail a good distance behind, and after came the Rear well nigh even with the Battail on the left side: the Vanguard was flank'd on the right side with four or five Pieces of Artillery drawn by Men, and with 400 Horsemen Prickers on the left. The Battail and Rear were likewise guarded with Artillery, in like sort drawn; and about 4000 Irish Archers, brought by the Earl of Argyle, serv'd as a Wing to them both, rightly so term'd as being the first who began the Flight.

The General of the English and the Earl of Warwick were together, when the Scots thus abandon'd the Hill; which they espying, gave Thanks to God, holding themselves in good hope of the Event: forthwith they order'd the Artillery, and taking a loving leave departed to their severall Charge, the General to the Battail, where the King's Standard was born, the Earl to the Vanguard, both on Foot, protesting that they would live or die with the Soldiers, whom also with bold Countenance and Speech (which serve Soldiers for the best Eloquence) they put in mind of the Honor their Ancestors had acquir'd, of their own extreme Disgrace and Danger if they fought not well, that the Justice of their Quarrel should not so much encourage as enrage them, being to revenge the Dishonor done to their King, and to chastise the deceitful dealings of their Enemies; that the multitude of their Enemies should nothing dismay them, because they who come to maintain their own Breach of Faith, besides that the Check of their Consciences much breaketh their Spirit, have the omnipotent Arm of God most furious against them.

Herewith arose a buzzing noise among them, as if it had been the rustling found of the Sca afar off, every Man addressing himself to his Office, and encouraging those who were nearest unto them. The Earl rang'd his Vanguard in array, upon the side of the Hill, expecting until the Enemy should more nearly approach. The General after he had order'd his Battail, part upon the Hill, and part upon the Plain, somewhat distant from the Vanguard on the right side, mounted the Hill to the great Artillery, to take a view of both the Armies, and to give directions as occasion should change. The Rear stood wide of the Battail, upon the same side, but altogether upon the Plain. The Lord Gray Captain of the Men at Arms, was appointed to stand somewhat distant from the Vanguard on the left side, in such a sort as he might take the Flank of the Enemy, but was forbidden to charge, until the Foot of the Vanguard were buckled with them in Front, and until the Battail should be near enough for his relief.

Now after that the Scots were well advanc'd in the Field, marching more than an ordinary pace, the great Shot from the English Ships, and especially from the Gally, began furiously to scour among them, whereby the Master of Grime, and divers others about were torn in pieces; especially the Wing of the Irish was so grievously either gall'd or scar'd therewith, that (being Strangers and in a manner Neutrals) they had neither good heart to go forward, nor good liking to stand still, nor good assurance to run away. The Lord Gray perceiv'd this Amazement, and conceiv'd thereby occasion to be ripe; whereupon when the Enemy was not above two flight shot from the English Vanguard, suddenly and against direction with his Men at Arms, he charg'd them on head.

The Scots were then in a fallow Field, whereinto the English could not enter, but over a cross Ditch and a Slough, in passing whereof, many of the English Horse were plung'd, and some mir'd: when with some difficulty and much disorder they had pass'd this Ditch, the Ridges of the fallow Field lay traverse, so as the English must cross them in presenting the Charge. Two other disadvantages they had, the Enemy's Pikes were longer than 1547. than their Staves, and their Horses were naked without any Barbs. For albeit many brought Barbs out of England, yet because they expected not in the morning to fight that day, few regarded to put them on.

The manner of the Engagement of the Armies.

The Scots confident both in their Number, Order, and good Appointment, did not only abide the English, but with some biting Terms provok'd them to charge. They clos'd, and in a manner lock'd themselves together, Shoulder to Shoulder, so near as possibly they could; their Pikes they strain'd in both Hands, and therewith their Buckler in the left, the one end of the Pike against the right Foot, the other Breast high against the Enemy. The fore Rank stoop'd so low, as they seem'd to kneel; the second Rank close at their Backs, cross'd their Pikes over their Shoulders, and so did the third and the rest in their order, so as they appear'd like the thorny Skin of a Hedgehog, and it might be thought impossible to break them. Notwithstanding the Charge was given with so well govern'd Fury, that the left Corner of the Scots Battalion was enforc'd to give in; but the Scots did so bravely recover and acquit themselves, that divers of the English Horsemen were overthrown, and the residue so disorder'd as they could not conveniently fight or fly, and not only justled and bare down one another, but in their confus'd tumbling back, brake a part of the Vanguard on Foot. In this encounter Six and Twenty of the English were slain, most part Gentlemen of the best Esteem. Divers others lost their Horses, and carry'd away Marks that they had been there. The Lord Gray was dangerously hurt with a Pike in the Mouth, which struck two Inches into his Neck. The Lord Edward Seymour Son to the Lord General lost his Horse, and the English Standard was almost lost.

Assuredly albeit Encounters between Horsemen on the one side, and Foot on the other, are seldom with the Extremity of Danger, because as Horsemen can hardly break a Battail on Foot, so Men on Foot cannot possibly chase Horsemen: Yet hereupon so great was the Tumult and Fear among the English, that had not the Commanders been Men both of approv'd Courage and Skill, or happily had the Scots been well furnish'd with Men at Arms, the Army had that day been utterly undone. For an Army is commonly like a Flock of Fowls, when some begin to fly all will follow. But the Lord Gray to repair his Error endeavour'd with all Industry to rally his Horse: The Lord General also mounted on Horseback and came amongst them, both by his Presence and Advice, to reduce them into order. Sir Ralph Vane and Sir Ralph Sadler did memorable Service. But especially the Earl of Warwick, who was in greatest Danger, declar'd his Resolution and Judgment, to be most present in retaining his Men both in Order and in Heart. And having clear'd his Foot from Disturbance by the Horsemen, he sent forth before the Front of his Vanguard Sir Peter Mewcas Captain of all the Hackbutterers on Foot, and Sir Peter Gamboa, a Spaniard, Captain of two hundred Hackbutterers Spanish and Italians on Horse. These brought their Men to the Slough mention'd before, who discharging lively almost close to the Face of the Enemy did much amaze them, being also disorder'd by the late pursuit of the English Horsemen, and by spoiling such as they had overthrown.

At the Backs of these, the Archers were plac'd, who before had march'd on the right Wing of the Vanguard, and then sent such Showers of Shot over the Hackbutterers Heads, that many Bodies of their Enemies being but half arm'd, were beaten down and bury'd therewith. And besides, the Master of the Artillery did visit them sharply, with murdering Hail-shot from the Pieces mounted towards the Top of the Hill; also the Artillery which flank'd the Rear executed hotly. Lastly the Ships were not idle, but especially the Gally did play upon them, and plague them very fore.

The Scots being thus apply'd with Shot, and perceiving the Vanguard of the English to be in good Order, nearly to approach, and the Men at Arms to have recover'd their Array, turn'd their Vanguard somewhat towards the South, to win, as it was thought, some advantage of ground. By this means they fell directly on the head of the English Battail, whereupon the Earl of Warwick address'd his Men to take the Flank. The Vanguard of the Scots being thus upon, and beset with Enemies, began a little to retire towards their great Battail, either to be in place to be reliev'd by them, or happily to draw the English more separate and apart. The Irish Archers espying this, and surmising the Danger to be greater than it was, suddenly broke up, and committed the Safety of their Lives to their nimble Footmanship. After whose example, all the rest threw away their Weapons, and in headlong haste abandon'd the Field, not one stroke having been given by the English on foot. But then the Horsemen coming furiously forward, had them very cheap.

The Flight was made three Ways, some The Scots running to Edinburgh, some along the Sands sh. towards Leith, but the most towards Dalkeith, which way, by reason of the Marsh the English Horse were least able to pursue. The Chase was given from One of the Clock in the Afternoon, till almost Six. It reach'd five Miles in length, and four in breadth, all which Ways the Scots scatter'd in their Flight Jacks, Swords, Bucklers, Daggers, or whatsoever was either cumbersome, or of weight to impeach their haste; yea some cast off their Shoes and Doublets, and fled in their Shirts. Divers other Devices were practis'd to avoid or defer the present Danger. Some intreated and offer'd large Ransoms, some being pursu'd only by one, suddenly turn'd Head and made Resistance, by whom many Horses were disabled, and some of their Horses either slain or hurt. The Earl of Angus, a Man of assur'd both Hardiness and Understanding, couch'd in a Furrow, and was pass'd over for dead, until a Horse was brought for his Escape. Two thousand others lying all the Day as dead, departed in the Night, divers others plung'd into the River Eske, and cover'd themselves under Roots and Branches of Trees, many so strain'd themselves in their Race, that they fell down breathless and dead, whereby they seem'd in running from their Deaths, to run unto it.

The English discern'd in their Retreat that the Execution had been too cruel, and far exceeding the Bounds of ordinary Hostility, which happily was a Cause in the secret Judgment of God, that they had no better fruit of their Victory. The dead Bodies lay all the way scatter'd so thick, as a Man may see Sheep

A great Slaughter of Scots.

1547. Sheep grazing in a well-stor'd Pasture, most slain in the Head or Neck, for that the Horsemen could not well touch lower with their Swords; and scarce credible it is how soon they were strip'd and laid naked upon the Ground. But then again the Eyes of all Men were fastned upon them with pity and admiration to behold so many naked Bodys, as for tallness of Stature, whiteness of Skin, largeness and due proportion of Limbs, could hardly be equal'd in any one Country. The Ground where their several Battalions first brake, lay strew'd with Pikes so thick as a Floor is usually strew'd with Rushes, whereby the places could hardly be pass'd over either by Horse or by Foot: The River Eske ran red with Blood, so as they who perish'd therein might almost be said to be drown'd in their Fellows Blood.

On the other side, when they came to the place where the Englishmen at Arms had been defeated, many of their Horses were found grievously gash'd or goar'd to death. The English who there perish'd were so deeply wounded, especially on the Head, that not one could be discern'd by his Face. Brave Edward Shellie, who was the first Man that charg'd, was known only by his Beard; Little Preston, for that both his Hands were cut off, being known to have worn Bracelets of Gold about his Wrists; others were brought to knowledg by some such particular Marks. Hereby appeareth (as I said before) what Blessing is grown to both Nations by their late happy Union, when before they were like two rude encountring Rams, whercof he that escapes best is sure of a Blow.

Of the Scots slain and taken Prisoners.

Divers of the Nobility of Scotland were here slain, and many Gentlemen both of Worth and noble Birth; of the inferior sort about 10000, and as some say 14000 lost their Lives. Of the English were slain 51 Horsemen and one Footman, but a far greater number hurt. The Scottish Prisoners accounted by the Marshal's Book were about 1500. The chief whereof were the Earl of Huntley, the Lords Tesler, Hoblie and Hamilton, the Mr. of Sam-poole, and the Lord of Wimmes. A Herauld was also taken, but discharg'd forthwith. The Execution was much maintain'd by the Scots own Swords scatter'd in every place: for no sooner had an English Horseman broke his Sword, but forthwith he might take up another; infomuch that many of them broke three or four before their return. So apparent is the Hand of God against violation of Faith, that it is often chastis'd by the Means appointed to defend it.

Kirkmen in the Scots
Army.

Of all other the Englishmen were least favourable to the Priests and Monks, by the Scots call'd Kirkmen, who had been equally troublesome in Peace, and unprofitable in War. To whom many, as well English as Scots, imputed the Calamity of that Day; these made a Band of three or four thousand, as it was said, but they were not altogether so many. Howbeit many Bishops and Abbots were among them; from these divers Scots feared more Harm by Victory, than they found among their Enemies by their Overthrow. After the Field a Banner was found of white Sarfenet, whereon a Woman was painted, her Hair about her Shoulders, kneeling before a Crucifix, on her right Hand a Church, and along the Banner in fair Letters written, Afflicta Ecclesia ne obliviscaris. This was suppos'd to have been the Kirkmens Banner. But could this Crucifix have spoken, as one is said to have spoken to St. Francis, and another to St. Thomas, it might happily have told them, that neither Religious Persons are fit Men for Arms, nor Arms fit Means either to establish or advance Religion.

I must not forget the Fidelity of a Scottish Earl of Soldier towards the Earl of Huntley. He finding the Earl assaulted by the English, and without his Helmet, took off his own Headpiece and put it on the Earl's Head. The Earl was therewith taken Prisoner, but the Soldier for want thereof was presently struck down. This Earl was of great Courage, and for this Cause much loved of his Soldiers, to whom he was no less loving again. This he manifested by his great Care for such Scottish Prisoners as were either wounded or poor, providing at his proper Charge, Cure for the one, and Relief for the other. This Earl being ask'd whilst he was Prisoner, how he stood affected to the Marriage? answer'd, That he was well-affected to favour the Marriage, but he nothing liked that kind of Wooing.

Certain of those who escap'd by flight excus'd their Dishonor, not without a sharp Jest against some of their Leaders, affirming, That as they had follow'd them into the Field, so it was good reason they should follow them out. Those bitter Jests, the more Truth they carry, the more biting Memory they leave behind.

The Day of this Fight being the 10th of September, seemeth to be a most disastrous Day to the Scots, not only in regard of this Overthrow, but for that upon the same Day 34 Years before, they were in like sort defeated by the English at Flodden Field. The Victory rais'd exceeding Joy among the English, partly because it came so Cheap, and partly by reason of the great Danger and greater Terror that had been cast upon them by reason of the Repulse and Disarray of their Men at Arms.

Now as seldom one Accident, either prosperous or adverse, cometh unaccompany'd with the like, so this Calamity hapned not to the Scots alone: For whilst the English Army had thus drawn both the Preparations and Intentions of the Scots wholly upon them, the Lord Wharton, and the Earl of Lenox, entred Scotland on the West Marches with 5000 Men, and having marched two Miles they won the Church of Anan, a strong Place, and always much annoying the English; there they took sixty two Prisoners, fir'd most part of the Spoil, and overthrew the Fort with Powder: Passing sixteen Miles further, they took the Castle of Milk, which they fortify'd strongly, and planted a Garison therein; and after much spoil and wast of the Country, return'd safely into England.

These Successes did strike such a Terror into many of the Scots, that the Earl Bothwell, and divers chief Gentlemen of Trivedale and Meers, supposing to find more easy Conditions by yielding than by striving, submitted themselves to the King of England, and were receiv'd by the Lord General into protection. But it is most certain that the English made not their best Improvements of these fortunate Events, and that especially by two miserable Errors, Cunctation in prosecuting, and Hast in departure. But doubtless the Union of these two Realms was a Work most proper to God's Omnipotent Arm, which afterwards effected the same, as by milder Means, so in a more durable Manner than they could have been united by Arms. This high Appointment of God we must reverence and admire,

First therefore after the Retreat, the English lodg'd the same Night in the Place where the Battle had been fought. Where, and in the Villages not far distant, they sojourn'd five Days without doing any thing; in the mean time the English search'd the Rivers and Havens where the Scottish Ships were retir'd, in such sort as they left few Ships of War unspoiled or untaken: The Army also gather'd the Spoil of the Field, whereof 30000 Jacks and Swords, and thirty Pieces of great Artillery were ship'd for England.

The English take many Places,

The English having thus long breath'd, and thereby given breathing to their Enemies, fir'd Leith, took St. Colmes, Broughticragge, Rockefborough, Humes Castle, Aymouth, Fial Castle, Dunglass, Kilnecombe, and divers other small Places, whereof part they ruin'd, part they enlarg'd and fortify'd, and furnish'd them with able Soldiers, accusom'd with often and prosperous Success. Herewith, as if they had been weary of their fair Fortunes, they suddenly brake off the Enterprize, and return'd another way into England, having staid not above five and twenty Days in Scotland, and lost under sixty Men. The Pretence of their departure was worse than the Departure it self, namely, for that the Year and their Provisions were far spent, and the Country afforded little Forage. Assuredly, as Nature taketh least care for those things which she formeth in haste, so violent and storm-like Fortunes, how terrible so ever, are seldom durable.

And depart home.

The Policy of the Scotts Government.

Now the Lord Governor of Scotland being of great Courage, and sober Judgment, as a Man might well read in his Face; as he had amply perform'd his Duty, both before the Battel and in the Field; so especially after the Fight he declar'd himself to be of a stout and unbroken Spirit: For, first, he assembled the disperfed Forces of the Scottish Army, albeit not in sufficient manner to give a fresh Battel, by reason that much of their Armour was lost, yet able to keep the English from ranging at large. Then he presented the English with divers offers of Treaty touching Matters in difference, until the Country was discharg'd of them. Lastly, Knowing right-well that Counsels are commonly censur'd by Events, and that in Matters of Arms, albeit the praise of prosperous Success is shar'd amongst many, yet the blame of Misadventures is charged upon one; and fearing hereby Mutinies among his own People, and contempt of others, having first assur'd the young Queen in place of good Defence, he assembled the Scottish Nobility, and us'd words to this effect.

The Governor of Scotland's Speech to the Nobility.

I Assure my self that many of you, my Lords, and more of the Vulgar, are much displeas'd with me, for that I have advis'd this War whereof so sad Events have follow'd. For this Cause I have assembled you together to reduce you to a better Opinion, or to blame you deeply, either if you remain offended, or if you cast down your Courage through Fear, the betrayer of all Succours which Reason can afford. For tell me, if you are discontented with me for advising this War, do you not condemn yourselves for following the Advice? It is certain that at the first you were all of my Opinion, and that I did nothing without your Approvement. If now upon one Misadventure you change your Judgments, and charge the Fault only upon me, you do me wrong and discover your own Weakness, in being unable to endure those things which you knew were casual, and which you were resolv'd to endure. But I make no doubt but the same Reasons which induc'd you to entertain this War, will induce you also to prosecute the same, howsoever sudden and unexpected Events dismay your Judgments for the present.

Touching my self I was always of Opinion, and shall never change, that it is better the Kingdom should be in good Estate, with particular Loss to many of the People, than that all the People should be well, and the State of the Kingdom altogether lost or dishonourably impair'd; even as it is better that a Ship should be preserv'd with some discommodity to the Sailers, than that the Sailers being in health the Ship should perish; or as it is less dangerous when divers parts of a Tower are decay'd, and the Foundation firm, than when the Foundation is ruinous, albeit the Parts remain entire: For the common Estate is but weakned by Calamities of particular Persons, but the Ruin of the State involveth all in a general Destruction. And therefore they are to be blam'd alike, both who move and who decline War upon particular respects, the common either Honour or Necessity must be the true Measure of both.

But the Cause of this War is no other, than that we will not incontinently submit our selves to do what our Neighbours require; that is, because at the first word we are not forward to thrust our Necks under the Girdles of our Enemies, yea our old Enemies, yea our only Enemies of any account for many Years, who in their gluttonous Hope have devour'd our Kingdom; who by the bloody Execution of their late Victories, have shewn what Courtesy we may expect at their hands. In doing whereof we shall abandon our antient and approved Friends, who as they never fail'd us in our Extremities, so are they now prepar'd with large Aids to relieve us, who will not fear or pause at the least, before he leap upon this sudden Changer, who will forsake long try'd Friends to rely upon those who always have been ready by Arms to infest us: Not at all times upon desire either of Revenge or Spoil, but to bring us under their ambitious Dominion. Which of us had not rather die this Day, than see our Enemies in our strongest Castles, and Yoaks of Garisons cast upon our Necks? Who will not prefer a Death for Liberty, before a Life without it?

Their Promises are fair and large indeed, I must say, but of what Assurance? What Assurance can we have, but that when we have lifted them into the Chair of State, we shall not be compelled to be their Footmen? If our Prince were a Man, and should marry an Inheritrix of England, we should happily have no cause to fear but that he would maintain the Liberty of his native Country; but being a Woman, and desir'd in marriage of a King of England, under whose Power and Custody she must abide, how shall we be able against his Mind either to benefit or preserve us? Verily, as Men hate those that affect that Honour by Ambition which pertaineth not to them, so are they much more odious who,

1547. who, either through Negligence or through Fear, will betray the Glory and Liberty which they have.

Now, my Lords, if any surmise, either that this War will be long, or that we shall have the worst in the End, his Error is great; for removing whereof I must tell you, that which many of you seem either little to remember, or never to have known: Do you suppose the State of this Realm (of the Valour whereof the Enemy hath often woful proof) to be now so feeble that it cannot bear off a greater Blow than this? It hath often done it, and is able of it self to do it again, if our Endeavours be answerable to our Means. Our Ancestors have sustained many greater Dangers, and yet retaining their Liberty, have left both it and their Honour entire to us; what are we of less Heart than they? For of less Ability we are not: Shall we shew our selves unworthy of our Succession from them? Assuredly it is more shame for a Man to lose that which he holdeth, than to fail in getting that which he never had.

But suppose our Forces to be nearer driven than they are; our antient Allies the French are upon the Seas and near approaching for our Relief, also our Friends in Italy, and other Parts have sent us Mony to supply our Wants: wherefore, Lords, it is meet that we resume our antient Courage, and address our selves for new Preparation, not only upon those hopes both from our selves and our Friends, but in Contempt of our Enemies. For often it happeneth that a Prosperity unexpected maketh Men careless and remiss if they be not very wise; whereas they who have received that Wound become more vigilant and collected, especially when they see not only the common Honour and Liberty, but their particular both Seigniories and Safeties to be at the stake.

And albeit the Enemy hath done that which it was to be believ'd they would endeavour to do, in case we would not yield unto them, yet as those things must be endured upon necessity, which happen by the hand of God, so those which come from Enemies must be born by Virtue. And since it is a Custom of our Country so to do, sith our People are famous for being nothing abash'd at cross Events, take we heed this Virtue fail not in us. If it doth, if we shew our selves heartless and faint, we shall utterly overthrow not only the Glory but the Memory, both of our Ancestors and of our State.

As for those who have yielded to our Enemies, let us esteem them as Fugitives and Traitors, who endeavour to cast themselves and their Country into Subjection; but let us stand assur'd, that they who least shrink at the storms of Fortune, whether in publick or private Affairs, are always most virtuous and victorious in the end.

The Lord Protector
rewarded.

On the other side King Edward added to his Glory, Courtesy and Liberality; shewing himself most gracious in Countenance to all, and giving Rewards suitable to every Mans Performance or Place. The Lord Protector he rewarded with Lands of the yearly Value of 500*l.* and certain it is that these first Fortunes rais'd unto him a great Respect both in other Countries and among his own People, and the rather because he was discern'd to be much searching both into the Counsels and after the Events of all his Affairs, and likewise into the Condition and State both of his own Strength and of the Countries near unto him.

But these prosperous Proceedings were not only hinder'd, in their fairest Course, but altogether stay'd, and in some measure turn'd back by reason of the unadvis'd Forwardness of divers chief Counsellors, in making both sudden and unseasonable Alterations in Matters of State, whose greedy desires of having their Wills in all they lik'd, bred both trouble to the Realm and to themselves danger. For great and sudden Changes are never without danger, unless the Prince be both well settl'd in Government and able to bear out his Actions by Power; but whilst King Edward was both unripe in years and new in Government, to attempt a Change both sudden and great, could not but be accompany'd with many Mischiefs. The great Matters wherein Alteration was wrought were especially two, Religion, and Inclosures.

Now for that Religion is of so high and noble a Nature, of so absolute necessity in a Commonwealth, that it is esteem'd the Foundation of Laws, and the common band of human Society, no sudden Alteration can almost be made therein, but many will be induc'd thereby to attempt some Alteration in Rule, whence (saith Dio) Conspiracies and Seditions are often occasion'd. For Religion being seated in the high Throne of Conscience, is a most powerful Ruler of the Soul, and far prefer'd before Estimation of Life, or any other worldly respect; for this advanceth Man to the highest Happiness, it leadeth him to his last End; all other things are but Instruments, this is the Hand; all other things are but Accessories, this is the Principal. And therefore as all Men are naturally mov'd by Religion, so when they are violently thrust forward by those who (as Livy speaketh) make it their purpose to possess Souls by Superstition, then do they break all bands of Reason and of Rule, no Persuasion of the one, no Command of the other can then restrain them. Multitudo ubi religione capta est, melius vatibus quam ducibus suis parat. Curt. lib. 4.

I will not deny but that some Change in Religion is often expedient and sometimes necessary; because, more in that than in any other thing, it is hard to contain Men from running into one of these Extremes, either of vain Superstition, or of careless Contempt. But this must be done with a soft and tender hand, and as Cicero speaketh, Ut quum minima sonitu orbis in republica convertatur. Some Respect should also have been given to those green times, to the monstrous Multitude muffled with two great Plagues and Corruptions of Judgment, Custom and Ignorance, whereto may be added Grief at their own Wants, and Envy at the Prosperity of others, especially for that many bold Spirits were busy'd, not only to incense, but to lead them into much Variety of Mischief. And if it be said that King Henry the Eighth had quietly pass'd the like Change before; I answer, the Example was not then to be follow'd, the Kings were not equal either in Spirit or in Power. Even as it is in the Fable, that albeit an Eagle did bear away a Lamb in her Talons with full flight, yet a Raven endeavouring to do the like was held

1547. Inclosures. held entangl'd and fetter'd in the Fleece. Touching Inclosures, I am not ignorant what a profitable Purchase is made thereby, not only to particular Persons, but generally to the whole Commonwealth, in case it be without Depopulation, because a Company of Lands inclos'd are thereby improv'd in worth two or three parts at the least; hereby two great Commodities ensue, Riches and Multitude of People, because the more Riches are rais'd out of Lands, the more People are thereby maintain'd. This doth plainly appear by two Shires, almost equal both in Greatness and in Goodness of Soil: Northampton much Champain, and Somerset altogether Inclos'd. For if Estimation may be made by Musters, and by Subsidies, Tenths, and Fifteens, Inclosure hath made the one County more than double to exceed the other, both in People and in Wealth. (n)

The Protector censur'd in forbidding Inclosures. Notwithstanding the Lord Protector gaping after the fruitless Breath of the Multitude, and more desirous to please the most than the best, caused a Proclamation to be set forth against Inclosures, commanding that they who had inclos'd any Lands accustomed to lie open, should upon (o) a certain Pain before a day assign'd lay them open again. This Proclamation, whilst few were forward to obey, gave occasion to the mutinous Multitude, instable in Judgment, and tempestuous when they are stir'd, all carry'd with a headlong Rashness, and one following another, as wiser than himself, immoderately both in Desire and Hope to be easily drawn by others who had deeper Reaches than themselves, to matters which at the first they least intended.

Commissioners sent abroad with Injunctions for Religion. And again, soon after the beginning of the young King's Reign, certain Injunctions (p) were set forth for removing Images out of Churches, which had been highly, not only esteem'd but honour'd before, and for abolishing or altering some other antient Observations in the Church. Hereupon Commissioners were dispatch'd into all parts of the Realm to see those Injunctions to be executed: with those divers Preachers were sent, furnish'd with Instructions to persuade the People from praying to Saints and for the dead, from adoring Images, from use of Beads, Ashes and Processions, from Mass, Dirges, praying in an unknown Language; and from some other like things, whereunto long Custom had wrought a religious Observation. And for Defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed to be publickly read in Churches, aiming at the very same end.

Some others offering to maintain these Ceremonies, were either punish'd or forc'd to recant. Edmund Bonner (q) Bishop of London was committed Prisoner to the Fleet, for refusing to receive these Injunctions. Stephen Gardiner was likewise committed first to the Fleet, afterwards to the Tower, for that he had openly preach'd, that it were well these Changes in Religion should be stay'd, until the King were of years to govern by himself. This the People apprehending worse than it was either spoken or meant, a Question began to be rais'd among them, whether during the King's Minority such Alterations might lawfully be made or no. For the like Causes Tunstall Bishop of Duresme, and Heath Bishop of Rochester, were in like manner committed to Prison: all these being then and still continuing famous for Learning and Judgment, were dispossest of their Bishopricks; but no Man was touch'd in Life.

Hereupon a Parliament was held in the first Year of the King: and by Prorogation in the second, wherein diverse Colleges, Chantries, free Chappels, Fraternities, Guildes, &c.

(n) Our Author blames the Counsels, as unadvised, that were taken for Alterations, both in respect of Religion and of Inclosures; because of the Danger thereof in the new Reign of the young King; and that as to Religion, the King Henry VIII. past the like Change before, yet that Example was not then to be followed, the King being not equal either in Spirit or Power.] These were the very Considerations that Bishop Gardiner, and the Papists in those times used with the Protector, and others of the Council, against attempting a Reformation of Religion. But there was indeed no such Danger in the Attempt, that it required King Henry's Spirit and Power, since the Nation generally was well prepared and disposed to it; nay, and most earnestly waited for and desired it. J. S.

(o) The Author dislikes the Protector's Proclamation for laying down Inclosures by a certain day. Which he saith being not obeyed, gave occasion to the Multitude to make Tumults. In truth, the Inclosures themselves, whereby vast Numbers of poor People (whose Right it was) had the Food taken out of their Mouths by the Rich, were the Causes of Tumults. The Proclamation was but just and reasonable, to redress such Wrongs done to the poor Subjects. J. S.

(p) The Author seems to disapprove the setting forth of the Injunctions in the beginning of the King's Reign, for removing Images out of the Churches, and for abolishing some Ceremonies, because the People had an Honour and Esteem of them. If such Regard was to be had to the People, why should they not be as well regarded in their Complaints of Inclosures, which he expresses himself much for? But herein, whatsoever of a Politician, our Author shewed himself surely but an indifferent Protestant. If it were ground sufficient not to reform Religion, because it would give Distast to the superstitious People, Religion must never be reformed. But in truth, vast were the Numbers of People, throughout the Land, especially the most civilized Parts of it, that at this time of day did heartily expect a Reformation from the Worship of Images, and superstitious Ceremonies. J. S.

(q) He placeth here, in the first year of the King, the Commitment of Bishop Bonner, Bishop Gardiner, Bishop Tunstall, and Bishop Heath. Bonner indeed endured a short Restraint in the Fleet then; but that which may be truly called his Imprisonment happened but in September 1549. Heath's the same year, Tunstall's not before the year 1551. And only Gardiner's happened in the King's first year, tho he was put at Liberty again not long after. Nor was Bonner put into Prison for refusing the King's Injunctions, as Hayward asserts; for he did receive them, tho under a Protestation: but the true Reason was, because he did not publish in a Sermon the King's Authority during his Minority, as he was commanded. But hitherto, having recanted before the Council, for the ill manner of his receiving the Injunctions and Homilies from the King's Visitors, he went along with the King's Proceedings, swore Obedience to the King, professed his Assent and Consent touching the State of Religion then settled, directed out his Letters according to the Archbishop's Precepts, for abolishing Images, Abrogation of the Mass, setting up Bibles in Churches, ministering in both kinds, &c.

Neither was the Cause of Gardiner's Imprisonment this first year of the King, because he had preached against making Changes in Religion till the King was of years, as it is here said, but for his Refractoriness to the King's Proceedings. His second Imprisonment indeed was occasioned by a Sermon which he preached on St. Peter's day, in the second year of the King; yet not for preaching that the Changes in Religion should be stay'd, but for omitting to speak of several Matters committed to him in Writing, by Command of the Council, as concerning the usurped Power of the Bishop of Rome, the Superstitions used towards St. Nicolas, and other Saints; concerning the Authority of the King in his Minority; concerning auricular Confession, and some other things.

Heath was committed for refusing to subscribe the new Book of Ordinations: Nor was Heath now Bishop of Rochester, as our Author styles him, but of Worcester.

He leaves out Day Bishop of Chichester; whom he might have mentioned among the rest of Bishops committed. The Cause of whose Restraint was, because he refused to obey an Order from the King, to take away Altars out of his Diocess. J. S.

1547. with all their Lands and Goods were put into the actual Possession of the King: part of the Goods and Lands being sold at a low Value, enrich'd many, and ennobl'd some, and thereby made them firm in maintaining the Change; also that no Man should speak against receiving the Eucharist under both kinds (r), which had been restrain'd in times before; and that Bishops should be plac'd by Collation of the King under his Letters Patent, without any precedent Election or Confirmation ensuing, and that all Processes Ecclesiastical should be made in the King's Name, as in Writs at the common Law; and that all Persons exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, should have the King's Arms in their Seals of Office: and further the Statute of the six Articles, and other Statutes concerning Punishment of Lollards were repeal'd, and so was another Statute restraining the Use of Scriptures in the English Tongue, and the King's Supremacy over the Church of England was confirm'd. Herewith a Book was set forth for publick Prayers by Proclamation, and for Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Offices of the Church (f); and diverse Punishments were appointed by Proclamation, either for not using the Forms prescribed in that Book, or for depraving any thing therein contain'd.

I forbear to rehearse other Acts of this Parliament, albeit a noble Writer in our time esteems it to be a main in History that the Acts of Parliament should not be recited: which I conceive so far to be true, as they occasion Tumults or Division, or some remarkable Alteration in State; otherwise as I find them not regarded by most imitable Writers, so I account the Relation of them both fruitless and improper for a true carry'd History.

The Commissioners pull down Images.

Now in this mean time the Commissioners before mention'd (t) were earnest in executing their Authority. And either pull'd down or defac'd all Images in Churches, and that in such unseasonable and unseason'd Fashion, as if it had been done in Hostility against them. Hereat many did express a Sense of Distast, some for religious Respects, others in regard of the excellent Artifice of some of their Pieces, affirming that albeit religious Reverence might happily have been either taken away or moderated, yet the civil Regard which all Men do not only afford but affect, in maintaining the Memory of those whom they honour or love, might be indur'd without Offence.

Certainly albeit the Religion of the Romans indur'd 170 Years according to the Law of Numa Pompilius without any Images; albeit the Persians had neither Images nor Temples nor Altars, being of Opinion that God could be represented by no Device, that he had no Temple but the World, no Altar but the Heart of Man; albeit Eusebius writeth that the People of Asia, call'd Seres, by express Law forbad Adoration of Images; albeit that Images were forbidden of Lycurgus as drawing Men from the true Worship of that which cannot be seen; albeit the antient Germans, and from them the Britans, and the Gauls had neither Images nor Temples; albeit the Jews, and in imitation of them, the Saracens and Turks, abhor nothing more than Images, either in their Temples, or in their Houses; because the Law of God forbiddeth not only to adore, but to make any Image: Albeit the Christians continu'd a long time without Images in their Churches; yet were they never entertain'd into any Religion, but presently they took deep root in the Hearts and Consciences of the common People. When Leo Isauricus furnam'd Iconomachus assembl'd a Council at Constantinople, wherein it was decreed that Images should be cast out of Churches and burnt, the West part of his Empire did thereupon first rebel, and afterwards revolt.

And yet while these Proceedings were but in the Bud, Affairs of State without the Realm were maintain'd in good Condition of Honour, but seem'd rather to stand at a stay, than either to advance or decline. In Scotland the Wars were maintain'd by the Lord Gray of Wilton, Lieutenant of the North, with variable Success. He fortify'd Haddington, fir'd Dalkeith, and won the Castle where fourteen Scots were slain, and three hundred taken Prisoners; he spoil'd much of the Country about Edinburg, Lowthian, and Meers, fir'd Muscleborough, and fortify'd Lowder, and took Yester, at the yielding whereof he granted Life to all, except to one who had us'd vile Speeches against King Edward. Those Speeches were commonly cast upon one Newton, but he charg'd them upon one Hamilton; hereupon Hamilton challeng'd Newton to the Combate, which he did readily accept, and the Lord Gray consented to the Trial: to this purpose Lists were erected in the Market Place at Haddington, whereinto at the time appointed,

(r) This Act was not against such as should speak against receiving the Eucharist under both kinds; but against such as should deprave or despise the Blessed Sacrament: which further appears by the Preamble to that Act, shewing how some had disputed and reasoned unreverently and ungodly of that most holy Mystery, and called it by such vile and unseemly Words, as Christian Ears did abhor. The Act forbears the mention of them. They were Round Robin, Jack in a Box, &c. because the Wafer was round, and they used to keep it in a Pix or Box. The same Act in the last Paragraph of it did enjoin the said Holy Sacrament to be delivered and ministered unto the People in both kinds of Bread and Wine, as being more conformable to the common Use and Practice of the Apostles and Primitive Church, by the Space of five hundred years and more after Christ's Ascension. J. S.

(f) Our Author here confoundeth two Books that were to be publicly used for Divine Service; and both belonging not to this, but the next Year. For there was first a new Office for the Communion only, and was enjoined by Proclamation in the Month of March, 1547. to be generally used at Easter following. This was pursuant to the Act An. 1. Edw. 6. for the Administration of the Sacrament in both kinds. The second Book was set forth the latter end of that year 1548. by Act of Parliament, 2 and 3 Edw. and was a compleat Liturgy, or Form of publick Prayer, intitl'd, The Book of the Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, after the Use of the Church of England. This Book was again, by the Care of Archbishop Cranmer, review'd and corrected in the Year 1550. and set forth for Publick Use. And this was call'd King Edward's Book. J. S.

Hist. Reform. Vol. 2. p. 28.

(t) If by these Commissioners be meant the King's Visitors, which he sent forth lately for a Royal Visitation all over England and Wales, they indeed enjoined the Curats to take down such Images as they knew were abused by Pilgrimages or Offerings to them; but that private Persons should not do it, no doubt to prevent Confusion and Disturbance. And they also enjoined the Ordinaries, to take care that all Monuments of Idolatry should be removed out of the Walls, and Windows of Churches; as may appear by the Injunctions. By which it seems that the Visitors themselves removed not, nor pulled down any Images; but only left Order, both with the Ordinaries and Curats to see it done. Wherein there was so much Backwardness, that the next year, 1548. the Protector and Privy Council sent Command to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and he by the same Order to the rest of the Bishops, to see that all Images be taken away out of the Churches. J. S.

1548. both the Combatants enter'd, apparel'd only in their Doublets and Hofes, and weapon'd with Sword, Buckler, and Dagger. At the first Encounter Hamilton drave Newton almost to the end of the Lifts, which if he had fully done he had thereby remain'd victorious; but Newton on the sudden gave him such a gash on the Leg that therewith he fell to the Ground, and Newton forthwith dispatch'd him with his Dagger: certain Gentlemen then present offer'd to have fought with Newton upon the same point, but this was adjudg'd to be against the Lawes of Combate; wherefore Newton was not only acquitted but rewarded with a Chain of Gold, and with the Gown which the Lord Gray did then wear: howbeit many were perswaded that he was faulty, and happily neither of them was free; but he enjoy'd neither his Escape nor his Honour long, for soon after he was hewn in pieces by Hamilton's Friends.

The Scots take Broughtirage. On the other side, the Scots came before Broughtirage, with 8000 Men and eight pieces of Artillery; but it was for that time well defended by the English, who by often Sallies enforce'd their Enemies with loss of their Artillery to abandon the Attempt. After this divers other Enterprizes were made upon that Fort; at the last it was taken, where the Scots slew all except Sir John Lutterel the Captain, who was taken Prisoner.

Haddington besieged by Fr. and Scots. And now Henry the Second of France having newly succeeded Francis the First, who dy'd the last of March 1547. sent Monsieur Dassie his Lieutenant into Scotland, with an Army of about 10000 French and Almanes, who joining with the Scots besieg'd Haddington, and that with so good earnest, as six pieces of Artillery discharg'd 340 shot in one day, and in another 200 within sixty Paces of the Wall: they lodg'd so near within the very Ditches, that the English slew divers of them with Plummets of Lead ty'd to a Trunchion or Staff by a Cord. The Place was but weak, and the Brackes fair; but the Defendants by Resolution supply'd all the Defects, making divers Sallies with such lively Spirit, that the Assailants were thereby discourag'd from making Assault: the English from Berwick with about 1500 Horse did often relieve the Defendants, by breaking thro the midst of their Enemies. But at the last they were so strongly both encounter'd and inclos'd between the French, Almanes, and Scots, that Sir Thomas Palmer the chief Leader and about 400 were taken Prisoners, and divers slain.

Earl of Shrewsbury relieves them. Hereupon the Earl of Shrewsbury was sent with an Army of about 15000 Men, whereof 3000 were Almanes; but upon notice of his Approach the French rais'd the Field, retir'd so far as Muscleborough and there encamp'd, attributing much Honour to the English for their Valour, in regard of the small strength of the Place which they defended. When the Earl had victual'd and reinforc'd the Town, he march'd forth towards the Enemies, and encamp'd near unto them; and first a few of the English Horse approach'd near the Army of the French, who sent forth some Troops of their Horse to encounter them: but the English retir'd until they had drawn the French into an Ambush laid for the purpose, and then charging together they had them cheap, amongst which two Captains of Account were taken Prisoners.

And offers the French Battel. The next day the Earl presented his Army in plain Field before the Enemy's Camp, clos'd in three Bodies, and rang'd ready to abide Battel. The French had newly receiv'd Supply of 14 or 15000 Scots, but yet remain'd within their Strength, holding it no Wisdom to venture on Men resolv'd to fight, who being forthwith to depart the Realm could neither long endanger nor endamage them much. So the Earl, after that he had remain'd about an Hour, and perceiving that the French intended not to forsake their Strength, return'd unto his Camp, and afterwards to England, destroying Dunbar and some other which stood near his Passage: The Army being dissolv'd, and the Scots thought secure, the Lord Gray with his Horsemen enter'd Scotland, did great Wast in Tivedale and Liddesdale for the space of 20 Miles, and return'd without Encounter. Also a Navy was apointed to coast along with the Army before mention'd: This Fleet coming to Brent Island, fir'd four Ships; then attempting upon S. Minoes, were repuls'd by the Lord Dum, and so without either Glory or Gain return'd into England.

Not long after the departure of the English Army, Monsieur Dassie with his French and Almanes, attempted suddenly to surprize Haddington. The Enterprize was govern'd in so secret manner, that the French had slain the English Scouts, and entred the Base Court, and approach'd the main Gates before any Alarm was taken; but then the Townsmen came forth, many in their Shirts, who with the help of the Watch sustain'd the Assault, until the Soldiers in better appointment came to their Aid. These issued into the Base Court through a privy Postern, and sharply visited the Assailants with Halberts and Swords. Here the Fight grew hot, the Darknes and Danger terrifying some and animating others: Blows flew at all adventures, Wounds and Deaths given and taken unexpected, many scarce knowing their Enemies from their Friends: But shame wrought such Life and Courage in the English, as very few of the Enemies who enter'd the Court escap'd alive, leaving their Fellows bleeding in their deadly Wounds; yet Monsieur Dassie not discourag'd herewith, gave three lively Assaults more that Morning, but was repelled with so great loss, that 16 Carts and Waggon were charg'd with carrying away their dead and dying Bodies, besides 300 left in the Base Court.

After divers like Adventures, the English perceiving that the Town could not be kept without danger, nor lost without dishonour; the Earl of Rutland was sent with 3000 Almanes, and as many Borderers, to demolish the Town, and to bring the Artillery away to Berwick. The Earl not only accomplish'd his Charge, but made wide wast in his passage by ruin and spoil. Herewith the Castle of Hume was suddenly surpriz'd by the Scots, and all the English therein either taken or slain. This was effected by means of certain Scots who us'd to bring Victuals to the English, and were reputed their assured Friends; these both observing the Weakness of the Place and Orders of the Garison, discover'd them to their Fellows, and gave entertainment for the Surprize. Giving also warning to others, never to trust either the Courtesies or Services of those whom they have provok'd to be their Enemies.

About these Times Sir Edward Bellingham Lord Deputy of Ireland, first with great Diligence and Care, then Credit and Reputation, especially gain'd by that Service, took Ocanor 1548. and Omor, and reduc'd the other seditious Lords to good Subjection. Ocanor and Omor guided by overlate Counsel, of Necessity left their Lordships, and had a yearly Pension of 100*l.* assign'd to either of them.

Bullingberge attempted by the French but beaten off.

And now the French supposing that by reason, partly of suspence of Hostility between England and France, and partly of the English Affairs in other Places, Matters with them would be neglected, determin'd to attempt a sudden Surprize of the Fortres of Bullingberge; to this end 7000 Men were appointed, under the Conduct of Mr. Chastilion, furnish'd with Ladders and other Preparations for the Surprize. They marched secretly in the dead time of the Night; and when they approach'd within a quarter of a League, one Carter who had been discharg'd of his Pay by the English, for taking a French Woman to Wife, and then serv'd under the French, ran privily before and gave the Alarm to those in the Fort. The English drew him up the Walls between two Pikes, and understanding the Danger, address'd themselves to their Defence. By reason whereof the French at their approach had so warm a Welcome, every of the English contending that his Valour might be noted for some Help in the Fight, that at their departure they laded fifteen Waggons with their Dead. Carter himself adventur'd bravely in Places of greatest danger, and receiv'd two great Hurts in his Body. Sir Nicholas Arnault the Captain was likewise hurt with a Pike in the Face; divers others were wounded, and about 25 slain. The Assault continu'd with great Obstinacy from midnight until somewhat after break of day.

A skirmish between the French
& English.

Shortly after 300 English on Foot, and 25 Horsemen, were appointed to go to a Wood about two Leagues from Bullingberge, having Carriages with them, for bringing certain Timber for mounting great Artillery, and some other uses: When they approach'd near the edge of the Wood, about 500 French Horsemen issu'd forth and gave three sharp Charges upon them; the English impal'd themselves with their Pikes, and therewith bare off their Enemies; and being lin'd with Shot (the cruel plague of Horsemen) the French were in such sort galled with Arrows that many were wounded, Mr. Cauret and divers others slain, 70 great Horses lay dead in the Field, and one Cornet was taken. The English fearing greater Forces, began to retire; and therewith appear'd about 2000 French and Almanes on foot. But the English maintain'd an orderly Retreat, until they came within favour of the Shot of Bullingberge, and then the Enemy adventur'd no further: And in this manner the old Wounds of War began freshly to open and bleed between England and France.

But in this mean time such Tempests of Sedition tumbled in England, more by default of Governors, than the peoples Impatience to live in Subjection, that not only the Honour but the Safety of the State was thereby endanger'd. For as the Commissioners before-mention'd pass'd to divers Places for establishing of their new Injunctions, many unfavoury Scorns were cast upon them; and the further they went from London, as the People were more uncivil, so did they more rise into Insolency and Contempt. At the last, as one Mr. Body a Commissioner was pulling down Images in Cornwal, he was suddenly stab'd into the Body by a Priest with a Knife.

Hereupon the People more regarding Commotioners than Commissioners, flock'd together in divers Parts of the Shire, as Clouds cluster against a Storm: And albeit Justice was afterwards done upon the Offenders, the Principal being hang'd and quarter'd in Smithfield, and divers of his chief Complices executed in divers parts of the Realm; albeit so ample a Pardon was proclaim'd for all others within that Shire touching any Action or Speech tending to Treason; yet could not the Boldness be beaten down either with that Severity, or with this Lenity be abated. For the Mischief forthwith spread into Wiltshire and Somersetshire, where the People supposing that a Commonwealth could not stand without Commons, beat down Enclosures, laid Parks and Fields Champain. But Sir William Herbert, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, with a well arm'd and order'd Company, set sharply upon them, and oppressing some of the for-wardest of them by Death, suppress'd all the Residue of them by fear. But their Duty depending upon Fear, the one was of no greater continuance than the other.

The like Motions follow'd in Suffex, Hampshire, Kent, Glocestershire, Warwickshire, Essex, Hartfordshire, Leicestershire, Worcestershire and Rutlandshire. But being neither in Numbers nor in Courage great, partly by Authority of Gentlemen, and partly by Entreaty and Advice of honest Persons, they were reduc'd to some good Appeasement; as with People more guided by Rage than by Right, yet not altogether mad, it was not uneasy. But herein happily some Error was committed, that being only brought to a Countenance of Quiet, regard was not had to distinguish the Rebellion fully: for soon after they broke forth more dangerously than before, for no part could content them who aim'd at all.

After this the People in Oxfordshire, Devonshire, Norfolk and Yorkshire, fell into the same madness, incens'd by such who being in themselves base and degenerate, and dangerous to the State, had no hope but in troublesom Times. To Oxfordshire the Lord Gray of Wilton was sent with 1500 Horse and Foot, to whom the Gentlemen of the Country resorted, drawing many Followers with them: The very Name of the Lord Gray, being known to be a Man of great Valour and Fortune, so terrify'd the Seditious, that upon the very Report of his Approach, more than half fell away and dispersed; of the Residue, who being either more desperate or more sottish, did abide in the Field, many were presently slain, many taken and forthwith executed.

To Devonshire was sent John Lord Russel, The Mai-Lord of the Privy Seal, whose Forces being indeed, or being by him distrusted to be inferior to the Importance of the Service, he sat down at Honington, whilst the Seditious did almost what they would: Upon this heaviness of the King's Forces going forward, interpreted to be Fear and want of Mettle, divers, either of the most audacious, or such as Poverty or fear of Punishment might easily plunge into any Mischief, resorted to the seditious daily from Cornwal and other Parts; as bad Humours gather to a Bile, or as divers Kennels flow to one Sink, so in short time their Numbers increas'd to 10000 tall and able Bodys. They were chiefly guided by Humphrey Arundel, a Man well esteem'd for Military Services. About six others of inferior Note were

1549. were bold Actors with him. Many Priests, unworthy to be nam'd, were also impetuous and importunate Incensors of the Rage; Men of some Academical Learning in Discourse, but their Minds not season'd with any virtuous or religious Thoughts.

Assuredly the vulgar Multitude is not unfitly term'd a Beast, with many Heads not guided, I will not say with any proportion but portion of Reason: Violence and Obstinacy, like two untam'd Horses, draw their Desire in a blindfold Carrier. They intend most foolishly what they never put in action, and often act most madly what they never intended; all that they know to do, is that they know not what to do; all that they mean to determine, proves a Determination and Meaning to do nothing. They attribute more to others Judgments than to their own, esteeming bold Obstinacy for bravest Courage, and impudent Prating for soundest Wisdom. And now being assembled into one Company, rather without a Lord than at Liberty, to accomplish their Misery they fall to Division, of all Calamities the worst, and so broken in their Desires, that many could not learn either wherefore they came, or what they would have done. Some were Commonwealth Mutiners, and some did mutiny for Religion. They who were for the Commonwealth, could agree upon no certain Thing, but it was certain they could agree upon nothing: Some would have no Justices, some no Gentlemen, some no Lawyers nor ordinary Courts of Justice; and above all Inclosures must down: but whether all, or which, or how to be employ'd, none could tell, every Man regarding what he follow'd, but not what might follow thereof. All would have the State transform'd, but whether reform'd or deform'd, they neither car'd nor knew. They concurred only in confus'd Clamours, every Man thinking it no less reasonable that his Opinion should be heard, than that his Body should be adventur'd.

Their Demands.

The religious Mutiners were not altogether so various in their Voices, as having some few Spirits among them by whom they were both stirred and guided: these in the name of the People, hammer'd up the Articles following, and sent them to the King; upon granting of which they professed that both their Bodys and Goods should be absolutely at the King's Devotion.

1. That Curats should administer Baptism at all times of Necessity, as well on Week-days as on Holy-days.

2. That their Children might be confirm'd by the Bishop, whensoever they should within the Diocess resort unto him.

3. Forasmuch as they believ'd, that after the words of Consecration no Substance of Bread remained but the real Body and Blood of Christ: That the Mass should be celebrated without any Man communicating with the Priest, for that many put no difference between the Lord's Body and other Meat, some saying that it is Bread before and after, some saying that it is profitable to none except he receives it.

4. That they might have reservation of the Lord's Body in their Churches.

5. That they might have holy Bread and holy Water, in remembrance of Christ's precious Body and Blood.

6. That God's Service might be said or sung with an audible Voice in the Quire, and not forth like a Christmas Play.

7. That Priests live chaste (as St. Paul did) without marriage, who said to all honest Priests, Be ye followers of me.

8. That the six Articles set forth by King Henry the Eighth be so used as they were in his Time, at least until the King should accomplish his full Age. (v)

Now albeit the King knew right well that no Reasons would serve for denial, and that the yielding to them in any thing would profit him nothing, but rather make them rise to more insolent Demands; yet he return'd an Answer in writing, and therewith his general Pardon, in case they would desist, and open their Eyes to discern how their uncircumspect Simplicity had been abus'd, especially in Matters of Religion: for that as some Virtues resemble some Vices so near, as the one is often taken for the other; so Religion and Superstition do so nearly resemble, that it was easy for Men to disguise the one under the Mask of the other. First, therefore he reprov'd them fairly for their disorderly Assemblies, against the peaceable People of the Realm, and against the Honour of his Estate, fearing much that by reason of their Disobedience, his Lenity should appear to be less than he would have it; also for that they us'd his Name in all their Writings, not only without his Authority, but even against himself, abusing thereby the Weakness of many, and drawing them into society of their Evil. Then he pitied their Ignorance and the Errors thence arising, whereby they were allur'd to new Hopes by some, who could not thrive so well by their honest Endeavours as by Rapine and Spoil; who stop'd all Course of Law and Discourse of Reason, to open the Floodgate of their unmeasurable Madness; who to overthrow the State pretend Liberty, but if they should overthrow it all Liberty were lost.

For, saith he, who hath born you in hand that Children even in case of necessity cannot be baptiz'd but upon Holidays? whereas there is no Day nor Hour wherein the Minister is not only permitted but commanded to baptize. By like abuse you are perswaded that many hold that the blessed Sacrament of Christ's Body doth nothing differ from common Bread; whereas Laws, Statutes, Proclamations, common Practice agree, that common Bread is only to sustain the Body, but this blessed Bread is Food for the Soul. Touching Confirmation, doth any believe that a Child baptiz'd is damn'd unless it be confirm'd? If it be baptiz'd and also confirm'd, is it sav'd only by Confirmation, and not by Baptism? Or is it the more sav'd by Confirmation? Children are confirm'd at the Age of Discretion, to teach them what they receiv'd in their Infancy; they

(v) The full and whole Answers made to these Articles of the Rebels are set down in Hollingshed's Chronicle; whereof our Author hath given here some imperfect Abstract.

These Rebels of Devon required several other things of the King, consisting in fifteen Articles more, the first whereof was, We will have all the General Councils, and holy Decrees of our Fore-fathers observed, kept and performed. And whosoever shall gainsay them, we hold them as Hereticks. To this and the rest, Archbishop Crammer wrote excellent Answers, which are publish'd in the Appendix to the Memorials of his Life. J. are

As for the Order of Service and Use thereof in the English Tongue, which you esteem new, it is no other than the old, the same Words in English which were in Latin, except a few things omitted so fond, that it had been a Shame to have heard them in English. And how can any reasonable Man be offended to understand what God by his Word speaketh unto them, what they by their Prayers speak unto God? If the Service were good in Latin, it remains so in English; for nothing is alter'd but to make you understand what is said. In like sort the Mass with great Judgment and Care was reduc'd to the same manner as Christ left it, as the Apostles us'd it, as the ancient Fathers receiv'd, practis'd and left it.

But you would in sober earnest have the six Articles again reviv'd: Do you understand what you would have, or are you Masters of your own Judgment? If you understand them and yet desire them, it is not long since they were enacted, and have since drawn much Blood from the Subjects: As would you have bloody Laws again in Life, or would they any long time be endur'd? Upon pity they were taken away, upon Ignorance they are again demanded: Verily that in the Gospel may truly be said of you, ye ask ye know not what, for ye neither know what Good ye shall have by receiving them, nor what Evil you have lost by their abolishing: our Intention is to have our Laws written with Milk, but you would have them written with Blood. They were establish'd by Law and so observ'd, altho with much Expence of Blood; they are abolish'd by Law with sparing of Blood, and that also must be observ'd: for unless Laws be duly observ'd, neither the Authority of the Prince, or Safety of the People can be preserv'd.

And whereas you would have them remain in force until our full Age, if you had known what you speak, you never would have given breath to such an unseason'd thought: for what is our Authority the less for our Age, or shall we be more King hereafter than now? or are you less Subjects now than in future times you shall be? Verily as a natural Man we have now Youth, and by God's Sufferance expect Age; but as a King we have no difference in Years, we are rightful King by God's Ordinance, and by Descent from our Royal Ancestors, and not by any set Number of Years: and much it is to be fear'd, that they who mov'd you to require this Suspence of time, would absolutely deny our Royal Power, if they durst so plainly expresse themselves.

The seditious, as Men always dangerous, when they have once broken Awe, interpreted this or any other mild Dealing to proceed from some faining or fainting Disposition, either doubting or daring most when they are most fairly intreated: and the more to inflame the Popular Rage, fresh Rumours were devis'd and divulg'd, that the People should be constrain'd to pay a ratable Tax for their Sheep and other Cattle, and an Excise for every thing which they should eat or drink; by which and other like Reports the simple were blinded, the malicious edg'd, all hardned from applying to any peaceable Persuasion.

And now unable to support themselves either with their own Estate, or by waite of Villages, they aspir'd to the Spoil and Subjection of Cities: and first they came to Exeter and demanded Entrance, but the Citizens as they were both civil and rich, so were they better advis'd, and therefore clos'd their Gates, and refus'd to have any Intercourse with the seditious, but either by common Obedience, or else by Hostility and Arms. The popular Fury being thus stop'd, swell'd the more. Whereupon they resolv'd to apply their Endeavours for taking the City, and either by destroying it to increase Terror, or else by sparing it to win an Opinion of Moderation: they had no great Artillery to open a Breach, and yet without Reason they gave an Assault, and us'd divers Means to mount the Walls: but the more Madnes they shew'd in their Attempt, with the greater Loss they were driven back. Then they fir'd the Gates at two several times, but the Citizens at both times by casting in Wood maintain'd the fire, until they had cast up a Half Moon within; upon which when the Seditious attempted to enter, they were slain from the Corners like Dogs. After this they min'd the Walls, laid the Poudre and ramm'd the Mouth; but the Citizens made a Countermine, whereinto they pour'd such Plenty of Water, that the wet Powder could not be fir'd.

In the meantime the Lord Privy-Seal lay at Honington expecting more strength: and knowing right well that as the Multitude are slow to danger, so are they most desperate when they are stir'd, but whilst he expected more Company, many of those he had slip'd away from him; hereupon he resolv'd for retaining the rest, to entertain some present Enterprize, and first he assay'd by a by-way to enter and relieve the City, but the seditious for prevention hereof had fell'd all the Trees between S. Mary Outry and Exeter, and laid them cross the way, in such sort as they impeach'd his Passage. Hereupon firing such Places as he thought might serve either for use or ease to the seditious, he determin'd to return to Honington. But the seditious forelaid a Bridge, over which he should pass, call'd Fenington Bridge; and in a great fair Meddow behind the Bridge plac'd a great number under Banners display'd. The Lord Privy-Seal had but a small Company in regard of the seditious. Yet with good Order and Courage he attempted the Bridge, but could not force it: at the last finding the River to be fordable at the foot of the Bridge, he there set over his Horse, whereupon the Guards appointed to defend the Bridge forsook their Charge, and retir'd to their Strength in the Meddow. Then the King's Forces charg'd lively upon them, and they again as stoutly receiv'd the Charge; but being an untrain'd Multitude without either Soldier or Guide, they were soon broken and put to flight: yet they rally'd themselves and tumultuously charg'd upon the King's Forces, but were presently routed and cast out of the Field; the Chase was not far pursu'd for fear of fresh Succours from before the City. Notwithstanding the seditious lost 600 of their Men, and the Lord Privy-Seal return'd without Loss to Honington.

At this time the Seditious liv'd by Rapine and Ruin of all the Country, omitting nothing of that which Savages enrag'd in the height of their unruly Behaviour do commit; but the Citizens driven to great Distress for want 1549. want of Victuals, Bread they made of coarsest Bran moulded in Cloths, for that otherwise it would not cleave together: Their finest Flesh was of their own Horses, especially for twelve days they endur'd most extreme Famine. During this time they were much encourag'd by an aged Citizen, who brought forth all his Provisions, and said, that as he did communicate unto them his Store, so would he participate of their Wants; and that for his part he would feed on the one Arm, and fight with the other, before he would consent to put the City into the seditious hands. Here-with the Lord Privy Seal, for want of Power to perform any Services, was about to rise and return to London. But in good time the

The Lord Gray comes with a Supply.

Lord Gray came to him with Supply of Forces most Almane Horsemen, and with him came Spinola with his Band of Italians, consisting of 300 Shot, purposed for Scotland, also 200 Men were sent unto him from Reading; so being in all not much above 1000 strong, he made head against the Seditious. So departing from Honington, he came to a little Village, from whence lay two ways towards Exeter, both which were block'd up with two Bulwarks of Earth made by the Seditious; hither they had driven 2000 Men from before Exeter, whom they divided into four Companies. In either of the Bulwarks they lodg'd one; at the Bridge near the Back of one of the Forts a third Company was plac'd; the fourth was laid in ambush behind a Hedge on the Highway, at the back of the other Forts. The Arrier of the King's Forces led by Captain Wavers set upon one of the Forts, the Vaward and Battail upon the other; Spinola with his Shot did bear upon those within, who offer'd to appear upon the Walls. At length Captain Wavers won the Fort which he assail'd, and drave the Defendants to the Bridge, where one of their Companies made stand. Here-with the other two Companies did forthwith resort unto them, one from the second Fort, the other from the Ambush. These casting a strong guard upon the Bridge, marshal'd the Residue upon a plain ground behind the Bridge. The King's Forces coming forward, drave the Guard from the Bridge; and making profit of the fresh Terror, set upon those who were upon the Plain. The King's Footmen were firmly rank'd, the Troops of Horse in good Array; whereas the Seditious had neither Weapons, Order, or Counsel, but being in all things unprovided, were slain like Beasts. They took their Flight towards St. Marycliffe; but the Soldiers, upon disdain of their unworthy Actions, fill'd themselves with Revenge and Blood, and slew of them above 900, not sparing one.

The Seditious routed and slain.

This sad Blow abated much the Courage and Hope of the Seditious; and yet the next day about 2000 of them affronted the King's Forces at the entrance of a Highway, whom when they found both ready and resolute to fight, they desir'd Enterparlance, and in the mean time began to fortify. But understanding that their Intention was known, more like Slaves than Soldiers they furiously ran away. The same night the Seditious before Exeter rais'd their Siege, and therewith discharg'd the City from many Miseries and Despairs. The King afterwards enlarg'd the constant Obedience of the City, with Enlargement both of Liberties and of Revenues; he gave unto them the Mannor of Eutland, for a perpetual Remembrance both of their Loyalty and of his Love.

Now the Seditious driven almost to a dead despair, and supported only by the Vehemency of Desire, brought forth their Forces to Clifton Heath, to whom many of the most vile Vulgars resorted hourly, which much enlarg'd their Numbers but nothing their Strength. But what Measure have Men in the increase of Madness, if they keep not themselves from falling into it? They brought with them a Crucifix upon a Cart cover'd with a Canopy, and beset with Crosses, Tapers, Banners, Holy Bread and Holy Water, as a Representation of those things for which they fought. The Lord Gray encourag'd his Men to set sharply upon the vague Villains, good neither to live peaceably nor to fight, and to win at once both Quiet to the Realm, and to themselves Glory: so he brought the King's Forces upon them, rather as to a Carnage than to a Fight, inasmuch as without any great either loss or danger to themselves, the greatest part of the seditious were slain, diverse also were taken, of whom the common sort were forthwith executed by martial Law, the chiefest Leaders were sent to receive Justice at London; some escap'd and sail'd to Bridgwater, who taking Dangers to be the only Remedy against Dangers, endeavour'd to set up the Seditio again, but they were speedily repress'd, and thereby the Seditio suppress'd wholly.

But slain and taken.

The Seditio thus broken and beaten down, Sir Anthony Kingston Provost Marshal of the King's Army was deem'd by many not only cruel but uncivil, and inhumane in his Executions. One Boyer Mayor of Bodmin in Cornwall was observ'd to have been among the seditious, but by absolute Inforcement as many others were. The Marshal wrote to him a Letter that he would dine at his House upon a day which he appointed; the Mayor seem'd glad, and made for him the best Provision that he could: upon the day he came, and a large Company with him, and was receiv'd with many Ceremonies of Entertainment. A little before Dinner he took the Mayor aside, and whisper'd him in the Ear, that Execution must that day be done in the Town, and therefore requir'd him that a pair of Gallows should be fram'd and erected against the time that Dinner should end. The Mayor was diligent to accomplish his Demand, and no sooner was Dinner ended, but he demanded of the Mayor whether the Work was finish'd; the Mayor answer'd that all was ready. I pray you, said the Provost, bring me to the Place; and therewith he took him friendly by the Hand. Here, beholding the Gallows, he ask'd the Mayor whether he thought them to be strong enough; yes, said the Mayor, doubtless they are: Well, said the Provost, get you up speedily, for they are prepar'd for you; I hope, answer'd the Mayor, you mean not as you speak; in faith, said the Provost, there is no Remedy, for you have been a busy Rebel, and so without Respite or Defence he was strangl'd to death.

The Mayor of Bodmin hang'd by Martial Law.

Near the said Place dwelt a Miller, who had been a busy Actor in that Rebellion; and fearing the Approach of the Provost Marshal, told a sturdy tall Fellow his Servant that he had occasion to go from home, and therefore gave Directions that if any one should inquire after the Miller, he should not speak of him, but affirm that himself was the Miller, and that so he had been for three years before: So the Provost

And a Miller's Man.

1549. Provost came and call'd for the Miller, his Servant came forth and said he was the Man. The Provost demanded how long he had kept the Mill; these three years answer'd the Servant: then the Provost commanded his Men to lay hold on him, and to hang him on the nearest Tree: then the Fellow cry'd out that he was not the Miller but the Miller's Man; nay Sir, answer'd the Provost, I will take thee at thy word, and if thou beest the Miller thou art a busy Knave, if thou beest not, thou art a false lying Knave, whatsoever thou art thou shalt be hang'd. When others also told him that the Fellow was but the Miller's Man, and what then said he? could he ever have done his Master a better Service than to hang for him? and so without more to do he was dispatch'd. Assuredly this might have pass'd for a tolerable Jest if it had not been in case of Life.

Diverse others were executed by Martial Law, and a great part of the Country was abandon'd to the Spoil of the Soldiers, who not troubling themselves to discern between a Subject and a Rebel, whilst their Liberty lasted, made indifferently Profit of both.

Sedition in Norfolk.

The seditious in Northfolk were somewhat dangerous, both because their Strength was greater, as also because the City of Norwich was a Friend unto them, or at least wish'd them no great harm, and being faithful to neither side, was always ready to entertain the stronger. Their first Attempt was made at Attleborough, where they threw down the Fences of one Green of Wilby, who was suppos'd to have inclos'd a part of Attleborough Common adjoining to the Common Pasture of Harsham. Afterward they assembl'd at a Play accusom'd yearly to be kept at Wimondham, and from thence went to Morley a Mile distant, and there cast down the Ditches of one Hubbard, next by Incitement of John Flowerdew of Netheset, a Gentleman of good Estate: but never expressing Desire of Quiet, they did the like to certain Inclosures of Robert Ket a Tanner in Wimondham, and receiv'd of him thirty eight Shillings and four pence for their Labor. This Ket, who hath made his obscure beginning well known by his mischievous Attempts to requite Flowerdew, carry'd them to Netheset, where they cast down all the inclos'd Pasture of Flowerdew, and not staying there he led them indifferently to diverse other Places, laying all Inclosures where he came rather wast than open.

Ket provoketh the Rabble against Gentlemen.

And the rather to train them to his Allure, he told them both often and with vehement Voice, how they were overtop'd and trodden down by Gentlemen, and other their good Masters, and put out of Possibility ever to recover foot; how whilst Rivers of Riches ran into their Landlords Coffers, they were par'd to the quick, and fed upon Pease and Oats like Beasts; how being fleec'd by these for private Benefit, they were stay'd by publick Burthens of State, wherein whilst the richer sort favour'd themselves, they were gnawn to the very Bones; how the more to terrify and torture them to their Minds, and wind their Necks more surely under their Arm, their tyrannous Master did often implead, arrest, cast them into Prison, and thereby consume them to worse than nothing; how they did palliate these Pillaries with the fair Pretence of Authority and of Law, fine Workmen I warrant you, who can so closely carry their Dealings, that then Men only discover them, how harmless Counsels were fit for tame Fools, but for them who had already stir'd there was no Hope but in adventuring boldly.

The Likeness of Affection and the masking of Vices under pleasant Terms, procur'd not only Assent, but Applause to all that he said: and so by often and earnest repeating of these and the like Speeches, and by bearing a confident Countenance in all his Actions, the Vulgars took him to be both valiant and wise, and a fit Man to be their Commander, being glad they had found any Captain to follow.

Their Numbers increas'd daily, and there-with their Boldness and Power to do harm: They were largely supply'd at the first both with Victuals and Arms, albeit not with open Consent of the Places adjoining, yet with much private Good-will; for many did not only secretly favour, but openly approve their Designs. Generally every good Man was much griev'd; many upon some dislikes before rejoic'd in their greater Harms, and not regarding in what Liberty they stood, were ready to run into any Bondage. The Sheriff of Norfolk resorted unto them, and made Proclamation in the King's Name, that forthwith they should peaceably depart; and had he not been ready, and his Horse swift to depart in time, he should hardly have departed from them alive.

After this they drew towards Norwich, and seated themselves at Monshold near Mount Surrey, and upon St. Leonhards, which hangeth over Norwich: Another Company seated at Rising near Lynne, but they were dislodg'd by the Gentlemen of the Country, and forc'd to draw to their Fellows at Monshold. Here the main Body encamp'd, and sent divers light Companies forth to terrify and rove. To this place many resorted out of Suffolk, and from all places of Norfolk, many for want, but most upon a turbulent mind; and in all places thereabout Beacons were fir'd and Bells rung, as a roaring Furtherance to his Up roar; so as in short time the Multitude increas'd to 16000, and yet rather to be esteem'd a Number than an Army.

Their Actions were cover'd and disguis'd with Mantles, very usual in time of Disorder, of Religion and Justice; for they had one Coniers for their Chaplain, a Man brought up in idle and dead Studies, who both Morning and Evening read solemn Prayers: many Sermons they also had either by Intreaty or Enforcement. But Dr. Parker, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, in his Sermon before them, touch'd them for their living so near, that they went near to touch him for his Life. As for Justice, they had a Bench under a Tree, where Ket usually sat, and with him two of every Hundred whence their Companies had been rais'd. Here Complaints were exhibited and examin'd as well against those of their own Company, who receiv'd Judgment for their Offences, as against any Gentleman or other in the Country: by Commandment from hence many were very violently pull'd from their Houses, of whom some were enforc'd to follow them, others were cast into Prison, and haply fetter'd with Irons, and not a few rudely and dangerously entreated: From hence also Warrants were sent forth in the King's Name, whereby Ordnance, Powder and Shot were commanded out of Ships, and any other Furniture of War out of Houses where it could be found. The King's was ever since term'd the Oak of Reformation.

And now the Seditious being advanc'd unto the height both of their Power and of their Pride, presented certain Complaints to the King, and desir'd that a Herald or some other Messenger of Credit may be sent unto them to receive Articles of all those Matters wherewith they concern'd themselves to be griev'd. The King took it for a great Indignity that base Traitors and Thieves should offer to capitulate with him as Enemies Law, fully holding the Field; and yet knowing right well, that as good Counsels gather Strength by time, so upon a little Respite evil Advices either vanish or grow weaker to win some Advantage of time, return'd an Answer: That seeing he was ready always to receive and relieve the quiet Complaints of any of his Subjects, he marvel'd much either upon what Opinion of Necessity in themselves or of Injustice in him, they should first put themselves into Arms, as a Party against him, and then present him with their bold Petitions, especially at such a time, when having fully reform'd many other Matters, he had lately set forth a Proclamation against excessive Prices of Victuals, and had also appointed Commissioners with ample Authority for divers other things, whereof many doubtless had been by that time redress'd, had not these Disorders given impediment to his Designs, generally when they might well discern both his Care and Endeavours to set all Matters in a right Frame of Reformation, as might best stand both with his Honour and their Sureties, and with Justice and Providence towards all. Touching their particular Complaint for reducing Lands and Farms to their antient Rents, altho it could not be done by his ordinary Power without a Parliament, yet he would so far extend his Authority Royal and Absolute as to give Charge to his Commissioners to travel with all Persons within their Counties, to reduce Lands to their former Rents wherewith they were farm'd forty years before, and that Rents should be paid at Michelmass then next ensuing according to that Rate, and that such as would not presently yield to his Commissioners for that redress, should at the Parliament which he would forthwith summon be overul'd.

Concerning their Complaint for Price of Wools, he would forthwith give Order that his Commissioners should cause Clothiers take Wools, paying only two parts of the Price wherewith they were commonly sold the year next before; and for the other third part, the Owner and Buyer should stand to such Order as the Parliament should appoint. At which time also he would give Order, that landed Men to a certain Proportion should be neither Clothiers nor Farmers, and farther that one Man should not use divers Occupations, nor have Plurality of Benefices, nor of Farms; and generally that he would then give Order for all the Residue of their Requests, in such sort as they should have good Cause not only to remain quiet, but to pray for him, and to adventure their Lives in his Service.

This Parliament he promis'd should begin in the beginning of October then next ensuing, against which time they should appoint four or six of their County, to present Bills of their Desires; and in the mean season apply themselves to their Harvest, and other peaceable Business at home, and not to drive him to Necessity (whereof he would be sorry) by sharper Means to maintain both his own Dignity and the Common Quiet.

These Letters carrying the King's Name in the front, and the Protector's with the King's Signature at the foot, were sent by a Herald to Monshold, a Place guarded with great, but confus'd and disorder'd Strength of the Seditious. Herewith also the King sent his general Pardon, in case they would quietly desist and dissolve. But the Seditious were so far from accepting these or any other Offers of Accord, that hereupon they discharg'd the first shot against the City; and because their Artillery being planted on a Hill, could little or nothing endamage the Walls, they remov'd their Battery to a lower ground: but because the City was weak, and the Citizens but weakly dispos'd against them, with no Danger, and little Travel, they made themselves Masters thereof.

Here they imprison'd the Mayor and many other of the chief Citizens, and order'd all things at their Pleasure, but maintain'd the chief Seat at Monshold, where it was before. The Mayor of Norwich and some other Gentlemen of Credit they constrain'd to be present at all their Counsels, with Intention to countenance their Actions with some Authority, but in no sort to be guided by them. All this time the King's Forces advanc'd but slowly, being employ'd in appeasing the like Disorders more near the Heart of the Kingdom. So that it is most certain, that had these Seditious been so mischievously bent as in Number they were great, they might have prov'd more dangerous than they were; but they aim'd not at ambitious Ends, their rude Earthly Spirits were never season'd with any manly adventurous thought, and therefore they were content with a licentious and idle Life, wherein they might fill their Bellies with Spoil rather than by Labour: to this side their Companies rang'd in all parts thereabouts, and took away for their Householdstuff and Goods; but especially they brought to their Stations many Drovers of Cattle; for besides Deer out of Parks, besides Beeves, besides Fowls of all kinds, within a few days were brought out of the Country 2000 Muttons; such Numbers of Sheep were daily brought in, that a fat Weather was sold for four Pence. This was interpreted for a present Plenty, but it made such Scarcity afterwards, as could not in many years be repair'd. Sir Edmund Knevet Kt. with such Company as he could assemble, charg'd upon one of their Watches by night; but he was so far inferior unto them, that it was esteem'd a great Fortune that he departed from them with his Life.

But soon after the Lord William Parre Marquis of Northampton was sent against them with 1500 Horsemen, and a small Band of Italians, under a Captain nam'd Malatesta: he was accompany'd with the Lord Sheffield, the Lord Wentworth, with divers Knights and Gentlemen of Principal Estimation. When he approach'd within a Mile of the City, the Magistrates and chief Citizens upon Summons resorted to his Standard, yielded unto him the City Sword, and profess'd their own Loyalty, and excus'd others of inferior force, who either by Ignorance favour'd the Seditious, or thro fear durst not declare against them; with these the Lord Marquis enter'd the City at St. Stephens Gate, the City Sword being born before him, and therewith caus'd the chief Citizens to assemble

And a general Pardon.

Marquis of Northampton sent against them.

1549. in the Market Place, both to give Advice and to take Direction how the City might best be defended.

In the mean time the Strangers who came with him, whether by Appointment or by Adventure, issu'd forth of the City, to view both the Numbers and Orders of the Seditious. They again first put forth their Archers, then their Horsemen, lastly a Company ran furiously forth without either Direction of others or Judgment in themselves, intending to have inclos'd the Italians: but here might have been a great Difference between Men practis'd to fight, and Men accustom'd only to spoil. For the Italians in so well advis'd Order receiv'd the seditious coming rashly upon them without either Fear or Skill, that divers of the tumultuous Numbers were slain: at the last the Italians perceiving themselves almost inviron'd, cast themselves into a Ring and retir'd back into the City. But they left one Gentleman of their Company behind, who being overthrown from his Horse fell into the Hands of the Seditious, who like Savages spoil'd him of his Armour, and of his Apparel, and hang'd him over the Walls of Mount Surry.

They assault the City.

This caus'd the Seditious to remain the first part of the Night within their Station, which by reason of the Nastiness of the beaitly Multitude, might more fitly be term'd a Kennel than a Camp. Within the City diligent Watch was kept, which was often visited and reliev'd. The Soldiers remain'd in their Armour all Night, and kept so great a Fire in the Market place, that all Parts of the City were lighted therewith. The Seditious about Midnight began to shoot off their great Artillery very lively and thick: hereupon the Lord Marquis directed part of his Forces to rampart the Gates and ruinous Places of the Walls, which the Seditious espying, with a hideous Roaring and Rage they pour'd themselves upon the City, some endeavour'd to fire the Gates, some to mount over the Walls, and some to pass the River: the fight continu'd three hours, and it is almost incredible with what rude Rage the Seditious maintain'd their Assault; some being almost disabled to hold up their Weapons would strive what they could to strike their Enemies; others being thrust thro the Body with a Spear, would run themselves further to reach those who gave them that deadly Wound; at the last their Obstinacy was overcome, and they return'd to their Cabbins with loss of 300 of their Company.

And enter it.

The Residue of the Night which was not much, the Soldiers within the City apply'd in refreshing themselves; but the next Morning the Seditious both with greater Strength and better Order enter'd the City by the Hospital, and began a most desperate Surprise. The Forces of the Marquis, albeit inferior in Numbers, yet by reason of the Freshness of the Place might have been sufficient, if they had charg'd in order, and together; but being scatter'd in the Streets, they were not able to make Resistance: herewith they were much endamag'd by the Citizens from their Houses, so as 100 of them perish'd, many were hurt, and the Residue driven to forsake the City; the Lord Sheffields Horse fell with him into a Ditch, whereby he fell into the Power of the Seditious, and as he pull'd of his Helmet to shew them who he was, a Butcher slew him with the Stroke of a Club. Divers Gentlemen to the Number of 30 were taken and committed to freight Prison, where they were vex'd alike with Scarcity and Scorn. The Seditious lost about seven score of their Company; and yet much flesh'd with this Success, they spoil'd many Parts of the City, and fir'd the Houses of those whom they esteem'd not to be their Friends: but the Rage of the Fire was at first hinder'd, and then appeas'd by fall of a sudden Shower of Rain; whereupon many presag'd that the Flames of this Seditious should neither spread far nor long endure. The Report of this Repulse flying to London, the most was made of that which was true, and many Falsities added thereto. The Earl of Warwick was sent with such Forces both English and Strangers, wherewith he had appointed for Service in Scotland: when he came to Cambridge, the Lord Marquis resorted unto him, and also the Lord Willoughby, Powes and Bray, his two Sons Ambrose and Robert, and many Knights and Gentlemen of Name; with these he march'd somewhat leisurely, because the Importance of the Danger might make the Service the more esteem'd. At length he presented his Forces, consisting of 6000 Foot, and 1500 Horse, before the City upon the Plain, and forthwith sent to summon the Seditious, and to offer Pardon if it would be accepted; but neither Summons nor Pardon was any thing regarded. Infomuch as when the King's Pardon was offer'd by a Herald, a lewd Boy turn'd towards him his naked Breech, and us'd Words futable to that Gesture: one standing by and mov'd with this barbarous Behaviour, discharged a Harquebur upon the Boy, and stroke him with a Shot a little above the Reins. Hereat those Seditious that seem'd moderate before became desperate, and those who were desperate seem'd stark mad; whence such Tumults, such confus'd Hollowings and Howlings ensu'd, that the Herald was glad to withdraw himself.

Then the Earl planted his Cannon against St. Stephen's Gate, and set Pioneers to work against the Brazen Gate. The Cannon against St. Stephen's Gate executed so well, that in short time the Portcullis and Gate were broken, and Entry open'd into the City; others enter'd at the brazen Gate, but in that Entrance some were slain. Also the Mayor's Deputy open'd Westwick Gate, where the Earl himself enter'd without Resistance, and possess'd himself of the Market Place; at these Entrances 130 of the seditious were slain, 60 were taken and forthwith executed by Martial Law. As the Earl's Carriages were brought into the City, neither guarded nor regarded as they should, divers of them were surpriz'd by the Seditious, and driven to Monshold. At this Booty they were more joyful than griev'd at the Loss, either of the City or of their Companions, especially for that they were supply'd thereby with good store of Powder and Shot, wherein their Want did most consist.

The Earl being in possession of the City, rampar'd all the Gates, except those which open'd towards Monshold, wherein he planted good Artillery. But the Seditious, the more terrible by reason of their more desperate Fury, fell upon those Gates, albeit without order, yet with such rude and careless Courage and Cries, that they beat back the Guards, slew the principal Gunners, carry'd away their Artillery, and therewith certain Carts laden with Munition: here were 1549. were Boys observ'd to be so desperately resolv'd, as to pull Arrows out of their own Flesh, and deliver them to be shot again by the Archers on their side: Hereupon the Earl was enforced to block up those Gates as he had done the rest, but the City was so weak that it could hardly be defended.

For the Seditious being now furnish'd with Artillery, Powder and Shot, batter'd Bishopsgate, and cast down a great part of the Walls upon that side of the City. They afterwards pass'd the River likewise, and assail'd the Earl's Men upon Advantage in the Streets, of whom many they slew, and fir'd divers Places, prostrating two Parishes almost entirely; so they did mischief, they little car'd what they did, or to what End: And in such sort the Danger increas'd, that many perswaded the Earl to submit Courage to Rage, and for a time to abandon the City. But he not easily vincible in Spirit, and well assur'd that having stop'd all Passages for Relief, shortness of Provision would in very short time draw the Obstinacy of the Seditious to shorter Limits, drew his Sword, and caus'd others to do the like, and (according to a Soldiery Custom in Cases of Extremity) by interchange of a Kiss by every of them upon the Swords of others, seal'd a Resolution to maintain the Place.

Assuredly as it is advantageable to a Physician to be call'd to the Cure of a declining Disease, so it is for a Commander to suppress a Sedition which hath pass'd the height; for in both alike the noxious Humour doth first weaken, and afterwards wast and wear to nothing; and besides it is scarce possible that a rude and ruinous Multitude should continue long together, if any Prevention be apply'd, but they will fall into irreparable Wants: And so it hapned to these Seditious, who after three days, finding their Provision to fail, fired their Cabbins built of Timber and cover'd with Bushes, and with a broken Noise between certain Questions and doubtful Answers, dislodg'd from their Hill, and entrench'd them at the foot thereof, in a Valley call'd Dussendale, where they invited the Earl to a present Encounter. And as there hath seldom hapned any Sedition within this Realm, but the chief Actors therein have been abus'd with some Prophecies of doubtful Construction, so the Seditious were moved to remove to this Place, upon a Prophecy much credited among them, that they should fill it with slaughter'd Bodies; but whether of their Enemies or of their own it was left uncertain: The Words of the Prophecy were these;

A Prophecy which the Seditious depend on.

The Country Knuffs, Hob, Dick and Hick,
With Clubs and clouted Shoon, Shall fill up Dussendale
With slaughter'd Bodies soon.

The Earl being newly supply'd with 1400 Horse, was glad that the Seditious had forsaken their Hill, for that his Horsemen, in whom consisted his greatest Strength, could there perform but little Service: So the next Morning he sent forth all his Horsemen, of whom 1000 were Almanes, as accusom'd, so adventrous in Arms; his Foot he retain'd within the Town.

The Seditious rang'd themselves for the Fight, 1549. placing all the Gentlemen whom they had taken in Front, every two couple together, to make them sure from starting away. The Earl, before he would charge, sent to them an Offer of a General Pardon, one or two of the Principal excepted. But this more chafed the Rage of those who were resolv'd either to live or die together; and what cared they for Pardon who have nothing but a vile and servile Life to lose. For no more could be gotten from their Estates than from the hatching of an Egg; wherefore in a proud Scorn they answer'd this Offer with a great Shot, that strook the King's Standard-bearer on the Thigh, and his Horse on the shoulder.

Hereupon the Earl commanded his Artillery to be apply'd; the Almanes also, and Captain Drury with his Troops, gave a resolute Charge, and yet with such discretion, that most of the Captive Gentlemen who were placed in the Front escap'd without harm; these were so well seconded by the Light-horse, that in a short time they brake the Seditious, chased them above three Miles, and filled themselves with Blood until Night: There died of them 2000, as King Edward took the Number, but our Histories report more than 3500. (w)

In the mean time they who guarded the Artillery and Baggage, inclosed themselves with Carriage and a Trench, and pitched Stakes to bear off the approach of Horses, determining to stand stilly upon their Defence. The Earl returning from the Execution, did certify them by Messager, that because the King his Master was desirous to establish Peace, rather by Benignity than by Blood, he did assure them their Pardon if they would submit, otherwise they might expect nothing but Death. Answer was made, that they expected nothing but Death, and that they respected nothing at all, but it was by the Sword if they stood upon Defence, and by the Halter if they should yield; wherefore they made choice to die rather as Soldiers, than as Dogs.

The Earl sent again to know if they would entertain their Pardon in case he should come in Person and assure it? They answer'd, they did conceive him to be so Honourable, that from himself they would most thankfully embrace it. So he rode and caus'd their Pardon to be read to them, and engag'd his Honour that it should be perform'd. Then seeming to respect Life more than any other thing, they threw away their Weapons and Disloyalty together, and with Voices so lowd as before they were lewd, wished all Joy and Prosperity to the King.

The Commander Ket having a good Horse, fled away with the first; and the next day was taken with his Brother William in a Barn, and brought with a Guard of twenty Horsemen to Norwich, both of them having made good proof, that they were no less able to guide an Army in War, than they were to govern themselves in Peace.

Nine of the Principal were hang'd upon the Tree of Reformation, of whom two were seducing Prophets, a third was a most excellent Cannonier, whose good Skill evilly employ'd, did much endamage the Forces of the King.

(w) During this dangerous Insurrection, Sir John Cheek, a very learned Man, and the King's Preceptor, wrote and published a Tract to them, intitl'd, The true Subject to the Rebel: Where in an expositulatory Address to them, he shew'd them the great Mischiefs of Sedition. This is printed at large in Hollingshed, and by it self. J. S.

He and his Brother
hanged.

Robert Ket and his Brother were sent to London, and from thence return'd to be executed in Norfolk. Robert Ket was hang'd in Chains upon Norwich-Castle, his Brother William was in like sort executed upon Wymondham Steeple, but not without some murmuring, that that Church, dedicated to the Service of God, and which is polluted by violent Death, should be made a place of publick Execution. The day of this Defeat of the Seditious was a long time after yearly observ'd for a festival Day by the Inhabitants of Norwich, as well by cessation from Labour, as by resorting to Church to give publick Thanks for their deliverance.

Another Rising in Yorkshire.

About the same time another Sedition was rais'd at Semor in the North-riding of Yorkshire, whereof the chief Movers were William Ombler a Gentleman, Thomas Dale a Parish Clark, and Stevenson a Post. They took encouragement from a dark and deceivable Prophecy, a common Law both of Obedience and Peace, which did foretel that the Time should arrive when there should be no King, when the Nobility and Gentry should be destroy'd, when the Realm should be ruled by four Governors elected by the Commons, holding a Parliament in Commotion, which should begin at the South and North Seas of England; and that present they understood to be the Time, and that the Rebellious in Devonshire, Norfolk, and Yorkshire, should draw together to accomplish this Prophecy. The Pretences were to restore the Church to her antient Rights (for that was always one Note in their Musick) to relieve the Poor, to abate the Rich, and generally to disburden the Realm of all Grievances, a seemly task for such Undertakers.

The Ringleaders executed at York.

And now for execution hereof, first by firing of Beacons and ringing of Bells (as if the Coast had been assail'd by Enemies) they assembled about 3000 in Arms, whom they drew to be applyable to their purpose. Then to begin their great Work of Reformation, they slew one White a Gentleman, Savage a Merchant, and two others of meaner quality, and left their Bodies naked upon the Wild near Semor. After this they pass'd to the East-riding in Yorkshire, their Company daily increasing like a Snow-ball in rowling; and many they took with them much against their minds. But no sooner was the King's Pardon presented, but most of them fell off and dispersed, leaving Ombler and Dale almost alone. These, as they were riding like Madmen from Town to Town, charging People in the King's Name to assemble at Hummanby, were apprehended, and with four others of the most tumultuous, soon after executed at York; whose speedy Punishment staid others who were thought to waver between Obedience and Revolt.

break out into Hostility.

Now the French King supposing to make his hand by these rude Ravages in England, brake off his Treaty of Peace, proclaim'd Hostility, and denounc'd the same by his Ambassador to the King. Hereupon all French men in England not Denizens were taken Prisoners, and all their Goods seiz'd for the King. The French King understanding that certain English Ships lay at Jersey, set forth a Fleet of Gallies and Ships, intending to surprize them as they lay at Anchor. But the English being both vigilant and well appointed, in such sort did entertain them, that their Ships departed terribly torn, with loss of a thousand Men at the least. The French King fearing lest that the bad Success of this first Enterprize, might both discourage his People, and bring Disreputation to himself, forbid any Report to be made, not only of the Event, but of the Journey.

After this the French King levy'd an Army by Land, wherewith marching towards Bulloine, he took Blackness and Newhaven, two Ports of the English near unto Bulloine. This he did effect chiefly by the Treason of one Sturton, a Bastard Son of Lord Sturton's; and by Revolt of divers Almanes who serv'd in the Garisons, who being merely Mercenary, did easily encline to the strongest.

From whence the French King marched towards Bulloine; upon whose approach Sir Nicholas Arnault Captain of Bullingberge, holding the Place not of Strength to be held, withdrew all the Ordinance and Matters of Worth into High Bulloine, and with Gunpowder blew up the Fort. So the French King brought his Army before Bulloine; but because the Plague rag'd amongst his Soldiers, and the Weather was unseasonable by reason of much fall of Rain, he departed from his Army and left Chastilion Governor in his stead.

Chastilion bent his Siege against the Pierre, which was erected in Bulloine Haven, and after battery of 20000 Shot or more, the Breach was thought reasonable, and thereupon the Assault was given. But the same was so well encountered by the Valour of the Defendants, help'd with advantage of Place, that the Obstinacy of the Assailants did nothing but increase their loss; so as the first Fury being broken and spent, the French resolv'd to attempt the Place no more by Assault, notwithstanding they continu'd the Siege, presented divers Skirmishes and false Attempts; but they spent both their Labour and Shot without putting the Defendants in any fear. Then they planted their Artillery against the Mouth of the Haven, to impeach supply of Victuals to the Town. Yet the English Victualers surceased not at the King's Adventure to bring all things necessary, until the end the Soldiers of the Town set upon the French suddenly by Night, slew many of them, and dismounted their Pieces.

Then the French apply'd their Battery again, wherein they sometimes spent 1500 Shot in one day. But finding this to be a fruitless Fury, they afterwards us'd it more sparingly, and rather upon a shew of Hostility, than upon any hope thereby to prevail. In the mean Season they charg'd a Galley with Gravel and Stones, and prepar'd to sink it in the midst of the Haven. But the English took the Galley before it sunk and drew it to the Shore, and us'd the Stones to reinforce the Pierre. After this they made Faggots of light Matter mixt with Pitch, Tar, Tallow, Rosin, Powder and Wildfire, with intention to fire the Ships in the Haven; but that Enterprize was defeated by the Bullenais, and their Faggots taken from the French. During these Enterfeits divers Skirmishes pass'd between the English and the French about the Frontiers of Calais, which as they were but light, so most of them ended with disadvantage to the French.

And now if all these Troubles had not been sufficient to travail the Realm of England, at once a great Division fell among the Nobility; so much the more dangerous, by how much the Spirits were more active and high. And albeit the Heat thereof was much appeas'd for 1549. a time by the great Judgment and Moderation of the King, yet did it break forth in the end to tragical Events, not upon particular Persons only, but did much overflow, and almost overwhelm the whole Realm with disquiet, and hereof the most apparent Original was this.

The King's two Uncles fall out.

The King had two Uncles, Brothers to Queen Jane his deceased Mother, Edward Duke of Somerset Lord Protector, and Thomas Lord Seymour Baron of Sudley, High Admiral of England. As the Duke was elder in Years, so was he more staid in Behaviour. The Lord Sudley was fierce in Courage, courtly in Fashion, in Personage stately, in Voice magnificent, but somewhat empty of Matter: Both were so faithfully affected to the King, that the one might well be termed his Sword, the other his Target. The Duke was greatest in favour with the People, the Lord Sudley most respected by the Nobility; both highly esteem'd by the King; both fortunate alike in their Advancements, both ruin'd alike by their own Vanity and Folly. Whilst these two Brothers held in Amity, they were like two Arms, the one defending the other, and both of them the King. But many things did move together to dissolve their Love, and bring them to ruin: First, their contrary Disposition, the one being tractable and mild, the other stiff and impatient of a Superior, whereby they liv'd but in cunning Concord, as Brothers glew'd together, but not united in grain: Then much secret Envy was born against them, for that their new Lustre did dim the Light of Men honour'd with antient Nobility. Lastly, They were openly minded, as hasty and soon mov'd, so uncircumspect and easy to be minded. By these the Knot, not only of Love but of Nature, between them was dissolv'd; so much the more pitty, for that the first Cause proceeded from the Pride, the haughty Hate, the unquiet Vanity of a mannish or rather of a devilish Woman.

For the Lord Sudley had taken to Wife Katherine Parre Queen Dowager, last Wife to King Henry the Eighth; a Woman beautify'd with many excellent Virtues, especially with Humility the Beauty of all other Virtues. The Duke had taken to Wife Anne Stanhope, a Woman for many Imperfections intolerable, but for Pride monstrous: She was exceeding both subtle and violent in accomplishing her Ends, for which she spurn'd over all respects both of Conscience and of Shame. This Woman did bear such invincible Hate, first against the Queen Dowager, for light Causes and womens Quarrels, especially for that she had precedency of place (x) before her, being Wife to the greatest Peer in the Land, then to the Lord Sudley for her sake; that albeit the Queen Dowager died by Childbirth, yet would not her Malice either die or decrease; but continually she rubbed into the Duke's dull Capacity, that the Lord Sudley dissenting from him in Opinion of Religion (y), sought nothing more than to take away his Life, as well in regard of the common Cause of Religion, as thereby happily to attain his Place. Many other things she boldly feign'd, being assur'd of easy belief in her heedless Hearer, always fearful and suspicious (as of feeble Spirit) but then more than ever, by reason of some late Opposition against him. Her Perswasions she cunningly intermix'd with Tears, affirming, that she would depart from him, as willing rather to hear both of his Disgraces and Dangers, than either to see the one or participate of the other.

Their Wives.

(x) This Story of the Dutchess's Quarrel with the Queen about taking place, Hayward had neither from Stow, nor Hollingshed, nor yet from King Edward's Journal; none of which Writers speak a word of it. So that he must have it from Sanders*, who was the first Broacher of that Fable; and who thus relates it, 'That there arose a very great Contest * De Schij- between Queen Katherine Parre, and the Protector's Wife, who should have the Precedency. And the Contest rested mat. An- not in the Women, but passed to the Men: And when the Emulation continually increast, the Protector's Wife would glican. not let her Husband alone, till at last it came to pass, that the Protector (who altho he ruled the King, yet was ruled by his Wife) must cut off his Brother, that nothing might be an hindrance to her Will. Thus Sanders: who being an Author of such a profligate Character, it became not a just Historian and a good English-man, to borrow any thing from, unless confirmed with better Authority. J. S.

(y) The Author suggests, that this Lord Sudley dissented from his Brother the Duke in Religion; that is, in other words, that he was a Papist. No such thing appears in History, but rather that he was of the Religion now professed and countenanced: For one of his last Requests, when the Message was brought him to prepare for Death, was, that his Daughter might be committed to the Care of the Dutchess of Suffolk, a fast Protestant; and another was, that Mr. Latymer might be sent to him, to assist him with his Counsel and Prayers. Who would not have been a Ghostly Father fit for his Turn, had he been of a Religion different from Latymer. And here our Author dissents from Sanders, whom at other times he too much follows; who saith, that the Admiral was tainted with the same Herefy with his Brother the Protector.

Here the Author likewise will scarcely obtain Credit in other of his Reflexions upon the Duke, when he makes the first Cause of dissolving the Knot of these two Brothers Love to proceed from the Dutchess; and that she rubbed into the Duke's dull Capacity (as he unhanfomely and rudely treats with his Words that great Peer) that his Brother sought to take away his Life, and to attain his Place. And that the Duke at length yielding himself to her, did devise his Bro- ther's Destruction. And that being arrested and sent to the Tower, he was condemned by Act of Parliament a very short time after. And lastly, that the Accusations against him consisted of frivolous or pittifull Matters. By all this Account of this Lord's Fall, he is represented to come unjustly by his Death, by the unnatural acting of his Brother against him. And that he was set on in all this Mischief, like a weak Man, by his Wife. This, if it were true, layeth a most heavy Imputation upon the Duke. But surely he was no such Man as he is here delivered down to be; He had better Morals, and more Religion than this came to. The Admiral was certainly an evil Man, turbulent, and full of ambitious Designs from the beginning of this King's Reign. And his Brother the Duke observing it, did often advise him, and earnestly dissuade him from his dangerous Courses, using all the fairest Means with him; pardoning what was past: and that he might meet with his Brother's high Mind, gratifying him with Possessions, besides the high and honourable Office of Lord High Admiral. Yet was he continually practising after this: He raised Soldiers, and threatned, he would make the blackest Parliament that ever was in England. He is suspected to have poisoned his Wife, that excellent Woman, Queen Katherine; that being single, he might make his Addresses to the Lady Elizabeth the King's Sister, and one of the Heirs to the Crown. So that in fine, the Parliament did judg these Things to be a traiterous aspiring to the Crown. And surely Sir John Hayward had never read the Act of Parliament whereby that Lord was attainted, to term his Accusations to be frivolous and pittifull Matters. The Writer of the History of the Reformation of the Church of England hath, from the Council Book, exemplified the Articles against him to the Number of Thirty three: which will shew what heavy Crimes he was charged with. And which, altho he was urged by the Lords of the Privy Council, and that upon his Allegiance, to make Answer to, he would never be persuaded to do: Till at last he made some Answer to the three first; but no more. Nor would he set his Hand to them.

Vol. 2. in the Collect. Num. 31.

And how fairly he was judged and dealt with in the Parliament, will appear by this Account, as it stands in the Journals of both Houses: viz. February the 25th, was read in the House of Lords the first time, the Bill of Attaindor of the Lord Admiral. Febr. the 26th read the second time. Febr. the 27th read the third; and concluded with the common arrested.

The Duke embracing this Woman's Counsel (a Woman's Counsel indeed, and nothing the better) yielded himself both to advise and devise for Destruction of his Brother. The Earl of Warwick had his finger in the business, and drew others also to give either furtherance or way to her violent Desires; being well content she should have her mind, so as the Duke might thereby incur Infamy and Hate. Hereupon the Lord Sudley was arrested, and sent to the Tower; and in very short time after, condemn'd by Act of Parliament. And within few days after his Condemnation, a Warrant was sent under the Hand of his Brother the Duke, whereby his Head was deliver'd to the Ax. His own fierce Courage hasten'd his Death, because equally ballanc'd between Doubt and Disdain, he was desirous rather to die at once, than to linger long upon Curtesy and in fear.

The

common Assent of all the Peers. The same Day, being Wednesday, the Bill was sent down to the Commons; when it was thought good by them to send down certain Members of their House, to declare unto the Commons the Manner after which the Lords had proceeded in that matter; and further to declare unto them, that in case they were minded to proceed in like sort, certain Noblemen who had given evidence against the said Lord Admiral, should be sent unto them to declare by Mouth and Presence such Matters, as by their Writing should in the mean time appear unto them. The Master of the Rolls, Sir James Hales, and Sergeant Molineux were the Persons sent by the Lords.

March the 2d, they were sent again to the Lower House, with the like Commission in effect, as they were sent the Wednesday before. Answer was made, that they would consult together, and thereupon they would with speed send up their Resolution. But no Haste having been made therein by them of the Nether House, the Lords having sat so long as it was thought the Time now far spent, they concluded to depart; desiring the Lord Protector, that it would please him to receive such Answer as should be sent touching that Purpose, and to make report thereof at their next Assembly, which should be the next Monday.

March the 5th, the Bill was brought from the Commons for the Attainder of the L. Sudley. Thus it is related in the Journal of the House of Lords.

By the Journal of the House of Commons it appears, That this Bill was read there the last Day of February the first time. March the 1st, read again. And March the 2d, the Master of the Rolls, Sergeant Molineux, Sergeant Hales, and the King's Solicitor, were sent from the Lords, to know the Pleasure of this House, if it should be resolved there, to pass upon the Attainder of the Admiral in such Order as was passed in the Higher House. Whereupon it was ordered, that Advertisement thereof be sent to the Lords by some of that House; That it was resolved, that the Evidence should be heard orderly as it was before the Lords: And also to require, that the Lords who affirmed that Evidence, might come hither, and declare it viva voce . And this to be delivered to the Lord Protector by Mr. Speaker, and other the King's Privy Council of the House.

March the 4th, The Master of the Rolls, &c. declared the King's Majesty's Pleasure to be, that the Admiral's Presence was not necessary in this Court. And therefore not to be there. And further declared, that if the House would require to have the Lords to come, and to satisfy the House for the Evidence against the Admiral, the Lords would come. Then it was ordered, that Master Comptroller [and others] of the King's Privy Council should hear the Lords; and require, that if it were judged necessary to have the Lords come down, that upon any further Suit they might come down to the House. And the Bill for the Attainder of High Treason of Sir Tho. Seymour, L. Sudley, was read the third time.

This Lord was sent to the Tower the 16th of January, according to Stow; and the Bill for his Attainder was not finished till the 5th of March. Which shews that his Condemnation was not so very short a time after his Commitment, as our Author here writeth. And he was executed the 20th Day of March.

The ground then of the Admiral's Fall was his apparent Treason. But that the Cause should spring from an Envy the Dutcheffs of Somerset had against the L. Admiral, because his Wife, Queen Katherine, took place of her, is both trifling and incredible; and the less to be credited, because it is a Surmise taken from Sanders's Book of the English Schism, that abounds with Malice and Lyes, and Ill-will to all the Transactions of this Reign.

The Author speaks of the Admiral's Protestation at his Death; and that the open Course and Carriage of his Life cleared him in the Opinion of many. What his Protestation was, Stow tells us, viz. that he never committed or meant any Treason against the King or Realm. The contrary to which his Deeds declared, and the Act for the Attainder abundantly sheweth; and also that the Course and Carriage of his Life was, during this King's Reign, vicious and turbulent; and in the preceding King's Reign he was very dissolute. A Woman going to her Execution for a Robbery, confessed that Sir Tho. Seymour first debauched her. He seldom or never came to Common Prayer, which the Queen his Wife had said daily in her Family; and was reported to disbelieve the Immortality of the Soul. This, and a great deal more, Latymer in a Sermon preached before the King a little after his Execution, related upon his own Knowledge or upon good Evidence, to satisfy all People of the Manners of the Man, and how well he deserved his Punishment.

Latymer

Then the Author hath a most vile Insinuation against the Protector, and the said Reverend Father and Martyr Hugh cleared about a Part of the Odium of the Admiral's Death; and that he pretending all the Gravity and Sincerity of a professed Divine, yet contented in his to be serviceable to great mens Ends, declared in a Sermon before the King, that while the L. Sudley was a Prisoner in the Tower, he wrote to the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth, that they should revenge his Death. He adds, that Latymer concerning the cast forth many other Imputations, most doubted, many known to be untrue. And then from this Story the Author takes occasion to express his cankered Mind against Men in Holy Orders in these words: Some Theologians have been employed to defile Places erected only for Religion and Truth, by defending Oppressions and Faction, distaining their Profession, and the good Arts which they have learned, by publishing odious Untruths upon report and credit of others. As tho they were a mercenary base sort of Men, that however Sacred their Office is, would be hired to be Trumpets of other mens lying Inventions, for the easier deceiving of the People. This Author going thus out of the Road of an Historian, that he might give a Lash to the Theologians, as he calls them, betrays only the Good-will he had to that Order, and leaves upon record his Malice: and particularly his ingrateful Pains to render (as much as lay in his power) that grave and good Man, Bishop, and constant Martyr for Religion and Truth, to be a publick Lyar in the Pulpit, to do a piece of Service to the Protector. And he that would die rather than to subscribe or acknowledg that to be true which he thought to be false, is made such a mercenary Wretch, as willfully and openly to promulgate, and that before so solemn an Assembly, Uncertainties and downright Lyes.

Hayward here again goeth hand in hand with Sanders to defame this Reverend Man; who, speaking of Latymer, giveth him this broad Complement (because he was commonly stiled the Apostle of England) his Apostleship consisted in Lying. And tells this Story of him; That after the Dutcheffs had invented the Mischief against the Admiral, the Protector went and dealt with Latymer, that he should in his Sermon traduce him before the People for a Traitor. And that accordingly Latymer readily undertook it; and soon after in the Pulpit told a Tale of I know not what Snares prepared against the King's Majesty by the Admiral: and therefore that he deserved Death. So that by this Account the Duke and the Divine are represented to Posterity as a couple of bloody Wretches, combining together to make an innocent Man seem guilty of Treason, and then cry out for Execution of him.

But for more particular Satisfaction concerning Latymer, as to his Concern about the Admiral, I add further, That these Passages related by Hayward to have been spoken by this Divine in one of his Sermons before the King, are not to be found in the last Edition of his Sermons in Quarto, An. 1571. it being thought good then to leave out what was said of this particular Act of Justice; but indeed they are found in an Edition of the said Sermons in Octavo, set forth while the King lived. Where, in the fourth Sermon, Latymer took occasion to relate something of the Admiral's evil Conversation, and particularly concerning two small Papers writ by way of Letter to those two Princesses a little before his Death; which for Secrecy sake he caused to be sewed up within the Sole of his Shoe, with a Command to his sations.

The Accusations against him contain'd much frivolous Matter, or term them Pittiful, if you please. The Act of Parliament expresses these Causes of his Attainder: For attempting to get into his Custody the Person of the King, and Government of the Realm; for making much Provision of Mony and of Victuals; for endeavouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth the King's Sister; for persuading the King in his tender Age to take upon him the Rule and Order of himself. The Proofs might easily be made, because he was never call'd to his Answer. But as well the Protestations at the point of his Death, as the open Course and Carriage of his Life, clear'd him in opinion of many. So doubtful are all weighty matters, whilst some take all they hear for certain, others making question of any Truths, Posterity enlarging both. Dr. Latymer pretending all the Gravity and Sincerity of a profess'd Divine, yet content to be serviceable to Great Mens ends, declar'd in a Sermon before the King, that whilst the Lord Sudley was a Prisoner in the Tower, he wrote to the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth the King's Sisters, that they should revenge his Death; which indeed the Lady Mary afterwards more truly did, by executing the Earl of Warwick, than either she was, or at that time could in particular be requir'd. Many other Imputations he cast forth, besides most doubted, many known to be untrue: And so whereas Papinian a Civil Lawyer, but a Heathen, chose rather to die than to defend the Murder which the Emperor Caracalla had done upon his Brother Geta, some Theologians have been employ'd to defile Places erected only for Religion and Truth, by defending Oppressions and Factions, staining their Professions and the good Arts which they had learn'd, by publishing odious Untruths upon report and credit of others.

O Wives! the most sweet Poison, the most desir'd Evil in the world! Certainly as it is true as, Syracides saith, that there is no Malice like the Malice of a Woman, so no Mischief wanteth, where a malicious Woman beareth sway. A Woman was first given to Man for a Comforter, but not for a Counsellor, much less a Controller and Director; and therefore in the first Sentence against Man this Cause is express'd, because thou obey'st the Voice of thy Wife. And doubtless the Protector by being thus rul'd to the Death of his Brother, seem'd with his left Hand to have cut off his right: For hereupon many of the Nobility cry'd out upon him, that he was a Bloodsucker, a Murderer, a Parricide, a Villain, and that it was not fit the King should be under the Protection of such a ravenous Wolf. Soon after it was given forth, and believ'd by many, that the King was dead; whereupon he pass'd in great State thro the City of London, to manifest that he was both alive and in good health. Whether this Speech were spread either by Adventure or by Art, it is uncertain; certain it is, it did something shake the Strength of the King's Affection towards the Protector.

Besides, many well-dispos'd Minds conceiv'd an hard Opinion of him, for that a Church by Strand-bridg and two Bishops Houses were pull'd down, to make a Seat for his new Building; in digging the Foundation whereof, the Bones of many, who had been there bury'd, were cast up, and carry'd into the Fields: and because the Stones of those Houses and the Church did nothing suffice for his Work, the Steeple and most part of the Church of St. John of Jerusalem near Smithfield, most beautifully erected and adorn'd not long before by Docray, Prior of that Church, was min'd and overthrown with Poulder, and the Stones apply'd to this spacious Building. And because the Work could not be therewith finish'd, the Cloister of Paul's on the North-side of the Church, in a place call'd Pardon Churchyard, and the Dance of Death, very curiously wrought about the Cloister, and a Chappel that stood in the midst of the Churchyard; also the Charnel-house that stood upon the South-side of Paul's (now a Carpenter's Yard) with the Chappel, Tombs, and Monuments therein, were beaten down, the Bones of the Dead carry'd into Finsbury Fields, and the Stones converted to his Building. It is constantly affirm'd, that for the same purpose he intended to pull down the Church of St. Margaret in Westminster, and that the standing thereof was preserv'd only by his Fall. Assuredly as these Actions were in a high degree impious, so did they draw with them both open Dislike from Men, and much secret Revenge from God.

And now hath the Lord Protector play'd the first Act of the Tragedy of his Life, namely his high and prosperous Estate; he is now stepping into the second Act, wherein he begins mainly to decline.

For the Earl of Warwick espying opportunity, shewing himself, and knowing that in troublesom Times the Obedience of Great Persons is most easily shaken, drew about 18 of the (2) Privy Council to knit with him against

Man to convey them privately to the said Ladies. Which Practice nevertheless came to light by his Man's own Confession. The Substance of which Papers (betraying his implacable Malice to the last) was to excite them to a Jealousy of the L. Protector, that they might join their Interests to overthrow him. The Reason why Latymer spake these things of the Admiral in this Auditory, was to justify the Authority that put him to death; against which some (perhaps of his own Party) had uttered unbecoming Words. Therefore that Holy Man warned and charged his Auditors not to judg those that were in Authority, but to pray for them; saying, that it became not them to judg great Magistrates, nor to condemn their Doings, unless their Deeds were openly and apparently wicked. And that these Imputations, whatever Hayward writes, were neither doubted nor untrue, nor taken upon vain Report, the Reverend Preacher averred at the same time, that he himself saw those two Letters, and shewed that he was an Eye and Ear-witness of the rest of the Matters he related. And what Latymer spake in the Pulpit, and that upon his own Knowledge, I know no reason why we may not conclude true, because so just and honest a Man spake it; who was above the being hired to speak a Falshood, or to serve a base Turn. And in a word, if we may depend upon the Protestation of such a vertuous Person, we have him making it publicly before the King and the rest of his Noble Auditory (as tho he forecasted some such Calumny should afterwards be laid upon him) 'That what he spoke of the Admiral and his Writing, he spake it of a good zeal and on good ground, and that he neither feigned nor lyed a jot. (2) There were but fifteen (besides himself and Secretary Petre, detained with them by Force.) For so many only set forth the Proclamation against the Lord Protector, and signed it with their Hands; but indeed they were Men of the greatest Sway, viz. the L. Rich, L. Chancellor, L. St. John, L. Great Master and President of the Council, the Lord Marquiss 1549. against the Lord Protector. These he did so wind up to his purpose, that they withdrew from the Court, fell to secret Consultations, and walk'd in the City with many Servants weapon'd, and in new Liverys: the Causes thereof many conjectur'd, but few knew. They were all desirous that the Protector's Greatness should be taken lower, but none conceiv'd that the Earl's Malice did extend unto Death. But the Lord Protector, as humble then as he had been haughty before, sent Secretary Petre to them in the King's Name, to understand the Causes of their Assembly, and to declare unto them that he would thank them for hating him, in case they did it in love to the King (a); intreating them for the King's sake, if not for his Safety, yet for his Quiet, that they would forbear open shew of Hostility, and resort unto him peaceably, that they might commune together as Friends. In the mean time he arm'd five hundred Men, part of the King's, and part his own; the Court-gates were rampard, and People rais'd both by Letters and Proclamation to aid the King: and the more to increase the present Terror, he remov'd the King by night from Hampton-Court to Windsor, with a Company more resembling an Army than a Train.

The Lords with the E. of Warwick at London.

On the other side, the Lords at London first taking possession of the Tower, sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of the City to the Earl of Warwick, lodging at Ely House in Holborn. Here they presented themselves secretly arm'd; and the Lord Rich, then Lord Chancellor of England, a Man of quick and lively Delivery of Speech, in this manner spake unto them. (b)

L. Rich's Speech against the Protector.

I Am not ignorant into what Adventure I now plunge my self, in speaking against a Man both high in Honour and great in Favor, both with the King and many of the People. But my Duty prevailing against respect of Danger, I will plainly declare the Discontentments which the Lords of his Majesty's Council have already conceiv'd against the Actions past of the Lord Protector, as also their Fears touching matters to ensue; that with your Aid they may in good time happily remedy the one, and remove the other: assuring you all, that as I will not utter any thing falsely, so will I forbear to tell many Truths.

And first to touch upon his open Ambition; with what good reason or purpose, think we, did he, being a Man of many Imperfections, as want of Eloquence, Personage, Learning, or good Wit, aspire to the great Offices of governing all Affairs of State, fit for none but whom God hath favour'd with fitting Graces? And albeit these Defects might have been well supply'd by Sufficiency of others of the Council, yet was he so peevishly opinionative and proud, that he would neither ask nor hear the Advice of any, but was absolutely rul'd by that obstinate and imperious Woman his Wife, whose ambitious and mischievous Will so guided him in the most weighty Affairs of the Realm, that albeit he was counsel'd by others what was best, yet would he do quite contrary, lest he should seem to need their Advice. And yet this was not enough, as Avarice and Ambition have never enough; but to add Dignity to Authority, and to make sure that as no Man should as in Power so in Title surmount him, he would be advanced to the Degree of Duke of Somerset, which hath always been a Title for one of the King's Sons inheritable to the Crown.

And albeit it may seem a light matter to speak of Bribery and Extortion against him, yet his Robberies and Oppressions have been such, that no Man would willingly have adventur'd to commit them, unless he thought by Treason so to assure himself, as he could not be call'd to answer for them. For he hath laid his ravenous hands upon the King's Treasure and Jewels left by his Father, which were known to be of an inestimable Value; that it might well be said, even as he had given forth, that King Henry died a very poor Prince, and had been utterly shamed, in case he had liv'd one quarter of a Year longer.

Then also what havock hath he made of the King's Lands and Inheritance? What Sales and Exchanges, upon pretence of necessity? And yet what a high deal hath he transported to himself, without regard of others, who have employ'd their Travels and Estates in service of the King and of his deceas'd Father? What Arts hath he us'd to spend those, and spare himself against the time of his mischievous Purpose? How greedily, how insatiably hath he never ceas'd the whilst to rake and glean Mony together? What shameful Sale of Offices and Preferments hath he made, nothing regarding the Worthiness of the Person, but the Worth and Weight of the Gift? betraying thereby the Administration of the Realm into the Hands both of worthless and corrupt Men: To speak nothing the whilst of his Mint at Duresme Place, erected and us'd for his private Profit; to speak nothing of the great Boutifale of Colleges and Chanceries; to speak nothing of all his other particular Pillages. All which were so far from satisfying his bottomless Desires, Marquis of Northampton, Earl of Arundel, L. Chamberlain, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Southampton, Sir Tho. Cheincy, Treasurer of the King's House and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Sir John Cage Constable of the Tower, Sir Edw. North, Sir Edw. Mountagu, L. Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Rafe Sadleir, Sir John Baker, Sir Edward Wotton, Dr. Wotton Dean of Canterbury, and Sir Richard Southwel. J. S.

(a) There was no such word passed from the Protector; nor is the rest truly represented. The Letter the Protector sent to these Lords by Secretary Petre, is extant in our Histories, which speak him of no such timorous Spirit. He wrote in the King's Name and his own, and the other Lords with him; 'That they marvelled to see the manner of those Lords Doings, bent with force of Violence to bring the King's Majesty and him into Extremities. But that if they would take no other way, he intended to defend the King and himself with Extremity of Death, and to put all to God's hand. But that if they fought no hurt to the King, as touching other private Matters, to avoid Effusion of Christian Blood, and to preserve the King's Person, his Realms and Subjects, they should find him agreeable unto any reasonable Conditions. And so he prayed them to send their final Answer. J. S.

(b) This large Speech ensuing, attributed to the L. Chancellor Rich, is no where to be met with in our Histories, nor one word of it. Only Stow writeth, that the L. Chancellor and others of the King's Council being assembled at the L. Warwick's Place, declared to the Mayor and Citizens the Abuses of the L. Protector, &c. So that this Harangue is wholly framed out of the Head of our Author, to display his own Eloquence. J. S.

1549. that he proceeded to fleece the whole Commonwealth, to cut and pare it to the very quick.

For under colour of War, which either his Negligence drew on, or his false Practices procur'd, he levy'd such a Subsidy upon the whole Realm, as never was ask'd a greater at once; which should not have need'd, albeit the Wars had been just, in case he had not imbezeld the King's Treasure as he did: for besides he extorted Mony by way of Loan from all Men who were suppos'd to have it, and yet left the King's Soldiers and Servants unpaid. But in all these pretended Necessities, how profuse was he in his private Expences? carrying himself rather as fitting his own Greatness, than the common Good. How did he riot, surfeit upon vain hopes, as if new Supply for waste would never want? What Treasures did he bury in his sumptuous Buildings? And how foolish and fanciful were they? A fit Man forsooth to govern a Realm, who had so goodly Government in his own Estate. All these things, as there are but few but know, so we may be assur'd that he never durst have committed half of them with a mind to have remain'd a Subject under the Law, and to be answerable for his Actions afterwards; but did manifestly intend to heap his Mischiefs with so high a Treason, as he might climb above his Sovereign, and stand sure beyond reach of Law.

And for inducement to this his traitorous Design, he suborn'd his Servants and certain Preachers to spread abroad the Praises of his Government, with as much abasing the Noble King Henry, as without Impudence they could devise: Following therein the Practices of King Richard the Tyrant, by depraving the Father to honour the Son, to extinguish the Love of the People to the young King, by remembring some Imperfections of his Father; which Example, both traitorous and unnatural, who doubts but his Heart was ready to follow? Whose Heart was ready to defame his Father, and set nought by his Mother (as it is well known) and to procure, yea labour the Death of his Brother; whom albeit the Law and Consent of many had condemn'd upon his own Speeches, yet his earnest Endeavour therein did well declare what Thoughts can sink into his unnatural Breast, and what foul shifts he would have made, rather than that his Brother should have escap'd Death, to that end that he might remove at once both an Impeachment to his poisonous Purposes, and a Surety to the King's Life and Estate. To this end he also practis'd to dispatch such of the Nobility as were like to oppose his mischievous Drift, and in such sort either to encumber and weaken the rest, that they should be no impediments to him. In the mean time he endeavour'd to win the common People both by strain'd Courtesy and by Looseness of Life, whereto he gave not only Licence, but Encouragement and Means.

And the better to advance his Intents, he deviseth to intangle the Realm not only with outward War, that with rumor thereof his dangerous Devices might be obscur'd; but with inward Sedition, by stirring and nourishing Discontentments among the Nobility, Gentry, and Commons of the Realm. This he did under pretence of such matters as all Men desir'd might be redress'd more gladly than he, but in a more quiet and settled time. But the time seem'd most convenient for him, when, under the sweet Pretence of Release and Liberty to the People, he might have destroy'd the Nobility and Gentry, who are the Defence and Safety of the People; and so at pleasure have reduc'd all under his tyrannous Subjection.

Which, how insupportable it would have been, may well be conjectur'd by his Actions already past. What Pride and Insolency of his Men made up of nought? What Instruments had he in every Shire to work his Purposes, to spread his Rumors, to hearken and to carry Tales? And those, what Flatterers? What Lyars? How greedily gaping for other mens Livings? How vigilant to grope mens Thoughts, and to pick out somewhat whereof they might complain? And such vile Vermin, how dear were they to him? And namely John Bonham his one Hand in Wiltshire, Sir Miles Partridge his other Hand in Gloucestershire, his Customers in Wells, Pier's Country, his Minister in Devonshire; besides many his bad-condition'd Minions in Court: what Monsters were they? How esteem'd they his Favour above all mortal respects?

And further to accomplish his ambitious Ends, he devis'd to make the French King his Friend, by betraying unto him the King's Fortresses beyond the Seas, which the late Noble King Henry with great Charge, Courage and Glory, had brought under his power; which Practice was so carry'd, that no Man, but such as discern'd nothing, but did perceive it: And that as well by his often private Conference with the French Embassadors and their Secretaries, as by failing to furnish those Pieces with necessary Supplies, as also by the Speeches which himself and his Servants cast abroad, that Bulloigne and the Fortresses about it were an unprofitable Burden to the Realm. But for the Charge no Man will conceive that he wanted Mony to keep them, who undertook so great a Charge as the Conquest of Scotland, and wasted every day a hundred pounds on his fantastical Building.

Besides, it hath been often heard from his own Communication, how he intended to procure a Resignation of the Rights of the King's Majesty's Sisters, and others who are entitled to the Possession of the Crown, and to have entail'd the same upon his own Issue; which when he had effected, and having the King's Person in his power the Chain of Sovereignty could not long have ty'd him short, he might have atchiev'd all his ambitious Intentions at will.

Wherefore surely he hath thus put on the Person not only of a Robber and of a Murderer, but of a Traitor to the State, since we have evidently discover'd both his lofty and bloody Mind. It behoveth you to join in aid with the Lords of his Majesty's Privy Council, as in extinguishing a raging Fire, as in repelling a cruel Enemy; for assuredly we must either weakly yield to his Rule and Command, or else the ambitious Author must be taken away.

In the afternoon of the same Day the Lord Mayor assembled a Common Council in Guild-hall, City requir'd to send Soldiers.

1549. hall, where two Letters arriv'd almost in one instant, one from the King and the L. Protector for 1000 Men to be arm'd for Defence of the King's Person, another from the Lords at London, for 2000 Men to aid them in defence of the King's Person; both Parties pretending alike, but both intending nothing less. The Recorder, whose Voice accordeth commonly with the Lord Chancellor, did so well set forth the Complaints of the Lords against the Protector, that many were inclinable to favour their side. But one nam'd George Stadlowe, somewhat better advis'd, stept up and spake unto them as followeth.

*A Citizen's Speech in Common
hereupon.*

This Buiness (Right honourable Lord Mayor and the Residue of this Court) as it is a very high Passage of State, so it is worthy of serious Consideration; and that upon sudden Advice nothing be done or determin'd therein, lest happily by being serviceable to the Designs of other Men whose Purposes we know not, we cast our selves into the throat of danger, which hitherto we do not see, two things I much fear in case we afford present Aid to the Lords, either of which should cast upon us a Bridle rather for stopping a while, than for stepping or stirring too soon or too fast at their Incitement. One is the certain Dangers of the City, the other the uncertain Adventure of all the Realm. First then if we adjoin to the Lords, whether they prevail or not we ingulph our selves into assured Danger, an Example whereof I find in Fabian, whose report I intreat you all to observe. In the time of Henry the Third, the Lords in a good Cause, for Maintenance of divers beneficial Laws, desir'd Aid of the City against the King. Aid was granted, and the Quarrel brought to the Arbitriment of the Sword. In this Battel the King and his Son were taken Prisoners, and upon their Enlargement free Pardon was granted, not only to the Lords but the Citizens of London, which was afterwards confirm'd both by Oath and by Act of Parliament. But what follow'd? Was the Displeasure forgotten? No verily, nor ever forgotten during that King's Life; for afterwards the Liberties of the City were taken away, Strangers were appointed Governours, and the Citizens perpetually vex'd, both in their Persons and in their Estates. So heavy and durable is the Wrath of Kings, that Solomon saith, The Indignation of the King is death. For it is natural for Princes to uphold their Sovereignty, and to hold it in highest esteem, in no case to indure their Supreme Authority to be forceably either oppress'd or dispres'd by their Subjects; inso much as they mortally hate such Subjects as have once attempted either to overrule them by Power, or to cast any Terror upon them. And howsoever they may be either constrain'd or content to bear Sail for a time, yet are they so sure Paymasters in the end, that few have held out their Lives, I will not say prosperously but safely, who have offer'd Inforcements against their King.

Now touching my Fear for the Commonwealth, I much suspect these Considerations. I always expect from them some lurking Mischief, which the more cunningly it be kept in, the more dangerously it will break forth. For albeit there be many Hands in this Action, yet one is the Head, who doubtless hath Skill to play his own Game: and albeit the Pretences given forth are always fair, and for the publick Good, yet are the secret Intentions commonly ambitious, and only aim at private Ends. Yea many times the End is worse than the first Intent; because when a Subject hath obtain'd the Hand against his Prince, I will not say, he will be loth, but doubtless it is not safe for him to give over his Advantage: wherefore I am of Opinion, that for the present we will not be so uncourteous as to delay, and suspend our giving Aid to the Lords for a time. (c)

Upon this Advice the Court resolv'd to arm a hundred Horsemen, and four hundred Foot for Defence of the City. To the King they return'd Answer, that they would be ready upon any Necessity to apply all their Forces either for his Defence or for his Honour. But they intreated him to be pleas'd to hear such Complaints as were objected against the Lord Protector before he assembl'd Forces in the Field, which in those tempestuous times, as it could not be done without great Danger, so without great Cause it should not. To the Lords they answer'd, that they were ready to join with them in any dutiful Petition to the King, but to join with them in Arms, they could not upon the sudden resolve.

The next day, the Lords at London dispatch'd a Letter to the Lords at Windfor, wherein they charg'd the Protector with many Disorders both in his private Actions, and in his manner of Government, requiring that he would disperse the Forces which he had rais'd, and withdraw himself from the King, and be content to be order'd by Justice and Reason. That this done, they would gladly commune with the rest of the Council for the Surety of the King's Person, and for ordering of his Estate, otherwise they would make no other Account of them than they might trust to find Cause, and would assuredly charge them according to their Demerits.

The King all this time was so far from governing his Lords, that he was scarce at his own Liberty: and considering that the late Rebellions had but newly weary'd themselves into Quiet, and fearing new Rages among the unstable People daily threatned, and upon such occasion not unlike to take Flame; conceiving also that the Confederacy trench'd no deeper, or that the only Remedy was to seem so to conceive, dissolv'd his Companies except only his Guard, but charg'd them upon warning to be ready; so it is most certain, that the troublesome times were a great Advantage to the Lords. Had the People been well settl'd in Subjection, or the Protector a Man of Spirit enough, they had been in danger to have been undone: but the Protector, instead of using his Authority, sent Secretary Petre (who under pretence of Gravity, cover'd much Untrustiness of Heart) (d) to the Lords at London, with some secret Instructions sent espe-

(c) This Speech of the judicious Citizen is in Fox, and Hollingshed, but much flourish'd, augmented and enlarged by our Author according to his Custom. J. S.

(d) An unfair Character of a very wise and honest Man, and long exercised in publick Affairs, without any spot that ever I could find: except that he did comply with the Changes of Religion, under the Princes in whose Reigns he served. Which was a Practise of a great number more besides himself. Secretary Petre is not to be censured as false, for 1549. especially to persuade them, that for a publick Benefit, all either private Guards or Unkindnesses might be laid aside. But neither did he return to Windsor, neither was any Answer return'd from the Lords. After this he wrote two Letters, one in his own Name to the Earl of Warwick, the other in the Name of the Lords at Windsor to the Lords at London; in both which he so weakly complain'd, expostulated, intreated, yielded under their Hand, as it was sufficient to have breath'd Courage into any Enemy once declar'd against him.

The Lords publicly by Proclamation charge the Protector. And indeed, hereupon the Lords forthwith publish'd a Proclamation under the Hands of seventeen Persons, either for Nobility or Authority of Office well regarded: wherein the Causes of such Calamities and Losses as had lately before happen'd, not only by inward Divisions which had cost the Lives of many thousands of the King's Subjects, and threatned more, but also by the Loss of divers Pieces beyond the Seas, which had been won by great Adventure of the late King's Person and Consumption of his Treasure; they perceiv'd that the only Root from whence those Mischiefs sprung, was the evil Government of the Lord Protector, whose Pride, Covetousness and Ambition cover'd only his private Ends, and therefore he was deeply busy'd in his spacious and specious Buildings in the hottest times of War against France and Scotland, whilst the poor Soldiers and Servitors of the King were unpaid, and labour'd to make himself strong in all Countries, whilst within the Realm Laws, Justice, and good Order perverted, Provisions for the Forts beyond the Seas neglected, and the King's Subjects by most dangerous Divisions (by his means either rais'd or occasion'd) much Disquiet. That hereupon the Lords of the Council for preventing as well present Dangers to the King's Person, as the utter Subversion of the State of the Realm, concluded to have talk'd to him quietly, without Disturbance to the King, or to the People, for reducing him to live within reasonable Limits, and for putting Order for Safety of the King's Person, and Preservation of the Commonwealth of the Realm, and so to have pass'd over his most unnatural and traitorous Deservings without further Extremities. But he knowing that he was unable to answer for any part of his Demeanour, began forthwith to spread false Rumours, that certain Lords had conspir'd against the King's Person; under pretence whereof he levy'd Forces in a disorder'd Uproar, albeit the Treason rested in him and some other his Complices. Wherefore seeing he troubl'd the whole Realm for accomplishing his traitorous Ends, and us'd the King in his tender Age for an Instrument against himself, causing him to put his Hand to many of his own Devices, and to speak things tending to the Destruction of himself, they desir'd, and in the King's Name charg'd all Subjects not to obey any Precepts, Licenses or Proclamations, whereunto the Protector's Hand should be set, albeit he should abuse the King's Hand and Seal unto them, but to quit themselves upon such Proclamation as should proceed from the Body of the Council, protesting therewith their faithful Hearts to the King, and their Loyalty toward the People.

Instantly after publishing of this Proclamation the Lords directed their Letters to Windsor, and address'd one to the King, another to the Protector, the third to the Household which was openly read. The Letter to the Protector was guiled over with many smooth Words, intimating fair Promises and full of Hope; but the other two did fully and folly set forth his Obstinacy, his Avarice, his Ambition, his rash Engagements into Wars, in the King's unsettl'd both Age and Estate, his Negligencies, his Deceits, and all other Insufficiencies mention'd before. Herewith Sir Robert Wingfield Captain of the Guard was sent from the Lords to Windsor, who so well persuaded the King both of the Loyal Affection of the Lords towards him, and of their moderate Desires against the Protector (who then was in Presence) that partly thereby, but chiefly in regard of the turbulent times, the Protector was remov'd from the King's Person, and a Guard set upon him until the next day, when the Lords at London were appointed to be there.

So the next day diverse of the Council rode from London to Windsor, but the Earl of Warwick rode not with them, for he was a perfect Master of his Craft: he had well learn'd to put others before him in dangerous Actions, and in Matters of Mischiefe to be seen to do least, when in very deed all mov'd from him. He had well learn'd of the Ape to take Nuts out of the Fire with the Paw of the Cat. These Lords coming before the King, did again run over their Complaints against the Protector, and also under Colour of Love and Duty, adviseth the King to beware of such as were both powerful, ambitious, mischievous and rich: Affirming that it would be better Surety unto him, if this great Authority should be committed to many, who cannot so readily knit in Will or in Action, as when the whole Manage resideth in one. In the end the Duke of Somerset (for hereafter he must be no otherwise call'd) was committed into their Power, and committed to Custody in Beauchamp Tower within the Castle.

The next day he was brought to London, as if he had been a Captive carry'd in Triumph. He rode thro Holborn between the Earls of Southampton and of Huntington, and was follow'd with Lords and Gentlemen, to the number of 300 mounted on Horseback; at Holborn Bridge certain Aldermen attended on Horseback, and the Citizens Householders stood with Halbeards on all sides of the Streets, thro which he pass'd. At Soperlaine he was receiv'd by the Mayor, Sheriffs, Recorder, and divers Knights of especial note, who with a great Train of Officers and Attendants bearing Halbeards carry'd him forthwith to the Tower. All this was to bear in shew, both that the Duke was a dangerous Man, and that the common both Aid and Applause concur'd in his Restraint.

Forthwith the King was brought to Hampton

for not returning back to Windsor, but remaining with the Lords, since he was detained by them, which occasioned a Letter of the Lord Protector to them expostulating with them for staying him with them, when the King had sent him with such a weighty Message, and expected their Answer by him. 'Tis true, I find, that while they kept him with them, he signed a Proclamation against the Lord Protector with the rest, but that might well be out of fear of some great Danger if he had refused. J. 1549.
The King at Hampton Court.

Court, where all things being born as done well, because nothing was ill taken, seven of the Lords of the Council and four Knights were appointed by turns to attend the King's Person. The Lords were the Marquis of Northampton, the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, the Lords Russell, St. John, and Wentworth; the Knights were these, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Thomas Darcy, and Sir Thomas Worth. As for Affairs of State, the Government of them was refer'd to the whole Body of the Council. Soon after the King rode to his House in Southwark (then call'd Suffolk Place) and there din'd: after Dinner he rode in great Estate thro' the City to Westminster, as if the People should be given to understand, that nothing was diminish'd either from the Safety or Glory of the King, by Imprisonment of the Duke.

Articles
brought to the Pro-tectour of his Misdemeanors.

And now when the Duke had breath'd a small time in the Tower, certain Lords of the Council were sent unto him, who after a short Preface in such terms as Hate and Dissimulation could temper together, remembring how great the Amity had been between them, and of what Continuance: Then acknowledging what Offices and Services he had done for the Commonwealth, and yet interlacing some Errours and Defects, wherewith they seem'd to reproach him. Lastly they presented him certain Articles as from the Residue of the Privy Council, desiring his present Answer, whether he would acknowledg them to be true, or else stand upon his Justification. The Articles objected against him were these.

1. That he took upon him the Office of Protector upon expresse Condition that he should do nothing in the King's Affairs, but by Assent of the late King's Executors, or the greatest part of them.
2. That contrary to this Condition he did hinder Justice, and subvert Laws, of his own Authority, as well by Letters, as by other Command.
3. That he caus'd divers Persons arrested and imprison'd for Treason, Murther, Manslaughter, and Felony, to be discharg'd against the Laws and Statutes of the Realm.
4. That he appointed Lieutenants for Armies, and other Officers for the weighty Affairs of the King, under his own Writing and Seal.
5. That he commun'd with Embassadors of other Realms alone, of the weighty Matters of the Realm.
6. That he would taunt and reprove divers of the King's most honourable Counsellors, for declaring their Advice in the King's weighty Affairs against his Opinion; sometimes telling them that they were not worthy to sit in Council, and sometimes that he needed not to open weighty Matters to them, and that if they were not agreeable to his Opinion, he would discharge them.
7. That against Law he held a Court of Requests in his House, and did inforce divers to answer there for their Freehold and Goods, and did determine of the same.
8. That being no Officer, without the Advice of the Council, or most part of them, he did dispose Offices of the King's Gift for Money, grant Leases, and Wards, and Presentations of Benefices pertaining to the King, gave Bishopricks, and made Sales of the King's Lands.
9. That he commanded Alchimy, and Multiplication to be practis'd, thereby to abase the King's Coin.
10. That divers times he openly said, that the Nobility and Gentry were the only Cause of Dearth. Whereupon the People rose to reform Matters of themselves.

11. That against the Mind of the whole Council he caus'd Proclamation to be made concerning Inclosures, whereupon the People made divers Insurrections, and destroy'd many of the King's Subjects.

12. That he sent forth a Commission with Articles annex'd concerning Inclosures, Commons, Highways, Cottages, and such like Matters; giving the Commissioners Authority to hear and determine those Causes, whereby the Laws and Statutes of the Realm were subverted, and much Rebellion rais'd.

13. That he suffer'd Rebels to assemble and lie arm'd in Camp against the Nobility and Gentry of the Realm, without speedy repressing of them.

14. That he did comfort and incourage divers Rebels by giving them Money, and by promising them Fees, Rewards and Services.

15. That he caus'd a Proclamation to be made against Law, and in favour of the Rebels, that none of them should be vex'd or su'd by any for their Offences in their Rebellion.

16. That in time of Rebellion he said that he lik'd well the Actions of the Rebels, and that the Avarice of Gentlemen gave occasion for the People to rise, and that it was better for them to die than to perish for Want.

17. That he said, The Lords of the Parliament were loth to reform Inclosures and other things, therefore the People had good Cause to reform them themselves.

18. That after Declaration of the Defaults of Bulloin and the Pieces there by such as did survive them, he would never amend the same.

19. That he would not suffer the King's Pieces of Newhaven, and Blacknefs, to be furnish'd with Men and Provision; albeit he was advertis'd of the Defaults, and advis'd thereto by the King's Council, whereby the French King was emboldned to attempt upon them.

20. That he would neither give Authority, nor suffer Noblemen and Gentlemen to suppress Rebels in time convenient, but wrote to them to speak the Rebels fair, and use them gently.

21. That upon the fifth of October the present year at Hampton Court, for Defence of his own private Causes, he procur'd seditious Bills to be written in Counterfeit Hands, and secretly to be dispers'd into divers parts of the Realm, beginning thus, Good People, intending thereby to raise the King's Subjects to Rebellion and open War.

22. That the King's Privy Council did consult at London to come to him, and move him to reform his Government; but he hearing of their Assembly, declar'd by his Letters in diverse Places, that they were high Traitors to the King.

23. That he declar'd untruly as well to the King as to other young Lords attending his Person, that the Lords at London intended to destroy the King, and desir'd the King never to forget, but to revenge it; and requir'd the young Lords to put the King in remembrance thereof, with intent to make Sedition and Discord between the King and his Nobles.

24. That at diverse times and places he said, the Lords of the Council at London intend to kill me, but if I die the King shall die, and if they famish me, they shall famish him.

25. That of his own Head he remov'd the King so suddenly from Hampton Court to Windsor, without any Provision there made, that he was thereby not only in great Fear, but cast into a dangerous Disease.

26. That by his Letters he caus'd the King's People to assemble in great Numbers in Armour after the manner of War, to his Aid and Defence.

27. That he caus'd his Servants and Friends at Hampton Court and Windsor to be apparell'd in the 1549. the King's Armour, when the King's Servants and Guard went unarmed.

28. That he intended to fly to Jersey or Wales, and laid Post-horses and Men, and a Boat to that purpose. (e)

To which the Duke subscribed.

Now albeit there is little doubt but that some of these Articles were merely devis'd, others enlarg'd or wrested, or otherwise enforce'd by odious Interpretation, yet the Duke subscribed with his own Hand, that he did acknowledge his Offences contain'd in them, and humbly upon his Knees submitted himself to the King's Mercy. That in like manner he intreated the Lords to be a means to the King, that he would conceive that his Offences did proceed rather from Negligence, Rashness, or other Indiscretion, than from any malicious Thought tending to Treason; and also that he would take some gracious way with him, his Wife and Children, not according to extremity of Laws, but after his great Clemency and Mercy. Written with my own Hand Decemb. 23. Anno 3 Edw. Regis.

Loses all his great Offices, Goods and Lands.

To this I make no other Defence, but intreat the Reader not to condemn him for perishing so weakly, and for that he, who should have lost his Life to preserve his Honour, cast away both his Life and Honour together. Assuredly he was a Man of a feeble Stomach, unable to concoct any great Fortune, prosperous or adverse (f). But as the Judgment of God, and Malice of a Man concur often in one Act, altho it be easy to discern between them; so it is little to be marvelled, that he who thirsted after his Brother's Blood, should find others to thirst after his. Notwithstanding for that present his Blood was respited, but he was stripped of his great Offices of being Protector, Treasurer and Marshal, lost all his Goods, and near Two thousand Pound Land; in which Estate if he had continu'd, the longer he had liv'd, the more Punishment he should endure: Herewith it was scoffingly said, that he had eaten the King's Goose, and did then regorge the Feathers.

Submits himself to the Lords.

After this he sent Letters to the Lords of the Council, wherein he acknowledg'd himself much favour'd by them, in that they had brought his Cause to be finable; which altho it was to him importable, yet as he did never intend to contend with them, nor any Action to justify himself, as well for that he was none of the wisest, and might easily err, as for that it is scarce possible for any Man in great Place so to bear himself, that all his Actions in the Eye of Justice shall be blameless; so he did then submit himself wholly to the King's Mercy and their Discretions for some Moderation; desiring them to conceive that what he did amiss, was rather through rudeness, and for want of 1549. Judgment, than from any malicious Meaning; and that he was therefore ready both to do and suffer what they would appoint. Finally, He did again most humbly upon his Knees intreat Pardon and Favour, and they should ever find him so lowly to their Honours, and obedient to their Orders, as he would thereby make amends for his former Follies.

These Subjections, Objections, Dejections of the Duke, made an heavenly Harmony in his Enemies Ears. But they wrought such Compassion with the King, that forthwith he was released out of the Tower, his Fines discharged, his Goods and Lands restor'd, except such as had been given away; either the Malice of the Lords being somewhat appeased, or their Credit not of sufficient strength to resist. Within a short time after he was entertain'd and feasted by the King with great shew of Favour, and sworn again of the Privy Council; at which time, between him and the Lords, perfect Amity was made, or else a dissembling Hate. And that all might appear to be knit up in a comical Conclusion, the Duke's Daughter was afterwards joined in Marriage to the Lord Leisle, Son and Heir to the Earl of Warwick; and the Earl also was made Lord Admiral of England: yet many doubted whether the Earl retained not some secret Offence against the Duke, which if he did it was most cunningly suppress'd. Doubtless of all his Virtues, he made best Vice of Dissimulation. And as this Friendship was drawn together by Fear on both sides, so it was not like to be more durable than was the Fear.

And thus the second Act ended of the Tragedy of the Duke, the third shall follow in the proper place.

In the mean time the Earl of Warwick, for what mischievous Contrivance it was not certainly known, but conceiv'd to be against the Duke, joined to him the Earl of Arundel late Lord Chamberlain, and the Earl of Southampton sometimes Lord Chancellor, Men of their own Nature circumspect and slow, but at that time discountenanced and discontent; whom therefore the Earl of Warwick singled as fittest for his purpose. Many secret Conferences they had at their several Houses, which often held the greatest part of the Night. But they, accustomed to afford at other times, either silence, or short assent to what he did propose, did then fall off and forsake him, procuring thereby Danger to themselves without doing Good to any other. For when the Earl of Warwick could by no means draw them to his Desires, he found means that both of them were discharged from the Council, and commanded to their Houses.

Southampton and Arundel discharged the Council.

Against the Earl of Arundel, Objections were framed, that he took away Bolts and Earl of Arundel fined.

(e) There is one Article more in Stow's Chronicle (whence our Author hath all this) but here omitted; and is to come in next after the 27th, viz. Item, You caused at Windsor your own Person in the Night time to be guarded in harness by many Persons, leaving the King's Majesties Person unguarded; and would not suffer his own Guard and Servants to be next the King's Person, but appointed your Servants and Friends to keep the Gates. J.S.

(f) Would a Man of a cooler Temper than our Author have presently judged the Duke so impotent and feeble, and unable to govern himself? Would he not rather have considered the Circumstances wherein he stood, and what powerful Enemies combined together against him, and thirsted for his Ruin? The Duke might have been somewhat too hasty, if Sir John Hayward had been his Counsellor, to have presently taken up Arms, and ventured Life and Honour together: and so might have lost both, in all probability he would, being so inferior in Strength to his Adversaries, who were in effect all the Council except one or two. The Duke undoubtedly considered this, and also the Danger the King his Nephew was and would be in, if this Broyl had proceeded further, and the Danger of the State of Religion too, to which many of the other Side had no great Favour. It was not his Feebleness therefore, but rather his Caution and Wisdom that made him submit as he did.

As for his thirsting after his Brother's Blood, as is mentioned most uncharitably afterwards, it was a groundless Calumny, as I have shewn before. J. S.

1550. Locks at Westminster, and gave away the King's Stuff: He was fined at 12000*l.* to be paid 1000*l.* yearly. But doubtless the Earl of Warwick had good reason to suspect, that they who had the honesty not to approve his Purpose, would not want the Heart to oppose against it.

Stirs moved again in Suffolk, and other places. During these Combats among the Nobility, many popular Insurrections were assayed. One Bell was put to death at Tyburn for moving a new Rebellion in Suffolk and in Essex; he was a Man nittily needy, and therefore adventurous; esteem'd but an idle Fellow, until he found opportunity to shew his Rashness. Divers like Attempts were made in other Places, but the Authors were not so readily follow'd by the People as others had done before: partly because Multitudes do not easily move, but chiefly because Misadventures of others in like Attempts had taught them to be more warily advis'd.

A Parliament. About this time a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies, the first Motive of Rebellions; and another against unlawful Assemblies, the first apparent acting of them. But for fear of new Tumults, the Parliament was untimely dissolv'd, and Gentlemen charg'd to retire to their Country Habitations, being furnish'd with such Forces and Commissions as were held sufficient to hold in Bridle, either the Malice or Rage of reasonless People: Yea so great grew the doubt of new Insurrections, that Trinity Term did not hold, lest Gentlemen should by that occasion be drawn out of the Country where they were esteem'd to do good Service, by keeping the Commons from Comotions. All these Movements seem'd to be pretended by moving of the Earth in divers Places of Essex.

Sir Tho. Cheynie sent to the Emperor. The Affairs of England beyond the Seas all this time, were carry'd with variable Success: Sir Thomas Cheynie was sent to the Emperor to treat with him, that his Forces might join with the Forces of England against the common Enemies of them both, according to the Articles formerly concluded. These Articles had been well observ'd for a time, especially against the French. But afterwards the Emperor being diverted about other Preparations, and therewith much sollicitated by the Scots not to be a help to ruin their Kingdom, fell by degrees from the King of England, filling his Embassadors with empty Hopes at the first, wherein also he daily fainted and failed in the end.

Affairs between France & England. In France the King placed the Rhinegrave with divers Regiments of Almanes, Lancequenots, and certain Ensigns of French, to the Number of four or five thousand, at the Town of Morguison, midway between Bulloine and Calais, to impeach all Intercourse between those two Places. Whereupon the King of England caused all the Strangers that had served the Year against the Rebels to the Number of 2000 to be transported to Calais; to them were added 3000 English, under the Command of Francis Earl of Huntingdon, and Sir Edward Hastings his Brother, to dislodge the French, or otherwise to annoy them. But the French perceiving that the Troubles in England were perfectly appeas'd, and that the King thereby was much strengthen'd in his Estate, for that the vicious Humors against him were either corrected or spent; finding also that he daily grew rather into Admiration than Love, as well for that it was apparent, that he had so well improv'd that little Stock which his Father left, as he was like to prove a Thriver in the end; also weary in maintaining Wars with Scotland, as well in regard of the Charge, as for that his People were nothing desirous of Service in that distant Country.

Lastly, Having try'd as well the Strength as Courtesy of the English Nation, and doubtful of the Estates of the Empire and of Spain, by whom not only the Wings of his Kingdom had been clipped on every side, but the whole Body thereof dangerously attempted, he resolved to fasten Peace with England if he could.

Hereupon he dispatched to the English Court Guidotti an Italian born in Florence, who made many Overtures to the Lords of the Council, but all as from the Constable of France; and espying with a nimble Eye that Matters of Council were chiefly sway'd by the Earl of Warwick, by great Gifts and greater Hopes he wrought him to be appliable to his Desires. In the end it was concluded that four Embassadors should be sent from the King of England into France, and four from the French King to treat with them; that the English Commissioners should come to Guifnes, and the French to Ardes, and that their Meeting should be chiefly at Guifnes: The English yielding to all with sincerity of Mind, the French accepting all, but with Intentions reserv'd to themselves. The Lords appointed by the English were John Earl of Bedford, William Lord Paget, Sir William Peter, and Sir John Mason Secretary (g) of State. On the French side were appointed Monsieur Rochpott, Monsieur Chastilion, Guillant de Mortier, and Rochetele de Daffie. In short time after the Earl of Warwick was made Lord Great Master, another Feather to his mounting Mind.

The day wherein the English Embassadors arriv'd at Calais, Guidotti resorted unto them with a Letter from Monsieur Rochpott, whereby he signify'd that the French intended not to come to Ardes, but desired that the English would go to Bulloine, and that the Meeting might be besides the Town. For this he alledg'd that he was so weakly disposed in Health that he could not travel far, and that he being Governor of Picardie and Chastilion of Newhaven, they might not depart such distance from their Charge; and further, that there must be much wast of time if the English should lie at Guifnes and the French at Ardes; and that the Equality would be more, and the Dishonour to one of the sides less, if the Interview should be upon the Frontiers, than if one part should be drawn into the Territory of the other.

Upon this rub the English Embassadors thought fit to demur, and so sent into England to receive Directions from the Lords of the Council. They again referr'd the Matter wholly to the Judgment of the Embassadors, affirming, that it was a Circumstance not much to be stood upon, in case it were not upon some fineness, but for ease and commodity of them and their Train, which indeed they might better find near Bulloine than at Ardes; in case also they could discern no deep 1550. inconvenience which might hinder the good Issue of the good Business in hand, which they esteem'd sufficient, if in substance it might be effected; albeit in all Points they had not so much of their Minds as they then desired, and as at another time they would expect; and so the English Commissioners went to Bulloine, and the French came to one of their Forts nearest to Bulloine.

The Condition of Bulloyn.

Not long before the Emperor had been assailed by the King of England to aid him in defence of Bulloine against the French; which he expressly refused, alledging, that he was not bound so to do by Conditions of the League; for that Bulloyn was a piece of new Conquest acquir'd by the English since the League was made. Then the King offer'd to yield the Town absolutely into his hands, in case he would maintain it against the French; which Offer also he refus'd to accept. At the arrival of the English Embassadors, the Soldiers were sharply assail'd with Wants; there was not one drop of Beer in the Town; the Bread and Bread-corn sufficed not for six days. Hereupon the Soldiers entred into proportion, and to give them Example, the Lord Clinton being Lord Deputy, limited himself to a Loaf a day.

The King was indebted in those Parts above 14000*l.* besides for the Earl of Huntingdon's Numbers, which were about 1300 Foot; besides also the Increases daily rising, for the monthly pay of English and Strangers amounted to 6000*l.* besides Allowance for Officers. Hereof the Band of Horsemen out of Germany, took little less than 800*l.* the Month; and the Almanes on Foot 4000*l.* accounting the Gulden at 3*s.* 4*d.* but accounting it more, as without a higher Valuation little Service and happily some Mischief might be expected, the monthly Pay to Strangers amounted higher. Hereby a great Error was discover'd, in that the Strangers for defence of Bulloyn, were of greater strength than were the English.

Now the English Commissioners having first procur'd some Relief both for Victuals and Pay, prepar'd a Tent without the Town for meeting with the French. But they erected a House on the further side of the Water within their own Territory, in a manner half way between their Fort and the Town. The English perswaded the French to surcease their Building, pretending (but for their Fantasy) it was not necessary, because neither their Treaty was like to continue long, neither was it by solemn Meeting that the Business in hand must be effected. But in truth they feared lest if Peace should not follow, the French might in short time, either with filling or massing the House, or else by fortifying, make such a Piece as might annoy the Haven or the Town. Notwithstanding the French not only proceeded, but refused any other place of Interview.

The French treat about restoring Bulloyn.

At their first meeting much time was spent in Ceremony of Salutation. Then the Commissioners were read: then Monsieur de Mortier in a sharp Speech declar'd, that the French King their Master had upon just Grounds entred the War for recovery of his Right, and defence of his Allies; yet was he well minded for an honourable Peace, so as the things for which the War began, might be brought to some reasonable Appointment; and hearing of the like Disposition of the King of England, he had sent them to treat of those Affairs, nothing doubting but that the English would accord to 1550. the restitution of Bulloyn, and other Pieces of their late Conquests, which so long as they should keep, so long they may be assur'd the War would continue. He further added, that Bulloyn was but a bare ruinous Town, without Territory, or any other Commodity to balance the Charge of defending it against the Power of France. Lastly, He said there should want no good Will in them to bring Matters to good Appointment, hoping to find the like Affection in the English.

After that the English Commissioners had conferred a while, the Lord Paget answered, That the Causes of the War, both with them and their Allies (whom he took to be the Scots) being just and honourable, the Town of Bulloyn, and other Pieces subdu'd, as well by their late great Master against them, as by the King their then Master against their Allies, were acquir'd by just Title of Victory: and therefore in keeping of them no Injury was offer'd, either to the French King or to the Scots. But the further declaration he left off until their next meeting, because both the Time was spent, and the Tide summon'd them to depart. Touching the good Inclination of the King their Master, he had declared it well by sending them thither, in whom they should find such good Conformity, that if good success ensued not, the Fault should be, which they expected not, in the French. Nothing else was done saving a surcease of Hostility concluded for 15 Days, which was proclaim'd in both the Frontiers.

At the next meeting the Lord Paget spent much Speech in setting forth the King of England's Title to Bulloyn, and to his Debts and Pension from the French King, with all Arrearages; together with the Justice of his War against the Scots.

The French were as earnest in maintaining the contrary, wanting no Words whatsoever their Reasons were: For between great Principles, the greatest Strength carrieth the greatest Reason. At the last Monsieur de Mortier roundly said, that to cut off all Contentions of Words, he would propose two Means for Peace; All that for old Matters of Pensions, Debts and Arrearages, the English should make white Books and never mention them more; but for Bulloyn to set the higher Value; or else, said he, let old Quarrels remain, so as your Right may be reserved to claim, and ours to defend; and let us speak frankly of some Recompence for Bulloyn. As for the Scottish Queen (for this had been also mention'd before) our King is resolv'd to keep her for his Son; and therefore we desire you to speak thereof no more, but of what other Points you please, so as we may draw shortly to an end.

The Lord Paget answer'd for the other Commissioners, that they had greatest Reason to desire a speedy End; but the Matters whereupon they stood were of greater Importance than to be determin'd upon the suddain. For, said he, you may make Doubts as you please. But if the Debt to our King be not just, being confess'd, judg'd, sworn, and by many Treaties confirm'd, we know not what may be deemed just; neither is it a Sum to be slenderly regarded, being 2000000 Crowns clear Debt, besides 12000 Crowns resting in dispute. The Justice of the Wars against Scotland he maintain'd, as well in regard of Breach of Treaties with themselves, as for that, contrary to their 1550. their Comprehension in the last Treaty of France, they had invaded England in these Intercourses. The whole Afternoon being spent, it was agreed that both Parties should advise upon such Matters as had been propounded until the next meeting.

The French stiff. But the French either having, or supposing that they had Advantage over the English; partly by reason of their firm Intelligence in the English Court, and partly because they found the English Commissioners much yielding to their Desires, as first in coming into France, then to Bulloign, lastly to a House of their own erecting, began to be stiff and almost intractable, sharply pressing both for speedy Resolution, and short Times for meetings. But Guidotti continually travel'd to draw both Parties to conformity, the French being willing to be entreated by their Friend to their most dissimulated desires. Guidotti instead of the Queen of Scots, propounded that the French King's Daughter should be joyn'd in Marriage to the King of England, affirming, that if it were a dry Peace, it would hardly be durable; but hereto the English gave no inclinable ear. Then he deliver'd 17 Reasons in writing, for which he said it was necessary for the English to conclude a Peace. The English demanded how many Reasons he had for the French; he answer'd, that he had also his Reasons for them, which he intended likewise to deliver in writing.

Further Treaty between the Commissioners.

At the next meeting the French shew'd themselves, as before, peremptory and precise, standing stiffly upon their own Overtures, which they had they said no Commission to exceed: and therefore they refus'd to treat either of the Pension or the Debt demanded by the English, and declar'd themselves rather desirous than willing to break off the Treaty. The English answer'd, that before their coming Guidotti had declar'd from the French King, that so as Bulloign might be restor'd, all that was owing from him to the King of England should be paid, which Guidotti being present affirmed to be true. Well, said they, what our King told Guidotti we know not, but to us he hath given no other Commission than you have heard, which in no case we must exceed. As for the Pension whereof you speak, think you that a King of France will be tributary to any? No, no, assure you he will not; and touching the Debt, because the King of England gave occasion to the Wars, wasted the French King's Country, and thereby caus'd him to expend such Sums of Money as exceeded the Debt, he took himself to be acquitted thereof.

Hereto the English answer'd, that the French King might take Matters as he pleas'd, but in Honour, Justice, and Conscience, no Debt was more due: And the Wars being made for denial thereof, he could not be for that Cause acquitted. That the Pension was also granted upon divers Causes both weighty and just, and amongst other by reason of the King of England's uncontrollable Title to Normandy, Gascogne, and other Parts of France. Here they were interrupted by Monsieur Rochpott, who brake forth into warm Words, and was again as warmly answer'd; but the French would nothing move from their own Overtures, which they stood upon by way of Conclusions.

The English Commissioners send into England.

At last the English said, that they might do well to report these Differences to their Masters on both sides, and that their Pleasures might therein be known. Hereto the French answer'd, that they knew their King's Pleasure so well, that if they should send to him again, he would and might think them of small Discretion; and herewith they offer'd to break. The English told them, that if they would break they might, but they intended to conclude nothing until they had further Instructions from England; which they would procure as soon as they could. To this the French did easily incline.

These Matters advertis'd into England, much troubled the Council, and the rather for that the Earl of Warwick was at that time retir'd, pretending much Infirmary in his Health. Hereupon many sinister Surmises began to spring up among some of the Council, partly probable, and part happily devised: for as they knew not whether he were more dangerous present or away; so, as the nature of all Fear is, they suspected that which happen'd to be the worst. From hence divers of the Council began in this manner to murmur against him.

What, said they, is he never sick but when Affairs of greatest Weight are in debating? Or wherefore else doth he withdraw himself from the Company of those who are not well assured of his Love? Wherefore doth he not now come forth and openly over-rule, as in other Matters he is accusom'd? Would he have us imagine by his absence that he acteth nothing? Or knowing that all moveth from him, shall we not think that he seeketh to enjoy his own Ends, without bearing blame for any Event? Go to then; let him come forth and declare himself, for it is better that he should find fault with all things whilst they are doing, than condemn all things when they are done.

With those and the like Speeches he came to Council more than ordinary before; and at last, partly by his Reasons, and partly by his Authority, Peace with France was esteem'd so necessary, that new Instructions were sent to the English Embassadors, according whereto Peace was concluded upon these Articles.

1. That all Titles and Claims on the one side, and Defences on the other, should remain to either Party as they were before.
2. That the Fault of one Man (except he were unpunish'd) should not break the Peace.
3. That Prisoners should be deliver'd on both sides.
4. That Bulloign, and other pieces of the new Conquests, with all the Ordnance, except such as had been brought in by the English, should be deliver'd to the French within six Months after the Peace proclaim'd.
5. That Ships of Merchandise might safely pass, and Ships of War be call'd in.
6. That the French should pay for the same 200000 Crowns of the Sum, every Crown valued at 6 s. 8 d. within three Days after the delivery of the Town, and 200000 like Crowns more upon the 5th day of August then next ensuing.
7. That the English should make no new Wars upon Scotland, unless new Occasions should be given.
8. That if the Scots razed Lords and Dunghlass, the English should raze Roxborough and Aymouth, and no Fortification to be afterward made in any of those Places.

To these Articles the French King was sworn at Amiens, the King of England at London; the Kings Commissioners being especially appointed to take 1550. take their Oaths, and for further Assurance six Hostages were deliver'd for the French at Ardes, and six for the English at Guisnes: and it was agreed that at the Delivery of Bulloine, the English Hostages should be discharg'd, and that upon the Payment of the first 200000 Crowns, three of the French Hostages should be discharg'd, and other three upon Payment of the last 200000 Crowns. In the Peace the Emperor was compriz'd, in case he would consent. And further to cut off future Contentions, Commissioners were appointed both by the English and French, to make certain the Limits between both Territories. Other Commissioners were appointed summarily to expedite and determine all matters of Piracy and Depredation between the Subjects of both Kingdoms, whereby many had not only liv'd, but thriv'd many years before.

L. Clinton delivereth up Boloyne, Apr. 25. So the Lord Clinton, Governour of Bulloine, having receiv'd his Warrant, discharg'd all his Men except 1800, and with them issued out of the Town, and deliver'd it to Monf. Chastilion, having first receiv'd of him the six English Hostages, and an Acquittance for Delivery of the Town, and safe Conduct for his Passage to Calais. These 1800 Men were afterwards plac'd upon the Frontiers between the Emperor and the English. Soon after the first Payment of Mony was made by the French to certain English Commissioners, whereupon three of their Hostages were discharg'd: The other three, namely Count de Anguien next Heir to the Crown of France after the King's Children, the Marquis de Meaux Brother to the Scottish Queen, and Montmorency the Constable's Son, who at that time chiefly guided the Affairs of France, came into England. They were honourably accompany'd, and with great State brought to London, where every of them kept house by himself.

The Monies paid for Boloyne, how disposed. Of the Monies of the first Payment 10000 l. was appointed for Calais, 8000 l. for Ireland, 10000 l. for the North, and 2000 l. for the Navy: the Residue was carefully laid up in the Tower. Likewise of the second Payment (whereupon the Hostages aforenam'd return'd into France) 8000 l. was appointed for Calais, 5000 l. for the North, 10000 l. was employ'd for increase towards outward Payments, certain Persons undertaking that the Mony should be doubled every * Month: the Residue was safely lodg'd in the Tower.

* Or haply Year. And now it remain'd that the chief Actors in this Peace (whatsoever their Aims were) must be both honour'd and enrich'd with great Rewards: and first Guidotti the first Mover of the Treaty was recompens'd with Knight-hood, 1000 Crowns reward, 1000 Crowns Pension, and 250 Crowns Pension to his Son.

Places and Honors bestow'd on certain Nobles. The Earl of Warwick was made general Warden of the North, had 1000 Marks Land granted to him, and 100 Horsemen of the King's Charge. Mr. Herbert his chief Instrument was made President of Wales, and had a Grant of 500 l. Land. And thus whether immoderate Favours breed first Unthankfulness and afterwards Hate, and therewith ambitious Desires; or whether God so punisheth immoderate Affections; it often happens that Men are prone to raise those most, who work their Ruin in the end. Also the Lord Clinton, who had been Deputy at Bulloine, was made Lord Admiral of England. The Captains and Officers were rewarded with Lands, Leases, Offices and Annuities; the ordinary Soldiers 1550. having all their Pay, and a month's Pay over, were sent into their Countries, and great charge given that they should be well observ'd, until they were quietly settled at home. The Light Horsemen and Men at Arms were put under the Marquis of Northampton Captain of the Pensioners. All the Guard of Bulloine were committed to the Lord Admiral. The chief Captains with 600 Ordinaries were sent to strengthen the Frontiers of Scotland. Lastly, Strangers were dispatch'd out of the Realm, who after some idle Expence of their Monies and Time, were likest to be forward either in beginning or in maintaining Disorders.

Presently after this Agreement of Peace, The Duke of Brunswick sent to the King of England to offer his Service in the King's Wars with 10000 Men of his Band, and to entreat a Marriage with the Lady Mary the King's eldest Sister. Answer was made touching his Offer of Aid, that the King's Wars were ended; and touching Marriage with the Lady Mary, that the King was in speech for her Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, which being determin'd without effect, he should favourably be heard. Upon this also the Emperor's Embassadors did expostulate with the King, that he had broken his League with the Emperor. To this the King answer'd, that because the Emperor fail'd in his Performances, the King was enforc'd to provide for himself. The Embassador desirous, as it seem'd, to make a Breach, demanded boldly that the Lady Mary should have the free Exercise of the Mass. This did the King not only constantly deny, but hereupon Sermons were increas'd at Court, and order taken that no Man should have any Benefice from the King, but first he should preach before him. And in short time after, under pretence of preparing for Seamatters, 5000 l. were sent to relieve Protestants beyond the Seas: And further, because the Emperor made divers strait Laws against those of the Religion, Merchants were charg'd to forbear their Trade into Flanders so much as they could. So as it appears, had some of the English Nobility been either less powerful or more faithful than they were, the King had Ears enough and Hands enough as well at home as among good Friends abroad, either to have maintain'd Wars against the French, or to have reduc'd them to a more honourable Peace.

Wars being thus at good Appointment, peaceable Business was more seriously regarded; and whereas an Embassador arriv'd from Gustavus King of Sweden to knit Amity with the King for Intercourse of Merchants, at last these Articles were concluded.

1. That if the King of Sweden sent Bullion into England, he might carry away English Commodities without Custom.
2. That he should carry Bullion to no other Prince.
3. That if he sent Ozimus, Steel, Copper, &c. he should pay Custom for English Commodities as an English Man.
4. That if he sent other Merchandize, he should have free Intercourse, paying Custom as a Stranger.

The Mint was set to work so as it gain'd 24000 l. yearly to the King, which should bear his Charges in Ireland, and bring 10000 l.

1550. to the Treasure. 400 Men were sent into Ireland, and charge given that the Laws of England should there be administer'd, and the Mutinous be severely suppress'd. Verily it may seem strange, that among all the horrible Hurries in England, Ireland was then almost quiet. But besides that the King drew much People from thence for service in his Wars, who haply would not have remain'd quiet at home; the Governors at that time were Men of such choice, that neither the Nobility disdain'd to endure their Command, nor the inferior fort were oppress'd to supply their Wants.

Base Coin made.

Further 20000*l.* weight was appointed to be made so much baser, as the King might gain thereby 160000*l.* Agreement was also made with York, Master of one of the Mints, that he should receive the Profit of all the Bullion which himself should bring, and pay the King's Debts to the value of 120000*l.* and remain accountable for the rest, paying six Shillings and eight pence (b) the Ounce until the Exchange were equal in Flanders, and afterwards six shillings and eight pence (c). And further, that he should declare his Bargain to any that should be appointed to oversee him, and leave off when the King should please. That for this the King should give him 15000*l.* in prest, and license to transport 8000*l.* beyond the Seas to abase the Exchange. Herewith the base Monies formerly coin'd were cry'd down.

Now it is certain that by reason of the long Hostility which England held against Scotland and France, Peace was not so hardly concluded as kept. But albeit Occasions of Breach were often offer'd, yet the Judgment and Moderation of both parts suffic'd either to avoid or appease them. The Bishop of Glasco coming into England without safe Conduct, was taken Prisoner. The French Ambassador made means to the King for his Discharge, but answer was made that the Scots had no such Peace with the English, that they might pass without safe Conduct. This was not deny'd by the Mr. of Erskine; whereupon the Archbishop was retain'd Prisoner, but after a short time remitted to his Liberty. After this the Queen Dowager of Scotland going from France to her Country, pass'd thro England, but the French Ambassador first obtain'd her safe Conduct. She arriv'd at Portsmouth, and was there encounter'd by divers of the English Nobility of highest Quality and Estimation, as well for doing her Honour, as for that having such Pledges she need not fear. At London she sojourn'd four days, being lodg'd in the Bishop's Palace, and defray'd at the charge of the City, in which time she was royally feasted by the King at Whitehall. At her departure she was attended out of the City with all Ceremonies pretending to State. The Sheriffs of every Shire thro which she pass'd, receiv'd her accompany'd with the chief Gentlemen of the Country; as also they convey'd her from one Shire to another (making always Provision for her Entertainment) till she came into the Borders of Scotland.

The Earl of Maxwell came with a strong

Band to the Borders (k) of England against certain Families of Scots who had yielded to the King of England; and the Lord Dacre brought his Forces to their Aid. In which Service his Valour and Discretion did equally appear. For albeit the Gentlemen of those Families did often skirmish with the Earl's Men, and slew many of them, yet were they never therein aided by the English, neither would they assail him upon any advantage. But when any of these Gentlemen were distress'd by the Earl, the English did then encounter him by Arms. Generally the English would not offer to offend the Scots, but only in defending their Friends.

About this time the French King sent Monsieur Lansat to request of the King of England, that the fishing of Tweede, Edrington, the debatable Ground, and the Scottish Hostages which had been sent into England in the time of King Henry VIII. might be restor'd to the Scots; and that the English Prisoners who were bound to pay their Ransoms before the Peace, should not be compris'd in the Conditions thereof. The King sent Sir William Pickering to declare to the French King, that to the last Demand he agreed without exception; and albeit he had a right to the Places requir'd, yet he was content as well for them as for other Demands, to perform whatsoever should be agreed on by Commissioners on both sides: So Commissioners were appointed, and the Matters settled in quiet Agreement.

In the mean time the King sent new Supply of Forces and other Provisions into the North Parts of the Realm; whereupon the French King sent a Navy of 160 Sail into Scotland, laden with Grain, Powder, and Ordnance: of these sixteen of the greatest perish'd upon the Coast of Ireland, two charg'd with Artillery and fourteen with Grain; the Residue so shaken and torn, that it gave a main check to their further Designs: But because many sav'd themselves in the Harbours of Ireland, the King sent thither four Ships, four Barks, four Pinnaces, and twelve Victuallers. These possess'd themselves of three Havens, two on the South side toward France, and one towards Scotland. The Lord Cobham was appointed General Lieutenant, who fortify'd those Havens, and drew down the chiefest Forces of the Country towards the South Parts thereof. And thus even in Peace either of the Kings so vigilantly observ'd every Motion of the other, as if they had liv'd upon the Alarm. The Will of Friends is best assur'd when they have no power to do hurt.

In France a difference did rise about a place call'd Fineswood, whether it pertain'd to the English or to the French. On the French part 800 Men assembled at Arms upon this Quarrel, on the English 1000. But the readiness of the English to fight, mov'd the French to abstain from blows, and to permit the English to enjoy their ground. Hereupon the King fortify'd Calais and his other Pieces in France, in such sort as they had never been in like condition of Defence. And whereas one Stryward

(k) These Borders were the North Borders; and these Families, or rather only one Family, was that of the Grimes, or Grabams. The Encounter of Earl Maxwell and them was on the 16th of August. The Assistance of the L. Dacre was only that he stood before Maxwell's face with a good Band of Men; and so put him from his Purpose: As this Affair is set down in K. Edward's Journal. And thence it also appears, that in the Skirmish, not many, but certain of the Earl's men were slain. J. S.

1551. a Scot was apprehended in England, and imprisoned in the Tower, for intending to poison the young Q. of Scots; the King as well to manifest his Justice as his Love and Respect towards the young Queen, deliver'd him to the French King upon the Frontiers of Calais to be justic'd by him at his pleasure.

And yet this Advice was not approv'd by many; for albeit it be both honourable and just, that they who offend against their proper Prince, should be deliver'd to him to be punish'd, yet is it grown out of common use. And for this cause the Condition is often express'd in Leagues, that the Subjects of one Prince should be deliver'd by the other in case they be requir'd; the contrary Custom may haply hold reasonable in ordinary Offences, in which case the Scripture forbiddeth to deliver a Slave to his angry Lord: but in grievous and inhuman Crimes, in such as overthrow the Foundation of the State, in such as shake the Surety of human Society, I conceive it more fit that Offenders should be remitted to their Prince to be punish'd in the place where they have offended.

But of all other the King's Amity with the Emperor was least assur'd, being as fullest both of Practice and Distrust, so in danger every hour to dissolve. Certain Ships were appointed in the Low Countreys, with Men and Furniture suitable to the Attempts, to transport the Lady Mary either by violence or by stealth, out of England to Antwerp. Divers of her Gentlemen departed thither before, and certain Shippers (as they are term'd) were discover'd to view the English Coast. Hereupon Sir John Gates was sent with Forces into Essex where the Lady then lay; and besides the Duke of Somerset was sent with 200 Men, the Lord Privy Seal with other 200, and Mr. Semlegier with 400 Men more, to several Coasts upon the Sea. Divers of the King's Ships were address'd to be in readiness for the Sea. Mr. Chamberlain, Embassador for the Queen of Hungary in the Low

Countrie, advertis'd by his Letters, that it was intended by this means to raise an outward War to join with some Sedition within doors, and that the Queen of Hungary had openly said, that the Shippers were towards, who for fear of one Gentleman durst not proceed in their Attempt. Upon these either Dangers or Fears, the Lord Chancellor and Secretary Petre were sent to the Lady Mary, who after some Conference brought her to the Lord Chancellor's House at Leez in Essex, and from thence to Hunsdon, and from thence to the King at Westminster. Here the Council declar'd unto her, how long the King had permitted her the use of the Mass; and perceiving by her Letters how unmovable she was, he was resolv'd no longer to endure it, unless she would put him in hope of some Conformity within a short time. To this she answer'd, that her Soul was God's, and touching her Faith, as she could not change, so she would not dissemble it. Reply was made, that the King intended not to constrain her Faith, but to restrain the outward Profession thereof, in regard of the Danger the Example might draw. After some other like Interchange of Speeches, the Lady was appointed to remain with the King; but Dr. Mallet her Chaplain was committed Prisoner to the Fleet. And almost herewith arriv'd an Embassador from the Emperor, with a menacing Message of War, in case his Cousin the Lady Mary should not be admitted the free Exercise of the Mass. The King presently advis'd with the (1) Archbishop of Canterbury, and with the Bishops of London and Rochester, who gave their Opinion, that to give licence to Sin was Sin, but to connive at Sin might be allow'd, in case it were neither too long, nor without hope of Reformation. Then was answer given to the Embassador, that the King would send to the Emperor within a month or two, to give him what Satisfaction should be fit.

1551. March 18. She is not permitted to have Mass.

In

(1) This the Author had from the King's Pen in his Journal; where he hath not faithfully transcribed. For the Words of the King are these: 'The Bishops did consider that to give Licence to Sin was Sin: To suffer and wink at it [not at Sin, but at the Lady Mary's Mass in her Household] might be born, so all haste possible might be used. The King's Notes are short, and must be supplied: that is, all haste was to be used, to take away such an Occasion of Sin. But as Hayward sets down the Words, he would make those excellent Bishops very bad Casuists: as though to connive at Sin might be allowed, in case it were not too long, and in hope of Reformation. This sheweth again, how studious this Author was to expose Protestant Bishops.

There was indeed some Promise past by the King for the Lady Mary's hearing Mass. Which stood thus, as appeareth in one of the Council's Letters to her: That upon the Emperor's Request to the King, that she might have the Liberty to use the Mass in her House, and to be exempt from the Danger of the Statute, thus much was granted, that for his sake, and the Lady Mary's too, it should be suffered and winked at, if she had the private Mass used in her Closet for a season, until she might be better informed; whereof was some hope: having only with her a few of her own Chamber. So that for all the rest of her Household the Service of the Realm should be used. Further than this the Promise exceeded not. After this Grant in Words, the Emperor desired some Writing, as a Witness of the same; but that was ever denied.

Concerning this Saying of Mass in the Lady Mary's Family against the Law that abolished it, many notable Letters past between the King, the Protector, the Privy Council, and the said Lady: which are preserved to us in John Fox's Treasury, I mean his Martyrology. This Business was in hand a great while, in order to the inducing of the Lady Mary and her Household to conform to the late Act for Uniformity of public Prayer. For it lasted from June 1549. to August or September 1551. such a Deference was given to her Quality. But this Lady was so resolute in her Adherence to the Mass, that she had like to have embroiled the Kingdom in a War with the Emperor: whom she engaged so far, that he required by his Ambassador yet a second time, that she should enjoy her Liberty in that behalf, contrary to a Law made, which abolished the Mass, and enjoined a Book of Common Prayer instead thereof.

They proceeded with her in this matter with all due Respect; as I shall shew briefly, partly from the Letters that past between them, partly from the Council-Book, the King's Journal, or other MSS.

First, the L. Protector advis'd her in May or June 1549. to lay aside the Mass, and use the Book. Then again in June, the Protector and Council wrote their Letters to her; and that she would send the Comptroller of her House and Dr. Hopton her Chaplain to them, to receive certain Orders from them. But she in a Letter to them dated June the 22. from Kenninghal, in some Displeasure excused sending either: But yet Dr. Hopton came at length, and brought back to her from Richmond their Answer in Writing to her former Letter, answering it Article by Article. They also sent their Letters to her Comptroller, her Chaplain and Mr. Englefield, to repair immediately to them. Then she wrote again another Letter to the Protector and the Council dated June 27. full of very haughty Language, expressing great Anger that they should send for her Servants, saying, She took not her self to be subject to any of them; and that none of them would have been contented to be so serv'd at their Inferiours hands.

An Amba-
sador sent to the Emperor.

In the mean time the Council considering how prejudicial it would be to the Realm if the Subjects should lose their Trade in Flanders, that the Flemmings had Cloth for a year in their hands, that the King had 500 Quintals of Poulder, and much Armour in Flanders, and the Merchants much Goods at the Wool Fleet, they advis'd the King to send an Ambassador Legier to the Emperor, as well to satisfy him for other Matters by him requir'd, as to win time, thereby both to prepare a Mart in England and to withdraw their Goods out of Flanders. So Mr. Wotton was dispatch'd with particular Instructions to desire the Emperor to be less violent in his Requests: And to advertise him that the Lady Mary, as she was his Cousin, so was she the King's Sister, and which is more, his Subject; that seeing the King was a Sovereign Prince without Dependancy upon any but God, it was not reason that the Emperor

After all this, Mafs was continued in her Family, to the open Affront of the King and his Privy Council, and the Laws. Whereupon Process was awarded against two of her Chaplains, and delivered to the Sheriff of Essex. These were Mallet and Berkley. Which the Council gave her Notice of December 2. Whereat she wrote them an angry expostulating Letter; urging them with the Promise made to the Emperor the last year, that she should never be troubled or disquieted for having Mafs said in her House; and that the Emperor's Ambassador, that then was dead, told her so. But that nevertheless to be plain with them, however they should use her, or those that belonged to her, she would never vary from her Opinion; and as she had been minded always to have Mafs said to her, so she ever would be. To this Letter they wrote her again, Decemb. 25. a large Answer: Shewing her, that the Promise made to the Emperor's Ambassador was only temporary, until she were better informed, there being then daily hope of her Reformation: And that the most that was told the Ambassador was, that the King might, upon hope of her Grace's Reconciliation, suspend the Execution of his Law; so that she would use the Licence as it was at first granted: That is, that the Mafs were used in her own Closet only, and that for a Season.

Then Jan. 24. An. 1551. following, the King, observing by her Letters how stiffly she persisted in her own Way, wrote her a loving Letter upon the same Argument; arguing excellently well with her, pretermittin (as he said) his Estate as King, and talking with her as her Brother. To which Letter she gave Answer February 3. from Beaulieu: remaining still unmoveable.

Feb. 16. The Emperor's Ambassador pres'd the Council to observe their Promise made to him for Permission to the Lady Mary of the Exercise of her Religion, till the King should come to Age.

March 18. The King relateth in his Journal, that he sent for her to Westminster, and told her that he could not any longer bear her Practise. Upon the next day (according to the Journal) the Emperor's Ambassador declar'd War to the King, if he continued not to her the Liberty of her Religion. March 18. (according to the Council Book) the said Emperor's Ambassador had Access to the Council.

March 22. Crammer, Ridley and Poynt discoursed with the King about the Lawfulness of the Permission.

March 23. The Council decreed to send Dr. Wotton to the Emperor (who was not dispatched till the 10th of April) and in the mean time to punish the Offenders; first the King's Servants that heard Mafs, next hers.

March 24. (According to the Journal) Sir Anthony Brown and Serjeant Morgan, were sent to the Fleet for hearing Mafs. The Council Book placeth the Commitment of the latter March 19. and of the former at March 22. and assigns the Cause more at large, viz. for hearing Mafs in her Company, when by the King's Order he attended her from Essex to London.

March 23. Or rather the 18. It was resolved to punish her Servants, hearing or saying Mafs. The day before, the Lady Mary's Comptroller Mr. Rochester, was examined how many Chaplains she had. Who answered four, viz. Mallet, Hipton, Barkley, and Richards.

April 29. Dr. Mallet was brought before the Council, and being examin'd what he meant, that after he had been once forgiven, he would again willfully offend the King's Laws in saying of Mafs, and other like; he could not deny but he had done evil in so doing. He therefore was committed to the Tower.

Brown and Morgan upon their Submission were soon after discharged from their Imprisonment.

Aug. 9. It was resolved in Council at Richmond, 24 Lords present, to send for the chief Officers of the Lady Mary's House, and to give them in Charge not to permit Mafs to be said in her House, or to hear it, and to give the same Charge to her Chaplains, and other Servants. The same day it was resolved not to permit the Use of the Mafs to the Emperor's Ambassador, since he would not permit the English Ambassador, Resident in his Dominions, the Use of our Liturgy.

Aug. 11. A Warrant was signed for the Appearance of the Lady Mary's Officers. And an excellent Letter of the King's own to his Sister accompanied their Departure, which they seemed to be the Bringers of. Which I will here insert out of the Cotton Library, the rather because it is not any where published, as many others are, relating to this Matter.

Letter to the Lady Mary about her Mafs.
Cott. Lib.
Ortho. C. 10.

' Right dear and intirely beloved Sister, We greet you well. And where we have heretofore not only by our Speech unto you, but also by our Letters, and by the Letters of our Council, and otherwise, many times declared unto you the earnest Desire we had to have reduced you to such Conformity, and Agreeableness in Religion, as is agreed upon by the learned Men of our Realm, established by us in our Parliaments, and most, we doubt not, to the Honour of Almighty God; Perceiving that all our Travel and Sufferance taken to that End, worketh not in you the good Effect we would have wished, but that you do rather rest more wedded to your own Mind than you were at the beginning: refusing also to hear any learned Men, that might inform you more rightly in these things: like as for the natural good Will we bear towards you, we cannot but be sorry to find this manner of Proceeding in you, whom by Nature we should rather have found of all other most obedient, and readiest to give example to others, for doing of any thing that might be agreeable to our pleasure; So considering what great Inconveniences do daily grow by the Example of you and your Family, we cannot but have a more earnest Regard to the Reformation thereof; not only for the Conservation of our Laws, which we may not with our Honour endure to have thus openly broken and manifestly contemned, but also and much more, for that the Honour and Glory of Almighty God by this Sufferance is hindred.

' For which Causes we have willed certain of your Officers to be sent for: by whom it might be signify'd unto you, that our Pleasure and express Commandment is, that they shall not from henceforth suffer any Mafs or other Divine Service to be said or used within your House, than is set forth by the Laws of our Realm. And that if any Chaplain of yours, or any other whatsoever, shall hereafter presume to break our Laws in that behalf, that he or they so offending, shall be used according to our Laws. Of which our Pleasure declared unto your Officers by our Council, they are commanded to make report to you: to whom we pray you give Credit in that behalf.

The Contents of this Message given to her Officers aforesaid were, that the Common Prayer should be used from henceforth in her Family; and to inhibit her Chaplains to say Mafs before her, and her Servants to hear it. But they out of fear of disturbing her, being not well, delivered not this Message. Which the Council August 23. understanding from their own Mouths, charged them, and that upon their Allegiance, to go and do it. But they still refused it, and offered themselves willingly to endure any Punishment rather than to deliver so unwelcome a Matter. Whereupon they were commanded to attend continually upon the Council. And a little after they were committed to the Fleet, and thence to the Tower.

Aug. 26. The L. Chancellor Rich, Sir Anthony Wingfield Comptroller of the Household, and Sir William Petre Secretary, were sent by the King's Council to her, with a Message, which was in effect the same that her three Officers should have delivered her. They accordingly August 28. repaired to Copt hall where she now was. And August 29. they declared to the Council then at Windor, their Discharge of the Matter intrusted with them: and that the said Lady Mary received the King's Letter upon her Knees, and kist it. But as to her Compliance with the Commands given, she said, that rather than she would use any other Service than what was used at the Death of the late King her Father, she would lay her Head on a Block: but adding, that she was unworthy to suffer in so good a Quarrel. She said further, that 1551. peror should intermeddle either with ordering his Subjects, or with directing the Affairs of his Realm. (m) Thus much he offer'd, that what Favour the King's Subjects had in the Emperor's Dominions for their Religion, the same should the Emperor's Subjects receive in England. The Emperor perceiving that his Threats were little regarded, regarded little to threaten any more.

A Rebellion attempted in Essex.
Discover'd
April 15.
About the time that the Lady Mary should have been transported unto Antwerp, a Rebellion was attempted in Essex where she then lay. For furtherance whereof Speeches were cast forth, that Strangers were arriv'd in England, either to rule or to spoil the natural Inhabitants. Upon this Surmise many appointed to assemble at Chelmsford, and from thence to make Pillage as their Wants or wanton Appetites should lead. But the Principal being put to death and the Residue pardon'd, all remain'd quiet.

Tumult upon May-day
in London.
Many Londoners also hunting after Riot and Ease, contriv'd to tumult upon May-day, pretending Grievances and Feats from Strangers; but because where many are of Counsel Counsel is hardly kept, the Enterprize was discover'd and defeated before it was ripe: herewith Lion, Gorran and Ireland, Persons of mean Condition but desperate and discontent, endeavour'd to raise a Rebellion in Kent. They often met, and had Conferences both private and long. They seem'd highly busy'd in mind, and their Heads travelling with troubl'd thoughts, which they often dissembl'd with impertinent Speeches. This was first discover'd by one of their Servants, doubtful whether before knowing the Mischief, and until then secret or ignorant before, and then first apprehending Suspitions. So they were apprehended, and after Conviction the Danger determin'd by their *Deaths. Herewith Rumours were rais'd of great Discord and Practises among the Nobility: for this Cause the Lords assembl'd at London, and feasted divers Days together, giving order to apprehend the Reporters of these Surmises, albeit happily not altogether untrue. For this Cause Gentlemen were newly commanded to remain in the Country, to govern the People, easy to be dealt with whilst they stand in fear.

The King being thus uncertain of the Faith both of his Subjects and of his Confederates, intended by Alliance to strengthen himself. To this Purpose one Bortwick was sent to the King of Denmark with private Instructions to treat of a Marriage between the Lady Elizabeth the King's Sister, and the King of Denmark's eldest that when the King was come to such Age as he might be able to judge these things himself, his Majesty shou'd find her ready to obey his Orders in Religion; but in these years of his (tho, good sweet King, he hath more Knowledge, said she, than any other of his years, yet that) it was not possible he could be judge of them. That as for her Priests, they knew what they had to do. The Pain of Imprisonment was but for a short time. And that if they refused to say Mass for fear of their Imprisonment, they might do as they would. But that none of the new Service should be used in her House: and that if any were, she would not tarry in it.

And speaking concerning the Promise given to the Emperor on her behalf, she said, That to be plain with them, his Ambassador should know how she was used at their hands: she said moreover, that she was tickly, and yet would not die willingly; but that if she chanced to die, she would protest, that they of the Council were the Cause of her Death. And that they gave her fair Words, but their Deeds were always ill towards her. Then she gave unto the Lord Chancellor a Ring upon her Knees for the King, with her very humble Recommendation to him; saying, she would die his true Subject, and suffer and obey his Commandment in all things, except in these Matters of Religion.

In fine, notwithstanding the Emperor's Ambassador's Solicitation to have the Lady Mary's Officers set at liberty, and that she might have her Mass, till the Emperor were certified of these things, he was answered as was thought convenient, and that the King's Ambassador should satisfy the Emperor. And the said Officers were not set at Liberty until April 24. the next year, viz. 1552. when they repair'd unto her Grace. J. S.

(m) This Ambassador Dr. Wotton, Dean both of Canterbury and York, was an ancient Counsellor and an Ambassador in the Reign of King Henry VIII. But it is strange to consider, what a Liberty this Author takes in relating the Instructions that were given Wotton in this Embassy, whereas there is not a word in the said Instructions, as he representeth them. Nor would it have been good Policy to treat a prosperous and powerful Emperor in such sharp and rough Terms, when the Embassy was commenced on purpose to continue a good Correspondence with him. That part of the Instructions relating to the Lady Mary's Matter are in these very Words, as they are extant in a Volume of the Cotton Library. Which I will insert, to set this part of the History right.

‘Lastly, ye shall declare, That We perceived likewise, by the Letter of our said good Brother, his Motion that our Sister the Lady Mary, his Cousin, might use her accustomed Religion for a further Time, according to an Assurance made, as by the said Letter is reported. Cott. Lib.

‘For answer whereunto ye shall say, that First, there hath never been any Assurance or Promise made for that Purpose by us, but only in this manner, at the Motion of him that was here Ambassador last before this present Man from our said Brother. We were content to bear at that time with our Sister, and to spare the execution of our Law for a time, until we might see some proof of her Amendment by Instruction and Persuasion of her. The proof whereof to be such and no other, the Ambassador that now is here present, hath evidently seen and heard by the several Testimonies of all our Council, even in particularities by all, and every such as either hath been on our behalf with our said good Brother, or for this purpose with his Ambassador here: in such sort that if he shall report what he hath heard in that Matter testified, it shall be evident in what manner the Sufferance was, and to what End. And if there shall be any one named unto you (as we conjecture the L. Paget shall be named) ye shall say, that upon this Matter now moved, both Sir Philip Hoby and also the L. Paget, have been of their Faith and Honour willing to declare that they knew. And they both most constantly deny, that ever they mentioned any Promise, or such Matter touching our Sister, either unto the Emperor or unto any.

‘And touching the L. Paget, both he and Sir Philip Hoby declare, that he the L. Paget at his last being with our said good Brother, spake not with him but in the hearing of Sir Philip Hoby: And of the Matter saith thus, that indeed our said good Brother, upon the departing of the said L. Paget, recommended the Case of our Sister and his Cousin, by Message, praying him that she might be favoured, and permitted to have her ancient manner of Religion. Whereunto the said L. Paget saith, that he, considering he had no Commission to treat of that Matter, answered with the Advice of Sir Philip Hoby to our said good Brother, that he would make Report of his Request unto us, and to our Uncle the Duke of Somerset, at that time Protector, and to the rest of our Council, not doubting but that she should have that Favour that was convenient for her, being our Sister, and Cousin to our said good Brother. Of which Request and Answer, at his coming home, he made Report accordingly. And otherwise than this he never meddled in that Matter at his being there. And if he had, yet we do assure our said good Brother, that he exceeded therein our Commission; having nothing on our part at that time to say in that Matter.

‘Wherefore for the Matter itself ye shall say, Like as We desire not any thing of him that is inconvenient or against Reason to grant, so we doubt not but, altho he doth seem to move this unto us, yet when he shall understand how much against Reason it is to be granted, he will stay further Motion. And therefore because he percase hath not heard the State of the Cause, ye shall declare unto him, that such Order and Form of Common Prayer in our Churches, and

able Embassy to France,
May 21.

After this the Lord Marquis of Northampton was directed with a solemn Embassy to the French King, as well to present him with the Order of the Garter, as to treat with him of other secret Affairs. With him were join'd in Commission the Bishop of Ely, Sir Philip Hobby, Sir William Pickering, Sir John Mason Knights, and Mr. Smith Secretary of State. The Earls of Worcester, Rutland, and Ormond were appointed to accompany them, and likewise the Lords Lisle, Fitzwater, Bray, Abergavenny, and Emers, with other Knights and Gentlemen of Note, to the number of 26: and for avoiding immoderate and burthensome Train, Order was given that every Earl should have four Attendants, every Lord three, every Knight and Gentleman two; the Commissioners were not limited to any Number.

They arriv'd at Nants, and were there receiv'd by Monsieur Chastilion, and by him conducted to Chasteau Bryan where the French King then lodg'd, they were twice banqueted by the way; and the nearer they approach'd to the Castle, the more increas'd the Resort of the French Nobility to do them Honour: being come to the Court, they were forthwith brought to the King abiding then in his Bed-chamber. Here the Marquis presented unto him the Order of the Garter, wherewith he was presently invested, and thereupon gave for the Garter a Chain worth 200 l. and his Gown address'd with Aglets esteem'd worth 25 l.

The Bishop
of Ely's Speech to the French
King.
Jun. 20.

Then the Bishop of Ely in a short Speech declar'd how desirous the K. of England was not only to continue but to encrease Amity with the French King. That to this purpose he had sent the Order of the Garter to be both a Testimony and Tye of Love between them, to which purpose chiefly those Societies of Honour were first devis'd. He further declar'd that they had Commission to make Overture of some other Matters, which was like to make the Concord between the Kings and their Realms, not only more durable, but in all expectation perpetual; desiring the King to appoint some Persons enabled with Authority to treat with them.

To this Speech the Cardinal of Lorain answer'd, that the French King was ready to apprehend and embrace all Offers tending to increase of Amity, and the rather, for that long Hostility had made their new Friendship both more weak in it self, and more obnoxious to Jealousies and Distrusts. And therefore he promis'd on the King's Behalf, that Commissioners should be appointed to treat with them about any Matters which they had in Charge; praying to God that it might be a Means, not only to assure but to enlarge their late settled Love. So a Commission went forth to the Cardinal of Lorain and Chastilion the Constable, the D. of Guise, and certain others. At the first the English demanded, that the young Queen of Scots might be sent into England for perfection of Marriage between King Edward and her. But hereto the French answered, that they had taken too much Adventure, and spent too many Lives, upon any Conditions to let her go; and that Conclusion had been made long before for her Marriage with the Dolphine of France.

Then the English propos'd a Marriage between their King and the Lady Elizabeth the French King's eldest Daughter: to which the French did cheerfully incline.

So after Agreement that neither Party should be bound, either in Conscience or in Honour, until the Lady should accomplish twelve Years of Age, they fell to treat of the Portion which should be given with her in Marriage. The English first demanded 1500000 Crowns, and offer'd that her Dowry should be so great as King Henry the Eighth had given to any of his Wives. The offer of Dower was not disliked; but for the Portion, some of the French wondred, others smiled, that so great a Sum should be demanded. The English descended to 1400000 Crowns, and after by degrees fell so low as 800000. But the French, as they held the first Sum to be unreasonable, so all the other they esteem'd excessive. Then the English demanded what the French would give? First they offer'd 1000000 Crowns, afterwards 200000, which they said was the most, and more than ever had been given with a Daughter of France. Then follow'd a stiff Contention, both by Reasons and Precedents; but the French in no Case would rise any higher, only they agreed that the French and Usage of the Communion of the Sacrament, as we use here, besides that it is in the very same Order as the Primitive Church of Christ used it; it is also established by a Law of our Realm, by the Consent of our Parliament. By the which the whole Estate of our whole Realm and Subjects be ruled, and We our selves also in all manner Causes, being such an Universal and High Court, as there is none in all our Policy to be compared to it. And therefore as it bindeth our Self and all our Subjects, so should we not but do unjustly to violate it, or in any Point to agree to the breaking of it.

Besides, that the Example of breaking that Order wittingly, were so pernicious and dangerous to all our Realm, that both the Reverence of our Estate, the Execution of our Laws, and the Authority of the same, were gone utterly and taken away.

Wherefore ye shall say in this Cause, We do but require our said good Brother, while he is in the consideration of this Matter, to turn the Case; and either remember some like Case of his own, or imagine this to be his, and make it more nearer him, if it so please him. As where she is our natural Sister, let our good Brother imagine in his own Cause, the Party were his natural Son. And that done, and considered with such Circumstances, as indeed be in this Case, of willing breaking of our Laws to be considered; We assure our selves upon the Opinion of the great Wisdom and long Experience, which We know to be in our said good Brother in the ruling of his own Realms and Dominions, he will not only cease to move this Matter further, but rather to give us contrary Counsil, for the good Love and tender Care, we trust, he beareth to us in this our Youth. And somewhat the more for the Respect that one Prince naturally ought to have to the Conservation of another's Estate and Dignity.

And yet we shall assure our said good Brother, that in all manner things wherein we may any wise shew our natural Affection to our said Sister, we will not fail, but even abundantly heap the same upon her, somewhat the more above our natural Affection, for a demonstration of an earnest Desire to gratify our said good Brother.

The other Article of these Instructions (mistaken also by this Author) was, that as the King permitted the Emperor's Ambassador to use that manner of Religion which he used in his own Country, so also it was desired that the King's Ambassador in the Low Countreys might use the same Religion that he had used here in our Country: Which the Emperor had denyed to Sir Richard Morison the King's former Ambassador. The Reasonableness of which Request was in the softest Terms shewed to the Emperor. J. S.

(n) This Embassy from Denmark is misplaced here, and belonged to the Year past, viz. 1550. his coming being placed in the Journal of K. Edward at Decemb. 19. that Year. J. S.

King,

1551. King, at his proper Charge, should send her to the King of England three Months before she should accomplish her Age for Marriage, sufficiently appointed with Jewels, Apparel, and Furniture for House; and that Bonds for the Performances should then be deliver'd at London by the King of England, and at Paris by the French King; and that in case the Lady should not consent after she should be of the said Age for Marriage, the Penalty should be 150000 Crowns. The French set down these Offers in Writing, and sent them to the King of England.

Commissioners from France sent into England. Soon after Monsieur le Mareſhall, and other Commissioners, were sent by the French King into England; where they arriv'd at such time as the Sweating Sickness was most furious; a new, strange and violent Disease, for if a Man were attack'd therewith, he dy'd or escap'd within nine Hours, or ten at the most. If he took cold he dy'd within three Hours; if he slept within six Hours (as he should be desirous to do) he dy'd raving; albeit in other burning Diseases that Distemper is commonly appeased with Sleep. It raged chiefly among Men of strongest Constitution and Years, of whom 120 perished in some one day within the Liberties of London; few aged Men, or Children, or Women, dy'd thereof.

The King goes to Hampton-Court, July 11. Two of Charles Brandon's Sons, both Dukes of Suffolk, one of the King's Gentlemen and one of his Grooms, dy'd of this Disease: For which Cause the King remov'd to Hampton-Court with very few Followers.

The French Commissioners were brought by the Lord Clinton Lord Admiral of England, from Gravesend to London. They were saluted by the way with all the Shot of more than fifty of the King's great Ships, and with a fair Peal of Artillery from the Tower; and lastly were lodg'd in Suffolk Palace † in Southwark. And albeit they had more than 400 Gentlemen in their Train, yet was not one of them, nor any other Stranger in England touch'd with the Sweating Disease; and yet the English were chafed therewith, not only in England, but in other Countries abroad, which made them like Tyrants, both feared and avoided wheresoever they came.

Delivers his Message to the King. The next day the French were remov'd to Richmond; whence every day they resorted to Hampton-Court, where the King remained. The first day after they had perform'd the Ceremonies of Court, and deliver'd to the King their Letters of Credence, they were led to a Chamber richly furnish'd for their Repose: The same day they dined with the King, and after Dinner being brought into an inner Chamber, the Marshal declar'd that they were come, not only to deliver unto him the Order of St. Michael, but therewith to manifest the entire Love which the King his Master bare him; which he desir'd him to conceive to be no less than a Father can bear to his natural Son. That albeit divers Persons, either witless or malicious, raise divers vain Rumors to draw the King, as it is thought, from his Master's Friendship, yet he trusted that the King would not listen unto them. That it much concern'd the Common Quiet, that good Officers be placed upon the Frontiers; for as good may do good in moderating things amiss, so evil will do evil albeit no bad occasion be offer'd. Lastly, He desir'd in case any new Controversy should arise, it might be determin'd by Commissioners on both sides, and not by Conflicts, the Parent of War.

To this the King both suddenly and shortly answer'd, 'That he much thanked the French King for his Order, as for the large Expression of his Love, which he would be ready in all Points to requite. Touching Rumors, they are not always to be credited, nor always to be condemn'd, it being no less vain to fear all things, than dangerous to doubt of nothing. And in case at any time he listned to them, it was only to provide against the worst, and never to break into Hostility. Concerning Officers, he appointed such as he esteemed good, and yet preferred the over-doubtful before the over-credulous and secure. New Controversies he would always be ready to determine by Reason rather than by Force, so far as his Honour should not thereby be diminish'd. (o)

The French after this return to their Lodging at Richmond, and the next day resorted again to the King, invested him with Garments of the Order, and accompany'd him to the Chappel, the King going between the Marshal and de Guise; both which after the Communion kissing his Cheek. The residue of that day, and a few days following, were pass'd over with Pastimes and Feasts. At the last the Lord Marquis of Northampton, and the Residue, who had been formerly sent with Commission from the King into France, were appointed to treat with the French Commissioners touching the great Matters of their Embassy.

And because the French could be serv'd no higher than their Offer of 200000 Crowns, it was accepted; the one Moity to be paid upon the day of Marriage, and the other six months after: the Dote was agreed to be 10000 Marks of English Mony, and not to be paid in case the King should die before Marriage. This Agreement was reduc'd into Writing, and delivered under Seal on both sides. At the same time an Ambassador arriv'd out of Scotland, to demand an Exemplification of Articles of Peace between England and France, under the Great Seal of England; which without any difficulty they obtain'd.

The Marshal at his taking leave, declar'd to the King how kindly his Master did conceive of the King's readines to conclude this Treaty, and also commended his Master's great Inclination to the Agreement thereof. Then he presented Monsieur Boys to be Ambassador Legier for the French, and the Marquis

(o) For a Youth not fourteen Years old to make such an Extemporary Harangue as this, so grave and so wise, will pass most Readers Faith to believe. But our Author has dress'd up and improv'd by his own Eloquence, what this young King said in Answer to the French Ambassador: which he set down in his own Journal; and was to this Tenor, (marvellous enough for his Years) viz. 'That he thanked him [the French King] for his Order [of St. Michael, which this Ambassador brought to him] and all his Love, &c. And he [the King] would shew the like Love in all Points. For Rumors, that they were not always to be believed. That he did sometimes provide for the worst, but never did any Harm upon their hearing. For Ministers, he said, he would rather appease these Controversies with Words, than do any thing by Force. J. S.

The King
confers Honours,
Octob. 11.

Now the King supposing his Estate to be most safe, when indeed it was most unsure, in testimony both of his Joy and his Love, advanced many to new Titles of Honour. The Lord Marquis Dorset, a Man for his harmless simplicity, neither mislik'd nor much regarded (p), was created Duke of Suffolk; the Earl of Warwick was created Duke of Northumberland, the Earl of Wiltshire was created Marquis of Winchester; Sir William Herbert, Lord of Cardiff, was created Earl of Pembroke; Sir Thomas Darcie, Vice-Chamberlain, and Captain of the Guard, was created Lord Darcie; William Cecil was made one of the chief Secretaries (q); Mr. John Cheek the King's School-master, and one of the Guides of his Industry and Hope, and with him Mr. *Henry Dudley and Mr. Henry Nevill of the Privy Chamber, were made Knights. And which was the Accomplishment of Mischief, Sir Robert Dudley one of the Duke of Northumberland's Sons, a true Heir both of his Hate against Persons of Nobility, and of his cunning to dissemble the same, was sworn one of the Six ordinary Gentlemen (r). He was afterwards, for Lust and Cruelty, a Monster of the Court, as apt to hate, so a most sure Executioner of his Hate: yet rather by practice than open dealing, as wanting rather Courage than Wit. After his entertainment into a Place of so near Service, the King enjoy'd his Health not long. (f)

Duke of Northum-berland's Greatness.

The Duke of Northumberland being now inferior unto none of the Nobility in Title of Honour, and superior to all in Authority and Power, could not restrain his haughty Hopes from aspiring to an absolute Command. But before he would directly level at his Mark, the Duke of Somerset was thought fit to be taken away, whose Credit was so great with the common People, that although it sufficed not to bear out any bad Attempt of his own, yet was it of force to cross the evil Purposes of others.

False Rumours of the Duke of Somerset.

And now to begin the third Act of his Tragedy, Speeches were cast that he caused himself to be proclaimed King in divers Countries; which albeit they were known to be false, in-1551. somuch as the Miller's Servant at Battle-bridge in Southwark, lost both his Ears upon a Pillory for so reporting; yet the very naming of him to be King, either as desir'd by himself or by others esteem'd worthy, brought with it a distastful relish, apt to apprehend Suspicion to be true.

After this he was charged to have persuaded divers of the Nobility to chuse him Protector at the next Parliament. The Duke being questioned, neither held silence as he might, nor constantly deny'd it; but entangled himself in his doubtful Tale. One Whaley a busy-headed Man, and desirous to be set on work, gave first light to this Appeachment, but the Earl of Rutland did stoutly avouch it.

Herewith Sir Thomas Palmer, a Man neither Sir Tho. loving the Duke of Somerset, nor beloved of Palmer's him, was brought by the Duke of Northum- Informa- berland to the King, being in his Garden. Here Somer- he declar'd, that upon St. George's day last be- Oct. 7. fore, the Duke of Somerset being upon a Journey towards the North, in case Sir William Herbert Master of the Horse had not assured him that he should receive no Harm, would have raised the People; and that he had sent the Lord Gray before to know who would be his Friends: Also that the Duke of Northum- berland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Pembroke, and other Lords, should be invited to a Banquet; and if they came with a bare Company, to be set upon by the way; if strongly, their Heads should have been cut off at the place of their Feasting. He declared Oct. 11. further, that Sir Ralph Vane had 2000 Men in a readiness; that Sir Thomas Arundell had assur'd the Tower, that Seymour and Hamond would wait upon him, and that all the Horse of the Gendarmorie should be slain. To this Mr. Secretary Cecil added, that the Duke had sent for him, Oct. 14. and said, that he suspected some ill Meaning against him; whereto Mr. Secretary answer'd, that if he were not in Fault, he might trust to his Innocency; if he were, he had nothing to say but to lament him.

The Duke being advertis'd of these Informa- Palmer de- tions against him, by some who had some re- mys his In- gard of Honesty, did forthwith defy the Se- formation. cretary by his Letters. Then he sent for Sir Thomas Palmer, to understand what he had reported of him, who denied all that he had said: but by this hot and humourous striving, he did but draw the Knots more fast.

A few days being past, the Duke either ig- The Duke norant of what was intended, or fearing if he and Conspi- seemed to perceive it, came to the Court, but rators se- somewhat later then he accustomed. And as to red, Oct. 16. Minds possess'd with Fear, all things unusual seem to menace Danger; so this late coming of the Duke was enforc'd as a Suspicion against him:

(p) A disparaging Character given of a Great Man without much, if any ground for it. This Character I can give of him, that he was a great Friend to the Reformation, and a Patron of Learned Men. I have seen Letters from Bucer and Bullinger to him. And, which is instead of all that can be said of him, he was the Father of an admirable tho unfortunate Woman, the Lady Jane Grey. J. S.

(q) Cecil was made Secretary before now, namely, upon Dr. Wotton's resignation of that Office, which was Sept. 6. 1550. so it is certified in the King's Journal. But at this Promotion he was made a Knight. J. S.

(r) Sir Robert Dudley is not well placed here among those that received Titles of Honour at this time; since he with Barnaby Fitz Patrick were two Months before admitted and sworn of the King's Bed-Chamber, viz. Aug. 15. J. S.

(f) Of all the ill Characters our Author gives of Men, that he bestows upon Sir Robert Dudley is the worst: and giveth at last a Hint, as tho he was the wicked Instrument of the King's Death. 'Tis true, this Man was none of the best, but is represented worse than he was, especially by Parsons in his Book intitled Lecesters Common-wealth. Out of which our Author takes his Character for Dudley: When other more wary Men would hardly set down all for Truth that they read in that malicious Book, and wrote by so invenomed an Author. Undoubtedly Sir Rob. Dudley was a good Souldier, a gallant Courtier, a great Statesman, an Enemy to Papists, and a favourer of Learning. J. S.

1551. And so after dinner he was apprehended. Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir Thomas Arundel, Hamonde, Nudigates, John Seymour and David Seymour were also made Prisoners; the Lord Gray being newly come out of the Country was attach'd. Sir Ralph Vane being twice sent for, fled. Upon the first Message it was reported that he said, that his Lord was not stout, and that if he could get home he cared not for any: but upon pursuit he was found in his Servants Stable at Lambeth, cover'd with straw. He was a Man of a fierce Spirit, both sudden and bold, of no evil Disposition, saying that he thought Scantiness of Estate too great an Evil. All these were the same night sent to the Tower, except Palmer, Arundel, and Vane, who were kept in the Court well guarded in Chambers apart. The day following the Dutchess of Somerset was sent to the Tower, no man grieving thereat, because her Pride and Baseness of Life overballanc'd all Pity; and doubtless if any Mischief were then contriv'd, whereof many were doubtful (every one giving forth as he believ'd) it was first hammer'd in the Forge of her wicked-working Brain; for she had always wicked Instruments about her, whom the more she found applicable to her Purposes, the more Favours she bestow'd upon them, who being engag'd by her into Dangers, held it dangerous to fall from her. Also with her were committed one Crane and his Wife, and her own Chamberwoman. After these follow'd Sir Thomas Holdcroft, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, Wingfield, Banister, Vaughan, and some others. In divers of these was then neither any cause known or afterwards discover'd, but the Number rais'd the greater Terror, and doubled the Conceit of the Danger.

Their Confessions.

Sir Thomas Palmer being again examin'd, added to his former Detection, that the Gendarmory upon the Muster-day should be assaulted by 2000 Foot under Sir Ralph Vane, and by 100 Horses of the Duke of Somerset's, besides his Friends which should stand by, and besides the idle People which were thought inclinable to take his part; that this done, he would run thro the City, and proclaim Liberty, and in case his Attempt did not succeed, he would go to the Isle of Wight or to Poole.

Crane confess'd for the most part as Palmer had done, and further added, that the Lord Paget's House was the Place, where the Nobility being invited to a Banquet, should have lost their Heads, and that the Earl of Arundel was made acquainted with the Practice by Sir Michael Stanhope; and that it had been done, but that the Greatness of the Enterprize caus'd Delays, and some diversity of Advice: and further said, that the Duke of Somerset once feigning himself sick, went to London to assay what Friends he could procure. This Crane was a Man, who having consum'd his own Estate, had arm'd himself to any Mischief.

Hamonde confess'd, that the Duke of Somerset's Chamber had been strongly watch'd at Greenwich by night.

All these were sworn before the Council, and the greatest part of the Nobility of the Realm, that their Confessions were true, and as favourably set down in behalf of the Duke as with a safe Conscience they could. And forthwith upon the Information of Crane, the Earl of Arundel and the Lord Paget were sent to the Tower, so were Stradley and St. Albans, Servants to the Earl of Arundel. The Lord Strange voluntarily inform'd, how the Duke desir'd him to move the King to take to Wife his third Daughter the Lady Jane, and that he would be his Especial about the King, to advertise him when any of the Council spake privately with him, and to acquaint him what they said.

Hereupon to give some publick Satisfaction to the People, the Lord Chancellor who had Words at will, and Wit enough to apply them, declar'd openly in the Star-chamber all these Accusations against the Duke of Somerset: these Accusations were also publish'd to all Emperors, Kings, Embassadors, and Chief Men in any State, wherein these matters were compris'd. By other Letters the Muster of the Gendarmory was defer'd for certain months: Other Letters were directed to Sir Arthur Darcy, to take charge of the Tower, and to discharge Sir Arthur Markham, for that without acquainting any of the Lords of the Council, he suffer'd the D. of Somerset to walk abroad, and permitted Intercourses of Letters between David Seymor and Mrs. Poynes.

The Lord Chancellor in the Star-chamber declares these Accusations of the Duke, Octob. 24.

Whilst these Matters were in traverse, A Message Messengers arriv'd from Duke Maurice of Saxony, the Duke of Mecklenburge, and John Marquiss of Brandenburge, Princes of the Religion in Germany, to understand the King's mind, whether he would agree to aid them with 400000 Dollars, in case any Necessity should assail them, they consenting to do the like to him, in case he should be overcharg'd with War. The King gave them an uncertain Answer, but gentle and full of fair Hopes, that because their Message was only to know the King's Inclination, and not to conclude, he could give them no other Answer than this, that he was well inclin'd to join in Amity with them whom he knew to agree with him in Religion; but first he was desirous to know whether they could procure such Aid from other Princes, as might enable them to maintain their Wars, and to assist him if need should require. And therefore he willed them to break this matter to the Duke of Prussia and other Princes about them, and to procure the Good-will of Hamborough, Lubeck, and Breme. Then he desir'd that the matter of Religion should be plainly set down, left under pretence thereof Wars should be made for other Quarrels. Lastly, he willed that they should furnish themselves with more ample Instructions from their Lords, to commune and conclude of all Circumstances pertaining to that Business.

The King's Answer, Nov. 14.

The King's Answer was fram'd with these Uncertainties and Delays, lest if the King had assur'd his Consent at the first, it might have been taken as Breach of League with the Emperor. Afterwards they and other Princes of Germany made a League offensive and defensive with the French King against the Emperor. Into which the French King desir'd the King of England to come; but because the French King was the Chief of the League, the King did plainly perceive that the War was not for the cause of Religion. Wherefore he answer'd that he could not do it without breach of his League with the Emperor, against whom having no pretence of Hostility, he was not so desirous of Wars, as without just cause of his own to pull them upon him.

Duke of Somerset
brought to
Dec. 1.

About the same time the Lord Admiral was sent into France, as the King's Deputy, to be Godfather at the Baptism of the French King's Son: also a French Man who had committed a Murder at Diepe, and fled into England, was remitted into France, and deliver'd upon the Borders to receive Justice by the same Laws against which he had offended.

And now the Duke of Northumberland being impatient of long-working Wickedness, the fourth Act of the Duke of Somerset's Tragedy must not be delay'd, lest thereby Fear abating (as being false it could not be durable) either the King's gentle Disposition, or the Love which he had formerly born to his Uncle, might haply return to their natural working. So the Duke of Somerset, after a short abode (t) in the Tower, was brought to his Trial at Westminster. The Lord William Paulet, Marquis of Winchester and Lord Treasurer, sat as High Steward of England, under a Cloth of State, on a Bench mounted three degrees; the Peers to the number of 27 sat on a Bench one step lower. These were the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bath, Suffolk, Worcester, Pembroke, and Viscount Hereford. The Barons Abergavenny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Borough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcy, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray.

First the Indictments were read, in number five: containing a Charge of raising Men in the North Parts of the Realm, and at his House of assembling Men to kill the Duke of Northumberland, of resisting his Attachment, of killing the Gendarmory, of raising London, of assaulting the Lords, and devising their Deaths. When the Prisoner had pleaded not guilty, and put himself upon Trial of his Peers, the Examinations before-mention'd were read, and by the King's learned Council press'd against him. Hereto albeit he was both unskilful and much appalled (Causes sufficient to drive him out of matters) yet after a short Intreaty, that Words either idly or angerly spoken might not be enforc'd to any high Crew, to the Points objected he answer'd.

The Duke's Apology for himself.

That he never intended to raise the North Parts of the Realm, but upon some Bruits he apprehended a Fear, which mov'd him to send to Sir William Herbert to remain his Friend. That he determin'd not to kill the Duke of Northumberland or any other Lord, but spake of it only, and determin'd the contrary. That it had been a mad Enterprize with his 100 Men to assail the Gendarmory consisting of 900, when in case he had prevail'd, it would nothing have avail'd the pretended Purpose. And therefore this being senseless and absurd, must needs discredit other matters, which otherwise might have been believ'd. That at London he never projected any stir, but ever held it a good place for his Surety. That for having Men in his Chamber at Greenwich, it was manifest he meant no harm, because when he might have done it he did not. And further, against the Persons of them, whose Examinations had been read against him, he objected many things, desiring they might be brought to his face, which in regard he was a Person of Dignity and Estate, he claim'd to be reasonable: Especially against Sir Thomas Palmer he spake much Evil, and yet in opinion of many far short of the Truth. Hereto no answer was made, but that the worse they were, the fitter they were to be his Instruments. Fit Instruments indeed, said he, but rather for others than for me.

The Fact being made, the King's learned Council avouch'd the Law to be, to assemble Men with intent to kill the Duke of Northumberland, was Treason by a Statute of the 3d and 4th of King Edward then reigning, made against unlawful Assemblies; that to raise London or the North Parts of the Realm was Treason; that to mind resisting his Attachment was Felony; that to assault the Lords, and to devise their Deaths, was Felony. But under favour of their Judgment, the Statute alledg'd bears no such Sense, either for Treason or for Felony. Indeed by a Statute of K. Henry 7. it is Felony for inferior Persons to contrive the Death of a Lord of the Council, but Lords are therein expressly excepted.

The Lords went together, and first the Duke of Suffolk nobly said, that he held it not reasonable, that this being but a Contention between private Subjects, under pretension thereof any mean Action should be drawn to Intention of Treason. The Duke of Northumberland (in countenance bearing shew of Sadness, but in truth stiffly obstinate) deny'd that he would ever consent that any Practice against him should be either imputed or reputed to be Treason; yet this was not taken to proceed from Modesty, as he expected, but for that he could not with his Honour or with Reason so enforce it.

The Marquis of Northampton was cross'd and contentious with many, but never reply'd to any Answer; a manifest mark of no strong Spirit (v). Some of the rest plainly brake forth, that they held it unfit that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke should be of the Trial, because the Prisoner was chiefly charg'd with Practices intended against them. But hereto answer was made, that a Peer of the Realm might not be challeng'd. After much variation of Opinions, the Prisoner at the Bar was acquit of Treason, but by most Voices (most favouring the Duke of Northumberland) was found guilty of Felony. Here-

(t) That is, from the 16th of October to the 1st of December.

(v) This was rather a sign of no contentious Spirit, and that delighted not in sending and proving, as we say. But if our Author means a Meanness and Lowness of Spirit, this forbearing of Replies is no such manifest sign of that; because sometimes this Sparingness of Words and Slowness of Reply proceeds from Wisdom and Discretion. But where our Author met with this Account of the Marquis, I know not; he was certainly able enough to make Replies, if he had pleas'd, being of a very gay Disposition, and addicted to Pleasure: as may be judged from this Passage, that at his Trial under Q. Mary, when he was with the Duke of Northumberland charged with High Treason, he pleaded for himself, that in the midst of those Conspiracies for the setting up the Lady Jane Gray, &c. he was intent to Hunting and other Sports. And Camden at the Year 1571. wherein this Marquis died, gives him this Character, That he was a Man very well versed in the more delightful sorts of Studies, as Music, Love-toys, and other courtly Dalliances. J. S.

1551. upon Judgment follow'd, that he should be hang'd; but this would never have gone so hard, had they not prosecuted all under pretence of Treason.

The Duke of Somerset might have crav'd his Clergy, but he suffer'd Judgment to pass, thank'd the Lords for his gentle Trial, crav'd Pardon of the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquiss of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, for his ill meaning against them, and made suit for his Life, in pity to his Wife, Children, and Servants, and in regard of Payment of his Debts. As he departed, because he was acquit of Treason, the Ax of the Tower was not openly carry'd; whereupon the People supposing that he was altogether acquit, shouted half a dozen times so loud, that they were heard beyond Charing-Cross. It is certain the People favour'd him the more, because they saw that there was much secret Hate born against him. But as this immoderate Favour of the Multitude did him no good, so will it undo so many as shall trust unto it. It was told the King, that after the Duke's Return to the Tower, he acknowledged to certain Lords, that he had hired Bartuile to make them away, that Bartuile confes'd so much, and that Hamonde was not ignorant thereof; which whether it were true, or whether devis'd to make the King more estrang'd from him, of Judgment could not hold themselves assur'd.

About this time Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, a Man famous in those times for Learning and Integrity of Life, was sent to the Tower for Concealment of (I know not what) Treason, written to him I know not by whom, and not discover'd until (what shall I call) the Party did reveal it. (w) But the Lord Chancellor Rich having built a fair Estate, and perceiving what nimble Ears were born to listen after Treason, also for that a Parliament was towards, wherein he was doubtful what Questions might arise, made suit to the King, that in regard of the Infirmities of his Body, he might be discharge'd of his Office; giving good Example to Men, sometimes by their own Moderation to avoid Disgrace. So he deliver'd the Seal at his House in Great St. Bartholomew's to the D. of Northumberland and the E. of Pembroke, sent by the King with Commission to receive it (x). The same Seal was forthwith deliver'd to Dr. Goodrick Bishop of Ely, a Man if haply able to discharge the Place, assuredly no more (y). It was first deliver'd unto him only during the Sicknefs of the Lord Rich, but in short time after he was sworn Lord Chancellor,

L. Chancellor Rich resigns his Office.

(w) Our Author writes not like an Historian, in giving us so lame an account of the Imprisonment of this Bishop. In the King's Journal he met with his Commitment for Concealment of Treason. And because he read no more Particulars of it, he would hint as tho his Imprisonment were unjust, and would cast the Imputation of it upon the State, as a piece of Forgery and Oppression. Whereas by the Minutes of the Council-Book, and the Book of Warrants to the Seal, the Particulars of this Matter appear. It was for consenting, about July 1550. to a Conspiracy in the North, for the raising a Rebellion. One Ninian Menvile of Stedwich in the Bishopric of Durham, Esq; accused the said Bishop of Durham of this in a Writing. To which the Bishop made his Answer. And Menvile again replied to the same. But for want of a Letter written by the Bishop to Menvile, whereupon depended a great Trial of this matter, the Determination thereof was for some time staid: and the Bishop only commanded to keep his House (he lodged now in the late Monastery of White Monks on Tower-hill) until he should be called to further Answer. This Letter afterwards came to light, being found in a Cask of the Duke of Somerset's, after his last Apprehension. Upon this the Bishop was sent for, and December the 20th, 1551. he made his Appearance before the Lords. By whom being charg'd with this matter, and his own Letter produced against him (I repeat the Words of the Council-Book) which he could not deny but to be of his own Hand, and unable to make any further Answer thereto than he had done before by Writing, he was (for that the same seem'd not a sufficient Answer) committed by the King's Commandment to the Tower of London. And there was a special Commission appointed for his Trial, dated in October 1552. to Sir Roger Cholmely, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, Sir Richard Read, and divers others both of the Common and Civil Law, to call before them Cuthbert Bishop of Durham, and to examine him of all manner of Conventicles, Conspiracies, Contempts, Concealments, &c. And if found guilty, to deprive him of his Bishopric, and otherwise to do in the Premises according to their Wilsdoms. In fine, he was found guilty, and deprived the 14th of October, or the 11th, according to the King's Journal. And in November following a Grant was made to Rob. Horne, Professor of Divinity and Dean of Durham, of the said Bishopric: Which however he would not accept of. And Menvile for his Service, in making this Information, was rewarded by the King with the Gift of an 100 l.

A. Har-mar's Specimen. p. 109. Warrant-Book.

And a year before this, viz. July 8. 1551. the Dean of Durham (whose Name was Whitehead) was ordered by the Privy Council to answer in Writing unto such Matters as he was charged with at his being before the Council, and in such sort as he would stand to at his peril. And in October the Council wrote a Letter to the L. Treasurer, L. Chamberlain, Secretary Cecil, and Mr. Majon, to hear and examine the Bishop and Dean of Durham's Case, and to make them Report of the same. So that this Dean seems to be involved in the same Accusation with the Bishop. But he died soon after. J. S.

(x) Those that were sent by the King to receive the Great Seal from the Lord Rich, were the Marquiss of Winchester, the L. Treasurer, the Duke of Northumberland, L. President of the Council, and the Lord Darcy, L. Chamberlain of the Household. These only were sent (the L. Pembroke was none of them) who brought Letters from the King, dated the 21st of December, in the Fifth of his Reign, to the said L. Rich for that purpose. Who accordingly delivered up the Great Seal into their hands; and it was brought to the King. Which he, not forthwith delivered to Dr. Goodrick Bishop of Ely (as our Author writeth) but keeping it with him all that day and all that night, and the next morning till about ten of the clock, delivered to the said Bishop, to keep Durante Beneplacito.

The Occasion of the King's sending for the Seal our Author suggests to be, the L. Rich's Warinefs to avoid danger of Life or Estate, Crimes being then so studiously laid to mens Charge that had to do in public Matters; and so desirous handsomly to quit that great Office, he pretended Infirmity of Body. But, according to the King's Journal, his Sicknefs is mentioned as the real Cause: and therefore the Seal was delivered at first to the Bishop of Ely, only during his Sicknefs. It is certain the said L. Rich was this year visited, at his House called Leez in Essex, with Sicknefs, and forty more of his Family, as the King writeth in his Journal. The Distemper perhaps was the Ague that raged in those times, or some other infectious Disease; the Relicks whereof might well hang upon him this Michaelmas Term, and in the declining of the Year, being now at his London House. For in October the L. Chancellor being indisposed, the Chancery Matters were dispatched by the Master of the Rolls, and some Judges and Civilians appointed by Commission. And lying now under some Displeasure at Court, for deferring presently to set the Great Seal to somewhat only upon a Letter under some few Counsellors hands, they might take this opportunity of his Indisposition to get him displaced. J. S.

(y) According to the common Custom of Sir John Hayward, here is a disparaging Character given of the Bishop of Ely, as to his Abilities. This Man was long accustomed to Business, from R. Henry the Eighth's time to this present. In K. Edward's Reign he was in many weighty Commissions, and a Privy Counsellor: employed in several Embassies, and particularly in the great and splendid Embassy to France, Anno 1551. with several other eminent Persons. In his Office of Chancellor he is noted by Archbishop Parker, in a Letter of his, for his impartial Administration of Justice. He was also a Churchman that was very instrumental in promoting of the Reformation of Religion, and purging it 1551. Chancellor, because as Keeper of the Seal he could not then execute such matters as were to be dispatch'd in Parliament.

The King diverted.

And now after Judgment against Somerſet, the Lords were not negligent to entertain the King with all Delights they could devise, partly to win the King's Favour, but especially to convert his Thoughts from his condemn'd Uncle. To this end they often presented him with stately Masques, brave Challenges at Tilt and at Barriers, and whatsoever Exercises or Disports they could conjecture to be best pleasing to him. Then also he first began to keep Hall, and the Christmas time was pass'd over with Banquetings, Masques, Plays, and much other variety of Mirth. Often they would call him to serious Affairs, wherein he took especial Pleasure. Sometimes they would remember him how dangerous the Duke of Somerſet was, who having made away his only Brother, contriv'd the Death of the Chief of the Nobility. And where (say they) would his Mischief have rested? Would it have rag'd against all, and left the King only untouch'd? Verily, having been always both cruel and false, there would have been no end of his Mischief, and all his Submissions must now be taken for counterfeit and dissembled: But his Avarice and Ambition once remov'd, the way will be laid open to Virtue and Merit.

A. 1552.

Jan. 22.

So about two months after his Judgment, the fifth and last Act of his Tragedy was brought upon the Stage. When being so often expos'd to Fortune's mercy before, he was plac'd by a strong Guard upon a Scaffold at Towerhill, about eight of the clock in the morning, to suffer Death: and albeit strait Charge had been given the day before to every Householder in the City, not to permit any to depart out of their Houses before ten of the clock that day, yet the People the more unruly by this Restraint, by such thick Throngs swarm'd to the place, that before seven of the clock the Hill was cover'd, and all the Chambers which open'd towards the Scaffold were taken up.

His Speech on the Scaffold.

Here the Duke first avow'd to the People, that his Intentions had been not only harmless in regard of particular Persons, but driving to the common Benefit both of the King and of the Realm. Then he exhorted them unto Obedience, assuring them that no Persons could justly avouch their Faith to God, who were not faithful to their King.

But herewith behold certain Persons of a Hamlet near, who had been warn'd by the Lieutenant of the Tower to attend that morning about seven of the clock, coming after their hour thro the Postern, and perceiving the Prisoner to be mounted upon the Scaffold, began to run, and to call to their Fellows to come away. The suddenness of their coming, the haste that they made, the Weapons they carry'd, but especially the word, Come away, being often doubled, mov'd many of the nearest to surmise that a Power was come to receive the Duke, whereupon many cry'd with high Voice, Away, Away. The Cry of those and the coming on of the other, cast amazement upon the rest, so much the more terrible, because no Man knew what he fear'd or wherefore, every Man conceiving that which his astonish'd Fancy did cast in his mind; some imagin'd that it thunder'd, others that it was an Earthquake, others that the Powder in the Armory had taken fire, others that Troops of Horsemen approach'd. In which medly of Conceits they bare down one another, and jostled many into the Tower-Ditch, and long it was before the vain Tumult could be appeas'd.

No sooner were the People settled in quiet, and the Duke beginning to finish his Speech, but upon another idle Apprehension they fell to be no less riotous in Joy than they had been in Fear. For Sir Anthony Brown coming on horseback upon the spur, gave occasion whereby many entertain'd hope that he brought a Pardon; whereupon a great Shout was rais'd, A Pardon, A Pardon, God save the King. But the Duke of Somerſet express'd great Constancy at both these times, often desiring the People to remain quiet, that he might quietly end his Life. For, said he, I have often look'd Death in the face, upon great Adventures in the Field, he is now no Stranger to me; and among all the vain Mockeries of this World, I repent me of nothing more than in esteeming Life more dear than I should. I have endur'd the Hate of Great Persons; so much the more dangerous, because unjust. I have incur'd Displeasure from Inferiors, not always for any great Faults of my own (albeit I was never free) but for giving way to the Faults of others. And now being constantly resolv'd, I neither fear to die, nor desire to live; and having master'd all Grief in my self, I desire no man to sorrow for me (z). So having testify'd his Faith to God, and his Faithfulness to the King, he yielded from the old Superstitions, both in K. Henry's and K. Edward's Reigns; and one of the Compilers of the Book of Common Prayer. He bred up Learned Men in his Family. Dr. Cox, who was K. Edward's Instructor, and after succeeded in this Bishopric, was his Chaplain; and the most Learned Dr. Smith, afterwards Secretary of State, and a Knight, was his Chancellor. To Foreigners, especially Professors of the Gospel, he was a Patron and Friend; as particularly the Noble Polonian Alasco, and Petrus Valentius a French Protestant, whom he made his Chaplain and Almoner. J. S.

(z) Our Author hath a way of making Speeches for men; and taking too much Liberty therein, to make them speak more or otherwise than they did, not to say, contrary to what they themselves uttered. In the Speech of this good Duke, as here represented, are several things omitted which he spake, and other Passages added which he spake not. And therefore it may not be amiss to set down here more truly the last Words of so great a Personage. And that I will do from John Fox, a diligent Historian, who lived in those Times, and had his Intelligence from a noble Person, then near the Duke upon the Scaffold, and who carefully marked all things.

Acts and Mon. ad

An. 1552.

The Duke of Somerſet's last Words.

The Duke addressing to the People with the Compellation of Dearly beloved Friends, said, 'That he was brought thither to suffer Death, altho he never offended against the King, neither by Word nor Deed; but had always been as faithful and true unto this Realm, as any Man had been. But forasmuch as he was by a Law condemned to die, he acknowledged himself, as well as others, to be subject thereunto. Wherefore to testify his Obedience which he ought unto the Laws, he was come thither to suffer Death: whereunto he willingly offered himself, with most hearty Thanks unto God, that had given him this time of Repentance; who might by sudden Death have taken away his Life, that neither he should have acknowledged God, nor himself.

'That there was yet somewhat he must put them in mind of, as touching the Christian Religion; which so long as he was in Authority, he always diligently set forth and furthered to his power. And he did not repent him of his Doings, but rejoiced therein; since now the State of Religion came most near unto the Form and Order of the Primitive Church.

1552. yielded his Body into the Executioner's Hand, who with one Stroke of the Ax cut off all his confus'd Cogitations and Cares; the more pity'd by the People, for the known Hate of Northumberland against him.

His Character. Assuredly he was a Man harmless and faithful, and one who never hatch'd any Hopes prejudicial to the King, but always intended his Safety and Honour; but hard it is for Greatness to stand, when it is not sustain'd Beloved by the People. by the proper Strength. The People, whose Property it is by excessive Favour to bring Great Men to Misery, and then to be excessive in Pity, departed away griev'd and afraid, and yet fear'd to seem to be afraid, and for this cause chiefly did never bear good mind to Northumberland afterwards, altho in shew they dissimled the contrary; for nothing is more easy than to discern when People observe Great Men from the Heart, or when they do it for fashion or for fear: and as it often happens, that Men oppress'd work revenge after their Deaths, so the Remembrance of Somerset much mov'd the People to fall from Northumberland in his greatest Attempt, and to leave him to his fatal Fall, whereat they openly rejoic'd, and presented to him Handkerchiefs dip'd in the Blood of Somerset, for whom they thought he deserv'd rather late than undeserv'd Punishment. So certain it is that the Debts both of Cruelty and Mercy go never unpaid. I omit the mean Scourges of Conscience: For assuredly a Body cannot be so torn with Stripes, as a Mind is with remembrance of wicked Actions. But of him more hereafter shall be said, and how his Greatness turn'd to be Fortune's Scorn.

The Nobility flatter and comply with him. But outwardly and for the present he gain'd a great hand over the Nobility; who soon observing that he was able to endanger the Estate of the greatest, and that the more Respect they did bear to him, the more safely they liv'd and the more easily advanc'd to Honour, they all contended to creep into his Humour, to watch his Words, his Gestures, his Looks, and to do that as of themselves, which they conceiv'd he had a desire they should do.

The King's Reflections. But the King, albeit at the first he gave no token of any ill-temper'd Passion, as taking it not agreeable to Majesty openly to 1552. declare himself, and albeit the Lords did much help to dispel any dampy Thoughts which the Remembrance of his Uncle might raise, by applying him with great variety of Exercises and Disports; yet upon speech of him afterwards, he would often sigh and let fall tears: sometimes he was of opinion that he had done nothing that deserv'd Death, or if he had, that it was very small, and proceeded rather from his Wife than from himself. And where then, said he, was the Good-Nature of a Nephew? Where was the Clemency of a Prince? Ah! how unfortunate have I been to those of my Blood? My Mother I slew at my very Birth, and since have made away two of her Brothers, and haply to make a way for the Purposes of others against my self. Was it ever known before that a King's Uncle, a Lord Protector, one whose Fortunes had much advanc'd the Honour of the Realm, did lose his Head for Felony, a Felony neither clear in Law, and in fact weakly prov'd? Alas! how falsely have I been abus'd? How weakly carry'd? How little was I Master over my own Judgment, that both his Death and the Envy thereof must be charg'd upon me? (a)

Not long after the Death of Somerset, because it was not thought fit that such a Person should be executed alone, who could hardly be thought to offend alone, Sir Ralph Vane and Sir Miles Partridge were hang'd on Tower-hill; Sir Michael Stanhope and Sir Tho. Arundel were there also beheaded. All these took it upon their last Charge, that they never offended against the King, nor against any of his Council. God knows whether obstinately secret, or whether innocent; and in the opinion of all Men Somerset was much clear'd by the Death of those who were executed to make him appear faulty.

Sir Ralph Vane was charg'd with conspiring with Somerset; but his bold Answers, term'd rude and ruffian-like, falling into Years apt to take offence, either only caus'd, or much further'd his Condemnation. For besides his natural Fierceness inflam'd by his present Disgrace, he was the more free by reason of his great Services in the Field. The time hath been, said he, when I was of some esteem, but now we are in Peace which reputeth the Coward and Courageous alike: and so

* Church. Which thing he esteemed as a great Benefit given of God both unto them and him: and most heartily exhorted them all, that this which was most purely set forth unto them, they would with all Thankfulness accept and embrace, and set the same forth in their Living; which thing if they did not, without doubt greater Mischief and Calamity would follow.

Then the Duke stop'd a while upon certain Hurly-Burlyes occasionally happening among the People. One Cause thereof was by Sir Anthony Brown's coming, and riding towards the Scaffold; by whom the People thought a Pardon was brought: but proving no such thing, the Duke proceeded, telling them, 'That there was no such matter as they hoped or believed. That so it seemed good unto Almighty God, whose Ordinance it was meet and necessary that we all should be obedient to. Wherefore he prayed them all to be quiet, and to be contented with his Death, which he was most willing to suffer. And then prayed them to join in Prayer unto the Lord for the Preservation of the King's Majesty; unto whom hitherto he had always shewed himself a most faithful and true Subject. That he had always been most diligent about his Majesty in his Affairs both at home and abroad; and no less diligent in seeking the common Commodity of the whole Realm. [At which Words all the People cry'd out, It was most true.] That unto the King's Majesty he wished continual Health, with all Felicity and prosperous Success. [Whereunto all the People cry'd out again, Amen.] He wished moreover unto all his Counsellors the Grace and Favour of God, whereby they might rule in all things uprightly with Justice. Unto whom he exhorted them all in the Lord to shew themselves obedient, as it was their bounden Duty, under the pain of Condemnation; and also most profitable for the Preservation and Safeguard of the King's Majesty.

* That forasmuch as heretofore he had oftentimes Affairs with divers Men (and hard it was to please every Man) therefore if there were any that had been offended or injured by him, he most humbly required and asked him Forgiveness; and especially Almighty God, whom throughout all his Life he had most grievously offended. And all other, whatsoever they were, that had offended him, he did with all his whole Heart forgive them.

* Then once again he required them, that they would keep themselves quiet and still, lest thro their Tumult they might trouble him. For albeit the Spirit were willing and ready, the Flesh was frail and wavering: And that thro their Quietness he should be much more quiet himself. And he desired them all to bear him witness, that he did there in the Faith of Jesus Christ; desiring them likewise to help him with their Prayers, that he might persevere constant in the same unto his Life's end. with 1552. with an obstinate Resolution he made choice rather not to regard Death, than by any Submission to intreat for Life. Indeed it was well known that he had been famous for Service, but therewith it was well known by whose Favour he had been famous.

Sir Tho. Arundel. Sir Thomas Arundel was with some difficulty condemn'd; for his Cause was brought to Trial about seven of the clock in the morning, about noon the Jurors went together, and because they could not agree, they were shut in a House all the residue of that day, and all the night following. The next morning they found him guilty. Unhappy Man! who found the doing of any thing or of nothing dangerous alike.

Sir Miles Partridge. Sir Miles Partridge and Sir Michael Stanhope were condemn'd, as Confociates in the Conspiracy of Somerset. Both reputed indifferently dispos'd to bad or good, yet neither of them of that Temper, as to dare any dangerous Fact; either because they were so indeed, or because their Favour or Alliance with the Dutcheffs of Somerset made them to be of less esteem.

L. Paget. Garter King at Arms was sent to the Lord Paget, Prisoner in the Tower, to take from him the Garter and the George, and to discharge him of that Order. The Pretence of this Dishonour, was because he was said to be no Gentleman of Blood, neither by Father nor by Mother. The Garter and the George were forthwith bestow'd upon the Earl of Warwick, eldest Son to the Duke of Northumberland. About this time the Order was almost wholly alter'd, as by the Statutes thereof then made it appears. (b)

After these Times few Matters of high nature or observable note happen'd in England during King Edward's Life. Of these I will select such as I esteem most fit for History, both as being publick, and as containing matter of some regard, not always observing the just Order of Time, but sometime Coherence or Propinquity of Matter.

Sir Phil. Hobby sent to Flanders, April 26. Sir Philip Hobby was sent to pay 62000 pounds at Antwerp, for Payment of which Sum the King stood to divers Persons engag'd. This done, he went to the Regent then lying at Brussels, to declare unto her certain Grievances of the English Merchants Adventurers; but he receiv'd nothing but fair Promises, which prov'd deceivable. Afterwards Monsieur de Couriers came from the Regent to the King, to understand more particularly the Complaints of the Merchants, and therewith to desire, that her Subjects Ships might safely take harbour in any of the King's Havens. For the first a Note of the Merchants Complaints was deliver'd in writing, but answer was defer'd for want of Instructions, an usual Pretence in like Affairs. Touching the second, answer was made, that the King had given order that Flemish Ships should not be molested in any of his Havens, which appear'd in that they were there always rescu'd from the Pursuit and Chase of the French; but he thought it not fit that more should enter his Havens at once, than he had power to govern. Assuredly the Merchants Adventurers have been often wrong'd and wring'd to the quick, but were never quick and lively in Thanks to those by whose Endeavours they were freed.

The same Merchants exhibited a Bill at the Council-Table against the Merchants of the Stilyard. After answer by those of the Stilyard, and reply by the Adventurers, it was conceiv'd upon view of divers Charters, that the Merchants of the Stilyard were no sufficient Corporation, and that their Number, Names, and Nation could not be known: Also that when they had forfeited their Liberties, King Edward the Fourth restor'd them, upon condition that they should cover no Strangers Goods, which they had not observ'd. And again, whereas at the beginning they ship'd not above 80 Cloths, after that 100, afterwards 1000, after that 6000, at that time 44000 Cloths were ship'd every year in their names, and not above 1100 by all Strangers besides. Wherefore albeit certain Embassadors from Hamburg and Lubeck spake much in their behalf, yet a Decree was made, that they had forfeited their Liberties, and were in the same condition with other Strangers. And albeit they made great Moans afterwards, yet could they not procure this Sentence to be revers'd. (c)

The King keeps Maundy Thursday.

(b) The old Custom of the Kings of England on Maundy Thursday was observed by K. Edward this Year 1552. being now fifteen years old. I find this Order in his Warrant-Book: 'A Warrant to Sir Rafe Sadler [Keeper of the Wardrobe] to deliver to Richard Cecyl and Robert Robotham, Yeomen of the Robes, 15 Gowns of gray marble Cloth, 15 Pair of single-soled Shoes, and 45 Ells of Linen Cloth, to be given to 15 poor Men on Maundy Thursday. J.S.

(c) In this Year, viz. 1552. the King being 15 years of Age, was mightily improved, and had attained to no ordinary Degrees of Knowledge and Learning: For he understood many Languages; as, besides his Mother Tongue English, Latin and Greek, French, Italian and Spanish, and more perhaps: and some of them he spake readily, as the Latin and the French. He was skilful in the Sciences of Logic and Music, understood Natural Philosophy: and as he was a King, he carried himself with the Majesty and Gravity of a King; yet with much Sweetness and Obligingness too. The Fame of him made Hieronymus Cardanus, a learned Italian, eminent for Astrology and Philosophy, come into England this Year to see King Edward; and presented him a Book de Rerum Varietate, which he had dedicated to him. When he was brought to the King, and offered his Book, the King forthwith discoursed learnedly and promptly in Latin with him; asking him first about the Subject of his Book, and then argued with him philosophically and critically concerning Comets, according to the account he had given of them. Which made the Italian amazed: so that afterwards in a Book of his De Genituris, he gave him a very high Elogium; extolling him, from his own Knowledge, to be a Youth of such extraordinary Parts and Expectations, that he seemed to be brought up for a Miracle of Human Nature. This and much more Cardan writ of him: Which our English Historians, our Author, Dr. Heylin, Bp Burnet, in their Histories of the Reformation, and Fox in his Martyrology before them all, make use of. The two last have thought fit to transcribe the very Words of Cardan, and to translate them into English, for the Use of English Readers. One of the Characters of this Prince was, Aderant illi Gratia; which the Bishop translates shortly and more obscure, viz. All the Graces were in him: But Fox, who understood Latin singularly well, could not express it in fewer words than these, That there was in him a towardly Disposition, and Pregnancy apt to all human Literature. What was done as to a new Body of Matter ran in this Tenour only; For the Reformation of the Canon Law; and, For the drawing and ordering of the Ecclesiastical Canon Law; and, For the Establishment of the Ecclesiastical Law. Nor did it take no Effect: For it took Effect so far, that Lawyers, in all 32. to set forth Ecclesiastical Laws, agreeable to the Nature both of the People and of the Religion then establish'd in the Church of England, but it took no effect. For neither the number of the Commissioners being many, nor the Quality of them, being Persons both in great Offices and divers far remote, could afford Meetings for so great a Business. Also the Difference both of Professions and of Ends, did of necessity raise much difference in Judgment.

Order for the King's six Chaplains.

The King had six Chaplains in Ordinary; touching whose Attendance in Court an Order was made, that two should remain with the King by turns, and four should travel in Preaching abroad. The first Year two in Wales, and two in Lincolnshire, the next Year two in the Marshes of Scotland and two in Yorkshire. The third Year two in Devonshire and two in Hampshire. The fourth Year two in Norfolk and Essex, and two in Kent and Sussex, and so thro all the Shires in England; which happily did not only serve for a spiritual End, namely Instruction in Religion, but did also advance a temporal Purpose of peaceable Obedience. For as rude untrain'd Minds are not only easily drawn but inclinable of themselves to Sedition and Tumult, so by Learning and Religion Men are especially both reduc'd and retain'd in civil Quiet.

The Council divides into severmissions,

March 3.

For better Dispatch of Business of divers Natures, the Body of the Council was divided into several Commissions. Some were appointed for hearing those Suits which were usually brought before the whole Table, to send matters of Justice to their proper Courts, to give full denial to such as they should not esteem reasonable, to certify what they thought meet to be granted, and upon Allowance thereof to dispatch the Parties. Others were appointed to consider of Penal Laws and Proclamations in force, and to quicken the Execution of the most Principal. These were directed first to consider what Principal Laws and Proclamations were most needful to be executed. Then to inquire in the Countries how they were disobey'd, and first to punish greatest Offenders, and afterwards to proceed to the rest. Lastly, that they should inquire what other Disorders were either dangerous or offensive in every Shire, and either to punish the Offenders, or else to report their Judgment therein. Others were appointed to attend Occurrences of State at large, with whom the King did sit once every Week to hear matters of greatest moment debated, because in these high Passages nothing was thought to be done truly with Majesty, nothing agreeable to the Dignity of the State, but in the Presence of the King. Generally all the Council agreed that none of them should make Suit to the King for Land or Forfeitures above 20*l.* or for Reversion of Leafes, or any other extraordinary Matter, until the State of his Revenues should be further known.

Besides these Commissions another went forth to oversee and order the King's Revenues, and to cut off superfluous Charges, to oversee all Courts, especially those of new Erection, as the Court of Augmentation, and of first-Fruits that a Book of Laws was drawn up, and compleatly finished, and wanted nothing but the King's Confirmation and Authority. But his Death and some other Causes, unhappily prevented.

But the King had it in his Mind, and in his Heart. I have seen a rough Draught of the King's last Will, drawn up by Secretary Petre, wherein he gave this Order to his Executors, 'That they should diligently travel to cause godly Ecclesiastical Laws to be made and set forth: Such as may be agreeable with the Reformation of Religion received within the Realm. And that done, shall also cause the Canon Laws to be abolished.'

But to relate this remarkable Piece of History in this Reign, from the Council Book and elsewhere. In October 1551. the Council wrote to the Lord Chancellor, to make out Commission to 32 Persons, viz. 8 Bishops. Canterbury, London, Winchester, Ely, Exeter, Gloucester, Bath, and Rochester: 8 Divines, Taylor of Lincoln, Cox, Parker, Latimer, Cook, Martyr, Cheek, Alasco: 8 Civilians, Petre, Cecil, Sir Thomas Smith, Taylor of Hadley, May, Traheron, Lyel, Skinner: 8 common Lawyers, Justice Hales, Justice Bromley, Goodrick, Gosnald, Stamford, Carrel, Lucas, Brook: To authorize them to assemble together, and to resolve upon the Reformation of the Canon Law. Eight of these to rough-hew the Canon Law; the rest to conclude it afterwards.

In November following a new Commission was ordered to eight Persons, for the first drawing and ordering the Canon Law: for that some of those afore appointed were then thought meet by the King to be left out. These eight were, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely, Dr. Cox, and Peter Martyr, Dr. May, and Dr. Taylor, and John Lucas, and Richard Goodrick. But by a new Commission the Bishop of London was put in the room of the Bishop of Ely, Traheron in the room of May, and Gosnald for Goodrick. Again, February 2. next following, there was another Commission to the Archbishop of Canterbury and other Bishops, learned Men, Civilians and Lawyers of the Reform. Realm, for Establishment of the Ecclesiastical Laws, according to the Act of Parliament made the last Sessions. The granting of this Commission King Edward dateth at the 10. of February.

Now because here is mention made of an Act of Parliament for this Commission, I will shew what the Parliament did in this Matter. A Bill pass the Commons in January, 3 Edw. 6. 'that the King may nominate 16 Persons to peruse and make Ecclesiastical Laws. Which Bill was brought up to the House of Lords the 24 of January: And concluded in the House the 3. of the same Month: yet making the Number 22. But to this dissented the Archbishop of Canterbury and ten other Bishops. It is among the printed Acts passed this Session: where the Number is 32. 'Who should have Power and Authority to assemble themselves by his Highness Commandment for three Years to come, for the perfect Collection, Compiling and Ordering of Ecclesiastical Laws. And that such Laws so compiled, gathered and ordered by the said 32, or the more part of them, and set forth and published and declared by the King's Proclamation with the Advice of his Privy-Council, under the Great Seal, shall by virtue of this Act, be only taken, reputed, practised and put in Use, for the King's Ecclesiastical Laws of this Realm.'

Lords

Upon this Act the Commissions afore mentioned were grounded. And at last after great Pains of the Learned Men the whole Work was finished, and a Body of Ecclesiastical Laws drawn up. Which were afterwards printed An. 1571. and again 1640. under the Title of Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, with a large Preface set before it made by J. F. that is, (I suppose) John Fox.

By this it appears how our Author erreth, when he writeth here, that this Matter took no Effect, because of the Number of Commissioners, and divers of them far remote: and others of them having great Offices could not afford Meetings for so great a Business. And also their Difference of Professions and Ends, raising Difference in Judgment. Which is all but his own Conceit and Imagination. For, for the remedying of these supposed Inconveniences, the King issued out a Commission in October 1551. to eight Persons, leaving the Work in their Hands to finish. And the Archbishop of Canterbury being one of these eight, knowing the great Usefulness of the thing, hastened it, and in effect himself completed it, as is shewn in Archbishop Cranmer's Memorials. Yet he had the Assistance of Cheek, Haddon, and Peter Martyr. A great deal of whose Hands I have seen in a rough Copy of this Book. But indeed the true reason why this excellent Book, framed with so much Study and Care and Consultation, had not Authority given to it, to make it a Law, was because the Nation, especially the great Men of it, could not endure Ecclesiastical Discipline. And so Cox, one of the eight Commissioners, wrote about this time to Bullinger at Zurich, in the Course of their Correspondence, We hate those bitter Institutions of Christian Discipline. J.S.

1552. and Tenth, and to provide that the Revenues were answer'd every half Year. Another went forth for Debts owing to the King, and to take account of Payments since the 35th of King Henry the VIII. and in what manner the King had been deceiv'd, either by not accounting or accounting fallily. Another also for taking away needles Bulwarks, by virtue whereof divers were demolish'd upon the Sea-Coasts, in Peace chargeable and little serviceable in War. And farther, for more orderly and speedy Dispatch of Causes, the King deliver'd to his Council these Articles following.

Articles
for dispatch of Causes.

1. That all Suits, Petitions and common Warrants deliver'd to the Privy-Council, be consider'd by them on Mondays in the Afternoon, and answer'd on Saturdays in the Afternoon; and that those Days and no other be assign'd to that Purpose.

2. That such Suits and Petitions as pertain to any Courts of Law, be refer'd to those Courts where properly they are triable, others to be determin'd with Expedition.

3. That in making Warrants for Money it be foreseen, that they be not for such matters as may be dispatch'd by Warrants dormant, lest by such means Accounts should be uncertain.

4. That upon Sundays they attend publick Affairs of the Realm, dispatch Answers to Letters for good Order of the State, and make full Dispatches of all things concluded the Week before; provided that they be present at Common Prayer.

5. That on Sunday Night the Secretaries or one of them deliver to the King a Memorial of such things as are to be debated by the Privy-Council, and he to appoint certain of them to be debated upon several Days, viz. Monday Afternoon, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday before noon.

6. That on Friday afternoon they shall make a Collection of such things as have been done the four Days before, what they have concluded, and what the time suffer'd not to peruse. Also the principal Reasons which mov'd them to conclude of such matters as seem'd doubtful.

7. That on Saturday before noon they present this Collection to the King, and inquire his Pleasure upon all things which they have concluded, and also upon all private Suits.

8. That none of the Privy-Council depart the Court for longer time than two Days, unless eight of the Council remain behind, and unless the King have notice thereof.

9. That they make no Assembly in Council unless they be to the number of four at the least.

10. That if they assemble to the number of four, and under the number of six, then they may reason or examine the Commodities or Inconveniences of Matters propos'd, and make things plain which seem diffus'd at the first opening; and if they agree, then at the next full Assembly of six, a perfect Conclusion thereof shall be made.

11. That if there be under four, and a matter ariseth requiring Expedition, they shall declare it to the King, but not give answer unless it requires extraordinary hast.

12. That if such matters arise as it shall please the King to hear the same debated, warning shall be given that the more may be present.

13. That if such matter arise as cannot be ended without long debating, the Council shall not intermeddle with other Causes until they have concluded the same.

14. That no private Suit be intermeddled with great Affairs, but shall be heard on Mondays only.

15. That when Matters for scantness of time be only discuss'd and not brought to an end, then it shall be noted to what Point the Business is brought, and what have been the principal Reasons, that when it shall be treated again it may the sooner come to Conclusion.

16. That in tedious or difficult matters two or three or more may be appointed to prepare and report the same, that being less cumbersome and diffuse they may the more easily be dispatch'd.

17. That no Warrant for Reward above 40 l. or Business, or Affairs above 100 l. pass but under the King's Signet.

18. That if upon Advertisements or other Occasions, matters of great Importance appear which require hast, such matters shall be consider'd and determin'd notwithstanding those Articles which appoint Business for several Days, so as this Order be not generally or commonly broken.

Assuredly albeit the King declar'd both his Judgment and his Diligence and Care of Affairs of the Realm; yet is there one Rule more (and not by him neglected) for all great Officers, which if it be not sufficient in it self to hold Matters in order, yet are no Rules sufficient without it.

And this is to chuse Persons both for Ability and Integrity well reputed, albeit haply they be not always us'd. For besides that these will be a Rule to themselves, it is a great satisfaction to the People, and keepeth them both from murmuring and curious inquiring into Counsels of State, which is never good, and often dangerous, when they know, or at least suppose Matters to pass under such Mens Judgments.

In these times it was conceiv'd by many, that by erecting of a Mart in England, the Realm would be much enrich'd and made more famous and less obnoxious to other Countries. The time was then esteem'd fit by reason of the Wars between the Emperor and the French King. The Places deem'd most meet were Hull for the East-Countries, and Southampton for the South. London was thought no ill Place, but Southampton was judg'd most convenient for the first Beginning. This Matter detain'd the Lords of the Council in a Deliberation both serious and long, with great Strength and Variety of Reasons on both sides; which because they may give some light to the like Question, which in times ensuing may happily again be set on foot, I will here declare them in the same manner as they were collected by the King.

Against the Mart these Objections were made.

1. That Strangers could have no Access into England by Land, which they had at Antwerp where the Mart then was.

2. That the ill working of English Cloths made them less esteem'd abroad.

3. That the great quantity of English Cloths in Flanders would make them less desir'd from hence.

4. That the Merchants had then establish'd their dwelling Places at Antwerp.

5. That other Nations would forbear their Resort into England for a while upon Commandment of the Emperor.

6. That the denial of the Requests of the Merchants of the Stilyard would be a hindrance to the Mart, if Prevention were not us'd.

7. That the Poverty and Smallness of Southampton would be a great Impediment.

8. That the River Rhine was more commodious for Antwerp than any River was for England.

Hereunto

1552.
To be settled at Southampton.

Hereunto answer was made, that at the time when the Mart should begin at Southampton, the French King and the Almanes would stop Inter-courseto Antwerp by Land, so as nothing should pass that way but in great danger. Again, as Southampton wanteth the Commodity of Access of Merchandize by Land, so it hath the Commodity that there can be no Access of Enemies by Land; and if Wars should be rais'd, then the Navy of England is sufficient to defend them. And further that Traffick that cometh to Antwerp by Land is almost only from the Venetians, who may with greater ease, and less danger transport their Merchandises into England by Sea. That the ill making of Cloths was fit to be redressed by the Parliament, then sitting, and the matter was then reduc'd to some Ripeness, the Upper House having one Bill and the nether House another in good forwardness. Neither were they so ill made but that the Flemmings did easily desire them, offering rather to pay the Imposition of the Emperor than to be without them.

That it were necessary that the Passage of Ships should be stay'd until the Mart should advance to some ripeness, and that Cloths should be bought with the King's Mony, and convey'd to Southampton to be there utter'd at the Mart, which should help the Inconvenience very well. That Merchants never bind themselves to any Mansion, which either to achieve, gain, or to avoid danger they will not readily forsake, for so they remov'd from Bruges to Antwerp only for the English Commodities. And therefore seeing they shall have a good Commodity by coming to Southampton, and be rid of great Fear of Danger both in their Lives and Goods, in forsaking Antwerp, there is little Fear that they will be curious in making the Change.

That the Emperor then was so nearly driven, that neither was he willing to attend the Impeachment of the Mart, neither could he at that time do it. For the Flemmings and the Spaniards under him could more hardly be without the English, than the English without them, and therefore would hardly be brought to forbear that Traffick; and besides, they liv'd then in fear of losing all.

That it were good that for the present the Stillyard Men were generally answer'd, and Trial made whether by any gentle Offer of some part of their Liberties again they might be brought to ship their Wares unto the Mart. The French also might easily be drawn over, having one Traffick at that time but with England. That these two might suffice to begin a Mart.

That the Merchants would make good shift for their Lodging; and it is not the Ability of the Place that maketh a Mart, but the Resort of Merchants, as Spaniards, Almanes, Italians, Flemmings, Venetians, Danes, in exchanging their Commodities one with another. With whom also would concur the Merchants of London, Bristow, and other Places of England. And some of the Cloths which should be carry'd thither at the first, might be taken up with the King's Mony, and there be utter'd.

That Bruges where the Mart was before

standeth not upon the Rhine, neither doth Antwerp where the Mart was then. Frankford doth and may well serve for a Fair for high Almain, but Southampton serveth better for all Countries upon the Sea, for few of these resort to Frankford.

Herewith diverse Reasons were alledg'd for the Mart, and namely, that the Vent of English Cloths would hereby be open in all times of War, that the English Merchants Goods would be out of Danger of Strangers, and without fear of Danger of arresting upon every light Cause. That it would much enrich the Realm, because as a Market enricheth a Town, so doth a Mart enrich a Kingdom. That upon occasion great Sums of Mony might be borrow'd of them who frequent the Mart. That the King might command a great number of Strangers Ships to serve in his Wars. That War being made, all Goods should be in the King's * Danger. That the English should buy all things at the first hand of Strangers: Whereas then the Strangers sold their Wares to the Flemmings, and the Flemmings to the English. That the Towns towards the Sea would hereby be made more Populous, Rich, Beautiful and Strong. That the Merchants instead of Tapistry, Points, Glasses, and other Laces, would then bring in Bullion, and other substantial Merchandizes to have the English Cloth, and Tin. That by this means the English should abate the Power of their Enemies, and not be inforc'd to borrow of Merchants but when they list, and that in no great Quantity or Sum.

The time was then esteem'd most convenient, because the Wars betwixt the French and the Emperor caus'd the Italians, Genoese, Portugals, and Spaniards to forbear their Trade to Antwerp. The Prussians also and other East-Countries, having fourteen Ships against the Emperor, would not be very forward to adventure thither. Again, the French invading Lorain, and menacing Flanders, and the Almanes lying on the River of Rhine, did stop the Course of Merchants out of Italy, as well to Frankford as to Antwerp. And further, the putting of Soldiers into Antwerp mov'd the Merchants to forbear their Traffick, and to look to their Safety. Also the Breach which a late Tempest had made, was like to make the Channel uncertain, and the Haven naught. Lastly, the stop of the Exchange to Lions would make many Flemmings Bankrupts. And because these Nations cannot live without a Vent, these things decaying the Mart of Antwerp and Frankford, they would most willingly upon erecting a free Mart resort to England.

And here the Town of Southampton was esteem'd most fit, because the Spaniards, Britains, Gascoins, Lombards, Genoese, Normans, Italians, the Merchants of the Eastland, the Prussians, Danes, Swedes and Norwegians might indifferently resort thither, and more easy than to Antwerp. (e) And whereas the Flemmings having few Commodities, have allur'd Merchants by their Privileges to settle a Mart among them, much more easily should the English do it, having both Opportunity and Means, as

(e) There were two Sea-Port Towns in England nominated, to fix this Mart in: One in the South Part of the Kingdom, viz. Southampton, for the Convenience of Merchants Strangers on that side; the other on the East, viz. Hull, for the Convenience of Merchants Strangers on the East and Northern Parts. This Eastern Port our Author taketh no Notice of, tho the MS. out of which he transcribeth mentioneth it expressly here; viz. That it is easier for Spaniards, Britons, Vascoins, Lombards, Genoese, Normans and Italians, to come to Southampton than to Antwerp: So for the Merchants of the Eastland, the Prusses, the Danes, Swedes and Norwegians to go [not to Southampton but] to Hull. J. S.

1552. Cloth, Tin, Seacole, Lead, Belmettal, and such other Commodities, as few Christian Countries have the like.

The Means contrived to establish this Mart. Lastly, The Means to establish this Mart were contriv'd to be these. First, That the English Merchants should forbear their resort for a Mart or two beyond the Seas, under pretence of the Impositions there charg'd upon them. Then that Proclamation should be made in divers parts of this Realm where Merchants chiefly resort, That there shall be a free Mart kept at Southampton to begin presently after Whitsonide, and to continue five Weeks, so as it should be no hindrance to St. James's Fair at Bristol, nor to Bartholomew Fair in London. The Privileges of which Mart should be expressed to be these.

That all Men should have free Liberty for Resort and Return, without arresting, except in Cases of Treason, Murder or Felony. That for the time of the Mart all Men should pay but half the Custom due in other Places of the Realm. That during the time no Shipping should be made from any Place between South-Wales and Essex, but only to Southampton. That in Hampshire, Wiltshire, Sussex, Surrey, Kent, Dorsetshire, no Bargain should be made for Wares, during that time, but only at that Mart. That a Court should be erected to punish Offenders with Liberties of good Condition. That some one Commodity, as haply some one kind of Cloth, should be assign'd as proper to the Mart. That some Liberties be given to the Inhabitants of Southampton, and some Monys lent to them, if it might be spared, to begin their Traffick. That Ships should attend the Safeguard of Merchants so well as they could. And that if this Mart took good effect, another might be erected at Hull for the North-East Countries, to begin presently after Sturbridge Fair, so as they might return before the great Ices stopped their Seas. (f)

Thus it was concluded, but the Execution was for a time delay'd, because the Wool Fleet of sixty Sail was lately before departed for Antwerp, and could not possibly be call'd back. But to make the first Preparation, because a Mart could not subsist without Exchange, Liberty was granted to the English Merchants to exchange and rechange Mony for Mony. As upon this Occasion this profitable Purpose was first delay'd, so afterwards it was altogether dash'd, first by the King's Sickness, after by his Death.

The King takes up Mony at Antwerp. Now albeit the King was both deeply in Debt, and had many extraordinary Occasions, yet in regard of the troublesome Times he did forbear to charge his Subjects with such Loans and Impositions, as usually in Peace breed Discontent, and in turbulent Times Disquiet; but he chose rather to deal with the Foulker in the Low-Countrys for Monys upon Loan at a very high Rate. And hereupon Letters were directed from the Lords of the Council to the Foulker at Antwerp, that he had received from the King 63000 Pounds Flemish in February, and 24000 Pounds (g) in April, which amounted to 87000 Pounds Flemish. A fair Sum to be paid in one Year, especially in that busy World when it was necessary for Princes not to be without Mony. Hereupon, and for that they understood that at that time he was well able to forbear Mony, they advised the King to pay to him only 5000 l. of the 45000 l. which then remain'd unpaid, and to continue the rest at the usual yearly Interest of 14 l. for every Hundred, wherewith they desir'd him to retain good patience. Hereto the Foulker answer'd, that as he had found fair Dealings before, so he would rest content to defer payment of 30000 l. so as 20000 l. (h) thereof might be well assur'd to be paid within some convenient time. All this was presently agreed, and no less faithfully perform'd afterwards. And assuredly as God is the Word, and cannot but make good his Word, so a Prince so much loseth of his Dignity as he declineth from his Word.

About this time a Garison-pay of 10000 l. was sent to the Frontiers of Scotland, and the like to Calais, and in the same Year 5000 l. in Ireland. Hereto if we add the King's great Charges in Fortification upon both the Frontiers of Scotland and France, the Particulars whereof I omit as Matters now altogether of no use, it may easily be discern'd that the Hostility with Scotland and France, and the Incivility of Ireland, were a great part of the Cause which held this frugal King thus dived in Debt.

And for another Means of raising of Mony, Commissions went forth for selling Chantry Lands, and Houses, for Payment of the King's Debt, given forth to be 251000 Pounds Sterling at the least (i). Also to enquire of all Church-Goods, either remaining in Cathedral or Parish-Churches, or embezzled away; and namely of Jewels of Gold and Silver, or Silver Crosses, Candlesticks, Censers, Chalices, ready Mony, Copes, and other Vestments: and reserving to every Church one Chalice, and Covering for the Communion-Table; the Residue to be apply'd to the Benefit of the

(g) In the King's Journal published by the Bp of Sarum, the last Sum is 14000 l. which with the 63000 l. maketh 77000 l. together. And so it is set down in the Journal. From which the Author varieth again: and instead of 77000 l. writeth 87000 l. wilfully (as one may guess) the better to cover his former Mistake. So that here was an Error of 10000 l. J. S.

(h) Here our Author mistakes his MS. again. For this 20000 l. was not a Debt to the Foulker, but to another, viz. August. Py: Who also was willing to defer his Debt, (as the Foulker was) so that 20000 l. thereof might be paid him, as soon as might be. As it is in the King's Journal. J. S.

(i) The King's Debts Anno 1551. owing at home and abroad were in all 241179 l. 14 s. 10 d. as they are particularly set down in a Paper of Secretary Cecills: that is, for Monies taken up at Antwerp upon Interest, of the Schetz and the Fuggars, or Foulcars, great Merchants and Bankers there, and for a Diamond that cost 1000 l. the Sum amounting to 132372 l. 10 s. And for Debts within the Realm, that is, to the Household, to the Chamber, to the Wardrobe, to the Stables, to the Admiralty, to the Ordnance, to the Surveyer of the Works, to Calais, to Barwick, to the Revels, to Scilly and Alderney, to Ireland, to Portsmouth, to the Isle of Wight, to the Men of Arms, to the Lieutenant of the Tower; the Sum amounting to 108807 l. 4 s. 10 d. Now the King's Debts the next Year, viz. 1552. advanced, amounting to 251000 l. at the least, as the King noteth in his Journal, May the 10th. Which put him upon selling some of his Chantry Lands, and Tenements. And his Commissioners appointed for this purpose were, Sir John Gates, Sir Robert Bowes, the Chancellor of the Augmentation, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Richard Cotton. J. S.

1552. King. By their Sales and Enquiries, the King's Wants were somewhat relieved. And many Persons, very mean both for Birth and Ability of Mind, and of no less place of Employment, found Means to advance themselves to so great Estate, as they left their Posterity ranged among the Nobility of this Realm.

Church-Purchasers. Of these Church-Purchasers, I have seen many melt to nothing, and the Residue shall be observ'd, either by Riot or by Improvidence to consume.

At the same time for more assured Strength of the Borders upon Scotland, Order was settled that no Man in those Parts should bear two Offices at once. Which not well observ'd in later Years, hath much derogated both from the Dignity and Discharge of Offices, as well in State as in some inferior Places.

Beaumont Master of the Rolls unfaithful, and punished. Another Means for raising Mony was practised no less pleasing to the People, than profitable to the Commonwealth, and that was by enquiring after Offences of Officers in great Place; who as by unjust dealing they became most odious, so by Justice in their Punishments, the Prince acquireth both Love and Applause. And so one Beaumont Master of the Rolls was convicted, that in his Office of Wards he had purchas'd Lands with the King's Mony (k); also that he had lent above 700 l. of the King's Mony, and forborn 11000 l. of the King's Debts for his own Profit. Also that being Master of the Rolls, he dealt corruptly in a Case between the Duke of Suffolk and the Lady Pomes. For he bought the Ladys Tithe, and caused an Indenture to be forged from Charles Brandon the Duke a little before deceased, purposing a Grant of the Lands in question from Duke Charles to the Lady Pomes. Also that he had conceal'd the Felony of his Servant, who having stol'n from him 200 l. he took the Mony to himself again. Hereupon he surrender'd to the King all his Offices, Lands and Goods in satisfaction, as well for the Monys due by him to the King, as of the Fines which his Offences had merited. He was a Man of a dull and heavy Spirit, and therefore the more senslessly devoted in his sensual Avarice.

And so Whaly Receiver of Yorkshire. One Whaly Receiver of Yorkshire, acknowledged how he had lent the King's Mony for Gain, how he ever paid one Year's Revenue with the Arrerages of the Year before; how he had bought the King's Land with the King's Mony; how he had made divers false Accounts;

how upon fall of Mony he borrow'd divers Sums, whereby he gain'd 500 l. at one crying down. For these Misdemeanours he surrender'd his Office, and submitted himself to pay such Fines as the King or his Council should charge upon him.

The Lord Payer Chancellor of the Dutchy, was convicted that he had sold the King's Lands and Timber Woods without Commission; that he had taken great Fines for the King's Lands, and apply'd them to his proper Use; and that he had made Leases in Reversion for more than one and twenty Years. For these Offences he surrender'd his Office, and submitted himself to be fined at the Pleasure of the King. So his Fine was guesse'd at 6000 Pounds, whereof 2000 were remitted upon condition that the other 4000 should be paid within the compass of that Year.

This he endur'd with a manly Patience, as knowing right-well that he held all the Residue of his Estate upon Courtesy of those who hated him at the Heart. It was at the first suspected, and afterwards expected by all, that among other Matters objected against the Lord Payer, the chief, or at least one should have been for contriving to Banquet the Lords at his House, and under pretence thereof to take off their Heads, which was the only Cause for which the Duke of Somerset lost his Head. But because no mention was made thereof, because about the same time the Lord Gray of Wilton, Bannister and Crane, and a little after the Earl of Arundel were freely discharg'd, having been imprisoned for this Conspiracy, the Conceit was taken that the Duke's Head was the only Aim, and that the Residue were us'd but as a Countenance of State to dazzle the People.

Whilst these Matters were in action, the Emperor's Ambassador in England deliver'd Letters to the King from the Regent in the Low-Countries, importing, that whereas the King was bound by a Treaty between the Emperor and the King's Father at Lutrecht (l) in the Year 1542. that if the Low-Countries should

(k) Our Author here errs again from the King's Journal: from which now all along he doth but Copy, with some little Descants of his own. For where he writeth that Beaumont lent above 700 l. of the King's Mony, in the said Journal it is 9000 l.

What this John Beaumonts Debt was to the King, and what Satisfaction and Submission he made, will appear by this Exemplification of two Original Papers.

His Submission and Surrender of his Place to the King ran in these Words.

XXVIII. May Anno 1552.

I John Beaumont do most humbly surrendre and gyff into the handes of our Sovereigne Lord the Kynges Majestie my Office of Master of the Rolls; most humbly beseeching hys Highness to be merciful unto me, and al my Mysdemeynours and Contempts, and in especyall for the Debt which I do owe unto his Grace, to have some dayes upon good Securities; and I am agreed to delyver my Patent to be concellyd unto the L. Chancellor of England, or to any other, who shall pleyse hys Highness to appoint to receive the same. John Beaumont.

He confessed his Offences before the King and Council, and submitted to his Fine, June the 4th. As did the L. Payer June the 6th, and Whaly the next Day. J. S.

1552. he invaded, the King should aid him with 5000 Foot, or 70 (m) Crowns a Day, during four Months; and that this Aid should be perform'd within one Month after Request: For so much as the French King invaded Luxemburg, the Emperor requir'd Aid of the King of England according to the Effect of that Treaty.

The King excuses it.

Hereupon Order was given, that if the Embassador did move for Answer to this Letter, he should be told by two of the Council, that during the King's Progress his Council was dispersed, whose Advice he was desirous to hear. And further, that the King had committed the same Treaty to be perus'd by Men whose Judgments, as he did much respect, so would he expect a time until their Opinions might be heard. And in case that after this the Embassador should again require an Answer, then they should say, that the King having lately wrestled out of most dangerous Wars, wherewith his young Years were overburdened, he hop'd well, that the Emperor would not desire to thrust him into the like again. That he had sworn Amity with the French King, which he could not with his Honour break; and therefore if the Emperor should deem it so meet, he would mediate a Peace as a Friend to both, which he should best effect by forbearing to use Hostility against either. And in case the Embassador should still persevere to urge the Treaty, they were lastly directed to answer, that the King did not hold himself bound by that Treaty, as both made by his Father, and evidently prejudicial to his Realm; for albeit Agreements of Peace are perpetual, and bind the Successor, yet it is not so in Agreements of Society and Confederation. And this the Emperor did right-well understand, for when the King in his last Wars desir'd to enter a new Treaty with the Emperor, he return'd answer that it should not need, for albeit the King were discharg'd by his Father's Death, yet the Emperor was still bound. And again, the Emperor had not for his part perform'd the Treaty, as well in hindring the carriage of Horses, Armour and Munition, which the King had provided for his Wars, as also in neglecting to send Aid when the Low Country of Calais was foraged; and therefore he did not justly demand performance thereof from the King.

I know it hath been often in like sort answer'd, that Treaties dissolve by Death of those who made them; for so the Fidenates held themselves discharg'd of the League which they had made with Romulus after his Death. And the Latines did the like after the Death of Tullus, and likewise after the Death of Ancus. The Etrurians affirm'd the like after the Death of Priscus. And the Sabines after the Death of Servius. And again after that Tarquinius was cast out of State. I know also that the difference is great between a League of Peace, and a League of Society and Confederation, But I will not touch every String of this Question, which Hottoman calleth a Noble Question, and much tossed and debated; partly, because it consisteth of many knotty and thorny Distinctions, wherein approv'd Authors do not well agree; but chiefly because at this time it fell not to be a Difference between the Emperor and the King.

For when the Embassador first came for Answer to this Letter, Mr. Wotton and Mr. Hoby by answer'd according to the first Branch of their Instructions, wherewith he departed well satisfy'd for the present.

And before he call'd for Answer again, one Stukely arriv'd out of France, and declar'd to the Council, how the French King being persuaded that Stukely would never return into England, because he departed without leave upon apprehension of the Duke of Somerset, his Master bewrayed to him, that if he could procure Peace with the Emperor, he intended to besiege Calais, and was in hope to carry the Town by way of the Sand-hills, and that from thence winning the Rice-bank, he might both famish the Town, and beat the Market-place: how he further said, that he intended to land in some Angle of England about Falmouth, because Bulworks there might easily be won, and the People were for the most part Catholics. And further, how at the same time Monsieur de Guise should enter England by the way of Scotland, not only with good Leave, but with Aid and Conduct from the Scots.

Upon this Discovery the King assembled his Council at Windfor, and entred with them into deliberation, whether it were either Safe from him, or to no Disadvantage, to rely so securely, either upon the Strength or Faith of France, as either to refuse or neglect to afford Aid unto the Emperor, and thereby haply incur his Hostility.

Many were of Opinion that the King should condescend to aid the Emperor. First, For that if the King were desirous to hold the Emperor bound, by the Treaty made with the King's Father, he must also be oblig'd thereby; Otherwise it was a lame halting League, and could not possibly go upright. Then for that if the Emperor should not be aided, the House of Burgundy was like to be devour'd by the French, whereby their Greatness might grow dreadful, especially to England. Then for that again the French King had drawn the Turk into Christendom, and therefore was to be resisted as a Common Enemy. And further, in case the Emperor upon Extremity should compose Agreement with the French, the Danger to England would be double. First, Upon Offence taken by the Emperor, then upon the French King's old Disposition, edged by every new Displeasure, wherein the Devotion of the Bishop of Rome would not be wanting. And again, the English Merchants were so ill intreated in the Empire, the Realm was so much engaged in Honour and in Wealth, as some Remedy was to be sought, and none better than by giving Aid. Lastly, The French King's Proceedings were no less doubtful than fearful, not only in regard of Stukely's Report (not altogether to be neglected) but by reason of his breaking and firing divers English Ships, the antient Strength and Fortresses of the Realm.

Others were of Advice, that the Emperor's Demands of Aid should be deny'd. First, For that it would be too chargeable, and almost impossible for the English to perform. Then for that when the Emperor should die, the whole Weight of the War would roll upon the English. And further, the German Protestants would be offended herewith, and conceive 1552. some Doubts of their own Estates. Lastly, There was hope that the Amity with France would not long continue, but amend, and that the Embassadors then lately sent, would repair all Harms done by the French upon English Ships.

Between both these the King stroke a midling Judgment, so to aid the Emperor against the French King, as other Christian Princes should also adjoyn, and that for no other Cause but as a Common Enemy for drawing the Turks Forces upon them.

That hereby as the Cause was common, so would there be more Parties to it: And this also would moderate the Charge of aiding the Emperor according to the Treaty; and whensoever the Emperor should die or break off, it was likely that some of those Princes and Parties should remain so as the King should not stand alone. Moreover, this Friendship would much advance the King's other Affairs in Germany; and finally, it would be honourable to break with the French King upon this Common Quarrel.

Against this Advice of the King, two Objections were made; one, that the Treaty must be entertain'd with so many, that it could not be speedily or secretly concluded: the other, that in case the Purpose should be discover'd and not concluded, the French might be provoked thereby to practise the like Confederation against the English.

All these the King did knit up in this Conclusion; first, that the Treaty should be made only with the Emperor, and by the Emperor's Means with other Princes; secondly, That the Emperor's Acceptance should be well understood before any Treaty were either enter'd or entertain'd against the French.

The King will assist the Emperor against the Turk.

Hereupon Letters were dispatch'd to Mr. Morison the King's Ambassador with the Emperor, whereby he was directed to declare to the Emperor, how the King touch'd with pity at the Invasion of Christian Countrys by the Turks, would willingly joyn with him and other States of the Empire (in case the Emperor could bring it to pass) in some League against the Turks and against their Confederates. But Caution was given that he should not once mention the French King, nor answer any mention made of him, only to say that his Commission extended no further. But if the Emperor would send a Messenger into England, he should happily know more.

Letters to Pickering the King's Ambassador in France concerning Stukely.

Herewith, and because Time beateth out Truth, Letters were sent to Mr. Pickering the King's Ambassador in France, to know whether Stukely had acquainted him with any of those Matters which he had disclosed in England. And with what Familiarity the French King us'd him, or by what other Circumstances he could conceive his Report to be true. Herewith also the Lord Gray was chosen Deputy of Calais, and the Lord Wentworth remov'd, as one whose Youth, and want of Experience, was held unfit to govern that Charge in turbulent Times. On the other side, Sir Nicholas Wentworth was remov'd from being Porter of the Town, by reason of his old Age, but had an hundred Pounds yearly Pension assign'd him for his Life.

The King retrenches his Expenses.

Also by abating needles Expenses, to be the better enabled against Charge; the several Tables for young Lords, for the Masters of Requests, and for Serjeants at Arms, were laid down; and divers extraordinary Allowances were taken away. And further, because the King was to make payment of 48000 l. beyond the Seas, and had but 14000 l. towards the Sum, Three hundred of the chief Merchants Adventurers, granted to him a Loan of 40000 l. for three Months, to be levied from the Cloths which they were then to transport, after the rate of 20 s. for every Cloth. But these Adventurers went not upon any Adventure, because at that shipping 40000 Broad-cloths were by them transported.

Whilst these Matters were in action, two Lawyers arriv'd in England, with direction from the French King, to declare what Matters had been determin'd against the English by the French King's Council, and upon what Reasons, and also what Matters were then depending, and what Care and Diligence was used in those Dispatches. They were much commended by all for their modest Behaviour, and their sweet Eloquence much delighted the King; who again in a short Speech first thanked the French King for his desire to give him Satisfaction, then commended them for well performing their Charge; but for the Substance of their Business he referred them to London, where some of his Council should commune thereof fully with them. Here Mr. Secretary Petre, and Mr. Wotton, and Sir Thomas Smith, laid before them the Grievances of the English Merchants, whose Losses by the French exceeded the Sum of 50000 l. To this the Embassadors gave little Answer, but said, they would make Report thereof at their return into France, affirming, that they had no Commission, but only to declare the Manner and Causes of judicial Proceedings.

Two come from the Fr. King, Sept. 22.

Presently after their return, Mons. Villandry was sent again in Post to the King to declare to him, that albeit Mr. Sydney's and Mr. Winter's Matters went justly against them; yet because they were the King's Servants, and one of them in place near his Person, the French King was content freely to give Mr. Sydney his Ship, and all his Goods in her; and to Mr. Winter his Ship, and all his own Goods. But this Offer the King refused, affirming that he requir'd nothing freely, but expected Justice and Expedition. Villandry shew'd further, that the King his Master was desirous that the Ordinances and Customs of England and France touching Marine Affairs, might be reduc'd into one Form, without any difference between them. Whereto answer was made, that the English Ordinances for Marine Affairs, were no other than the Civil Laws, and certain ancient Additions of the Realm, wherein they could conceive no reason or conveniency of Change, having long continu'd without Reproof. After this Villandry brought forth two Proclamations, not long before publish'd in France, and very advantageable for the English; for the which he had a Letter of Thanks to the King his Master. Lastly, which was indeed the main of his Message, and whereto all other were but Insinuations; he desired that certain Frenchmen taken upon the Coast of England might be released. Hereto he received answer that they were Pirates, and that some of them should by Justice be punished, and some might happily by Clemency be spared. So with this dispatch he returned for France.

Another Messenger from the Fr. King, to settle maritime Affairs, Oct. 8.

Pirates.

But before it was conceiv'd he could be fully at Home, he came again to the English Court, and there declar'd to the King, how the King his Master would deliver four Ships, against which Judgment had been given; and that he would Propositions made by the Fr. Ambassador about Shipping.

1552. would appoint Men of good fort and sufficiency to hear the English Merchants at Paris, and that he would alter his Ordinances for marine Affairs, of which Emendations he then sent a Copy to the King. The King appointed his Secretaries to consider thereof. And after some passages of time, Villandry had his answer; That the King intended not by receiving four Ships freely to prejudice his Right in the rest; That the appointing of an inferior Council to hear Merchants at Paris, after former tedious Suits in a higher Court, he thought would be but dilatory, and so to little purpose, because the inferior Council would never undo that (albeit good cause should appear) which had been judg'd by a higher Council; That the new Ordinances he liked no better than he did the old, and therefore desir'd no other than the Customs which of late times had been us'd in France, and then continu'd in force between England and the Low Countries. Lastly, he desir'd no more Words, but Deeds.

Letters from Pickering, Octob. 7. And now were Letters return'd from Mr. Pickering out of France; whereby he advertis'd the King, how Stukely never discover'd any of those Speeches to him, which since he had charg'd upon the French King: And further, that he never was either in credit or conversant with the French King or with the Constable, nor ever resorted unto them except once, when he was Interpreter between the Constable and certain English Pioners. Wherefore as it was very like, so did he verily believe, that as the French King was always close and reserv'd amongst his best known Friends, so would he not be open and uncircumspect, to impart a matter of such import to a mere Stranger, and in a most unseasonable time.

Stukely committed to the Tower. Hereupon Stukely was examin'd again, and then finding it dangerous alike to confess a Truth or stand to a Lye, he became more unconstant and variable than he was before: wherefore he was committed to the Tower, and notice was given to the French King's Embassador of all those Proceedings, to the intent that he might acquaint his Master with them. Letters were also sent to the King's Embassador in France, directing him to advertise the French King of all these matters, and that for two special Ends; one to manifest the King's Confidence in his Amity with France, the other to bring the French King into suspicion against all English Fugitives who resorted daily to his Court. And so because no better Person was the Author, incredible Fables were not believ'd. But hereupon some began to discourse that the Accusations against the Duke of Somerset were no less improbable, and upon the credit of no better Persons, and therefore might haply be no less untrue: But the difference is great between both the Persons, and the Facts of a Sovereign Prince and of a Subject.

What the Fr. K. protested to the English Embassador hereupon. And now when the French King understood as well the Imputation which Stukely had rais'd, as his Imprisonment; First, he deeply protested his Innocence in his particular, and his general sincere meaning for preserving Amity with England: Then he much blam'd Stukely's Villany, and no less thank'd the King as well for that he had not afforded a credulous ear to such mischievous Devices, wherein the tender Touch of his Estate might haply have excus'd his Error, as for his Princely manner in acquainting him therewith.

On the other side when Mr. Morison the King's Embassador with the Emperor, had open'd the Matters given him in charge, touching a League against the Turk, and against his Confederates; the Emperor much thank'd the King for his gentle Offer, and promis'd to procure the Regent to send over some Persons of credit to understand the King's further meaning. Soon after Mr. Tho. Gresham came from Antwerp into England, and declar'd to the Council, how Monfieur Longie the Emperor's Treasurer in Flanders was sent to him from the Regent with a Packet of Letters, which the Burgundians had intercepted in Bullonois, sent, as it was said, from the Dowager of Scotland; wherein she set forth how she had imprison'd George Paris an Irish Man, because she understood that upon Grant of his Pardon he had a meaning to come into England, and how she had sent Oconner's Son into Ireland to give encouragement to the Irish Lords. Also he shew'd Instructions given about four years before upon the Fall of the Admiral of France, to a Gentleman then coming from England, that if any were in England of the Admiral's Faction, he should do his best to excite a Trouble.

The Deputy of Ireland was at that time ready to transport into England: But upon this Advertisement Sir Henry Knowles was sent in post to stay him there, yet with caution that he should pretend to stay upon his own Occasions, and thereupon desir'd his Departure from week to week, lest the true reason should be discern'd. Letters of Thanks were also sent to the Regent for this gentle Over-ture. And the Messenger was directed to use pleasing Words in the Delivery of the Letter, and to wish a further Amity between the two States: And further to acquaint her with the French King's Practice in waging 5000 Scottish Footmen, and 500 Horsemen, and how he took up 100000 l. by Exchange at Lubeck; whereby the Conjecture was evident that he had some meaning against the Emperor in the Spring then next following. Doubtless the Advertisements of neighbour Princes are always much to be regarded; for that they receive Intelligence from better Authors and surer Grounds than Persons of inferior note and fort.

About this time one of the Earl of Tyrone's Men was committed to the Tower, for making an untrue Complaint against the Deputy and Council of Ireland, and for bruiting abroad how the Duke of Northumberland and the Earl of Pembroke were fallen into quarrel, and one of them against the other in the field.

In April, in the sixth Year of the Reign of the King, he fell sick of the Measles, whereof in short time he well recover'd; afterwards he sickned of the Small-pox, which breaking kindly from him, was thought would prove a means to cleanse his Body from such unhealthful Humours as commonly occasion long Sicknes or Death; and hereof he also so perfectly recover'd, that in the Summer next following he rode his Progress with greater Magnificence than ever before. For whether it were to maintain his Majesty, or to manifest the Fear which had been formerly impress'd, he carry'd with him a Band of 320 Men, which made up his whole Train above the number of 4000 Horse. But because this Multitude was burdensome to the Country thro which 1552. which he pass'd, which did afford little Meadow or Pasture, because also it seem'd to bewray Distrust, as if the King should think that he rather march'd among dangerous Rebels, than took his Pleasure among faithful and quiet dispos'd Subjects, about the midst of his Progress the greatest part was discharged. For furnishing the Charge of this Progress 500 pound weight of Gold was coin'd, with 1500 l. sterling.

Soon after the King did complain of a continual Infirmity of Body; yet rather as an Indisposition in Health, than any set Sickness.

Amos from Child born Aug. 3. And about that time certain Prodigies were seen, either as Messengers or Signs of some imminent and eminent Evil. At Middleton, eleven miles from Oxford, a Woman brought forth a Female Child, which had two Bodies from the Navel upward; so united at the Navel, as when they were laid in length, the one stretch'd directly opposite to the other; from the Navel downward it was but one; it lived weakly eighteen days, and then both Bodies died together. Upon Birth of such Monsters, the Grecians, and after them the Romans, did use divers sorts of Expiations, and to go about their principal Cities with many solemn Ceremonies and Sacrifices; supposing hereby that Wrath from Heaven was menac'd against them. At Quinborough three great Dolphins were taken, and a few days following at Blackwall six; which were brought to London, the least in bigness exceeding any Horse. After this three great Fishes were taken at Gravesend, call'd Whirlpools, and drawn upon the King's Bridg at Westminster. These Accidents the more rarely they happen, the more ominous are they commonly esteem'd; either because they are so indeed, or because they are never observ'd but when sad Events do ensue.

A. 1553. In January, about the beginning of the 7th Year of the King's Reign, his Sickness did more apparently shew it self, especially by the Symptom of a tough strong straining Cough. All the Medicines and Diet which could be prescrib'd, together with the helps both of his young Age, and of the rising time of the Year, were so far either from curing or abating his Grief, that it daily increas'd by dangerous degrees; and it was not only a Violence of the Cough that did infect him, but therewith a Weakness and Faintness of Spirit, which shew'd plainly that his vital Parts were most strongly and strangely assaulted. And the talk hereof among the People was so much the more, because thro an Opinion obscurely rais'd, but running as most absurd, that his Sickness grew by a slow-working Poison. Upon this cause it happen'd, 1553. that a Parliament beginning upon the first day of March, was upon the last of the same Month dissolv'd. (n)

And now the Danger of the King's Sickness was much lamented, not only by his own People, but by Strangers abroad; because his Courtesy and Wisdom had begot to him such Love, that he was no less honour'd by those who heard of him, than of those who convers'd with him. For he was famous in all places by reason of his Foresight and Judgment in Affairs, and did so well temper the Greatness of his Estate both with Modesty and with Gravity, that he avoided Envy by the one, and Contempt by the other. Some compar'd him with the greatest Persons that had been, both for War and Peace, because in the like pitch of Years none of them attain'd to the like Perfections. Haply he did not appear in Soldiery so great, but that was because he was not so rash; being also drawn back from his Pursuits abroad by domestical Disorders and Divisions, both amongst the People and Nobility of his Realm, by reason whereof he scarce seem'd well settled in his Chair of Estate, and yet his Fortunes were always victorious.

It happen'd during his Sickness, that Dr. Ridley Bishop of London preach'd before him, and in his Sermon much commended Works of Charity, which as they were a Duty for all Men to perform, so most especially for Men in most especial Dignity and Place, as well in regard of their large Abilities, as for that they were much oblig'd to give Examples of Goodness to others. The same day after dinner the King sent for him privately into the Gallery at Whitehall, caus'd him to sit in a Chair by him, would not permit him to remain uncover'd; and then after courteous Thanks, he reported all the principal Points of his Sermon, and further added: 'I took my self to be especially touch'd by your Speech, as well in regard of the Abilities which God hath given me, as in regard of the Example which from me he will require; for as in the Kingdom I am next under God, so must I most nearly approach to him in Goodness and in Mercy. For as our Miseries stand most in need from him, so are we the greatest Debtors: Debtors to all that are miserable, and shall be the greatest Accountants of our Dispensation therein. And therefore, my Lord, as you have given me (I thank you) this general Exhortation, so direct me, I intreat you, by what particular Actions I may this way best discharge my Duty.'

(n) The King being now in a sickly Condition, the Lords were called together at Whitehall, and sat there, in the great Chamber on the King's side, and he under a Cloth of Estate with them: where Bp Goodrich Lord Chancellor made a Speech, shewing the Reasons of the calling of the Parliament. But first the Parliament was opened by a Sermon preach'd at Whitehall by Ridley L. Bishop of London. After which the King with divers Lords received the Communion. And this being ended, the King and Lords repaired to the said great Chamber. The chief Business of this Parliament was to give the King Money to pay his Debts, and maintain his State. Which was granted both by the Laity and the Clergy out of their respective Revenues. In this Parliament was an Act made for the Dissolution of the Bishopric of Durham; upon the consideration that the Bishopric was so large and extensive into divers Shires; and so could not be sufficiently taken care of by one Bishop: and those Parts so wild and barbarous for want of good Preaching, and good Learning; and the King being desirous to have God's Holy Word better known there. Therefore as the old Bishopric was dissolved, so by the said Act a new Bishopric of Durham was to be erected, and also one other Bishopric at Newcastle; and a Dean and Chapter also there. That of Durham to be endowed with 2000 Mark a year, and that of Newcastle with 1000 Mark a year: And Power was granted, that the King might erect the same by his Letters Patents. But there were no Bishops presented to either of these two new-erected Bishoprics, while this King lived. Only Ridley Bp of London, born in the Diocess, was nominated for Durham, but never removed from London, till he was deposed from it under Q. Mary. And all that was done after this Act, was that the Temporalties of the Bishopric, a County Palatine, was given to the Duke of Northumberland. But under Q. Mary this Act was repealed, and the Bishopric new-erected, and the old Bishop Tunstall (who had been deposed) restored. J. S.

The Bishop
recommends the Poor of London.

The Bishop partly astonish'd, and partly overjoy'd with these Speeches, was struck into a sad silence for a time; at last Tears and Words breaking forth together, he declar'd to the King, that as he little expected such a Question, so was he not furnish'd with a present Answer, for this matter had a great Mixture of a Civil Government, wherein he conceiv'd that the Citizens of London had best Experience, as overburden'd with multitudes of Poor, not only of their own, but from all parts of the Realm besides. And therefore as they best know both the Quality of such People, and the Inconveniences which they occasion, so could they best advise what Remedies were fittest: Wherefore, if the King were pleas'd to afford his Letters to that effect, he would confer with them, and in very short time return with answer. The King forthwith caus'd his Letters to be written, and would not suffer the Bishop to depart until he had firm'd them with his Hand and Signet, and enjoin'd the Bishop to be the Messenger, imposing great charge for Expedition. The Bishop hasten'd with his Letters to the Lord Mayor, who presently assembled certain Aldermen, and four and twenty Commissioners, by whose Advice the Poor were cast into three Companies and Sorts; some were Poor by Impotency of Nature, as young fatherless Children, old decrepit Persons, Idiots, Cripples, and such like; others are poor by Faculty, as wounded Soldiers, diseas'd and sick Persons, and the like; the third sort are the Poor by Idleness or Unthriftiness, as riotous Spenders, Vagabonds, Loiterers, leud Strumpets and their Companions: that the first of these were to be educated and maintain'd, the second to be cur'd and reliev'd, and the third to be chastis'd and reduc'd to good order.

The King
gives the City the Gray Friars Church, St. Bartholomew's,
&c. for charitable Uses.

When this was presented to the King, he gave to the City for Education and Maintenance of the first sort of Poor, the Gray Friars Church (a) near Newgate-Market, with all the Revenues thereto belonging; for Cure and Relief of the second sort, he gave St. Bartholomew's near Smithfield; for Correction of the third, he appointed his House at Bridewell, the antient Mansion of many English Kings, and which not long before had been repair'd and beautify'd by Henry the Eighth, for the Entertainment of the Great Emperor Charles the Fifth. For Increase of Maintenance of their Places, together with the new re-edify'd Hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, the King gave seven hundred and fifty Marks yearly out of the Rents of the Hospital of St. John Baptist, or the Savoy, with all the Bedding and Furniture at that time belonging to that place. And when the Charter of this Gift was presented unto him with a blank Space for Lands to be afterwards receiv'd in Mortmain, to a yearly Value without further licence, the King presently with his own Hand fill'd up the void Space with these words, four thousand Marks by year. This done, with reverend Gesture and Speech he thank'd God for prolonging his Life to finish that Business: And so he was the first Founder of those three pious Works, which by many Additions are now grown to be the most absolute and famous of that kind in Europe.

The King's Sickness daily increas'd, and so did the Duke of Northumberland's Diligence about him; for he was little absent from the King, and had always some well assur'd espie how the state of his Health chang'd every hour; and the more joyful he was at the heart, the more sorrowful appearance did he outwardly make. Whether any tokens of Poison did appear, Reports are various; certainly his Physicians discern'd an invincible Malignity in his Disease: and the Suspicion did the more increase, for that the Complaint being chiefly from the Lights, a Part, as of no quick Sense, so no Seat for any sharp Disease, yet his Sickness toward the end grew highly extreme. But the Duke regarded not much the muttering Multitude, knowing right well that Rumours grow stale and vanish with time; and yet somewhat either to abate or delay them for the present, he caus'd Speeches to be spread abroad, that the King was well recover'd in Health, which was readily believ'd, as most desir'd to be true.

Hereupon all Persons express'd Joy in their Countenance and Speech, which they enlarg'd by telling the News to others whom they in- countred, who haply had heard it often before; and as the Report increas'd, so there- with increas'd also the Joy. Thus whilst every Man believ'd, and no Man knew, it was made more credible by Religious Persons, who openly in Churches gave publick Thanks for the King's Recovery.

But when the Speech of his Danger was again reviv'd, and as in News it happeneth, the more stop'd, the more increas'd to the worse, then as if the second time he had been lost, the People did immoderately break forth into Passions, complaining, that for this cause his two Uncles had been taken away, for this cause the most faithful of his Nobility and of his Council were disgrac'd and remov'd from Court; this was the reason that such were plac'd next his Person, who were most assuredly dispos'd either to commit or permit any Mischief; that then it did appear, that it was not vainly conjectur'd some years before by Men of Judgment and Foresight, that after Somerfet's Death the King should not long enjoy his Life. To qualify these and some broader Speeches, it was thought convenient that the King sometimes should shew himself abroad, albeit little either with his Pleasure or for his Health, yet a thing which in long consuming Sicknesses, even to the last Period of Life, Men are often able to do.

Whilst the King remain'd thus grievously sick, divers notable Marriages were solemniz'd at once in Durham Place. The Lord Guildford, fourth Son to the Duke of Northumberland, marry'd Lady Jane, the Duke of Suffolk's eldest Daughter, by Frances Daughter to Mary second Sister to King Henry the Eighth; also the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son marry'd the Lady

(a) Yet it must be remembred, that K. Henry VIII. also gave by Patent, Ann. 1546. the Gray Friars Church to the City for the Relief of the Poor. And in the beginning of January that year the Bishop of Rochester declared the same openly at St. Paul's. As also the Hospital of St. Bartholomew's was likewise at the same time granted to the City by the same King. Which Gifts were to the value of 500 Mark. In memory whereof the Statue of Henry VIII. is set up on that part of St. Bartholomew's Hospital over the Gate that fronteth Smithfield. J. S.

Katherine,

1553. Katherine, the Duke of Suffolk's second Daughter by the said Lady Frances, who then was living; and Martin Kayes, Gentleman Porter, marry'd Mary the third Daughter of the Duke of Suffolk, by the said Lady Frances: Lastly, the Lord Hastings, Son to the Earl of Huntington, took to Wife Katherine youngest Daughter to the Duke of Northumberland.

The People express their Hatred against the Duke of Northumberland. Hereupon the common People, upon a disposition to interpret all Northumberland's Actions to the worst, left nothing unspoken which might serve to stir their Hatred against the Duke, or Pity towards the King: But the Duke was nothing mov'd hereat; for being equally obstinate both in Purpose and Desire, and mounting his Hopes above the pitch of Reason, he resolv'd then to dissemble no longer, but began openly to play his game.

For albeit the Lady Jane, marry'd to his fourth Son, had not right to the Succession of the Crown, for that she was excluded, first, by the two Ladies Mary and Elizabeth, Daughters of King Henry the Eighth, next by the Issue of Lady Margaret marry'd into Scotland, eldest Sister to K. Henry the Eighth; lastly, by her own Mother, the Lady Frances, who then was living: yet Northumberland, sottishly mad with over-great Fortune, procur'd the King by his Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, to appoint the Lady Jane to succeed him in the Inheritance of the Crown. In this Contrivance he us'd the Advice of two especially, the Lord Chief Justice Mountague, who drew the Letters Patents, and Secretary Cecil. (p) These furnish'd the Patent with divers Reasons, whereof some were of Law, and some of Policy in State. The Pretensions of Law were these, that albeit the Crown of the Realm, by an Act of the five and thirtieth of King Henry the Eighth, was in default of Issue of his Body, and of the Body of Edward his Son lawfully begotten, limited to remain to the Lady Mary his eldest Daughter, and to the Heirs of her Body lawfully begotten; and in default of such Issue, the Remainder thereof to the Lady Elizabeth his second Daughter, and to the Heirs of her Body lawfully begotten, under such Conditions as should be limited by the said King under his Letters Patents under the Great Seal, or by his last Will in writing, sign'd with his Hand: yet because the said Limitations were made to Persons illegitimate, both the Marriages between King Henry the Eighth and their several Mothers being undone by Sentences of Divorce, and the several Divorcements ratify'd by Authority of Parliament in the eight and thirtieth Year of King Henry the Eighth, which Act remain'd then in force, both the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth were thereby disabled to claim the Crown, or any Honours or Hereditaments, as Heirs to King Edward the Sixth or any other Person.

And again, the said two Ladies, Mary and Elizabeth, being but of the half-blood to King Edward, albeit they had been born in lawful Matrimony, yet by the antient Laws of the Realm they were not inheritable to him by

(p) Herein our Author grossly wrongeth the Memories of these two Gentlemen, Mountague and Cecil; out of what Design I know not, nor as little do I know whence he had it. For neither Stow nor Sanders mention it.

For first, as for Cecil, he was so far from assisting in this matter, either by Advice, or devising Reasons for the Patent, that he oppos'd it as much as he could (and so Camden expressly saith) tho he signed with the rest. Moreover, I have seen an Apology of Cecil's own drawing about his Concern herein. There he shew'd, 'How he refused to subscribe the Book, when none of the Council did refuse; whereby he incurred the Indignation of the Duke of Northumberland. That he refused to make a Proclamation (for the proclaiming Queen Jane) and turned the Labour to Throng-morton. That he refused the writing of a Letter to send abroad in the Realm for the shewing Queen Jane's Title. That this he refused because he would not write Queen Mary BASTARD. And the Duke wrote it himself, 'That he avoided being present at the drawing up of the Proclamation for the publishing of Queen Jane's Title, tho he were especially appointed thereunto. That he avoided answering the Queen's Letters, which she wrote from Kenninghall to the Council, requiring their Obedience. That he avoided likewise writing all public Letters to the Realm, upon Jane's Access to the Crown. Still further, that he practis'd with the L. Treasurer to win the L. Privy Seal, that he might by the L. Russell's means, cause Windsor Castle to serve the Queen; and they two to levy the West Parts for the Queen's Service. That he opened himself to the L. Arundel, whom he found thereto disposed. That he did the like to the L. Darcy. That he purpos'd to have stolen down to the Queen's Highness, and Gajnahd offer'd to lead him thither, because he knew not the way. And that he had his Hories ready at Lambeth for that purpose. That when he heard of this Purpose first secretly [viz. of making the Lady Jane Queen] he disliked it, and fearing the Event, convey'd away his Lands, his Goods, and his Leases. All these things considered, who can think it true, that he furnish'd the Patent of Settlement with Arguments taken from Law and Policy? The most he did, was to sign with the rest. Which also he did as a Witness to King Edward's Deed, and not as an Abettor or Counsellor.

This for Cecil. Then for Sir Edward Mountague, L. Chief Justice, how he stood affected, and what he did in this Affair, may be seen by an original Paper, drawn up by that Judges own hand, which his Great Grandchild Edward Lord Mountagu of Boughton communicated unto Dr. Tho. Fuller. The Sum of which was, That he and the rest of the Judges told the King, that the Bill of Articles shew'd to them, according to which they should frame a Book for the Settlement of the Crown in the Lady Jane, was directly against the Act of Succession. Which was an Act of Parliament, and would be taken away by no such Device. But when it was the King's absolute Will, that a Book should be made according to those Articles, Mountagu took them. And the next day he and the rest concluded to do nothing, but to report to the Lords, that not only the executing this Device was Treason after the King's Death, but the making of this Device was presently Treason. And so they did report to the Council. And that upon it the Duke of Northumberland was in a great fury, and called Sir Edward Traitor. And so he departed home without doing any thing more. Afterwards Mountagu received another Letter from the Council to come to the Court. He and some others of the Judges and Lawyers being come, they were brought to the King; who demanding why they had not made the Book, Mountagu told the King the reason. And moreover, that if they had, it were of no effect nor force, but utterly void, when the King should decease. And that the Statute of Succession could not be taken away, but by the same Authority that made it: and that was a Parliament. And advis'd the King that all might be referred to a Parliament. The King said, they should make it, and afterward it should be ratified by Parliament. That divers of the Lords then said, that if he and the rest refused now, they were Traitors. So that, what with the Duke's Anger the day before, and the King's and other Lords now, he was in the greatest fear that ever he was in in his Life. And so at last, being an old Man, and for safety of his Life, he told the King, that he had served his Father and his Highness during his Life, and loth he would be to disobey his Commandment; and he would for his own part obey it, so that he had his Highness's Licence and Commission under the Great Seal for the doing of it; and when done, to have a general Pardon: both which were granted him. And he and the rest made the Device, as he writ, with sorrowful Hearts and weeping Eyes. And lastly, after he had done this, to shew how little he approv'd of what he was forced to do, he sent his Son to serve and assist Q. Mary with twenty men, with other Gentlemen of Buckinghamshire. By what is afore-written, it sufficiently appears, our Author hath wronged the Memory of these two Worthy Men, and wronged Posterity also, in imposing upon their Belief Matters of Falshood. J. S.

1553. Descent, and had no Capacity in any degree to receive any Inheritance from him.

And in Policy.

The Reasons or Pretexes of Necessity to the State were these: In case the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth should enjoy the Crown, they would assuredly join in Marriage with some Stranger, who would reduce this noble and free Realm into the Servitude of the Bishop of Rome, and thereby bring in foreign Customs and Laws, abolishing those whereupon the Rights of all native Subjects depend. And haply the whole Body of the Realm should hereby be annex'd as a Member to some other greater Kingdom, to the utter Subversion of the antient Dignity and Estate thereof. The People were not unlike to elect a King of some private Stock, a popular and seditious Man, peradventure one who to countenance his own Unworthiness and Obsequy, would little regard what Contumely he cast upon the falling Family of the Kings before him. Wherefore he held it the most provident Advice, that the King by his Authority should design not only his next Successor, but others also in Reversion, that the Crown might not be subject to rising, but remain to those whom he lov'd, and who humour'd him best.

Lady Jane's Character.

These Reasons did more easily sink into the King's Judgment, partly by means of the great Affection which he bare to the Religion that he had establish'd, of the Change whereof he was assuredly perswaded, in case the Lady Mary his Sister should succeed; and partly by reason of the entire Love he bare to his Cousin the Lady Jane, a Woman of most rare and incomparable Perfections: for besides her excellent Beauty adorn'd with all variety of Virtues, as a clear Sky with Stars, as a princely Diadem with Jewels, she was most dear to the King in regard both of her Religion and of her Education in the Knowledge of the liberal Sciences, and Skill in Languages; for in Theology, in Philosophy, in all liberal Arts, in the Latin and Greek Tongues, and in the vulgar Languages of divers near Nations, she far exceeded all of her Sex, and any of her Years, unless haply the King himself.

The Import of the King's Letters Patents for her to succeed him.

Hereupon the King consented that Letters Patents should be drawn, importing that in case the King should die without Issue of his Body lawfully begotten, then the Imperial Crown of England and Ireland, with his Title to the Crown of France, and all things to them belonging, should remain and come to the eldest Son of the Lady Frances, Daughter to the Lady Mary, youngest Sister to Henry the Eighth, in case such Issue should be born into the World during the Life of King Edward, and after to the Heirs Male of the said

Issue, and in like sort from Son to Son of the said Lady Frances lawfully begotten, as they should be in priority of Birth, and born during the King's Life; and in default of such Sons, and of Heirs Male of every such Son lawfully begotten, that then the said Crown and all the Premises should remain and come to the Lady Jane, eldest Daughter to the said Lady Frances, and the Heirs Male of her lawfully begotten; and for default of such Issue, the said Crown to remain to the Lady Katherine, second Daughter to the said Lady Frances, with divers other Remainders, over which as they were vainly appointed, so are they needful to be repeated.

These Letters were dated the one and twentieth of June, in the seventh Year of King Edward's Reign, and by him sign'd when he was in great debility of Body, and afterwards pass'd under the Great Seal of England. And albeit the coarse Contrivance was almost visible; first, for that such provision was made for the Issue Male of the said Lady Frances, who neither at that time had any, and was commonly reputed to be past Years of Child-bearing; secondly, for that in case that beyond the ordinary Course of Nature she should conceive, the hope was desperate, that the King should live until the Birth; lastly, for that her Children born, and to be born, were so carefully and orderly remember'd, and no mention made of her self, from whom then Title must be deriv'd: Yet these Letters were subscrib'd by all the Privy Counsellors, the greatest part both of number and power of the Nobility of the Realm, the Bishops, the King's learned Counsel, and all the Judges at the Common Law, except only Sir James Hales, (q) one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, a Man well observ'd to be both religious and upright, who worthily refus'd to subscribe, and was unworthily requited by Queen Mary afterwards. (r)

It is very like that some of these were guided with respect of their particular Interest, for that they were possess'd of divers Lands which once pertain'd to Monasteries, Chantries, and other Religious Houses not long before dissolv'd. Of these they held themselves in some danger to lose, in case Religion should change to the antient Form, which by Succession of Q. Mary they did evidently foresee.

Others were drawn partly by Fear, and partly by Obligation to the Duke of Northumberland, who then was exceeding potent, and almost absolute in Government of the State, and suppos'd able to make any Title good, either by his Authority, or by his Sword.

Now whether a King may lawfully dispose by his Will, or otherwise, of a Kingdom that

(q) It was very long and with great ado, before two others would be brought to subscribe, who ought therefore to be mentioned; viz. Cranmer the Archbishop, and Secretary Cecil: The former over-perswaded by the earnest Solicitation of the King, and the latter forced by Threatning and Terror. J. S.

How Judge Hales was serv'd.

(r) The matter of this unworthy Requit of Judge Hales was this. Soon after the Queen's Access to the Throne, at a Quarter Sessions (not at a Circuit, as the Bp of Sarum mistakes in his History of the Reformation) he declared, as he ought to do, that the Laws of King Edward were as yet in force and unrepealed: and therefore admonish'd the Justices of the Peace that they should see them duly performed, and not transgressed, as many People tumultuously did. Upon this he was informed against, and first committed to the King's Bench (not the Marshalsea, as the said Bishop relates it) and thence toss'd to the Counter, and thence to the Fleet. In the mean time partly dealt withal to turn his Religion, being a conscientious Protestant, and partly terrified with Threatnings if he did not, he at length made a Compliance upon Bp Day's Communication with him. But the next day, being exceedingly disturbed in his Mind for what he had done, wounded himself with a Penknife. Upon his Submission at last he recovered his Liberty, but never recovered himself: and being at his House in Kent, one day took an opportunity to go forth, and drowned himself. J. S.

hath been long carry'd in one Form of Succession, contrary to that antient Form, I have largely discours'd in my History of the three Norman Kings, about the beginning of the Reign of King William the Second: But certain it is, that when Kingdoms have custo-mably been carry'd by Right of Succession, according to Proximity of Blood, the Violation of which course hath always been either very vain or with dangerous consequence, it hath always been like the breaking of a Band which holdeth a Sheaf of Arrows together, like a Rupture in Banks which bindeth a River within its proper Channel, or like a casting down of a Pale wherewith Deer or other Beasts are inclos'd. It was never done, but either no Effect ensu'd, or bloody Disorders, or haply both: and the Duke, by piercing his ambitious Purposes with his unjust Policy, did no otherwise than often doth a foolish greedy Gamester, who by stealing a Card to win a Stake, forfeits
the whole rest.

The King's Disease
grows violent.

But having thus in his own opinion assur'd his own Devices, nothing remain'd but that the King should not longer survive, left haply his sickly Judgment might be over-ru'd by sounder Advice. His Disease was violent, but his Physicians conceiv'd some hope of Recovery, in case he might be remov'd to change of healthful Air, which in Infirmities of the vital Parts, the Seat of his Sickness, is of greatest moment for the Cure.

A Gentlewoman undertakes
the King's Cure.

But hereto the Council would not consent:
so he continu'd without either any sensible mending or impairing for a time. At the last a Gentlewoman, unworthy to be named, but accounted to be a School-mistress for the purpose, offer'd her Service assuredly to cure him, in case he were committed wholly to her hand. Hereto the Physicians would in no case afford their Advice, because as she could give no reason either of the Nature of the Disease or of the Part afflicted, so she would not declare the Means whereby she intended to work the Cure.

His Physicians are discharg'd.

After some shew of Deliberation among the Council, it was resolv'd that the Physicians should be discharg'd, and the Cure committed to her alone. The apparent Defect both of her Judgment and Experience, join'd to the Weightiness of the Adventure, caus'd many to marvel, and some deeply to suspect that she was but an Instrument of Mischief. This Surmise was strongly confirm'd within a very short time ensuing, when the King did fall into desperate Extremities; his vital Parts were mortally stuff'd, which brought him to a difficulty of Speech and of Breath; his Legs swell'd, his Pulse fail'd, his Skin chang'd colour, and many other horrid Symptoms appear'd.

Then were the Physicians call'd again, who espying him in that fearful Estate, departed from him with a sad silence, leaving him to the miserable Mercy of near-approaching Death. Some of these whisper'd among their private Friends, that they were call'd for faulcon only, but neither their Advice nor Appliances were any deal regarded, but the King had been ill dealt with more than once; and that when by the Benefit both of his Youth and of careful Means there was fair hope of his Recovery, he was again more strongly overlaid.

Yet as Cruelty and Wrong never stand secure, so the Duke thought one thing more expedient for alluring his Designs, and that was to draw the Lady Mary wholly into his power.
To this purpose Letters were directed to her in the King's Name from the Council, willing her forthwith to resort to the King, as well to be a Comfort to him in his Sickness,
as to see all matters well order'd about him.

The Lady suspecting no lurking Mischief, ad-dress'd her self with all speed to the Journey, expressing great joy that either her Company or her Service should be esteem'd needful to the King; but as she was upon the way, and within half a day's journey of London, her foot ready to slip into the Snare, she receiv'd Advice both of the King's desperate Estate,
and of the Duke's Designments against her:
whereupon she return'd in haste to her House at Hunsdon, where in a short time she heard how unprofitable her Journey would have been to London. (f)

So the King having long wrestled with a lingring and tormenting Sickness, at the last his Spirits yielded to the Malice of his Disease; which as with great patience he did endure, so with no less piety did he end it.
Many fervent Prayers he made, both for himself and for the People of his Realms, and some when he was esteem'd almost past Sense;
and so spent his last Breath, in committing his sweet Soul into the Almighty's hands which had created it.

He died at Greenwich upon Thursday the sixth day of July, in the Year 1553. and in the seventeenth Year of his Age, when he had reign'd six Years, five Months and nine Days.
Two days (t) his Death was conceal'd, to open a strait way for the Duke's crooked Purposes.
His Body was bury'd upon the ninth of August in the same Year, in the Chappel of St. Peter's Church in Westminster, and laid near to the Body of King Henry the Seventh, his Grandfather. (u)

(f) The Lady Mary was at Hunsdon in Hertfordshire in the time of her Brother's Sickness: But speeded away a little before his Death at a farther distance to Kenninghall near Norfolk. Where she seems to be at the Death of the King; and whence three days after, viz. July the 9th, she wrote to the Council, wondering that in so long time they had not acquainted her with the King's Departure, since she was by all Law and Right to succeed.

(t) Two days after the King's Death, the Lords of the Privy Council being at Greenwich, sent for the Lord Mayor of London,
Sir George Barnes, thither; and to bring with him six or eight of his Brethren the Aldermen, and twelve Death's Merchants. Who being come in the Afternoon, they acquainted them secretly that the King died two days before, made and whom he had appointed by his Letters Patents to succeed in the Government of the Kingdom. known.

The same day the Lords sent the sad News abroad to Sir Philip Hobby Ambassador with the Emperor, to whom he might take his opportunity to relate it: Assigning the Cause of his Death to be a Putrifaction of his Lungs, utterly uncurable of this Evil; but that the Manner of his Death was such towards God, as assured them that his Soul was in place of eternal Rest.

(u) His Funerals began to be celebrated the 8th of August. A Majesty was set up for him in the Chappel at Whitehall, The King's and another at Westminster Abby. His Corps was drawn in a Chariot covered with Cloth of Gold. Whereon lay his Funerals.
Effigies

1553. Effigies with a Crown of Gold and a great Collar, his Scepter in his Hand, covered with his Robes, a Garter about his Leg, and his Coat with Embroidery of Gold. The Marquis of Winchester was chief Mourner, and next him went twelve other great Lords Mourners, that is, six Earls and six Barons, going two and two. Archbishop Cramer performed the Office of Burial according to the Reformed way: and Day, Bishop of Chichester, preached the Funeral Sermon. He was interred at the Head of his Grandfather K. Henry VII. and resteth under an Altar Monument of Brass gilt, curiously wrought, but without any Inscription, tho he well deserved it. J. S.

Queen MARY.

Anno Dom. 1553. Reg. I.

1553.

WHEN the Lady Mary receiv'd the News of Her Brother's Death, having long before been acquainted with the Duke of Northumberland's secret Practices, She judg'd it unsafe to remain near London, where Her Enemies were in full Power; and therefore, pretending a fear of the Plague, by reason of the sudden Death of one of Her Domesticks, She withdrew from St. Edmond's-Bury, (Her Abode at that time) and in one Day came to Framlingham-Castle, in the County of Suffolk, about Fourscore Miles from London, and not far from the Sea; by which, if the Extremity of Her Affairs requir'd it, She might have an easie Passage to France.

Lady Mary lies into Suffolk.

As soon as She arriv'd, She took the Title of Queen; and sending Letters to Her Friends, and to the Nobility, requir'd 'em with all Expedition to attend Her. Northumberland in the mean time, having for two whole Days held a Consultation with his Friends, about the Measures to be taken in this important Juncture, sent to the Lord-Mayor before the King's Death was publish'd, and requir'd his Attendance at Greenwich, with Six Aldermen, and Twelve other principal Citizens. When they came, he inform'd 'em of His Majesty's Decease, and of Lady Jane's Accession to the Throne, shewing 'em the King's Will, and the Patent Sign'd for that purpose 14 Days before; then, by Promises or Threatings, he oblig'd 'em to take the Oaths to Her, and enjoyn'd 'em under a great Penalty, not to divulge what they had heard: For he had Cunning enough, to know what an Advantage 'twou'd be, if he could gain the City into his Interest; and hop'd, that if the King's Death cou'd for a while be kept secret, Lady Mary, ignorant, as he suppos'd, of what had pass'd, might be oppress'd without any difficulty. But when 'twas reported that she had made her Escape into Suffolk, most of the Nobility, with all the Solemnities of Royal Pomp, conducted Lady Jane to the Tower of London, acknowledged her for their Queen, and caus'd her to be Proclaim'd.

Lady
Jane Pro-
 claim'd Queen.

This Princess was about Sixteen, not Unhandfome, Learned beyond Imagination, of a most acute Wit, and for Prudence, even at that Age, superior to her Sex; Extremely Pious, devoted to the Reformed Faith, and so far from aspiring to the Honour conferr'd on her, that she took the Regalia with Tears; so that it plainly appear'd she was compell'd to ascend the Throne by the Importunities of her Parents and Friends, directly contrary to her own Inclination. When she pass'd thro' the City to the Tower, she was not saluted with any Acclamations, tho' vast Crouds flock'd about her, drawn rather, it seems, to gratifie their Curiosity, than to express their Joy: And this was the first Omen which encourag'd Queen Mary's Friends to the Resolution of making some Attempt in Her behalf, when a proper Occasion should offer; for, tho' they were aw'd from any immediate Motion by the Presence of Northumberland, a Man of the sharpest Discernment, and deepest Politicks, they hop'd, if they cou'd by any means hereafter, get him to a distance, they might be able to effect something considerable.

The same Day that Lady Jane went to the Tower, Queen Mary's Letters arriv'd, and were 1553. read in Council ; in which She commanded 'em to come and pay their Duty and Allegiance to Her, as rightful Heir to the Crown, and so acknowledg'd by the Major Part of the Kingdom. At the same time, News was brought that the People of Norfolk and Suffolk had taken the Oaths to Her ; and indeed it plainly appear'd to the wisest Observers, that the Commonalty were almost every where alienated from Lady Jane : For this Reason, they resolv'd upon raising Forces with all possible speed, that they might surprize Mary, and bring her to London by force. The Duke of Suffolk was design'd General ; but those who privately favour'd Mary, influenc'd the new Queen to keep Her Father near Her, and to send Northumberland on this Expedition ; who, they said, might do more by the Terror of his Name, (for he had lately reduc'd the Norfolk Rebels) than the other by his Arms or Counsel, or any other way ; and besides, who was a more proper Guardian to the Daughter, than her own Father ? As for the City, Her Council were at hand to govern it with their usual Wisdom and Fidelity.

Mov'd with these Reasons, She prevail'd with Northumberland, after some difficulty, to undertake this Charge. He was in a World of Apprehension, least any Disorder should happen in his Absence ; but since he had no way to get himself excus'd, he prepar'd for the Expedition ; and on the 13th. of July, with an Army of 6000 Men, march'd out of London. As he was passing thro' the City, 'tis said, he turn'd to the Lord Gray of Wilton, who was with him, and desir'd him to observe the Crouds that press'd to see their March ; Yet, says he, in all this Multitude, my Lord, you do not hear one wish us Prosperity. (a)

The Citizens were extremely Zealous in the Cause of Religion, as were likewise most of the People in Suffolk, and a great many in Norfolk, and they all knew how entirely Mary was the Creature of Popery. But 'tis the Manner of the English, to have such a constant Veneration for the lawful Sovereign, that no

Pretences or Colours, not even of Religion it self, can draw 'em from their Loyalty : Of which Truth, the unhappy Fall of Lady Jane, which we shall presently relate, was a memorable Example. For tho' the Foundation of her Government was laid with all possible Strength, and the Superstructure carry'd on with the utmost Art ; yet, as soon as the true and undoubted Successor appear'd, and made her Claim, the whole Fabrick fell at once, and was dissipated in a Moment, and that chiefly by the Means of those very Persons, who for the sake of Religion were expected to continue most firm to Lady Jane.

The Preachers whom Northumberland had appointed in great Numbers at London, to oppose Queen Mary's Title, prevail'd but little in the City it self : Nor was the Learned and Pious Ridley, who had been made Bishop of London after Boner's Deprivation, at all regarded upon this Subject. Indeed 'tis much to be wish'd that so excellent a Man had avoided the false Step he now made ; For, as to Lady Mary, if there had been nothing in what the Lawyers affirm, That the Offspring of a Marriage solemnly contracted, tho' it should afterwards be dissolv'd, shall be held Legitimate, yet why it was judg'd necessary to Exclude her Sister Elizabeth too, I can never sufficiently admire, nor do I think any probable Reason is to be assign'd by those who were dissatisfy'd with Mary's Birth. To say nothing of Mary Queen of Scotland, to whom, after King Henry the Eighth's Offspring, the Right of Succession undoubtedly belong'd. But whatever were the Reasons alledg'd by the Preachers, 'tis certain they had no Influence upon the Common People, who continually flock'd in great Multitudes to Queen Mary ; and not the common fort only, but a considerable Number of the best Interest and Quality, took the first opportunity to joyn her. Among these are reckon'd particularly the Earls of Bath, and of Suffex ; Wharton and Mordant, both Barons eldest Sons ; Sir William Drury, Sir John Shelton, Sir Henry Benefield, Sir Henry Fernigam, Sulierd, Freston, and o-

Jane at Home,

(a) This was done at Home by Queen JANE and Her Council. Some Days before, the Lord Clinton Lord Admiral, was made Constable of the Tower ; who presently planted the Tower round with Great Guns, made ready for Service : And the Lords Lieutenants of the Counties had their Commissions confirmed to them by this Temporary Queen, whose Letters, I suppose, ran in the same Tenor with that to the Marquess of Northampton, who was Lord Lieutenant of Surrey, Northampton, Bedford and Berks, which bore Date July the 10th. wherein She shew'd him, That She had entred upon the Possession of the Kingdom, styling it Her Rightful Possession, as was evident by the Will of Her late Cousin, K. Edward, and several other Instructions to that Effect, Signed with His own Hand : Ordering him to defend Her right Title against the Lady MARY, whom the Letter stiled BASTARD to Her Great Uncle King HENRY VIII.

broad.

Now as to what was done for settling Matters Abroad with Foreign Princes. July the 8th. Letters were sent from the Council to Hoby, Morison, and the Bishop of Norwich, Ambassadors at the Emperor's Court at Brussels, importing the Death of K. Edward ; and that they should declare it to the Emperor, and to pray Him to remember the Antient Amity between the two Crowns, and to continue it. July the 11th. Richard Shelley was sent Ambassador to the Emperor, to whom he carried a Letter from JANE Her Self : She also wrote another dated July the 12th. to the foresaid Ambassadors at that Court, setting forth Her Title to the best Advantage : As, that She was possess'd of the Crown by Her Cousin King Edward's Lawful Determination, and by the Assent of the Nobility and States of the Realm ; calling Her Self the Lawful Heir and Successor in the whole Blood-Royal. Sir Philip Hoby She appointed to reside at the Emperor's Court, as Her Ambassador there ; and both him and the two other to repair to the Emperor, and offer their Mediation, as they had before employed it by the Command of Her Predecessor K. Edward, for the begetting of a good Peace between Him and the French King. July the 16th. the Ambassadors had Admittance and Speech with the Emperor ; who spake to them many good Words, and Commendations of His good Brother K. Edward, Deceased ; and declared His ready Mind, to keep and observe the Amity and good Correspondence that He had before with this Realm, and thanked the Council for their good Will towards Him. July the 17th. the Ambassadors by Letters, signified to the Council the Contents of the Emperor's Discourse with them ; and yet to try Him further, advis'd their Lordships to offer a new League to Him, or to confirm the old, or to use some other Means.

But Shelley that lately came, understanding the Inclination of the People of England towards the Lady Mary, made some delay, and delivered not his Letters at all : And the others as yet moved nothing concerning the new Queen to the Emperor. Shelley makes hast Home : The Ambassadors hearing of Queen Mary's Success and Access to the Crown, and having no Letters sent to them, were in a Maze what to do ; and upon Shelley's Departure, signified as much by their Letters to the Council.

thers; but the principal of all was Sir Edward Hastings, (b) the Earl of Huntingdon's Brother, who having a Commission from Northumberland to raise 4000 Foot, went over with 'em to Queen Mary; for which Service She afterwards created him Baron of Loughborough. Sir John Williams too was rais'd to the same Rank of Quality, in reward for his faithful Performances at that time; and Serjeant Morgan having done his utmost among the rest, was soon after made one of the Lords Chief-Justices.

An Accident favourable to Queen Mary.

But there was an Accident that prov'd of very great Advantage to Mary's Affairs; Northumberland had order'd 6 Men of War to lie upon the Coast towards Holland, to intercept her if she shou'd Attempt her Escape; or to be ready against any extraordinary Occasion. It happen'd that they were driven by strefs of Weather into Yarmouth Harbour, at the same time that there was a Levy of Forces for Queen Mary; the Seamen and Soldiers being prevail'd upon, both by Threatnings and Promises to Revolt, deliver'd their Ships to Sir Henry Fernegam, one of Mary's Commanders, which gave such a fortunate Turn to her Affairs, that she receiv'd the News with the greatest Joy imaginable; for being now furnish'd with Men, Ammunition, and a Train of Artillery, she resolv'd to march against her Rival, not in the least fearing Northumberland's Troops.

The Lords who were with Lady Jane, as soon as they heard of this, were in very great Dread what might be the Result of it. And Mary's Friends at Court being grown bolder, began to open their Minds to each other; desiring nothing more than the Liberty of going out of the Tower, that they might confer more freely. Northumberland had now written to the Council, to desire a Reinforcement. After he began his March, besides his Four Sons, and the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Huntingdon, the Lord Gray, and several others of the first Rank, he had 8000 Foot and 2000 Horse, when he arriv'd at Cambridge. But by that time he was come to St. Edmunds-Bury, he found great Numbers of his Men had deserted, and was vehemently afraid that most of the rest wou'd follow 'em. For this Reason he mov'd back again to Cambridge, and ply'd the Council with continual and earnest Applications for Recruits. Mary's Party taking hold of this Opportunity, came to a Resolution, That the Necessary Forces should be rais'd as soon as possible. But they said, None except themselves ought to be trusted with the Command of 'em, for fear of the same Trick that was play'd 'em a little before by Sir Edward Hastings. Thus by Suffolk's leave they got out of the Tower, where they had been in effect Prisoners, and dispers'd themselves over the City. Those of 'em that appear'd most devoted to Queen Mary's Interest, were the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Treasurer; Herbert Earl of Pembroke; the Earl of Arundel, (who with Paget not long before had been kept Prisoner a whole Year by Northumberland,) and Sir Thomas Cheyny, Warden of the Cinque-Ports. By the Care and Industry of these, all of the Council that cou'd be found (except Suffolk only) and several others of the Nobility who were known not to be ill-affected to Queen Mary, were assembled at the Earl of Pembroke's House, known by the ancient Name of Bainard Castle, under Colour of treating other Matters, but in reality to concert Measures for reducing Lady Jane.

Northumberland's Soldiers desert.

In this Assembly the Earl of Arundel fell foul upon Northumberland with the utmost Severity. He ran over the History of the late Times, and reckoning up every Act of Mismanagement, Cruelty, and Injustice, committed in King Edward the VIth's Reign, threw the Odium of all upon him only; then he

(b) And no question this Sir Edward Hastings was excited the more to put himself forward in aiding Queen Mary in this Juncture, by the earnest and gracious Letter She had sent him; which was to this Tenor.

Lady Mary to Hastings.

MARY the Queen,

Right Trusty and Right Welbeloved Cousin, We Grete you well: Advertising you that to Our great Grief and Heaviness of Heart, We have received woful News and Advertisement, that the King Our Dearest Brother, and late Sovereign Lord, is departed to God's Mercy, upon Thursday last at Night. By means whereof, the Right of the Crown of this Realm of England, with the Governance thereof, and the Title of France, is justly come unto Us by God's mere Providence; as appears by such Provisions as have been made by Act of Parliament, and the Testament and last Will of Our late dearest Father King HENRY VIII. for Our Preferment in this Behalf. Whereby you are now discharged of your Duty of Allegiance to Our said Brother the King, and unburthened and set at large to observe, execute, and obey any Commandment heretofore, or hereafter to be addrest unto you by Letter or otherwise, from or in the Name, or by Colour of the Authority of the same King, Our late Brother; and only to Us and our Person are, and owe to be Our true Liegeman.

Wherefore, Right Trusty and Right Welbeloved, for the special Trust and Affiance we have in you, and as you be a Nobleman, We require, command, and charge you to have an Heart and Eye vigilant and fully bent to God's Glory, Our Honour, the Surety of our Person, and the Universal Quietness of the whole Realm; especially of those Our Counties of Middlesex and Bucks, where your Habitation and Mansion is: And that ye stir not in a forcible Array at the Commandment, Call or Bidding, by Letters or otherwise, of any Person or Persons whatsoever, except of Us your Sovereign Lady: And except also, if any wilful Person, as God forbid, will dare and attempt otherwise violently and by force, that to you shall seem prejudicial unto Us, Our Right and Title aforesaid. For the prevention of which Cause, and also to the Intent you shall and may be ready to serve Us, at Our Command hereafter, to be Addrest to you, We will you shall to the best of your Power fortify and prepare your self. And this Our Letter Signed with Our Hand shall be your Warrant and Discharge in this behalf. Willing you further not to doubt, but that We shall in the Ballance of Equity, Reason, and Justice consider your Endeavour; and also employ Our own Person and Study accordingly: And so prosecute you with such Our good Favour and Grace, as shall advance God's Glory and the Commonweale, to your Comfort with the help of God, who have Us all in his blessed Keeping. Yeoven at Our Mannour of Kenningale, the ix of July, in the Year of Our Lord God, 1553.

The People of Buckinghamshire to the Number of Four thousand, being got into Arms for the Lady MARY, headed by this Gentleman, Sir Edward Hastings, JANE wrot to several Gentlemen of the best Rank of the same County immediately to levy their Servants and Tenants to quell these Rebels as She stiled them. Her Letter to Sir John Bridges, and Sir Nic. Poyntz, which She wrot July the 18. is repositied in the Appendix to the Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer. Wherein She ordered them to forbear raising the Servants and Tenants of the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, as relying on them otherwise for Her Service, tho they were at that Instant plotting and contriving Her Overthrow.

1553. made expostulating Complaints, that the Children of K. Henry the VIIIth shou'd contrary to all Right be thrust from the Succession; and profess'd himself amaz'd, to think how Northumberland had brought such Great and Noble Persons (meaning those present) to so mean Servitude, as to be made the Tools of his wicked Designs: For 'twas by their Consent and Assistance that the Crown was put upon the Daughter of Suffolk, the same Northumberland's Daughter-in-Law; the Sovereignty in effect remaining in him, of exercising the most uncontrollable Rage and Tyranny over their Lives and Fortunes. To accomplish this Usurpation indeed, the Cause of Religion was pretended; but tho they had forgot the Apostle's Advice, not to do evil that good may follow; and to obey even bad Princes, not out of Fear, but for Conscience sake; yet who, he ask'd, had seen Cause to think, that in Matters of Religion Queen Mary intended any Alteration? For when She was lately Address'd about this in Suffolk, She had (which indeed was true) given a very fair Satisfactory Answer. And what a Madness is it, says he, for Men to throw themselves into certain Destruction, to avoid an uncertain Danger. I heartily wish there had been no such Transgression; but since there has, the best Remedy for a past Error, is a timely Repentance; wherefore 'tis my Advice, that we all join our utmost Endeavours, that so by our Authority, Mary, the Rightful and Undoubted Heiress of these Kingdoms, may be Proclaim'd Queen.

The Lords resolve for Queen
Mary.

After he had ended his Speech, the Earl of Pembroke generously profess'd aloud his Approbation of Arundel's Proposal; and clapping his hand to his Sword, added, That he was ready to dispute that Matter at the Peril of his Life with any who durst oppose it. Upon this, they all went into the same Resolution; and sending for the Lord Mayor, and Aldermen, proceeded in a full Body into Cheapside, and there with Sound of Trumpet Proclaim'd Queen Mary; From thence they all went to St. Paul's, where Te Deum was sung; after which, they sent some to seize upon the Tower, and oblige Suffolk to appear before the Council. Upon the first hearing of what had pass'd, the Duke, as much dejected now as he had before been exalted, went into his Daughter's Apartment, order'd all the Ceremonies of Royalty to cease, and admonish'd Her to bear with what Patience she cou'd, her Return to a Private State. She answer'd him with a Countenance not at all Discompos'd, That this was a more welcome Summons to her, than that which forc'd her against her Will to such an Elevation. In Obedience to you, my Lord, said she, and to my Mother, I acted a Violence on my self, and have been guilty of a grievous Offence. But this present is my own Act, and I willingly resign, to correct another's Fault, if so great a Fault can be corrected by my Resignation and sincere Acknowledgment. Having said this, she retir'd to her Closet, more Solicitous for her Life, which she knew to be in danger, than concern'd for the Loss of her Crown.

Jane de-
thron'd.

Suffolk went directly to the Council, and subscrib'd their Decree; On the 19th of July it was Proclaim'd with such Rejoycing of the People, that after the Name of Mary was read, not a word more cou'd be heard for the general Acclamations. Arundel and Paget having seen this accomplish'd according to their Minds, took Horse the same Night, and with a Party of 30 Horse more, made all possible hast to the Queen, who was transported with the News of so happy a Revolution. The Council in the mean time dispatch'd Letters to Northumberland, to certify him of what had pass'd, and requir'd him to Subscribe the Decree, and disband his Army. But before he receiv'd 'em, suspecting a Revolution, and cunningly hiding his Concern, he had Proclaim'd Queen Mary at Cambridge, and throwing up his Hat in the Croud, pretended to express his Joy. Then the Army was Disbanded, and all the Nobility going over to Queen Mary, obtain'd a Pardon, by throwing the whole Guilt on Northumberland.

The Unhappy Lady Jane, having thus as it were in a Play, acted the Part of Queen for a short space of ten Days, was seiz'd, and her Attendants remanded to their respective Homes; Northumberland too by Order of the Queen was Arrested by the Earl of Arundel, and sent Prisoner to the Tower. Some say that while he was doubtful what to do, and thinking how to make his Escape, as he was drawing on his Boots, the Guards (who under the Command of Sir John Gates follow'd him in that Expedition) seiz'd him, saying, 'Twas just he should bring 'em off from the Guilt of Treason. While he resisted, and a Contention arose between 'em, the Letters came from the Lords of the Council with the Contents above-mentioned; and a Command that every Man shou'd lay down his Arms and be gone to his own Dwelling. Upon the reading of these, the Duke was suffer'd to go free. But his Liberty lasted not long; for the very next Morning as he was preparing to take Horse, Arundel coming from the Queen seiz'd him and carry'd him away, together with several others, particularly his Eldest Son the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Ambrose, and Lord Henry Dudley, his Younger Sons, Sir Andrew Dudley his Brother, the Earl of Huntingdon, Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir John Gates, with his Brother Henry Gates, and Doctor Edwin Sands.

On the 25 of July they were brought to London, and immediately confin'd in the Tower. Huntingdon not long after was Discharg'd, as his Son was at first. Sir John Gates, whom Northumberland accus'd as the Projector of all this Mischief, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were Executed; The Earl of Warwick dy'd in Prison; the Lords Ambrose and Henry Dudley were pardon'd, the latter of which was afterwards kill'd by a Shot at the Battel of St. Quintin; the other had the good Fortune to live to the Time of Queen Elizabeth, was created by Her Earl of Warwick, and flourish'd many Years in great Authority and Favour with Her. Sir Andrew Dudley receiv'd Sentence of Death, yet had the Queen's Pardon. Dr. Sands, who was Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, by Northumberland's Order had preach'd against Queen Mary at the University, and defended the Title of Jane, but with that Prudence and Moderation, tho he had but a few hours to compose his Sermon, that the Duke was abundantly Satisfied; and yet the Offence to the other side was not so great, but that his Friends prevail'd for his Pardon. So that after almost a Year's Imprisonment he was Discharg'd, and presently fled to Germany; from thence returning after Queen Mary's Death, he was first made Bi-

Bishop of Worcester, then translated to the See of London; and lastly to the Archbishoprick of York. A Man very eminent for his Learning, Probity, and Prudence; to which I may likewise add his Birth and Family, and above all, his peculiar Happiness in an Offspring; for he left several Children, of whom Three were made Knights, and adorn'd with all the Felicities of Body and Mind.

July 26. Northampton, Ridley, and others brought to the Tower.

On the 26. of July were brought to the Tower likewise, the Marquis of Northampton, (who afterwards receiv'd Sentence of Death, but was Pardon'd.) Ridley Bishop of London, Burn'd two Years after at Oxford; and besides several others, Robert Dudley, another of Northumberland's Sons: This was the Great Earl of Leicester, afterwards under Queen Elizabeth, by whom he was rais'd to the highest Honours; but Death snatch'd him from his mighty Power, before he reach'd any considerable Age. July the 27th. the Duke of Suffolk was brought in, and four Days after, by a wonderful Instance of the Queen's Mercy, receiv'd a Pardon. Cheek, King Edward's Preceptor, and the Chief Justices Chemley and Montague, were Committed too at the same time, but on the 3d. of September were set at Liberty.

July 27. Duke of Suffolk Pardon'd.

July 30. Lady Elizabeth goes to meet her Sister.

July the 30th. the Lady Elizabeth, Queen Mary's Sister, with a great Number of Quality and Gentry of both Sexes, (some say 500, others 1000) went in State from her House thro' the City to meet her Sister, and to Congratulate Her Accession to the Throne; who

on the 3d. of August having disbanded Her Army, (which had not yet exceeded 13000 Men) was attended at Wansted by the chief Noblemen and Ladies of the Kingdom; and thus entering the City with a numerous Train, She came to the Tower. There met Her as humble Supplicants the Duke of Norfolk, who had been a Prisoner ever since his Son the Earl of Surrey was put to Death by King Henry the VIIIth. Edward Courtney, Son of the Marquis of Exeter, Executed in the Year 1538. Gardiner, depriv'd of his Bishoprick of Winchester about two Years before; and the Dutchess Dowager of Somerset, whose Lord had been Beheaded. They presented themselves on their Knees, and Gardiner in the Name of them all, made a Congratulatory Speech to the Queen, who kindly rais'd 'em one after another, saluted 'em, saying they were Her own proper Prisoners, and order'd their immediate Discharge. The next Day She restor'd Courtney to the Honour of his Family; Gardiner not only obtain'd his Bishoprick again, but on the 23d. of August following was made Lord Chancellor, tho' he formerly subscribed the Sentence of Divorce against the Queen's Mother, and had written in Defence of K. Henry's Proceedings.

(bb) Bishop Bonner pretended that his Deprivation during his Appeal to King Edward from the Commissioners, was Illegal: Whereupon the Queen appointed several Judges Delegates, to examine his whole Cause. These Delegates were John Tregonwel and William Roper, Esquires; David Pool Archdeacon of Darby, Anthony Draicut Archdeacon of Huntington, and divers others, Doctors of the Civil-Law. And to countenance his Business the more, to these were joyn'd the Marquess of Winchester, the Earl of Arundel, the Earl of Darby, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and several other Persons of Quality. To these Bonner in much Formality presented his Libel, stiled An Appellatory and Querelatory Libel against K. Edward's Commissioners; who were Archbishop Cranmer, Bishop Ridley, Sir Tho. Smith, Dr. May, and others: And at length Sentence Definitive was pronounced in favour of Bonner, by the said Dr. Tregonwel; and the former Sentence was said to be rashly attempted to his prejudice, and Null in Law: And further, declared him to be restor'd as well to the Possession of his Bishoprick, as to all his Goods and Things, with their Rights and Appurtenances; and allowed him to take his Course against the said Commissioners, for his Expences, Losses, and Inconveniences of his Imprisonment. But it must be noted here, (to see the hard Measure of these Times) that upon the Appeal Bonner had made to K. Edward from the said Commissioners, that King did accordingly appoint the Lord Chancellor Rich, the Lord Treasurer, and many other Persons of great Eminency and Learning, both in the Common and Civil Law, to Examine all the Transactions with him, and whether his Appellation were to be deferred to: And in the End, they gave their resolute Determination, That the said Appellation was naught and unreasonable, and that the Sentence against him was rightly and justly pronounced.

Bonner's Restoration upon his Appeal.

And as for the Deprivation of Cutbert, Bishop of Durham, the Queen set forth Her Commission to Examine also the Causes thereof: Which, (as the Act ran favourably) the Commissioners found to be upon untrue Surmises, and false Accusations of such as were inticed and provoked thereunto by ambitious Persons; whereupon the Sentence of Deprivation was repealed and reversed, and a certain Instrument was made thereof. Then the Queen did erect and establish again by Letters Patents the said Bishoprick, endowing it with all its Honours, Manours, and Possessions, which were in Her Hands by vertue of the Act that gave K. Edward the said Bishoprick and its Revenues; and She gave and disposed the said Bishoprick to the said Cutbert, and his Successors. So far the Queen went. But because, notwithstanding the Repeal of the Sentence of the Deprivation, the Bishop could not enjoy by Law all the said Honours, Manours, &c. because of the foresaid Act, therefore an Act was made in the Second Year of this Queen, to confirm Her Donation to him and his Successors.

Bishop of Durham's Sentence Reversed. Vid. the Act for the Repeal of the Act for the Dissolution of this Bishoprick, 1 Ma.

(c) These Bishops, with Bishop Gardiner aforementioned, being restor'd, were to be made use of in Commissions to depose and thrust out the other Bishops that favoured the Reformed Religion, and so stood in the way to the Courses now to be taken to overthrow it: For in the Month of March following, were Two Commissions issued out from the Queen; One dated on the 15th. and another on the 16th. Day, for the removing of them.

Commissions against King Edward's Bishops. Collect. Record. in the Hist. Ref. Vol. 2.

In the former, Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, Tonstall, Bonner and Day, with the Bishops of S. Asaph and Landaff, or any two of them, were empowered to call before them, if they thought good, Taylor Bishop of Lincoln, Hoper of Worcester and Gloucester, and Hatley of Hereford; and to proceed to declare their Bishopricks void, for the making room for other meet Persons to be elected thereunto: Their pretended Bishopricks being said in the said Commission, to be given to them by Letters Patents of K. Edward, to hold the same during their good Behaviour, with the express Clause, Quandiu se bene gesserint; which was looked upon to be a Defect in their Title. It was urged against them further in the Commission, That they had declared themselves unworthy of the Vocation, by their Preaching and setting forth Erroneous Doctrines, and by inordinate Life and Conversation, [perhaps in respect of their Marriage] contrary to the Laws of Almighty God, and the Use of the Universal Church: Whereupon their Places were said to be in Deed Void; As tho' nothing were wanting, but the declaring them Void, as the Commission gave Gardiner and the rest Authority and Warrant to do.

The other Commission dated the next Day, was directed to the same Six Bishops, to Amove, Deprive and Exclude from their Bishopricks Four more of these Bishops, viz. Holgate Archbishop of York, Farrar Bishop of St. David's, Bird of Chester, and Bujh of Bristol: And that because they had been guilty of very great and enormous

ward's Funeral.

August the 10th. the Funeral Rites of King Edward were perform'd : A Sermon was Preach'd on this Occasion by Day, Bishop of Chichester, who read Prayers in English, and administer'd the Sacrament to those who were present, after the Manner Ordain'd by King Edward; for no Change was yet made in Religion. (e) So that when Bourn, Canon of St. Paul's, and afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells, in a Sermon at Paul's Cross, inveigh'd against the Reformation under King Edward, and extolling Bonner, observ'd that he was unjustly Depriv'd for a Sermon Preach'd four Years before in the same place, and had ever since been kept a close Prisoner, but was now by the Queen's Goodness restor'd, the People rais'd a Tumult, and somebody in the Croud flung a Dagger at the Preacher, which narrowly miss'd him. This Action it seems was so much with the Consent of the Standers-by, that tho' the strictest Enquiry was made, the Author of it was never discover'd; Others at the same time making a Clamour, and some endeavouring to force the Pulpit: Bradford and Rogers, two very popular Ministers, who were afterwards Burnt, sav'd Bourn from the Danger which threaten'd him, and with great difficulty convey'd him unhurt into the neighbouring School of St. Paul's.

And now on the 18th. of August, the Duke of Norfolk sitting as Lord High Steward, those concern'd in the Rebellion were Try'd at Westminster; where the Duke of Northumberland, with his eldest Son the Earl of Warwick, and the Marquis of Northampton were found Guilty of High-Treason. The Account of that Day's Proceedings, and of the Day following, I shall here transcribe from Thuanus, a Writer of great Fame; because, tho' I do not entirely approve all he has set down, I think he keeps very near to Truth, and the Reader perhaps will not be ill Enter-tain'd with the Variety of Opinions upon this Matter.

"The Duke of Northumberland, says he, alledg'd that he did nothing but by Order of the Council, yet this wou'd not excuse him; so that he was Condemn'd as a Traytor. When the Sentence was pronounc'd, he beg'd that it might be mitigated as to the Manner of his Death, and that his Children in regard to their tender Years, might find Mercy; and that he might have the Liberty of speaking with some Learned Divine, (for the settling of his Conscience.) And lastly, that Her Majesty wou'd be pleas'd to send to him Four * of Her Privy-Council, to whom he had some things to Communicate relating to the Publick. Then came on the Tryal of the Marquis of Northampton, who pretended that he had not any Hand in the Rebellion, nor was engag'd in any Party, but having no publick Post, † had spent all the time in his usual Diversion of Hunting, and other Sports. However, it appear'd that he was engag'd on Northumberland's side, and therefore he was likewise Condemn'd. Afterwards, the Earl of Warwick, Northumberland's Eldest Son, when the Plea of his Youth wou'd not mous Crimes and Sins; [but not express'd] and among the rest, that after express Profession of Chastity, they had contracted Marriage with certain Women de facto, which de jure they ought not; and had lived with them as Wives, in contempt of God, and the manifest Scandal of all Orders, as well of Clerks as Laymen. And that they the said Commissioners, or any three of them, should send for these Bishops, or go to them, [for indeed they, or some of them were in Prison] and proceed against them summarie & de plano, and Depose them; and also injoin them Salutory Penance.

Here were two distinct Commissions for the Deprivation of these Seven Bishops, whereas one seem'd to have been sufficient: But the former Commission was directed against those that were Seculars, and had not made any Vow of Single Life; the latter against such as were Regulars, and so had made an express Profession of it, when they entred into the Rules of their Orders; and therefore to them were enjoyned Penances, which the others were not.

Both these Commissions were set upon and Executed in one Day, viz. the 20th. of March. When the Sentence of Deprivation was pronounced upon all Seven, viz. Upon John Taylor for the Nullity of his Consecration, (as it is set down in the Register of Canterbury) and for a Defect in his Title which he had from K. Edward the Sixth, by his Letters Patents, with this Clause, Dum bene se gesserit: Upon Hooper for his Marriage, and other Demerits, and a faulty Title, as before: Upon Harley for his Marriage and Heresy, and as before: Upon Farrar for the Causes aforesaid: And upon Bird for his Marriage. Bush (strictly speaking) was not at this time deprived: He it seems by some Compliances, had some favour shewn him; but about two Months after he Resigned.

As for the rest of the Bishops who were more active and eminent for the Reformation, Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury was soon Imprisoned for Signing K. Edward's Will for the Succession of the Lady Jane, as a Traytor; and besides, was Excommunicated and Deposed by the Pope for Notorious Heresies; and that by a solemn Sentence, mentioned in the Bull of Provision to Cardinal Pole for the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, dated December 11th. 1555. Stiling him there, Thomas Cranmer the Child of Iniquity, formerly Archbishop of Canterbury. His Bishoprick became void immediately upon his Attainder, and the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury assumed the Administration of the Spiritual Jurisdiction of the Archbishoprick: And December 16th. 1553. the said Dean and Chapter gave out Commissions to several Persons for the Exercise of the Archiepiscopal Jurisdiction in their Names, and by their Authorities; and continued in the Possession of this Jurisdiction, till the publishing of Cardinal Pole's Bulls of Provision to the Archbishoprick.

Coverdale the Bishop of Exeter was Deprived by the Restoration of Vezzy, by Patent from the Queen; because, as it was pretended, he had been induced by Fear to Resign under K. Edward.

Barlow Bishop of Bath and Wells Resigned. The Bishops that were Temporizers remained in their Bishopricks; as Sampson Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, Goodrick Bishop of Ely, who died soon after, in May 1554. Thirly Bishop of Norwich; Salcor, alias Capon, Bishop of Salisbury.

(e) It is very unlikely a Popish Bishop, and one that had suffered for his Opinion, should himself, and at this Time, use the Protestant Service, so much by him disliked. Day indeed Preached the Funeral Sermon; but it was Archbishop Cranmer, however now under a Cloud, that Officiated at the King's Interrment after the Reformed way appointed in the English Service-Book: To which he joyned a Communion, by him also Administred, tho' with much Opposition, as we are told. The last publick Office, I suppose, that Archbishop performed. Mass also of Dirige and Requiem was said for the King at the Tower before the Queen, the Marquis of Winchester, the Earls of Pembroke and Shrewsbury being chief Mourners; and the Bishop of Winchester, with his Mitre on his Head, executed after the old Popish Form.

† The contrary to which was Notorious; for Northampton was one of Queen Jane's Privy-Counsellors, and Signed a Letter July the 9th. among the rest of Her Privy-Council, to the Lady Mary, (as they stiled Her) requiring Her to desist, and be quiet and obedient; besides his going along with the Duke in all his Counsels.

About

(f) Fox, who lived in these Times, confirms and clears this Matter: who writes, that the Duke had a Promise made him of a Pardon; yea, tho his Head were upon the Block, on condition he would recant and hear Mass. On which Promise he firmly relyed, and did what was required; and still born up with the same hope, on the Scaffold denyed in Word and outward Profession that true Religion which he had often, both in K. Henry's and K. Edward's Days, evidently declared himself to favour and further.

(g) Two things the Queen now did as public Acts of Favour, to ingratiate her self with her People, upon her late Accession to the Throne; which our Historian takes no Notice of. The One was, To redress the Wrong done to her Subjects by the passing of Monies beyond their true Values; and a Promise that she would have several sorts of Money coined of fine Sterling: This was granted, August the 20. The other was for the Remission of part of the Tax granted in K. Edward's Reign. For which she Signed Letters Patents, bearing Date the 1st. of September; and confirmed what was granted in those Letters, in the next Parliament. The purport of these she declared in Two Proclamations, drawn up in the most endearing manner.

The former was to this Tenor, That she of her great and abundant Clemency, calling to her gracious Remembrance, what great and intolerable Charges had come and chanced both to her and to her Loving Subjects, by reason of the base Monies of late made within the Realms; and also by great Quantities of the like base Monies made and counterfeit in other Realms, and issued out here and in other her Dominions: For the tender Zeal her Grace bore to her loving Subjects, could in no wise longer suffer the same Inconveniencie, but was fully resolv'd and determin'd with all convenient speed, to cause to be made and set forth certain Coins as well of Gold as of Silver, of the perfect Fineness; which would redound much to her Honour, and her Subjects great Wealth, Commodity and Profit.

That therefore she had ordered within her Mints these several Coins, as well of Silver in fineness of the Standard Sterling, as also of Gold; as ensueth:

The whole Sovereign of fine Gold, to be current for xxx Sh.

The half Sovereign of fine Gold, to be called the Royal of Gold, for xv Sh.

The Angel of fine Gold, current for X Sh.

The Half Angel of Fine Gold, for V Sh.

And of Coins of Silver:

One piece of Silver Monies, which should be called the Grote, to be Current for 4 Pence of the lawful Monies of England.

Another piece to be called the half Grote, to be Current for 2 pence.

Another piece, half of the half Grote, which should be called the Penny, to be Current for one Penny.

All which Monies aforesaid the Queen straitly charged and commanded all manner of Persons within her Realms (the Realm of Ireland only excepted; forasmuch as her Coins there had a special Standard) to Receive and Pay the said several pieces of Money, at the several Rates before rehearsed.

And her express Commandment was, That all such base Monies, as had been reduced to a lower rate, should go Current in payment, as the same was Current at that day; as was declared in a Proclamation made in the time of K. Edward VI. in that behalf, until such time as she could, with the Advice of her Council, take further Order touching the same.

The other Act of Grace of the Queen ran to this Tenor, that she graciously considering the good Wills, Forwardness, and hearty Dispositions of her true loving Subjects always heretofore exhibited, to the Aid and Succour of the Commonweal, with their proper Substance and Goods, when the Service, the Necessity and Honour of the Realm had so required; as well in the times of her Father and Brother, but specially since the time of her Vocation to the Crown, in the Defence of her Royal Person, against the malicious Force of the most arrant Traitor Sir John Dudley, late Duke of Northumberland, and his Complices: Notwithstanding it was well known to the Multitude of her said good Subjects, how by the evil Government of the Realm in those late Years, especially since the said Duke had born rule, the Treasure of the same was marvellously exhausted, and she now presently charged with Payment of notable great Sums, being the Debt of her said Brother the King, partly due to divers of her Servants and Subjects, and partly to certain Merchant Straungers and others; which for her own Honour and the Honour of the Realm, she determin'd by the help of God, truly to discharge, content, and pay, in times convenient and reasonable. That yet having a special Mind to the Weal of her Subjects, and accounting their loving Hearts and Prosperity as her own Weal, and the chiefest Treasure that she desired, next the Favour and Grace of God; and having a full Affiance in her said Subjects, that if the State, the Cause, and Honour of the Realms should so require, they would at all times hereafter exhibite their semblable Service; tho in the latter Session of the last Parliament holden in the time of the said K. Edward, towards the Payment and Discharge of the said notable Debts, were granted two Dismes, and two Fifteens, and one Subsidy of four Shil-

Bishops Imprisoned.

About the same time, several Bishops who had appear'd with more than common Zeal in the Cause of Religion, were taken into Custody; as Hooper, Bishop of Worcester and Gloucester; Ferrar, Bishop of St. David's, (who were afterwards burnt); and Coverdale Bishop of Exeter, who, upon a Letter in his Favour from Christian the III. King of Denmark, obtain'd a Pardon. But all Ecclesiasticks who refus'd to put away their Wives, or enjoy'd Benefices whereof the former Incumbents had been deprived for Defence of Popery; and even those too who wou'd not promise by Oath to defend it, were forced to relinquish them without exception.

Peter Martyr.

Peter Martyr was then Professor at Oxford; who, as soon as King Edward dy'd, was confin'd to his House; but afterwards, upon the Application of his Friends, he had Leave to come to London, and there he put himself under the Protection of Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury. But Cranmer was already near his Fall, being in very great Displeasure with the Queen; who besides that She was entirely manag'd by Gardiner, his mortal Enemy, cou'd never forgive him the Business of the Divorce.

Cranmer's Merits with the Queen.

'Tis said that when Henry the VIIIth. had resolv'd to Imprison His Daughter Mary, for her Contumacy in Defending the Cause of Popery, He chang'd His Resolution at the sole Mediation of Cranmer. Afterwards, when she was to be Disinherited by King Edward, the Archbishop in a long Speech strenuously oppos'd it, tho' without Success; nor cou'd he be prevail'd with to subscribe the Decree, till the Judges having unanimously affirm'd that it might Lawfully be done, the dying King Himself with continu'd Importunity gain'd him to it. But the Memory of one Injury has more force on an ungrateful Mind, than that of a thousand Obligations. At that time there was an uncertain Rumor, that Cranmer had chang'd his Religion with his Fortunes; so that to gratify the Queen, he had promis'd to Celebrate the Exequies of King Edward after the Romish Manner. Cranmer therefore, by a Writing which he publish'd about the beginning of November, vindicated himself from this, and offer'd to defend the Institutions of K. Edward about Religion, as conformable to the Doctrine of Christ and his Apostles; in which Resolution having been confirm'd by Peter Martyr, he nam'd him for his Second in the Dispute. But the Controversy was soon decided another way; for his Death was positively resolv'd, but which way to bring it about was the Question. 'Twas determin'd therefore to proceed against him as a Traytor: So that on the 13th. of November, after he had been confin'd for some time in the Tower, to lessen the People's Veneration for him, he was Arraign'd for High-Treason, together with the Lords Ambrose and Gifford Dudley, and the Lady Jane, who so lately had sustain'd the Person of Queen: They were all Condemn'd as Accomplices in this Crime. As to Cranmer's Particular, his Enemies were so asham'd of the Part they had undertaken, that they procur'd him the Queen's Pardon for Treason; yet afterwards had him Prosecuted for Heresy. Before he had been Apprehended, his Friends advis'd him to fly into Germany, and avoid certain Ruin, as some of his Brethren had done: He answer'd 'em, that if he were in danger of being taken up for Theft, Parricide, or any other such horrid Crime, tho' he knew his Innocence, he might perhaps be prevail'd with to fly; but since the Cause now depending, says he, is my Faith in God, and the Truth of the Holy Scriptures, in opposition to the Errors of Popish Doctrines, I have determin'd to shew a Constancy worthy of a Christian Prelate, and to lose my Life rather than withdraw at such a time.

Shillings in the Pound, to be rais'd and levy'd of the Mannours, Lands and Tenements; and two Shillings Eightpence of the Goods and Cattels of her Subjects; which Graunts were now due unto her by the same Act, and would discharge one great Piece of the said Debts; Her Majesty of her mere Grace and great Clemency, for the Relief and Succour of her said good Subjects, had freely, for her, her Heirs, and Successors, pardoned and remitted to them the said Subsidy of four Shillings the Pound, and two Shillings Eightpence the Pound. Trusting her good Subjects would have loving Consideration thereof; whom she required hartly to bend themselves wholly to serve God to his Glory, with continual Prayer for the Honour and Advancement of her Grace and the Commonweal.

Honors conferred.

L. Paget: great Honor don him.

(b) These Matters following were as honourable Preliminaries to her Coronation. The Sunday Sevennight before, being the 24th of September, Feckenham, Dean of St. Paul's, and after Lord Abbot of Westminster, preach'd at Paul's-Cross. And some few days before the said Coronation, Honours were Confer'd upon certain Persons from the Queen: Whereof one was, (and that was most remarkable) the Restoration of the Lord Paget to the Order of the Garter, which he had once received, but was with great Indignity deprived of, by the Malice the great Duke of Northumberland bore him, for his Faithfulness, as it seems, to the Duke of Somerset, upon the pretence that he was not a Gentleman of Blood. For his honourable Restoration there was a Decree made September the 27 at St. James's, where the Queen now was, by a Chapter of the Heralds; And forthwith the Garter was Buckled on his Leg, by two of the Knights Companions present; and the Collar of the Order put about his Shoulders,

A Dispute in Convocation.

Pope and the Roman Modes of Worship were repeal'd (i). In the Convocation, which was Summon'd at the same (k) time, a Dispute was held with great Contention for several days, concerning the Lord's Supper. Weston the Prolocutor, and many others, defended the Doctrine of Christ's bodily Presence. Among the few that maintain'd the contrary Opinion, are reckon'd as chief, John Ailmer, and Richard Cheney, (the latter of which enjoy'd the See of Glocester, under Queen Elizabeth, and the former, that of London;) John Philpot, Archdeacon of Winchester, who at last seal'd that Doctrine with his Blood; James Haddon, Dean of Exeter, and Walter Philips, Dean of Roche-ster. These, after a long and sharp Controverlie, were overpower'd by Multitudes, not by Reason; and the re-establishing of Popery was concluded. So that by the Authority and Order of the Convocation on the 21st of Decem-ber, Mass began to be celebrated in all the Churches of the Realm.

At the same time the Marquis of Northampton, and Henry Gates, who had receiv'd Sentence of Death a little before, were Pardon'd and Discharg'd; and the Two Dudleys and Lady Jane not being so strictly confin'd as before, had some hopes of a Pardon too.

Anno

Shoulders, with the George depending thereat: And a Command given to Garter, that his Achievements should be publicly set up over his Stall at Windsor, being the same he before posselt. And the Records of the Order of the Re- brand his Degradation with Injustice: Asserting, that when Honour is confer'd upon the Score of Virtue or gentry, from great Endowments, the Consideration of this supplieth the Defect or Obscurity of Extraction. And the Sovereign then present declared, That he had highly deserved of the Nation by his Prudence and Counsel. And as a token how much the Queen esteem'd him, at her Coronation he was one of the Four Knights that held the Pall over her in her Traversé, when she was Anointed by the Bishop of Winchester.

September the 28. being Thursday, the Queen removed from St. James's to Whitehal, and took Barge to the Tower, where She lay that Night. The next day She made Fifteen Knights of the Bath, who were Knighted by the Earl of Arundel, Steward of the Queen's House, by Commission from her. The First whereof, was the Earl of Devonshire; the next, the Young Earl of Surrey; then the Lord Burgavenny, the Lord Cardiff, Lord Barkley, Lord Mountjoy, Lord Lumley, Sir William Paulet, Sir Henry Parker, Sir Hugh Rich, [the L. Rich's Son] Sir Henry Clinton, Sir Henry Paget, Sir Robert Rochester, Sir Henry Jernigam, Sir Edward [or William] Dormer. The Oath then Minister'd to these Knights, was in these Words: "Right dire Brother. Greeting be thys Wydre unto you: Almighty God geve you the Wydsynge of all knyghthode. Thys is the Wydre of knyght- hode: You shall Honour God above all thyngs; You shall be true and fithful in the Feith of Holy Church, and the same mainteine and defend to your Power. You shall love the Sovereign above all earthy Creatures; and for the Sovereign and Sovereign's Right and Dynite, lyve and dye. You shall defend Wydows, Orphens, and Ophelyns in thys Right: You shall suffer no Corruption, as far forth as ye may; nor sit in place where any wrongful Judgment shall be given, to your knowledge. And as grete Honour be thys Rolle Wydre unto you, as ever it was to any of your Progenitors."

Saturday, Sept. the 30th. She passed from the Tower through the City to Westminster in great Triumph, sitting in an open Chariot to be seen. All this glorious Cavalcade is set down by John Stow in his Chronicle.

Sunday, Octob. the 1st. The Ceremonies of Her Coronation were perform'd in St. Peter's Westminster, by Gardiner Bishop of Winchester. After divers Ceremonies were dispatch'd, She walked into the four parts of the Mount, shewing Her Self to all the People. Beside Her, the said Bishop of Winchester in his Pontificalibus stood, and declared to the People the Purpose of the present Solemnity, with demand of their Consent in these Words "Sirs, Here present is MARY, rightful and undoubted Inheritrix, by the Laws of God and Man, to the Crown and Royal Dignity of these Realms of England, France, and Ireland. Whereupon you shall understand, that this Day is prefixed and appointed by all the Peers of this Land, for the Consecration, Inunction and Coronation of the said most Royal Princess MARY. Will ye Serve at this time, and give your Good Will and Assents to the said Consecration, Inunction, and Coronation? Whereunto the People answered all in one Voice, "Yea, Yea, Yea: God save Queen MARY." The Coronation-Sermon was Preached by Dey Bishop of Chichester; who had also in August before, preached at the Funeral of King Edward; being, it seems, a Celebrated Orator.

The next Day, being the Morrow after the Coronation, the Queen made Fourscore and Ten Knights of the Carpet, Dubb'd in Her Chamber of Presence at Westminster by the Earl of Arundel, who had Knighted before the Knights of the Bath. Some of these Knights were the Lord Gerrard, the Lord Borough, the Lord Dudley, Thomas Stanley, Edmund Windsor, Henry Ratcliff, Tho. Hastings, Will. Walgrave, John Browne, Rafe Chamberlain, John Tirwhit, John Hodelston, Robert Peckham, Henry Ley, Christopher Allen, Richard Freston, Will. Kelloway, Henry Gaslon, John Tregonwel, Ambrose German, Leonard Chamberlain, Tho. Gerrard, David Brook, Lord Chief Baron, Richard Morgan, Lord Chief Justice; and among the rest, Tho. White, Lord-Mayor of London.

(i) This first Parliament of the Queen was short, having but two Sessions, and ending the 6th. Day of Decem-ber. Sir John Pollard esteem'd excellently Learned in the Laws of this Realm, was chosen Speaker, by the countess of this Recommendation of Mr. Treasurer of the Queen's House, and sat in the Chair. Here something in the begin-ning of the Session happened to one of the Members elected, that deserveth a Remark: Which was, that Alexander Nowel, a Learned Man, and Favourer of K. Edward's Reformation, was called into Question; Whether he being a Prebendary of Westminster, might Sit in the House? And the 13th. of October, it was declared by the Commons, that he being Prebendary of Westminster, and hereby having Voice in the Convocation-House, [So of Com- it is in the Journal of the House of Commons] could not be a Member of this House; and that the Queen's Writ should be directed for another Burges in that Place. There was another Prebendary of Westminster; name- ly, Tregonwel, a Member of the House of Commons at this Time: And but the Day before; that is, Octob. 12. der Nowel the Bill for avoiding Treasons and Premunire, was brought from the Lords by several of the House of Com- mons; and Tregonwel among the rest, with this Clause added in the Journal, If he may be of this House. And that he remained in this House, and acted in it the second Session, appears in the said Journal; and particularly Octo- ber 27, Mr. Tregonwel, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Price, &c. were appointed to Examine the Case of Mr. Fester, Burges of the Elect: But he was a Civilian, and a Man for the Turn.

October the 20th. Saturday the Queen came to the Lords House, and sitting in Her Royal Seat, the Lords and Commons present, She gave Her Royal Assent to Three Bills; One publick, and Two private: Viz. For Re- storing in Blood the Lady Marchioness of Exeter; and Edward Courtney, Earl of Devonshire. The publick Act was, That no Act, Deed or Offence, shall be made Treason, Petty Treason, or Misprision of Treason, but what welano- is declared so in the Act of 25 E. III. And that all Offences made Felony, or limited to be within the Case of Premunire, since the First Day of the First Year of K. Henry VIII. not being Felons before, or not within the Case of Premunire, are repealed and made utterly void. By divers Acts and Statutes of the said K. Henry, the Pa- pists and such as asserted the Pope's Superiority over the King here in his own Realms and Dominions, were suf- ficiently check'd and kept in awe; but were now at their Liberty again. And there was a Sting in this seeming Act of Grace, towards all that were taken up and Imprisoned for Treason, Petty Treason, or Misprision of Treason till the last day of September, who were to be exempted out of this Statute.

Second Session.

Nine Acts Repealed as once.

In the second Session of this Parliament, which began Octob. 24. after a few Days Prorogation, some Bills were brought in for the Discouragement and Terror of such as should continue to profess the late Reformed Religion: As a Bill for such as came not to Church, or received not the Sacraments. Another Bill for divers Punishments reserved to the Ecclesiastical Power, for such as say not their Service, or come not to the Church: But these Bills passed not. Yet there was another Bill that now passed into an Act, in Favour of the old Popish Religion, and the Overthrow of the Reformation, which was instead of an Hundred: Wherein no less than Nine Acts, all for the Establishment of the true Religion, were repealed at a Clap. These were,

An Act against such as should speak Unreverently of the Sacrament, and for receiving thereof in both Kinds.

An Act for the Election of Bishops.

An Act for Uniformity of Service, and Administration of the Sacraments.

An Act to take a way positive Laws against the Marriage of Priests.

An Act for abolishing and putting away of divers Books and Images.

An Act for the Ordering of Ecclesiastical Ministers.

An Act for the Uniformity of Common-Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments.

An Act made for the keeping of Holy-Days and Fasting Days.

An Act made for the Declaration of a Statute made for the Marriage of Priests.

All these by this one Act of Q. Mary, were utterly repealed; and the Divine Service, and the Administration of the Sacraments, as in the last Year of K. Henry VIII. was to be used and frequented, from the 20th. of December, Anno 1553. I find by the Commons House Journal, that this great Bill was discoursed and argued the last Day of October. Arguments upon this Bill again Novemb. the 6th. and ordered to be Engrossed. It was read again the 7th. of November. Argued again the 8th. Day.

Some Account of this Convocation. The Sermon.

* This hit pat to the Duke of Northumberland, Beheaded but a little before, who set up Jane against Her. The Prolocutor's Speech.

(k) The Convocation also now began about the 16th. of October, with much Solemnity, and as great Heat and Resolution to overturn all that had been done in Religion before. It was opened with a Latin Sermon preached by Harpsfield, B. D. Bishop Boner's Chaplain, from St. Paul's Words to the Elders of Ephesus; Attendite vobis, & universo Gregi, &c. i. e. Take heed to your selves, and the whole Flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you Overseers; to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own Blood. He first divided his Matter he intended to discourse of, and then he proceeded to bidding the Prayers. And here he recommended the Queen to the Peoples Devotions in the first place, whom he took occasion to run out very largely in the Praise of; and particularly commended Her in the same Words that Ozias did Judith: Viz. "Blessed art thou Daughter of the most High God, above all Women upon the Earth. Blessed be the Lord God, who hath created the Heaven and the Earth; which hath directed thee to the cutting off the Head of the chief of our Enemies; which this Day hath so magnified thy Name, that thy Praise may not depart from the Mouth of Men, who have remembered the Power of the Lord for ever: For whom thou hast not spared thy Life, by reason of the Straits and Tribulations of thy Nation, but hast prevented our Ruin before the sight of our God." At last he put the Words of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Queen Mary's Mouth: "That She being most gloriously Magnified in our Eyes, might sing with her, Behold! from henceforth all Generations shall call me Blessed."

In his Sermon he fell foul upon the late Times of K. Edward, and the Preachers then; and called them Wolves that entered into the Flock: And that they did savagely butcher the Lord's Flock, and plunged numberless Souls into Hell. Afterwards he proceeded to Directions how to reform these Evils: And he told his Reverend Fathers and Brethren, that he thought it the wisest Course to recall those Ecclesiastical Laws which had been made before, and no need of great Labour to make any new Canons.

The Sermon ended, at the same Session the Bishop of London, as the Mouth of the Upper House (there being no Archbishop) had the Lower House chuse them a Referendary or Prolocutor; and so they adjourned. The next Session Dr. Hugh Weston Dean of Westminster, being chosen, was presented to the Bishops by Py Dean of Chichester, and Wimsey Archdeacon of London. Both which making their Speeches, and Weston accordingly accepted, he began his Harangue, and went on to a great Length, extolling the Bishops that underwent some Troubles in the late Reign, and aggravating their Sufferings, comparing them with John the Baptist, who was Beheaded; but that they had suffered far more bitterly: He for a short time lost his Head, but they for a long time struggled with Dolours, Terrors, Threats, Bonds, &c. And concerning the Book of Common-Prayers, he said, It was stuffed with Blasphemies, stored with Errors; which under the Name of Religion, took away Religion, &c. And that to the obtruding of this Book, they [meaning the Convocation of the Clergy] never gave their Consent; and for which they did now congratulate themselves.

Weston having done, the Bishop of London made a concluding Speech.

In this Synod great pains was taken to restore the abandoned Doctrines, and especially those of the Mass: Yet those few Learned Persons of the Reformation that were present, tightly disputed these Points with the rest, prevailing much in their Numbers. These brave and stout Men were Philpot, Haddon, Aylmer, and one or two more; whose Disputations may be read in Fox's Acts and Monuments. At last Four Points were defined by the Upper House, I. Of the Sacrament of the Altar. II. Of Transubstantiation. III. Of the Adoration of the Eucharist, and the Reservation of it. IV. Of the Substance of the Sacrifice of the Church, and of its Institution; and by whom and for whom, and to whom it is to be offered.

Out of these Doctrines were framed by this Synod Three Questions to be disputed on at Oxford by some Members of the same, and others, against Archbishop Cranmer, Bishop Ridley, and Mr. Latymer, who were sent down thither from London on purpose. The First was, That in the Sacrament of the Altar, by virtue of the Word of God uttered by the Priest, is present under the Kinds of Bread and Wine, really the true and natural Body of Christ, which was born of the Virgin; and also his natural Blood. The Second was, That after the Consecration there remaineth not the Substance of Bread, nor any other Substance, besides the Substance of Christ, God and Man. The Third was, That in the Mass is the Lively Sacrifice of the Church, propitiatory for the Sins as well of the Dead as of the Living.

On the 13th. of December, the Queen sent Her Mandate to Boner Bishop of London, forthwith to Dissolve and break up this Convocation, and to signify to the Bishops and the rest of the Clergy this Her pleasure.

The Queen inclines to Marry.

THE Queen was in Her 37th Year, and had hitherto been thought averse to Matrimony; whether by Nature, or from a Sense that Her Person was none of the most engaging; yet She began now to yield to the Necessity of Her Affairs, and to think of a Husband. She was afraid that Her Sex's Weakness might expose Her to the Contempt of Her People, while Her Throne was not yet fix'd, nor the Nation well recover'd from the late tempestuous Factions. There were Three at that time allotted by common Fame for Her Choice: Philip Prince of Spain, Son to the Emperor; Cardinal Reginald Pool, and Courtney Marquis of Exeter. The two latter had their Country and the Splendor of their Ancestors to recommend 'em; and there was hopes that under either of 'em the Liberty and Privileges of the Kingdom would be preserv'd. Affinity of Blood was respected in 'em all; Pool was much in the Queen's Affection, for his Gravity and Holy Life, joyn'd with the greatest Courtesy and Prudence; and Courtney for his Youth, good Humour, and his Courtly Address. But some Suspensions were rais'd against the latter, as if he favour'd the Reformation; and Pool being above Fifty Three Years of Age, 'twas thought too great a Chance, whether the Queen might have Children by him or not. Therefore 'twas Resolved to follow the Advice of those, who judg'd that the unfer'd State of the Kingdom requir'd some Potent Prince to compose Domestick Troubles, and to make War upon France, which was now become a very troublesome Neighbour. These Motives easily wrought upon an Ambitious Woman, and gain'd Her Consent to Marry Philip.

An Embassy from the Emperor to treat of a Marriage betwixt
the Qu. & Philip of Spain.

To treat of this Match, about the latter end of the last Year, the Emperor had sent over an Extraordinary Embassy, of which L'Amirall Count Egmont, was chief, and with him were join'd in Commission Charles Count Lataine, and John Memorancy. In the beginning of January, the Ambassadors being come to London, soon accomplish'd the Business. The Conditions of Marriage were these.

Articles
of Marriage.

"That Phillip being Marry'd to Queen Mary, shall take the Title of all the Dominions belonging to his Wife, and share with Her in the Administration; but that all the Privileges and Customs of the Realm shall be preserv'd, and the free and full Power of bestowing Preferments, Rewards, and Offices, shall remain in the Queen. The Queen shall reciprocally share in all the Dominions which Philip Her Husband has now, or which shall come to Him hereafter; and if She Survive him, for a Dowry, She shall receive the Yearly Sum of Sixty Thousand Pounds, as was formerly allow'd to Lady Margaret, Sister to King Edward the Fourth, and Dowager to Charles of Burgundy. Of this, Forty Thousand Pound shall be rais'd in Spain and Aragon, and 20 Thousand in the Low-Countries. And to prevent all future Disputes and Contention about dividing the Inheritance, 'tis covenanted, that the Children which shall Spring from this Marriage, shall succeed to all the Kingdoms and Dominions of Her Majesty; and moreover to all the Dominions of which the Emperor stands possess'd in the Low-Countries and in Burgundy. Charles, Philip's Eldest Son by his former Marriage, shall for his Share succeed to all the other Dominions in Spain and Italy, both of his Father and of his Grandfather the Emperor, but shall be oblig'd to pay the foremention'd Forty Thousand Pounds. If the Offspring of this Marriage be Daughters, the Eldest shall succeed to all the Dominions in the Low-Countries, on Condition that she choose a Husband in England, or in the Netherlands, with the Consent of her Brother Charles; but if she choose one elsewhere, without her Brother's Consent, she shall lose her Right of Succession to the Netherlands, and it shall devolve on her Brother Charles. But to her and her Sisters shall be assign'd a convenient Dowry according to the Laws and Customs of the places. If Charles, or his Successors, die without Issue, then the first-born of this Marriage, tho it be a Female, shall succeed to all the Dominions of both these Princes, as well in Spain as the Low-Countries, and to all the Principalities in Italy; and shall be oblig'd to preserve inviolate the Rights, Privileges, Immunities, and Customs of each Kingdom. That between the Emperor Philip and his Heirs, and the Queen of England, her Children and Heirs, and both their Realms and Dominions, shall be constant Friendship, Peace, and a perpetual and inviolable League. That the Leagues made at Westminster in the Year 1542. and four Years after at Utrecht, shall be renew'd and confirm'd.

When the Resolution of concluding this Match was generally known, many who were displeas'd at it took occasion to raise Calumnies, as if a Spaniard was to be set at the Head of Affairs, that he and his Creatures might govern at will, and overturning the Ancient Laws and Institutions, might enslave England like a Conquer'd Nation (1). These Murmurs were common and openly utter'd. But in private, Men's Censures were according to the Temper of those with whom they convers'd; to some they complain'd of the Changes in Religion, contrary to what the Queen had promiss'd Match.

(1) And so many Wise Men did think and believe, and assert long after; namely, That the chief intent of this Marriage of Philip with Queen Mary, on the part of England, was for the better and surer Establishment of the Papacy here: But the Spaniards secret Design, was to get the Possession of the Imperial Crown of this Realm to himself, and to make the English his Vassals for ever. And to this purpose Sir Francis Hastings (who lived in Queen Elizabeth's Reign) writeth, and had good Testimony for it; which may not be amiss to be here set down, as illustrating this Article of Queen Mary's Reign. 'This Marriage, saith he, was sought and intended also in shew, only to strengthen the hand of the Queen of England, to bring in the Romish Religion and Government

To others, they commiserated and bewail'd the Misfortune of Lady Jane, that so illustrious a Person shou'd be precipitated from the Throne, and condemn'd to a shameful and unmerited Death. Pity mov'd many, Religion some, but most the Dread of a Foreign Yoke; And others were excited by their private Hopes, and the Affectation of Change; so that an Insurrection was ripe, and seem'd to want nothing but a Leader; This Plot therefore was undertaken by Sir Thomas Wiat of Kent, who having communicated the Design to the Duke of Suffolk, to Sir Peter Carow of Devonshire, and some others, declar'd that no Attempt ought to be made till Philip's Arrival, that so whatever they intended, it might appear to the Publick they had taken Arms for no other Cause than to defend their Liberty from the Tyrannical Administration of a Foreign Prince. The rest agreed to this, and for the present they all retir'd home to their several Counties. There they apply'd themselves privately to provide Arms, Money, and all Things necessary, and gain'd as many as they cou'd into their Conspiracy. But Carow, whether mov'd by his Destiny, or because he thought delays wou'd be hazardous, began to raise Men in Cornwall; and thus discovering the Design before 'twas ripe, he was soon oppress'd and forc'd to fly into France, where he lay hid for a while, till at last being in appearance reconcil'd to the King, he was taken at Brussels, and brought a Prisoner into England. How he escap'd afterwards I do not find; but 'tis certain that he flourish'd for many Years under Queen Elizabeth; and at last dy'd peaceably in Ireland, in the Year 1577, as appears by his Monument in Exeter Cathedral (m).

With this Gentleman was taken at the same time, Sir John Cheek, Præceptor to K. Edward, who with Publick Licence had come from Strasburg to Brussels to visit the Queen's Agents there, as Fox says; or rather upon a business of Matrimony, if we may credit Thuanus (n). But be that as 'twill, 'tis certain he was pull'd from his Horse in the Road between Antwerp and Brussels, then bound with Cords in a Wagon, and lastly Hoodwink'd, and hurry'd on Board a Vessel, while he knew nothing whether he was a going, till he was brought into the Tower of London. There with Threatnings he was terrify'd to a Recantation, tho in his Heart he utterly abhorr'd Popery. His Affliction and Regret at this Action threw him afterwards into a fit of Sickness, which cost him his Life. I have been more particular in this Story, because some have related, into this Land, and to Establish it with Continuance; with Purpose and Meaning to add Strength to all the Corners of Christendom, to continue Popery where it was, and to bring it in where it was not. That so the Archprelate of Rome might hold the Scepters and Powers of al Princes and Potentates of Christendom in his hand, to dispose at his Pleasure. But the Plots and Practices laid and pursued by the Spanish King had made a woful Proof to England of a further Mark shot at, (which was discovered in a Letter to some of our Nobles from a true hearted Englishman in Spain) had not God Almighty in his rich Mercy prevented their Purposes, and Defeated them in their Determinations, &c. When he made way to joyn in Marriage with Queen Mary, he made semblance of great Conscience to Catholic Religion, and great care to bring in the whole Land into the Obedience thereof; and seem'd to glory much, when it was brought to pass, as his Letter to his Holy Father at Rome, written out of England, doth make shew; wherein he expresseth what a worthy Work he hath don, when he had drawn the Nobles and Commons of the Land to submit themselves to his Holiness, as their Chief (those are the very Words.) Yet little did the Nobles and Commons know what was intended towards them by this Catholic Child of Rome. For under this colorable name of Catholic Religion, was hidden the Ambitious Humour of a most proud usurping Tyrant, whose Resolution was, upon mature deliberation and consultation with his Machavillian Counsellors, to seek by al the possible kind means he could, to win the Principal of our Nobles to affect him; and in their Affection to possess him of the Crown; and so to establish him in an absolute Power over England. And to bring this to pass, he decreed to spare neither Cost nor Kindness.

And if once he had obtained the Crown and Regal Power into his Clutches, then (as in that Letter of Discovery is laid open) the Council-Table must be filled with his Counsellors: The Haven Towns must be possessed with Governors of his appointing; Fortifications must be made by his direction; And Souldiers of his own must be placed in Garrison, at places most apt for Strength to himself, and annoyance to this Nation. Then must the Common Law of this Land be altered: By which Justice is truly taught to al sorts; the Prince to Govern, the People to Obey; the Nobles to live of their own, without wronging the Inferiors; the Inferiors to live under the Nobles, with al Love, Reverence, and Dury; the Rich to dwell among the Poor without Oppression; the Poor to dwell with the Rich without Disorder; the Offenders to be punished without partiality; and the well-disposed to be Defended without respect of Persons. This the Law of the Land doth offer unto us, to our Comfort; and from this he purpos'd to make an Exchange to his Spanish Laws. Which being no better than his Spanish Inquisition (as indeed they are not) we could not without question receive great Comfort by the Exchange, &c. Their intolerable Taxes also we must have been pestered with, being such (as the Author reporteth who knew them well) as England was never acquainted with. The said Author did further unfold his treacherous purpose towards this Land, by discovering upon his own knowledge and hearing, this King's Intentions to be, by little and little to root out the Nobility; to keep the Commons in Beggery; and not to suffer one to live here that was born in Twenty Years before; but either to destroy them, or to make them Slaves amongst the Moors. The Colour whereof was, because they were born out of the Faith of the Catholic Church of Rome. And lastly, the faster to settle his Crown upon his Head (if he had gotten it) he laid his Plot to destroy Queen Elizabeth, having decreed with himself, that neither she, nor any of that Cursed Nation (so he termed it) should Govern England any more, &c. While this Plot was laid, and the Practice was in hand, to set the Crown upon the Spaniards Head, the Spaniards themselves (in the Author's hearing) often cursed the time that ever their King Married Queen Mary, unless they might get the Crown: But if that should be brought to pass (which was meant by making the Marriage) they should do wel enough, &c. And to knit up all, this Marriage could not draw the least Spark of true Love from him to this Noble Queen, who so lovingly made choice of him to be her Husband: Nor the Honourable Acceptation of him by the Nobles, could work any sound Love in him towards them.

(m) He dyed at Rosse in Leinster, a Province of Ireland. His Monument was erected at the Costs of his Nephew Peter Carew, who was Brother to George, whom K. James I. for his many Vertues created a Baron. So in the former English Edition.

Sir John Cheek.

(n) Cheek was Married already; and left his Wife in England, when he went Abroad: And seeing little hope of his safe or comfortable Dwelling in his Native Country, resolv'd to settle himself at Strasbourg among other English Exiles, both Learned and of Quality; where he also undertook the reading of a Greek Lecture, there being an University there. And now as it seems, had sent for the Lady Cheek his Wife to come over to him: and in his way to fetch her, and to conduct her home, (not to Mary her) he met with his Disaster. For so we must interpret that Clause of Sleidan, (and Thuanus probably from him) ut uxorem (not duceret, but) educeret.

1554. that Carow and Cheek were both bound to the Stake together, and burnt for the sake of Religion.

But let us return to Wiat; When he saw his Design was laid open, and that he had nothing to rely upon besides his Courage, he made an Insurrection in Kent, using that Argument common to almost all the Heads of Sedition, That the Queen being influenc'd by Evil Counsellors, had already done several things, and was daily contriving more, which were pernicious to the good of the Kingdom; that therefore some Course must be taken to get those Ministers remov'd, and others put in their Places, who might discharge their Trust like faithful Counsellors, and such as were more studious of the publick Advantage than of their private Gain. But above all, he clamour'd against the Spanish Match, and that 'twas highly necessary to try all means to break it off; an Alliance by which he plainly foresaw England was doom'd to the most insupportable Slavery, and the Popish Superstition wou'd be for ever Establish'd. Therefore what he had now in Design wou'd be for her Majesty's Service, (to whom he wish'd all Happiness) and for the Universal Benefit of the Nation.

But whatever his Pretences were, when about the same time the News was spread, that Suffolk was raising Forces in Warwickshire, no body was so blind as not to perceive that the Drift of all these Efforts was to depose Queen Mary, and restore Lady Jane.

Jan. 25. On the 25th of January, News came to London of the Kentish Rebellion; and the same day the Duke of Norfolk was sent to suppress it with a small Force, consisting chiefly of the Queen's Guards. The next day 500 Men were rais'd in the City, who being sent down the River to Gravesend, where the Duke waited for 'em; with these he resolv'd to Attack Wiat who lay at Rocheſter, and kept his Head Quarters in the old ruinous Castle of that Town. This Place is situate near the River Medway, where falling into the Thames, it is extremely violent: Over it is a Stone-Bridge, of which Wiat's Party had possess'd themselves, and fortify'd it with some Brass Guns, that they might oppose the Duke's Passage, whom their Scouts had inform'd 'em to be at hand. But he continu'd his March, not in the least daunted, and sent a Herald before, to proclaim a Pardon to all who wou'd lay down their Arms, and quit the Rebels Camp.

This was perform'd, but in so low a Voice, that the Proclamation was heard by very few; for one that stood by, held a Pistol to the Herald's Breast, and oblig'd him upon Pain of immediate Death, to deliver his Message softly: To which, all that were nigh enough to hear it, made Answer, That they were conscious of no Crime that needed Her Majesty's Pardon. Sir George Harper only, feigning Repentance, came over to the Duke of Norfolk, with design to try his Skill upon Bret, who Commanded the 500 Men we mentioned before, and persuade him to Desert. He accomplish'd this so luckily, that before they came up to the Enemy, Bret suddenly drew his Sword, and turning to his Men, entreated 'em to consider what they were going to do, and against whom they were Marching: Are they not, says he, our Friends and Countrymen, who have taken Arms to preserve the ancient Glory

1554. of the English Name, and to set us free at the hazard of their Lives, from Spanish Pride and Cruelty? You then, that are content to be made Slaves, may tarry a God's Name with your General there, the Duke of Norfolk: For my self, who had rather die a thousand times than be a Slave to the Spaniard, I'm resolv'd to seek better Fortune under the Noble Wiat; and I hope there are some at least among you, who will have the Wisdom and Bravery to accept of my Advice, and follow my Example. — He had scarce ended his Speech, when they all cry'd out, A Wiat! A Wiat! and began to turn their Arms upon those that follow'd 'em.

Norfolk was confounded at this sudden Revolt, and immediately fled, together with the Earl of Arundel, and Ferneſham Captain of the Guard. But Wiat came up that Moment with a Party of Horse, and intercepted the rest: He seiz'd 8 Brass Guns, and all Norfolk's Baggage; Then addressing himself to the Queen's Forces he exhorted 'em to joyn him in so just a Cause; but declared at the same time, that if any Man had a Mind to return to the Queen, he should have his Freedom: This only he said he would request of those Deserters of their Country, that at their Return they wou'd let Her Majesty and the People know, that Wiat call'd Heaven and Earth to witness that he did not take up Arms against his Sovereign, but only to oppose the Designs of Foreigners upon the Liberty of his Country. Then the 500 under Bret, with many of the Guards, and the greatest part of the rest presently joyn'd Wiat; who being flush'd with such a Reinforcement, resolv'd to march directly to London.

While these things pass'd in the City and in Kent, the Duke of Suffolk, who left the Town on the 25th. of January with his two Brothers, publish'd Declarations in many Places, inviting the People to take up Arms against the approaching Spaniards; but finding 'twas to no purpose, he began to think of making his Escape, when he heard that the Earl of Huntingdon with a Body of Horse was come from the Queen to seize him. He had then about Fifty Men with him: He knew 'twou'd be in vain to make any Resistance with so small a Party, in a Country that was not likely to assist him; therefore distributing his Money among 'em, he feign'd a Flight, and sending away his Brothers and the rest, he committed his Life to the sole Fidelity of one Underwood, whom he had made his Ranger at Astley. This Fellow promis'd to conceal him, till he shou'd have time to resolve on something for his Safety: But whether wrought upon by Fear, or by the hopes of a Reward, he deliver'd his Master to Huntingdon, by whom with a Guard of Three Hundred Horse he was brought to London, and Imprison'd in the Tower on the 11th. of February.

In the mean time the Queen being concern'd to keep the Londoners in their Duty, and more particularly when She heard of the Desertion of Bret's Men, came into the City February the 1st. attended by most of the Nobility, and in Guild-Hall made a Speech to the Citizens; in which vehemently inveighing against Wiat, She represented his Rebellion as black as possible; saying, "That he only made use of the Pretence of breaking the Spanish Match, to cover the most Villanous Designs. That having a little augmented his Norfolk abandon'd by his Forces, is forc'd to fly.

The D. of Suffolk solicits an Insurrection in vain.

Feb. 5th. The Queen's Speech to the Citizens

Bret with 500 Londoners Revolt to Wiat.

1554. "his Forces, he had proceeded to that degree of Madnefs and Impudence, as not only to pretend in the Affair of the Marriage, but to aim at the Custody of the Queen's Person, and to give Orders what Counsellors shou'd attend Her, and who shou'd be Discharg'd and Punish'd. That in the Treaty of the Match, She had done nothing without the Advice of Her Nobles: That having liv'd a Virgin the better part of Her time, She was not now so fix'd upon Marrying, but that if the States of the Realm thought proper, She wou'd gladly continue in the same Condition. For it wou'd go to Her Heart, to think that by reason of Her Contract, England shou'd be expos'd to the Miseries of Fire and Sword, and all manner of Confusion. Therefore She exhorted 'em to keep firm to their Allegiance, and be ready to assist Her just Revenge upon Traytors. For this was their Duty, as having with one Consent receiv'd Her for their Queen, and the Rightful Successor of Her Father and Brother.

Having thus confirm'd the Minds of the Londoners, She arm'd Five Hundred Men, most of 'em Forreigners; of which a select Party were posted to defend the Bridge, and the rest dispos'd in proper Places thro' the City.

Feb. 3d.
Wiat
comes to London.

Two Days after, on the 3d. of February, Wiat came to London with Three Thousand, or as some say Four Thousand Men: He had conceiv'd mighty hopes that he shou'd presently be admitted into the City, and accomplish his Ends without striking a Stroke; but he was deceiv'd. For advancing to the Bridge, he found it possess'd by the Queen's Forces: However he remain'd in Southwark two Days, expecting that his Friends in the City wou'd in that time contrive something for his Assistance. But when he saw he did but lose his time, he march'd to Kingston, ten Mile from London, to take the Advantage of the Bridge there: He found it cut down, and Two Hundred Men posted on the opposite Bank; but these were soon dispers'd at the sight of two Pieces of Ordnance brought up against 'em. After which, Wiat with great diligence got the Bridge repair'd, and in the Evening brought over his Army: Then thinking that every thing now depended upon the swiftness of his Motion, without allowing his Soldiers any Rest, he march'd for London, hoping to reach it before Break of Day, and surprize the Queen unprepar'd to oppose him. Perhaps too he had not been disappointed, if Providence, which seldom prospers Rebels, had not by an unexpected Event retarded their March, or rather infatuated their Minds, that for a Trifle they might lose the opportunity of effecting their Design. They were now within six Miles of the City, when it happen'd that a Carriage of one of their Great Guns broke; so that it cou'd not be brought any further. Some Hours were lost in repairing it, and Wiat wou'd not be persuaded to leave it behind him; so that by this means he was not able to come up at the Hour appointed by his London Friends. Upon which, many despairing now of Success, fled from their Colours, and left him not above half the Number of his Forces. Among the rest, Sir George Harper, who had shar'd all his Secrets, to expiate his feign'd Revolt by betraying his Companions, went directly to the Queen, and discover'd the whole Conspiracy.

Her Majesty was in great Consternation at it, and raising in all haste some Forces, gave the Command of 'em to the Earl of Pembroke. Wiat hearing of this, slacken'd his March, that he might not bring his Men fatigued against fresh Soldiers; so that by a slow Motion he reach'd the Suburbs about Noon. Then planting his Ordnance on a Hill beyond St. James's, he left there the greatest part of his small Army, and advanc'd with Five Companies towards Ludgate, while Cutbert Vaughan with two Companies more, leaving St. James's on the Left, march'd towards Westminster. This was probably intended to make a Diversion, and favour Wiat's Passage by terrifying that Part of the Town. At Charing-Cross Sir John Gage, Lord Chamberlain, with the Guards and some other Soldiers oppos'd Wiat. But whether unable to sustain the Shock, or having receiv'd new Orders from the Queen, who perhaps was fearful of Vaughan, they soon retir'd in disorder to the Court, and fill'd it with Tumult and Confusion. The Earl of Pembroke in the mean time infest'd the Enemy's Rear, who halting forward, and not facing about to receive him, lost a considerable Number. But the Rebels boldly continu'd their March, crying out, Long live Queen Mary; and pretended that She had graciously granted their Requests. Then coming to Ludgate, they demanded Entrance; but being answer'd with nothing but Reproaches, they determin'd to return to their Companions the same way they came, when unexpectedly they found themselves Surrounded by the Earl of Pembroke's Horse. Clarenceux King at Arms press'd Wiat to yield, and not by drawing on himself the Blood of so many Valiant Men, forfeit all Hope of the Queen's Mercy. The Soldiers seem'd resolute to try the worst of their Fortune, but Wiat in Despair surrender'd himself to Sir Maurice Barkley, who carry'd him directly to the Queen. The Rebels having lost their General, made no further Attempt; some of 'em fled, the Prisons were fill'd with the rest. Thus on the 6th. of February was this Flame of Rebellion extinguish'd.

The Punishment of the Prisoners was next taken into Consideration; the first thing resolv'd, was the Execution of Lady Jane, who had been Sentenc'd on the 13th of November, but was Repriev'd till now, not without some hopes of a Pardon. But since 'twas plain by Experience, how dangerous it wou'd be to let her Live; to remove all Cause of Sedition 'twas thought fit to hasten her Death. To prepare her for it, Dr. Fecknam Dean of St. Paul's, and afterward Abbot of Westminster, was sent to her, and had orders to endeavour her Conversion to the Roman Religion. She was so far from receiving this fatal Summons with Terror, that she devoutly Bless'd God for it, but said, she had no time to spare now for Controversies, and thought that little which was allow'd her ought rather to be spent in Prayers and Supplication. Fecknam mistaking her Design in this Answer; as though she desir'd a Reprieve, went to the Queen and obtain'd three Days. Then returning immediately, told her what he had done, and Exhorted her to hearken to his Arguments, and to learn a better Faith. She answer'd with a pleasant Countenance, 1554. Alas! Sir, I did not intend that what I said should be reported to the Queen, nor would I have you think me covetous of a Moment's longer Life, which ever since your Departure has been so burdensome to me, that I am only solicitous for a better Life in Eternity, and will gladly suffer Death, since 'tis her Majesty's Pleasure. When the Dean continu'd still to urge her Return to the Romish Church, she made such extraordinary Answers, that whoever reads that Dispute, (for it was afterwards publish'd) must be astonish'd to observe in one of her Age and Sex, such Constancy of Mind, sound Learning, and acute Wit. Her Husband, the Lord Guilford, being first to suffer, had obtain'd leave to see her, and take his last Farewell; but she would by no means consent to it, beseeching him to omit this as a fomenting of Grief, rather than a Consolation in Death, for they should shortly have an Interview in a better place, and be joyn'd in a stricter Union. Yet she had such Presence of Mind, as to look on him through the Window, when he pass'd to the Scaffold, and saw his headless Body afterwards brought back in a Cart to be interr'd in the Chappel of the Tower. There was no doubt but the Death of this innocent unhappy Lady would excite Pity and Regret. 'Twas determin'd therefore not to bring her to the usual Place of Execution. But a Scaffold was erected within the Tower, where about an hour or two after her Lord, on the 12th of February she was Beheaded. When she was brought out to suffer, the Lieutenant of the Tower desir'd her to Favour him with some Memorial of her, upon which she ask'd for a Table-book, and wrote Three short Sentences in Greek and Latin (of both which Tongues she was a wonderful Mistress) and in English, by which she asserted her Innocence; and tho she own'd she had committed a Capital Error, yet she thought that among Men her Ignorance might without Injury to the Laws, have been allow'd in Excuse of it. At last having Saluted the Crowd as she went, with an unconcern'd Countenance, and desir'd their Prayers, she came to the Scaffold, holding Doctor Fecknam by the hand, whom she kindly embrac'd, saying, God will abundantly requite you, good Sir, for your Humanity to me, tho it gave me more uneasiness than all the Terrors of my approaching Death. Then turning to the Spectators, she modestly related her Misfortune after this Manner.

"I am Condemn'd, not for grasping a Scepter, but for not refusing it when offer'd; and my Death will be a memorable Instruction to Posterity, that Innocence is no Excuse for great Facts which tend to the publick Detriment; for 'tis criminal enough to be made, tho ever so unwillingly, the unhappy Instrument of another's Ambition."

Having said this, she commended her self to the Divine Mercy; then with the Assistance of the Ladies her Attendants, she took off her Gown, and the Ornaments of her Head and Neck, and having cover'd her Eyes with a Handkerchief, laid her Neck on the Block, and hasten'd the Executioner when he delay'd to do his Office, which was at last perform'd, and drew Tears from the Eyes of the Spectators, even of those who from the first had espous'd Queen Mary's Party.

Such was the End of Lady Jane, a Person illustrious by Birth and Titles of her Ancestors, but much more so by her own Virtue and noble Endowments of Mind, who, says Thuanus, sway'd by the Ambition of her Father-in-Law, and of her Imperious Mother, assum'd the fatal Title of Queen; and being suddenly hurry'd from a Throne to a Scaffold, suffer'd for Guilt not her own, surmounting all these Inflexions of adverse Fortune by her Innocence and amazing Constancy.

The Death of this illustrious Lady was follow'd two days after by the much juster Execution of Wiat's Accomplices. Twenty Gibbets were erected in several Parts of the City, on which, upon the Fourteenth and Fifteenth of February Fifty of the Rebels were hang'd. On the 18th of the same Month, Alexander Bret, who carry'd over the five hundred Londoners from the Duke of Norfolk, was sent down to be Executed in Kent, with abundance more, many of which were Persons of Condition and Figure. On the 20th, Four hundred of Wiat's Party came with Halsters about their Necks, and obtain'd the Queen's Pardon. February 23. Henry Gray, Duke of Suffolk, Father to Lady Jane, whom the Queen had formerly pardon'd, having receiv'd Sentence of Death on the 17th of the same Month, was beheaded, as indeed he deserv'd, being the chief Cause of all the Troubles which had hitherto distracted this Reign.

On the Eleventh of April came on Wiat's Execution, who in hopes of a Pardon, and instigated (as 'tis suppos'd) by some malicious Instruments, among others whom he discover'd as privy to the Conspiracy, nam'd the Marquis of Exeter; insinuating, that in Revenge of Queen Mary's refusing him the Honour of being her Husband, he had conspir'd to Depose her, and by Marrying her Sister usurp the Throne. Upon this Accusation, the Marquis was committed to the Tower on the 12th of February, and the Lady Elizabeth on the 18th of March. But Wiat as he was going to Execution, being touch'd in Conscience, desir'd to see the Marquis, and on his Knees begg'd his Pardon for having been induc'd by hopes of Life to load him with so foul a Calumny. This was afterwards testify'd by the Sheriffs, and many others, who saw and heard it. But the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor, who, fearing a Change of Religion by the Lady Elizabeth, was observ'd to use his utmost Endeavours to take her off, declar'd openly in the Star-Chamber, and cited the Lord Chandois as Witness to it, That Wiat a little before his Death had press'd the Marquis of Exeter to plead Guilty, and throw himself on the Queen's Mercy. This however had not the least Face of Probability; for 'twas certain, and universally known, that Wiat at the place of Execution, seeing no hope of a Pardon remain, when he was preparing to dye, did in the most solemn and religious Manner declare aloud, that the Lady Elizabeth, and Courtney Marquis of Exeter, were not all concern'd in his Treason.

April the 27th, Lord Thomas Gray was Beheaded for having push'd forward his Brother the Duke of Suffolk, and been the chief Instrument to engage him in Wiat's Conspiracy. On the 19th of May the Lady Elizabeth was remov'd from the Tower to Woodstock; and on the 25th, the Marquis of Exeter, to Foderin-

About the same time, Cranmer, yet Archbishop of Canterbury, Ridley lately depriv'd of the See of London; and Hugh Latimer, who long before resign'd his Bishoprick of Worcester, were remov'd from the Tower to Windsor, and thence to Oxford, there to Dispute publickly with the Divines of both Universities, concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. They were forc'd to engage in this upon the most unequal Terms imaginable; for, having but Two Days allow'd 'em to prepare for it, they were all the while kept close Prisoners, and not suffer'd to speak with any Friend, nor allow'd the Use of their own Papers and Books. The Controversy was nothing but Clamour and Confusion; and they were attack'd by several asking the same Questions at once, without either Order or Civility. On the 14th of April, being brought from their Prisons to St. Marys, they were commanded to Subscribe to the Popish Doctrine; which when they refused, several Days were appointed 'em for Disputing. The 16th. for Cranmer, the 17th for Ridley, and the 18th for Latimer; at which times they were singly to Answer to all Opponents. Tho' they were confounded with Noise, and distracted with the Multitude and Variety of Questions propos'd together; tho they were abus'd with Scoffs and Reproaches, and over-born with Numbers, yet they extorted the unwilling Admiration of their Adversaries: For Cranmer answer'd with the greatest Learning, and with a Gravity becoming that Dignity he had so many Years possess'd; Ridley with wonderful Promptitude and Acuteness; and Latimer with a pleasant Sharpness, and with more Strength of Reason than could be expected from a Man who was near Four-score. After this Dispute, on the 20th of the same Month, they were brought again to St. Marys, and being ask'd, whether they persisted in their Opinions; when they affirm'd that they did, they were adjudg'd Hereticks, and Condemn'd to be Burn'd. They all receiv'd the Sentence with admirable Constancy; Latimer even Triumphing, that God would Honour him with so glorious a Period of a long Life, which according to Nature must quickly have expir'd. What became of these excellent Persons afterwards, we shall relate in the next Year's Transactions.

In the mean time, on the 2d of April, the Parliament met (e), to whom the Queen propos'd Two Things; her Marriage, and the Restoring the Pope's Supremacy. The last of these she cou'd not yet Obtain; the other was assented to on certain Conditions, such as follow:

Account of the Queen's second Parliament.

Vol. II. p.
277.

(e) This Second Parliament began April 2. on a Monday in this first of the Queen. Then the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor, declared the Parliament to be called for Two Causes; viz. For the Corroboration of true Religion; And touching the Queen's Highness Noble Marriage. The Knights, Citizens and Burgesses, chose Robert Brook Serjeant at Law, and Recorder of London, for their Speaker: Who on Friday following made his Eloquent Speech before the Queen, the Lords and the Commons, in the waiting Chamber at Whitehall, within the Palace at Westminster. Saturday, April 7. the Second Bill that was read was, touching the Regality of any King in this Realm, that the same is as much invested in the Queen; that is, in the Females, as in the Males. The Ninth Day it was ordered to be engrosed, and the 10th it underwent this Title, That the Regality and Crown of this Realm is as much invested in the Queen's Highness, as in any of her Noble Ancestors. Being assented to, it was sent to the Lords by Mr. Speaker. The Author of the Reformation of the Church of England giveth Secret Reasons for this Bill. I am apt to think this Reason ought not to be excluded: Viz. To prevent any Disturbance that might arise from an Opinion broached by some of Q. Mary's Enemies, That it was unlawful for a Woman to Govern: To prove which, Knox and others published Books in English some time after.

The 10th day was the Bill first read, touching the Articles agreed on for the Marriage between the Queen and the Noble Prince Philip of Spain, Son and Heir to the Emperor CHARLES the Fifth. Which Bill was read again the 11th. And again the 12th day.

Another considerable Bill brought into this Parliament, and pass'd at last, was for the restoring and erecting the Bishoprick of Durham; which the Queen had done as much as She could before, by Letters-Patents. This Bill (whereby many were like to become Losers) met with much opposition; because King Edward had given and sold away to the Town of Newcastle, and to other particular Persons, some Parts of the Lands and Revenues of the said Bishoprick: First, the Burgesses of Newcastle exhibited a Proviso for the Town of Gateside, and the Salt Meadows to continue annexed to Newcastle, according to an Act made in the late Reign. Another Proviso was brought in upon another Reading of the Bill, for certain Lands, parcel of the Bishoprick, that had been granted to Sir John Jobson by King Edward VI. and another Proviso general for Sir Francis Jobson, for his Patent of those Lands. Tunstall the Bishop of Durham finding the Bill thus like to be clogged, came into the Lower House himself, and declared his whole Cause concerning his Bill, and his Troubles occasioned by the late Duke of Northumberland; and afterwards required the House to consider his Bill. The Day after, which was the 19th Day of April, there was an Argument upon the Bill; and upon the Question the House divided, and the Number that said Yes to the Bill was 201; and the Number against it was 120. But it was agreed by the House, that Mr. Speaker in their Names should require the said Bishop to shew favour to Sir Francis Jobson in this Suit. But in the Act there is neither Consideration nor Proviso made for the Town of Newcastle, or any other Persons, except Francis Earl of Somerset, to enjoy the Bishop's House of Coldherber in the Parish of Albhallows Barking, London, and three other Messuages or Tenements in the Parish of Grafchurch, London, which K. Edward had given him.

There were several Bills brought in and read about Religion (which was the second great Business of calling this Parliament) but pass'd not into Acts: As a Bill to revive certain Statutes touching Heresies and Lollardies. Another (to be even with that) to avoid the Statute of the Six Articles, made 31 H. 8. And another, that the Bishop of Rome shall not convent any Person for any Abby Lands. Which was read again; to the Bishop of Rome was added, or any other Spiritual Person; meaning, perhaps, Cardinal POLE, who was e're long to come as his Legate. Another, for extirpating Heresies, and Erroneous Opinions and Books: Another, to avoid Pensions of Married Priests: Another, for the Election of Scholars in the Universities: Perhaps that such only should be elected in such Places, as should subscribe or swear certain Matters for the surer preserving them in Papistry. Another Bill for avoiding Playing Houses. Another, for Unlawful Assemblies.

These Bills either could not, or perhaps were not thought convenient now to pass, and so were stop'd either in the Lower or Upper House; the Matters for the further Establishment of the Popish Religion, being as it seems intended to be more fully prosecuted in a longer Session than this could be; and another Parliament being likely to be better disposed to do it, after the Marriage with Catholic PHILIP.

House.

This may be noted further in this Parliament, that one Mr. Beaumont of the House of Commons, and his Wife, had served a Subpœna upon the Earl of Huntington in Parliament time. Whereat the Lords were offended: And April 17. sent some of the Judges to the Lower House, bringing the Subpœna with them; and prayed the Order of the House for that Offence. And it was ordered that Eight of the said House should declare to the Lords, That they took this Writ to be no Breach of Privilege.

May the 5th in the Afternoon, the Queen came into the Parliament Chamber, and gave her Royal Assent to 15 Acts; and then that Second Parliament was dissolved.

"That the Prince of Spain shou'd not Advance any to Publick Offices, but such as were Natives of England, and Subjects to the Queen. That he shou'd admit a certain Number of English in his Household, whom he shou'd treat with Respect, and not suffer 'em to be insulted by Foreigners. That he shou'd not carry the Queen out of England, unless She desir'd it, nor any of the Children which might spring from this Marriage; who shou'd be Educated in England; nor suffer'd to go out of the Realm, but upon Necessity, or some good Reason, and that with the Consent of the English. That if the Queen shou'd Die without Issue, the Prince shou'd have no Claim in the Kingdom, but shou'd leave it free to the Legal Successor; and shou'd make no Innovations in any of the Rights, either publick or private, the Immunities or Customs of the Realm, but shou'd preserve 'em entire and inviolate. That he shou'd not be permitted to Transport any Jewels or Goods belonging to the Crown, nor to Alienate any of the Royal Patrimony. That he shou'd preserve the Shipping, Artillery and Stores, and keep in good Repair the Castles and Fortify'd Places. Lastly, That this Match shou'd not at all derogate from the League lately concluded betwixt the Queen of England, and the King of France; but the Peace shou'd remain inviolate between the English and French: Yet the Prince shou'd be at Liberty to send Aids out of other Kingdoms and Dominions to his Father the Emperor, either to keep off Injuries, or to revenge those already receiv'd.

All things being thus agreed, and no Impediment remaining to obstruct the Nuptials, Philip Embark'd, and setting Sail July 26. from the Groine, arriv'd three days after at Southampton, with a Fleet consisting in all of a Hundred and Sixty Sail; among which were 20 English, and as many Flemish. From Southampton, where he rested three days, attended by a numerous Train of Spaniards and English, on the 24th. of July in a very wet day he came to the Queen at Winchester. The Festival of St. James, the tutelary Saint of the Spaniards, was the Day appointed for the Nuptials, which were celebrated at Winchester with great Magnificence. At which time Don Juan Figueroa in the Emperor's Name resign'd the Kingdom of Naples and Sicily, and transferr'd all Right therein to Philip. Their were their Titles publickly proclaim'd by the Heralds in Latin, French, and English. (p) About the beginning of August the Royal Pair came to Basing, and thence to Windsor, where King Philip on the 5th. of the same Month was Install'd Knight of the Garter. August the 11th. they made a splendid Entry at London, being receiv'd by the City with all manner of Expence and Solemnity.

On the 11th. of November a Parliament met again. (q) About the beginning of this Session, Pole came into England, who had been declar'd by King Henry the Eighth an Enemy to the State, had been created Cardinal by Paul the III. and might have been chosen Pope if he had consented in time, and who (as we before observ'd) had been mark'd out by some as a proper Husband for the Queen. (p) But neither the Queen, nor the Nation were likely to have any great Blessing of this Spanish PHILIP: For, (as it was Recorded of him, and experienced in his Reign very amply) in Dissimulation he surpassed all Nations, till he had obtained his Purpose; and when he could once prevail, he went beyond all in Oppression and Tyranny. Also, that he disdain'd all other Nations; and in Pride and Carnal Voluptuousness, no Nation came near him. And these were the Qualities of this Prince, whom the Queen had now against the Grain of the English, obtained for Her Husband.

Sir Fran. Hastings's Watch- word, p. 92.

(q) Queen MARY'S Third Parliament, commonly called the 1. and 2. of Philip and Mary, began the 12th. of November. The Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, declared this Parliament to be called for Confirmation of True Religion, and other weighty Affairs. After his Oration was ended, the Knights, Citizens and Burgeses came to the Commons House, and there did elect and chuse Clement Higham, Esq; one of the Privy-Council, to be their Mouth and Speaker; who was brought to the Chair by Mr. Treasurer and Mr. Comptroller. The said Mr. Speaker, Nov. 15. made an excellent Oration, comparing the Body Politick to a Body Natural: And in the End, made Three Petitions; viz. For free Speech in the House: Liberty from Arrest and Trouble for the Commons, and their Servants: And to have ready Access to the King and Queen for the Ease of the House. Which being granted, the Lord Chancellor Prorogued the Court until Saturday following; which was the 17th. Day of November.

Journ. House of Commons.

This Parliament made it self remarkable for two Things: One was for taking off the Attainder of Cardinal Pole, 31 H. 8. The other for obtaining a Reconciliation for the Realm to the Pope, all whose Power and Supremacy had for many Years been abolished. The former was done with great speed, and much Honour to the Cardinal: For on the 19th. of November, the Bill to take off his Attainder was brought from the Lords by the Master of the Rolls, and Master Solicitor: And the same day it was read once, and a second time: And the next day, being the 20th. it was read the third time, and pass'd. And the 21st. it was sent up to the Lords by Mr. Treasurer, and Mr. Speaker; and Mr. Treasurer declared to the House, that the King and Queen would be the next day in the Afternoon in the Parliament-House, to give their Assents to this Bill: And accordingly about Three a Clock, in the Parliament-Chamber, the Royal Assent was given to the Bill, and so made it a perfect Act.

What was done in this Par- liament.

On the 27th. day of November, Mr. Speaker declared, it was the King and Queen's Pleasure, that the House should be to Morrow at the Court, to hear a Declaration of the Lord Cardinal concerning his Legatie. On the day after hearing the said Cardinal's Declaration, Mr. Speaker shewed that the said Legate had moved them the Commons, to come again to the Unity of the Church from the which they were fallen. And the Matter of the Rolls, and Mr. Solicitor declared from the Lords, that they had appointed the Lord Chancellor, four Earls, four Bishops, four Barons, to confer with a Number of the Commons House; who immediately were sent unto them. The Lords aforesaid, together with the Commons, appointed certain Persons to draw up a Supplication to the King and Queen: Which was Engrossed; and then it was agreed by the House to be presented to the King and Queen. Whereby it was implored that these Realms and Dominions might again be united to the Church of Rome, by the Means of the Lord Cardinal Pole. The next day, viz. the last of November, being Friday, in the Afternoon, the Lords and Commons being present at the Palace before the King and Queen, the Supplication was read in Latin, and then exhibited by their Majesties to the Lord Legate; who, after making an Oration of the great Joy that was for the Return of the lost Sheep, did by the Pope's Holiness's Authority, give Absolution to this whole Land, and the Dominions of the same.

The Copy of this Supplication and Submission exhibited to the King and Queen, by the Lords and Commons of A. & Parliament, and the Absolution pronounced by the Cardinal hereupon, are both preserved by Master John Fox. Mon. The Book 10.

Vol. II.

1554. fault of another rather than his own, with the Leave of the new Pope Julius, he withdrew into the Territory of Verona to a Monastery of Benedictines, call'd Maguzano; of which Order he had been Patron while he continu'd at Rome. While he thought to live in private there the remainder of his Days, the News of King Edward's Death and Queen Mary's Succession, drew him once more to Rome. He knew very well how Zealous a Daughter of the Roman Church the Queen was, and hop'd with very good Reason that Julius, who much esteem'd him, having by Pole's Delays been chiefly assisted to obtain the Papacy, wou'd now send him with the Honour and Authority of a Legate into England. From this he promis'd to himself the absolute Direction of the Church at least, if not the State, by virtue of his Legantine Commission, and the Dignity of Archbishop of Canterbury. While he was a Child, Queen Mary had been Educated for some time under the Care of his Mother Margaret Countess of Salisbury, by the Direction of Queen Catharine; who was suppos'd to have design'd a Match for her with one of the Countess's Sons, to strengthen her Title to the Crown, in case King Henry dy'd without Male-Issue; for this Lady was Daughter to George Duke of Clarence, Brother to Edward the Fourth. The Cardinal, whether for this, or for any other Reason, knowing himself to be in great Esteem with the Queen, was sure, if not of the Crown by Marriage, yet of all the highest Advantages of Her Favour. Nor was he deceiv'd: For Mary no sooner was advanc'd to the Throne, than she invited him over with very great Promises; and the Pope knowing he wou'd be a faithful Solicitor of his Interest in England, at the Queen's Request, sent him immediately with ample Authority (r). But the Emperor, who seems somewhat jealous of the Cardinal's Project, and had another of his own in favour of his Son Philip, which he design'd by all possible means to promote, began to treat earnestly with Cardinal Dandino, the Pope's Legate at his Court, about concluding of a Peace between himself and the French. By this Stratagem he design'd to retard Pole in his Journey, that he might not arrive in England soon enough

The News of this Reconciliation King Philip wrote in a Letter in Spanish to the Pope, with wonderful Joy; and Cardinal Pole in Latin: Both dated November the 30th. that is, the very day wherein the Matter was done. The Translation of both are likewise preserved in Fox's Martyrology.

The Evil of this Submission to the Pope, and Union with the pretended Catholick Church, soon appeared, by the several Bloody Acts that pass'd this Session, and the Bloody Actions that followed in this Kingdom during the rest of the Reign. The Acts were these:

An Act to revive Three Statutes made for the Punishment of Herefy; viz. the 5. R. II. the 7. H. IV. and the 2. H. V.

An Act repealing all Statutes, Articles and Provisions, made against the See Apostolic of Rome, since the 20th. Year of King Henry VIII.

An Act for Traiterous Words, spoken or to be spoken against the Queen.

An Act whereby certain Offences are made Treason.

Besides these Bills that pass'd, other Bills were brought in that pass'd not, intended for the hampering of Ministers and People of the Protestant Religion; as,

A Bill for those that had been Married Priests, or Seditious Preachers, not to be Schoolmasters.

A Bill against Seditious Schoolmasters. This Bill was, as it seems, new-made, and intitled, A Bill against Erroneous Schoolmasters.

A Bill to avoid Leafes made by Married Priests.

Another Bill, (which perhaps was the same new-modelled) touching Leafes by Spiritual Persons, to be avoided after Resignation and Non-Residence.

January 16. in the Afternoon, the King and Queen gave their Royal Assent to One and twenty Bills; 17 whereof are printed. And thereupon this Parliament was Dissolved, having done and undone enough of Conscience.

(r) This ample Authority wherewith the Pope dispatched our Cardinal, will appear by the Bull wherein he constituted him his Legate de Latere, and by a Commission he gave him for the reconciling of the Clergy and Laity of England to the Church of Rome: Which Commission is extant in an Act of Parliament in the 1. and 2. of Philip and Mary, cap. 8. and may there be read. But the Bull being not so common, may not be unworthy to be set down in this place.

Pole's Reg. transcrib. thence in Ant. Har. Coll. F.

'JULIUS Episcopus Servus Servorum, &c. i. e. JULIUS Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, to our beloved Son called REGINALD POLE, Cardinal, Deacon of St. Mary in Cosmedin, Our and the Apostolic See's Legate de Latere, to our most dear Daughter in Christ, MARY Queen of England, and the whole Realm, Health and Apostolical Benediction. It began with this Preface; 'That if at any time it might be said, The Right Hand of the Lord hath done mighty Things, now certainly it might most evidently be so spoken; yea, now was the time, that most joyful Sentence might be celebrated by all Pious People with Gladness and Acclamation. For what should we say else, but that the Right Hand of the Lord hath brought to pass this so surprizing Change of Things; that the most flourishing Realm of England, after it had been seduced by Henry VIII. into a Separation and Departure from the Catholic Church, and next by the Succession of his Son Edward, strengthened and confirmed in his Father's (and so Hereditary) Error, should now on a sudden come to that State, to be (as it seems) in a very fair and ready way to be recalled into the Holy Sheep-Fold of the Catholic Church. Truly this was nothing else but a Change wrought by the Right Hand of the most High.' And so the Bull went on, shewing the wonderful manner of the Queen's Access to the Throne: Then proceeding unto Pope Julius's Part, 'That he, according to his Paternal Care of the Universal Church, committed to him by God, and according to that Charity with which he ought more especially to be endowed towards the English Nation, as a peculiar Daughter of this Holy See, over which he presided without any Merits of his own, but by the only Providence of God, being begotten by the Seed of God's Word scattered there in former Times by the procurement of his See; neither could, nor ought to be wanting to the Hope and Holy Confidence, that this said Land, having a Catholic Prince, would easily be turned into the Way of the Catholic Faith, and restored to the Communion of the Church.

'That therefore after very mature and deliberate Thoughts, he the Cardinal, was not only the first, but the only Man that occurred to his Mind, to whom above all he might commit this Care: And that consulting with his Brethren the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, by their unanimous Assent and Consent, he made choice of him, as his and the Apostolic Sees Legate to the same Queen MARY, and the whole Realm of England. For whether he had regard to the Place of his Birth, or the general Love that all had towards him, which ought to be, and so was very great; or the Knowledge of the Language of that Country, and their Customs and Inclinations; or his Authority and Esteem by reason of the Royal Blood whence he was sprung, or of his singular Prudence and Eloquence in all Respects; or (which was the chief of all) his most ardent Love and Duty towards God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Holy Catholic Church, now well known and experienced; or lastly, whether he regarded his Person, which the high Giver of all good Gifts had adorned with these and many other Vertues; He judged him most fitly qualified for this Legation. Wherefore

1554. enough to disconcert his Measures. Dandino therefore, to gratify the Emperor, sent Letters to Pole by Francisco Commendano, advising him not to set forward yet, for the Emperor was displeas'd with that Legacy, which was undertaken without his Approbation; besides, that the English for the most part, and especially the Londoners, had such an Aversion to the Pope, that a Legate ought not to be sent, till they were brought to a Temper to admit of it. Pole having receiv'd these Letters at the Monastery of Maguzano, thought it not proper to proceed till he had further Orders from the Pope; who being jealous of the Emperor's increase of Power, by the Accession of so many Dominions, resented Dandino's officiousness, and recalling him, conferr'd on Pole the whole Legatine Power both into England, and to the Emperor and the French, for transacting a Peace.

Pole willingly undertook this double Charge, and now began his Journey; when he came to Trent he dispatch'd Expresses both to the Emperor and the King of France to certify them of his Commission. The Emperor perceiving that he was no longer to be delay'd by Stratagems, sends Mendoza to him, with Letters plainly confessing his Fear, that Pole's further Progress wou'd obstruct some Affairs of great Moment depending; and therefore he desir'd him to stay where he was, till those Affairs were concluded, or to proceed to Liege and there expect his further Orders. Pole, upon the Receipt of these Letters, return'd to Dilling, not far from Trent, from whence he certifies the Pope of the whole Business, and writes at the same time an Expostulation to the Emperor, representing what an Indignity 'twas, that his Holiness's Legate sent to transact the Cause of Peace and of Religion, shou'd be stop'd in the midst of Germany, in the view of Hereticks, and that by his Imperial Majesty's own Direction, to the utmost Disgrace of the Holy Chair. Domingo Soto, a great Divine, and Preacher in ordinary to the Emperor, was then at Dilling. By him he presses the Emperor that he wou'd no longer retard him, to the great Detriment of Christianity, and especially of the English Nation. At last, when his Imperial Majesty had receiv'd advice, that the Marriage Articles were agreed on, Pole with much difficulty obtain'd leave to come to him at Brussels, but on Condition that he shou'd tarry there till the Nuptials of Philip and Mary were Solemniz'd. To Brussels therefore he came, where having pay'd his Devoirs to the Emperor who receiv'd him with a World of Civility, that his time might not be Consum'd to no purpose, he enters upon the other Part of his Commission to mediate a Peace between his Imperial Majesty and the King of France. He try'd the Emperor first, who seeming not averse to it upon reasonable Terms the Cardinal goes to France to treat the same Affair, but in short, such was the in-1554. veterate Hatred betwixt these Princes, that he cou'd effect Nothing; yet King Henry had made as fair a shew as the Emperor, and Embracing Pole at his Departure, declar'd a wonderful Sorrow that he had not the Happiness to know him sooner; for he wou'd not have wish'd to see any other in the Pontifical Chair; if he had been truly appriz'd of his great Virtues.

A little after his return to Brussels, came the Lords Paget and Hastings Embassadors to the Emperor from Philip and Mary, who signify'd their earnest Desire to see the Cardinal, and desir'd his Dismission by the first Opportunity, that by the Pope's Authority he might settle the Ecclesiastical Affairs in his own Country, which by a long Schism had been miserably disorder'd. In September he had leave for his Departure, but was detain'd till the next Month by adverse Winds, and then embarking, soon arriv'd at Dover.

He was receiv'd by the King and Queen with the highest Marks of Honour, as likewise by all the Nobility who seem'd at least to be full of Joy. And because in the year 1539 he had been attainted by the Parliament, the Act of Attainder was now repeal'd, the King and Queen coming to the House after an extraordinary manner to Sign the Repeal before his Arrival at London. A little after his coming, both Houses were assembl'd, and the King and Queen being present, the Lord Chancellor having notify'd the Cardinal's grateful Arrival, Pole himself in his native Tongue made a long Speech, full of extraordinary Acknowledgments to their Majesties, to the Lords, and Commons, by whose favour his Banishment and Proscription being repeal'd, he was restor'd to the Rights and Privileges of his Native Country: "And the best Return, he said, which in Duty and Gratitude he cou'd make for so great an Obligation was this, that since by the late Schism they had become Exiles from the Unity of the Church and the Kingdom of Heaven, he wou'd by Authority from Christ's Vicar bring 'em back to the Fold, and so restore 'em to their heavenly Inheritance. Therefore he exhorted 'em ingenuously to acknowledge and detest the Errors of the late times, and with sincere alacrity of Mind to accept and retain the Benefit which God by his Vicar's Legate offer'd to 'em. For, since he was come with the Keys to open to 'em the Church Gates, nothing now remain'd than that as they had open'd a way for his Return, by abrogating the Laws which made him an Exile, so they should abrogate all those Laws too, which being lately made against the Apostolical See, wholly seperated them from the Body of the Church.

His Speech to the Estates in Parliament.

After he had made a long Harangue to this Effect, and ransack'd Antiquity for Examples to shew how religiously their Forefathers were

'Wherefore by these present Letters he recommended this Office to the Cardinal's Circumspection: That he taking it upon him, according to that his Piety towards God, that Reverence towards him [the Pope] and the Holy See, with that Study and Love of his towards the Christian Commonwealth, would perform it with Faithfulness, Diligence and Dexterity; and would omit nothing to obtain, by the Assistance of God, the desired Fruit of his Legation, by comforting those that were fallen into Error, and restoring them to the Grace of God, and the Communion of the Holy Catholic Church. The hope of which he especially placed in the Mercy of God, and, next to God, as well in his Care, Prudence, and Virtue, as in the godly Piety, Wisdom and Devotion of Queen MARY. It was Dated at Rome, at S. Mark's, the Year of our Lord 1553. August the 5th, the Fourth year of his Pontificate.

1554. devoted to the See of Rome, the Gravity of his Countenance, his smooth Language, and the elegant Method of his Discourse, so sensibly affected the Devotees of Popery, that they believ'd themselves just then regenerated to the hopes of Salvation: Yet there were some of the House of Commons who strenuously oppos'd the submitting again to the Roman Yoke; but in fine, by the pressing Instances of the King and Queen, all things were concluded to the Cardinal's Satisfaction. The Pope's former Authority in this Realm was restor'd, and the Title of Supreme Head of the Church abrogated from the Crown; a Petition for absolving the Clergy and Laity from the Crime of Heresy was presented by the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellour, to the Legate, who pronounc'd the Absolution in English, all the Estates Kneeling. After this they went in Procession to the Chappel Royal, Singing Te Deum; and on the Sunday following, at Paul's-Cross the Bishop of Winchester in his Sermon related the particulars of that Day's Proceedings.

The Pope's Supremacy restor'd, and the Realm absolv'd.

An Embassy sent to Rome.

Things being thus order'd, a most honourable Embassy is appointed to the Pope, which the Queen had promis'd upon her first coming to the Crown. For as she then resolv'd to Re-establish Popery, she had privately written to Pole and inform'd him of her Designs. The Pope, upon this, had dispatch'd Giovanni Francisco Commendano, his Chamberlain, who was afterwards made a Cardinal, into England, to inspect the State of the Nation. He had some secret Conferences with the Queen, and receiv'd a Paper from her, in which under her hand she promis'd Obedience to the See of Rome, and desir'd that the Realm might be absolv'd from the Interdict; to obtain which, she oblig'd her self to send a Solemn Embassy as soon as the State shou'd be Settld. Accordingly, about the End of this Year, the Bishop of Ely, Sir Anthony Brown, and Edward Carne Doctor of Laws, are sent to Rome, in the Name of King Phillip and Queen Mary, to promise Obedience to his Holiness and the Apostolick Chair. But all this preparation was to no purpose; for before they Arriv'd the Pope was dead.

In the mean time the Queen finding all her Measures hitherto crown'd with Success and Applause, while the House was still sitting, began to try the Nobility, upon permitting

Philip to wear, if not the Imperial Crown which the Kings of England wear at their Coronation, at least the Crown of the Queen-Consort. But finding 'em averse to this*, she forbore any further Motion of it.

Her next Endeavour was the Restitution of the Church-Lands; but because the greatest part of 'em had been many years possess'd by the Nobility, nothing cou'd be effected. Only 'twas decreed that the first Fruits and Tenths granted to the King by the Clergy, in the Year 1534. should now be remitted. Yet this Decree was soon revok'd, because the Treasury was so low, and so great the Pensions to be paid yearly to the ejected Monks, that such a Branch of the Revenue cou'd not be spared.

About this time happened an absurd (not to say a ridiculous) thing, occasion'd by the Queen's Credulity, and increas'd by the Flattery of those about her. She had a Swelling in her Belly, by a Distemper which Physicians call a Mole, or something of the like Nature. And other Symptoms seeming to concur, she gave her self up to the Tales of Midwives, and neglecting the Advice of Physicians, believ'd so certainly she was with Child, that she affirm'd she felt the Motion of the Embryo. 'Tis usual it seems in that Distemper, for the fleshy Substance which is call'd the Mole to seem sometimes to move, and that with a slow and gentle Agitation of the whole Belly. But there were other Indications, if she had taken proper Advice, which made it not difficult to know the Distemper, which is generally incurable, if not apply'd to at first. So that in process of time, her Liver being over-cool'd, she fell into a Dropsy, which is usual, as Fuchsius and other Physicians write. In the mean time, the Queen's Error being fomented by Sycophants, not only was fatal to her in a few years, as she afterwards own'd, but in the mean time expos'd her to the infinite Scoffs and Ridicule of her Enemies. For on the 27th of November, the Privy-Council sent some Mandates to the Bishop of London, requiring him to cause Te Deum to be sung, and a general Thanksgiving to be given to Almighty God for his great Mercy to this Realm, in giving her Majesty certain hopes of an Offspring, by quickning the Embryo; and that the Priests shou'd pray for the preservation of the Queen and the Infant, and for her happy Delivery. A Form of Prayer was compos'd for this Occasion, and printed Copies of it dispers'd through the whole Kingdom. Several things were enacted in Parliament relating to the future Education of the Babe; and much ado there was with all the necessary preparations of Cradle, Swadling-Clouts, and such Trumpery to no purpose, for at last in the Month of June they were undeceiv'd, and the Nation wak'd from this ridiculous Dream. (s).

This

(s) Hollingshed in his Chronicle hath exemplified the Letter of the Privy-Council to Boner Bishop of London, concerning the Queen's supposed quickening with Child: The Contents whereof were, to direct and order him that the good News of it should by him be published in all parts of his Diocese; and that he himself should give God Thanks in his own Person for this special Grace; and to give out his Commands, that Thanks be returned openly by singing of Te Deum in all Churches; and that all Priests and Ecclesiastical Persons in their Masses and Divine Services, continually pray to God that this Thing begun by his Omnipotent Power, might be continued and brought to good Effect. There be also the Prayers to be used on this Occasion, set down in the said Chronicle, which are Three in Number; whereof one, used, I suppose, in the Abby-Church of Westminster, is said to be made by Dr. Weston Dean of that Church.

And that which was done by Parliament upon this expected Heir of the Crown to be Born, was, That King Philip the Father, being requested by the said Parliament, that if the Queen should be taken out of the World during the young Years of the Issue or Issues of her Majesty's Body, he would take upon him the Rule, Order, and Education of the said Issue. Upon which Request, the King did promise to accept and take upon him the said Care and Charge of the Education of such Child, and that during the time of such Government of such Child, he would study and travail to advance the Weal of this Realm, according to the Trust in his said Majesty reposed: And so according to that Purport an Act was made. But happy it was, that the Heir of this Kingdom, and the Kingdom it self had no Occasion for the Government of that King of Spain and his Spaniards.

Anno Dom. 1555. Reginae Mariae, 2. & 3. Philippi 1. & 2.

Prisoners Discharg'd, Jan. 18. ON the 18th. of January, the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, with six others of the Privy-Council, coming to the Tower, discharg'd several Noble Prisoners; viz. The Archbishop of York, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir James Croft, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir Nicholas Arnold, Sir Edward Warner, Sir George Harper, Sir William Sentlow, Sir Gavin Carew, and Sir Andrew Dudley, the Duke of Northumberland's Brother; and besides these, William Gibs, Cutbert Vaughan, Harington, Tremain, and others. The Archbishop for having Marry'd was Depriv'd, and his See fill'd with Nicholas Heath, formerly Bishop of Worcester, remov'd by King Edward, and lately restor'd by Queen Mary; Hooper (the former Bishop) being ejected and condemn'd to be Burn'd. Rogers and Crofts were afterwards of the Privy-Council to Queen Elizabeth, and flourish'd many Years in great Authority with Her. Throgmorton, a very subtle Man, was thought to have been the Contriver of Wiat's Rebellion; his Life therefore was principally aim'd at: But when he was Arraign'd, by his most ingenious Answers he so eluded the Accusation of his Adversaries, that after Ten Hours spent in his Trial, the Jury brought him in not Guilty; for which they were afterwards severely Fin'd.

The Marquis of Exeter discharg'd. About the beginning of April the Marquis of Exeter was sent for; and a little after, the Lady Elizabeth, who were brought from the Tower to Court. The Marquis was soon discharg'd: But it was long debated, what shou'd be done with Lady Elizabeth; for the Papists were resolv'd to take away her Life by the first opportunity, if they cou'd have found the least Colour for it. The Bishop of Winchester, upon any Discourse concerning punishing Hereticks, is reported to have said, We may shake off the Leaves, and lop the Branches, but if we do not destroy the Root, the Hope of Hereticks, (meaning Lady Elizabeth) we do nothing. But after the strictest Scrutiny, no probable Ground of Accusation appearing, tho' 'twas suggested by some that her Liberty wou'd indanger the Queen, yet at the Intercession of Philip, who affected the Reputation of Clemency, about the latter end of April she obtain'd her Freedom: But 'twas with this Condition; That she shou'd be oblig'd to keep in her Family Thomas Pope, one of the Privy-Council, Gage, and some others, who were to be constant Spies upon her Actions.

And Lady Elizabeth. This small Spark of Clemency was obscur'd by very great Flames of Cruelty which broke out this Year, to the destroying of great Numbers of Pious Men on the sole account of Religion. On the 4th. of February, John Rogers was burn'd, the Proto-Martyr of those Times. He was the Companion of Tindal, who first Translated the Bible into English; after whose Death, fearing Persecution, he declin'd returning into his own Country, but (being newly Marry'd) went with his Wife to Wittenberg: There having attain'd a competent Knowledge of the German Tongue, he became Pastor of a Church; which Trust he faithfully administer'd, till in King Edward's Reign he was recall'd from Banishment, and made a Prebend and Lecturer of St. Paul's by Ridley Bishop of London. When Mary was fix'd in the Throne, the Papists endeavour'd to terrify him with Threatnings, that he might fly to a voluntary Exile, forbidding him to stir from his House. Thus he liv'd for almost a Year; till at last, since he refus'd the Occasion given him for Flight, they threw him into Prison, and condemn'd him to the Flames; which cruel Death, tho' he had a Wife and Ten Children, he endur'd with an interpid and amazing Constancy.

The same Death on the 9th. of February suffer'd John Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester first, and afterwards by King Edward made Bishop of Worcester too. He had been very diligent in procuring Boner's Deprivation, which probably now prov'd his Ruin: For no sooner had Mary got the Crown, than he was sent for to London, imprison'd in the Tower, and finally condemn'd as a Heretick. In K. Henry's Reign he pass'd much time in Germany, where he Marry'd a Burguignon; and among several Learned and Pious Men with whom he convers'd, had peculiar intimacy with Bullinger, to whom he was extremely indear'd by his Knowledge, and the agreeable sweetness as well as sanctity of his Manners. After his Condemnation, he was sent to Gloucester, that he might suffer in that Place where he was thought to have done most harm by sowing the Seeds of Heresy; while he himself was not a little joyful that he had an opportunity of Sealing with his Blood the Truth of his Doctrine, before the Eyes of those to whom he had so often preach'd it.

The same Course was taken with Ferrar, Ferrar, who was brought from London to his own Diocess of St. David's, to be judg'd there by the new Bishop Morgan; by whom being Condemn'd, he was Burn'd on the 3d. of March in the Market-Place at Carmarthen. He was a Man of a rigid Temper, and rough Beha-

In fine, concerning this Spanish Match and this mistaken Presumption of an Heir, it was the grave Observation of a Wife and Reverend Man of that time; viz. 'If open Contempt of true Matrimony were not thoroughly Punished and Plagued in some certain Mariages, which then were so gloriously begun, so gorgeously set out and advanced, so greatly rejoyced at, and such wonderful Fruit certainly looked for; and in Conclusion, how it succeeded, how it ended; what it brought forth, &c. Here I cease, and leave it untouched.

1555. viour; which drew on him much Trouble even in King Edward's Days, and was now perhaps his Destruction: For having been prefer'd to that Dignity by the Duke of Somerset, after his Death this good and Learned Man by the unhappy Moroseness of his Manners, which even border'd upon Arrogance, rais'd against himself Accusers. Two of these, who were Bishops afterwards under Q. Elizabeth, easily prevail'd with the Faction against Somerset, to get Ferrar imprison'd. Thus being in Custody at Queen Mary's Accession to the Throne, he was brought before the Bishop of Winchester; and 'tis very probable, that by a little Temper in his Answers, and a discreet Regard to the Times, he might have sav'd himself (without wrong to his Integrity) from the Hands of bloody Men, as several had done, who were not engag'd in the Cause of Lady Jane, nor had any other way notoriously affronted the Patrons of Popery; whose Flight was therefore conniv'd at; or if they were taken, they were soon discharg'd again at the Intercession of their Friends. But Ferrar, sway'd by his natural Severity and ungovern'd Passion, gave such bold and provoking Answers to the Bishops, that 'tis not to be admir'd it went so hard with him.

Besides these, Laurence Saunders an excellent Preacher was Burn'd at Coventry; Doctor Roland Taylor at Hadley; John Cardmaker Chancellor of Wells, at London; as likewise that eminently good and Learned Man, John Bradford: And not to enumerate all Particulars, a great Number of both Sexes were Sufferers this Year, for their Faith in God; the greatest part of which were destroy'd by Boner's Butchery.

But I must not pass by in silence Ridley and Latimer, who being Sentenc'd the last Year, were now brought out on the 16th. of October, and bound to a Stake in the Town-Ditch over against Baliol College in Oxford, where, in the sight of the Students they were Burn'd. 'Tis said that Cranmer, from the Top of the House where he was a Prisoner, beheld that mournful Spectacle; and falling on his Knees, begg'd Constancy of Hope and Faith for his Companions, to support 'em in their Torments; as likewise for himself, who was not ignorant that he must shortly follow 'em. But his Execution was deferr'd for the present, by the means (as 'tis reported) of the Bishop of Winchester; and that not out of Pity, but Ambition, and a Regard to his own Profit. (r)

On

Matters of this Parliament.

(r) The Queen's Fourth Parliament began at Westminster, Monday, Octob. 22. called 2. and 3. of Philip and Mary. In the House of Lords sat the Queen, and next in place the Lord Cardinal Pole, now Archbishop of Canterbury. The Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor declared this Parliament was called for necessary Aid to be made to Her Majesty. The Commons House by entire Voice, chose John Pollard, Esq; profoundly Learned in the Laws of this Realm, their Speaker. One of the main things done this Parliament, (besides the Subsidy) was the restoring of the First Fruits and Tenths, and Improprations in the Queen's Possession, to the Church. The Bill for which, how it was carried, shall be shewed by and by.

On Wednesday the said Speaker made his Speech. Then a Bull was read from the Pope's Holiness, confirming the Declaration of the Lord Cardinal, touching the Assurance of Abby-Lands to the present Possessors. After which, the Speaker, with the Commons, departed to their House.

I shall specify some Things of more special Remark, done in this Parliament. When they had given the Queen a Subsidy, and two Fifteens; the Speaker declared, the Queen gave them Thanks for the two Fifteens, but was contented to refuse them.

November the 16th. The Speaker declared the Queen's Pleasure to be, that he with a convenient Number of the House, should be before Her Highness that Day in the Afternoon. Whereupon Fifty were nominated. The next Day Bourn Secretary of State, and Mr. Speaker, declared the Queen's Pleasure spoken to them the Day before; viz. That She was minded to part with the First-Fruits and Tenths, and all the Improprations of Benefices in Her Hands: And how the Lord Cardinal at the same time spake, that these were Spiritual, and so to be applied to the Church, and Spiritual Uses. The Bill brought in for this Purpose, ran in these Words; That the King and Queen did Surrender, and give into the Hands of the Pope's Holiness the First-Fruits and Tenths, &c. from the 8th. Day of August last. The next Week it was read again twice; viz. on Thursday, and Saturday. Then, (as it is in the Lords Journal) it was thus worded, Read the Third time the Bill for the Extinguishment of the First-Fruits, and touching Order and Disposition of Rectories and Parsonages Improprate; and touching Tenths of Spiritual and Ecclesiastical Promotions, remaining in the Queen's Majesty's Hands. Which was concluded, the Viscount Hereford, and Lord Cobham dissenting; and committed to James Dyer Serjeant at Law, and the King and Queen's Attorney, [Sollicitor, as the Journal of the Commons House] to be carried to the Commons. The Day when it was brought, (being November 23.) it was read, and committed to Cecil and others to be Articled. The 16th. of November it was read the Third time; and the 27th. long Arguments were in the House upon it. The last time I meet with it was December 3. and then I suppose it pass'd, tho' with difficulty; and was sent up to the House of Lords, with a Schedule annexed to it, requiring certain things to be added to the Bill; whereunto the Lords upon Debate assented.

A barbarous Murder Exam-

Parliament.

The barbarous Murder of one Giles Rufford of Edlesburgh, in the County of Bucks, Esq; procured by one Benediſt Smith of the same Place, gave occasion to a special Act of Parliament, to prevent his escaping Death, that he had so justly deserved, by the favour of the Law of the Clergy. This Smith, upon an old Grudge against the said Rufford, had hired two Russians, named Coniers and Spencer, with the Promise of 40 l. to kill the said Gentleman; and gave them two Javelyns and a Dagge to commit the same Murder. After divers Attempts to do it, Coniers did at last execute the Bloody Fact in Huntingdonshire, September 10. last; for which the said Smith sent him a Gold-Ring, and 20 s. in part of Payment. This Murder being (as it is in the Act expressed) one of the most detestable and heinous ones, all the Circumstances considered, that had been done or committed within the Realm in any Man's Remembrance; they enacted, that if the said Benediſt Smith were hereof lawfully Endicted, or appealed as Accessary to the said Murder, for procuring the same, and were thereupon found Guilty, he should not be admitted to the Privilege and Benefit of his Clergy, but put from the same. The Fact was so notorious, that the House was resolved to examine all the Parties concerned in it: So on the 18. Novemb. the House ordered two of their Members that were of the Queen's Council, to move Her, that Smith, who was in the Tower, and his Accusers might be brought personally to the House, to be transmitted before them to examine the Crime. The 22d. of Novemb. Spencer was brought in by a Serjeant; who declared at length, that Smith promised Coniers 8 l. to kill Rufford; and also the manner how he was killed by Coniers beyond Huntingdon. Coniers next brought in, confessed the same; and that he himself killed him, and not Spencer; but that he was with him then. When Smith was brought in, he utterly denied the Fact, and all the Circumstances. Godfrey, Servant to Smith, declared that he carried a Letter, a Ring, and 30 l. in Money by his Master's Command to Spencer, after the Murder was done; and justified to Smith's Face the same. Rowland a Taylor confessed before Smith, that he sent him to Coniers and Spencer, to go out of the Realm for Flanders: For which Message Smith gave Rowland 10 s. Coniers and Spencer avowed to Smith's Face all his procurement to the Murder; which he still denied. Whereupon all, save Smith, were had out of the House; and then Smith confessed that he consented to the Murder, and promised to give Coniers 20 l. for doing it. The same Day the Bill against Smith for the Murder of Rufford was assented to, after a Third Reading.

1555. On the 24th. of March Dy'd Pope Julius III. Marcello Cervino was elected to succeed him; a Man of extraordinary Learning and Sanctity, and particularly remarkable for his Saying, — That he did not see how 'twas possible for a Pope to be sav'd. From his distinguishing Character 'twas reasonable to hope for a Reformation of the Church; but he fill'd the Chair but Two and twenty Days, and then dy'd. His Successor Cardinal Cassia, who took the Name of Paul the Fourth, had engag'd formerly in sharp Contentions with Cardinal Pole, of which the Bishop of Winchester was not ignorant, and therefore deals privately with the new Pope to make him a Cardinal, and transfer to him Pole's Legatine Authority. The Pope by his Hatred to Pole was easily inclin'd to grant this Request, designing moreover to cite his old Enemy to Rome, there to accuse him of Heresy, and treat him as he afterwards did Cardinal Morono.

Pole's most intimate Friend, whom he kept in Prison as long as he himself liv'd. By this means, Gardiner well hop'd he shou'd get into the See of Canterbury, which Pole yet held in Sequestration, nor wou'd enter upon it any otherwise so long as Cranmer liv'd; 'Twas with this cunning Prospect, that Gardiner is believ'd to have protracted Cranmer's Execution, that Pole might not settle in the Archbishoprick. But while his whole Thoughts were thus engag'd, he was seiz'd with a Dropsey, which swelling from his Feet and Legs up to his Belly put a Period to his Life on the 12th of November. He was buried with great Pomp in his Cathedral at Winchester (u).

This Year, on the 25th of October, the Emperor Charles the Vth, having determined to resign his Dominions, at Brussels in a Convention of the Estates, transferr'd his Kingdoms and Principalities to his Son Philip, whom he had before made King of Naples and Sicily.

His death Nov. 12.

The Emp. Charles V. Resignation.

Amo 10

The 7th. of December, Saturday, Mr. Comptroller declared the Queen's pleasure to dissolve this Parliament on Monday. So on Monday, December the 9th. about One of the Clock, the Lords with Mr. Speaker and the Commons, came before Her Highness at the Palace at White-Hall; and after the Royal Assent given to 24 Bills, the Parliament was Dissolved by the Marquis of Winchester, upon the Queen's Commandment, the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, being now Deceased.

Many other Bills were read in this House, which proceeded not to Acts: Some whereof were these. A Bill touching the Absence of Knights and Burgesses in Parliament time: Afterward the Bill was Worded, For Bills not their Appearance in Parliament. A Bill that went through all this Queen's Parliaments, and in the Reign of the King before her, but never perfected; though it were engrossed 26th of October; And a new Bill to the same purpose brought in under this Title; For Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, to be attendant at Parliament. Passed.

A Bill touching Leases made by Spiritual Persons, [to the damage and prejudice, I suppose, of their Successors.]

A Bill, that no Mens Servants, wearing their Cloths [or Liveries] should be Justices of Peace, but the Kings and Queens. To prevent as it seems, the Inconvenience and Prejudice that might happen to the Queen's Subjects from the Dependents of Noblemen, [or other great men, who might distribute Justice partially in favour of their Lords and Masters.]

A Bill, that certain Persons might peruse the Penal Laws, for Reformation; for the Continuation of certain Statutes. This passed the next Parliament.

A Bill, that Out-Lawries should be declared once in the Parish Church where the Defendent is dwelling.

A Bill, that the late House of Black-Fryers may be within the Liberty of London.

A Bill for Silk Weavers and Silk Woven, and for wrought Silk from beyond the Seas. Another Bill for Silk-Workers of London. [Perhaps the same new modelled.]

A Bill for the Town and River of Stamford.

A Bill for a more grievous punishment of Murther. [Occasioned perhaps from the Murther of Mr. Rufford.] As also another Bill, viz.]

To punish procurers of Murthers and Felonies, not to have the Benefit of Clergy or Sanctuary. That such should not have the Benefit of Clergy, was made an Act the next Parliament.

A Bill to review the Act for killing of Crows.

A Bill for the Dutcheffs of Suffolk, and other Persons gone over the Seas, without the Queen's Licence, and contemptuously remaining there, notwithstanding the King's and Queen's Letters Patents to them, or Proclamations openly made for their calling home. [This was to be a Check upon the Noblemen, Gentlemen, Clergy, and Learned Men, and other Exiles, that were fled abroad for the Liberty of their Religion and Consciences.]

A Bill to avoid Licences made by the Queen, her Father, or Brother. [These Licences therefore were not Licences from Rome, as the Author of the History of the Reformation writes; but Licences, (too common in those times) that dispensed with some Ecclesiastical or other Laws of the Land: As Licences to great Persons to eat Flesh in Lent and other fasting days, for themselves, and as many as should come to their Tables: Again, Licences to some, to give Licences to any of their Servants, to shoot in Crossbows or Handguns at any Fowl; or with Licence of the Owner, at any manner of Deer, Red or Fallow. Licences for Merchants to bring into the Realm Merchandizes forbidden. Many such kind of Licences and Warrants may be met withal in these times. This Bill against Licences was read the 16th of November; the 20th following, the Speaker with others of the House waiting upon the Queen, and making no mention of these Licences to Her; Story, one of the Members, kneeled down to her, and complained, that Mr. Speaker did not open to her, that Licences might be restrained, as had been spoken in the House. This Act of Story's, the Speaker reported to the House, and prayed their Advice therein. To which it was answered, That it seemed to the House that Story spake of good Zeal; and therefore his Fault towards the Speaker and the House was to be remitted, he confessing the same. The next day he confessed his Fault, saying, That he would hereafter use more Discretion; and required Mr. Speaker and the House to remit it. And thus much of this Parliament.

Story a Member, his irregular Forwardness.

(u) Where his Effigies upon his Monument is yet to be seen, but broken and defaced. No Inscription appears on his Tomb. He died after the Queen had by his Means, Pains, and Policy above the rest, brought back the Church of England to downright Popery, and unravelled al that King Henry and King Edward for many years had been doing, for casting off the Yoke of a Foreign Power, and promoting a Reformation of corrupt Religion. He came to the Parliament the first day of its Sitting, which was October 21. Monday; and was there again the Wednesday following, when the Queen was present, and the L. Cardinal, and a splendid appearance of Both Houses: Absent ever after; and from the 13th of November and so downward, his Name is left out of the Journal Book of the Lords House. So that it seems he fel Sick, October the 23, or 24. and so continued till the day, or the day before his Name is wanting in the said Journal. This Character must be left of him to Posterity, That he was a most bitter and cruel Persecutor to death of those that conscientiously adhered to King Edward's Reformation. And one that lived in his time, and succeeded in his Bishoprick in King Edward's time, gave this Description of him; That he was of a Swarthy Colour, hanging Look, frowning Browes, Eyes an inch within his Head, hooked Nose, wide Nostrils, ever snuffing into the Wind, a Sparrow Mouth, great Hands, and long Talons rather than Nails upon his Toes; which made him go very uneasily; but a notable natural Wit, improved by Study and Experience.

A Counterfeit Edward VI.

ON the first day of the New Year, Nicholas Heath, Archbishop of York, receiv'd the Seal, and was made Lord Chancellor.

In March a Comet appear'd for Twelvedays, (viz. from the Fifth to the Seventeenth) in the 20th Degree of Libra.

On the 13th of the same Month one William Fetherstone, a Counterfeit King Edward was Executed. This Fellow was a Miller's Son; and being somewhat like the King in Stature and Features, and about the same Age, he acted this Imposture, for which he had been whip'd through the City the last Year. But not being reclaim'd, he continu'd his Boasts, and caus'd Letters to be dispers'd that King Edward was yet alive, for which he was at last deservedly hang'd.

Cranmer
examin'd at Oxford.

And now we come to give an Account of the memorable Martyrdom of Archbishop Cranmer. Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, being Dead, Pole, who was yet the Pope's Legate, appointed James Brook, Bishop of Gloucester, for Cranmer's Trial, because 'twas thought unlawful to punish an Archbishop without Leave from his Holiness. With him were joyn'd John Story and Thomas Martin, Doctors of Laws, and Commissioners from the Queen, who accompany'd the Bishop to Oxford for this Purpose. They had lofty Seats prepar'd for 'em in St. Mary's; Brook took his place under the Consecrated Host, which hung in a Pix after the Roman manner: On each side a little lower were seated Martin and Story; then Cranmer was brought before 'em, not habited like a Bishop, but only as a Doctor of Divinity; and being inform'd that besides her Majesty's Representatives, there was present too, the Representative of their most holy Father the Pope, he saluted the former with the greatest Reverence, but wou'd not so much as turn his Eyes on the Bishop of Gloucester; and that, as he afterwards confess'd, not out of Contempt of his Person, but lest he might appear to pay any Deference to the Pope's Authority, which he said, he had oblig'd himself by Oath to King Henry never to acknowledge, at least in England, where, he said, the Pope cou'd have no Pretension of Right. Upon this, each of 'em with many Persuasions urg'd him to change his Opinion, and return to the Unity of the Catholick Church. When he refus'd to comply with this Advice, they cited him to appear within Fourscore days before his Holiness, which, with her Majesty's Leave; he undertook to do. But the Pope, not expecting his coming, in less than Twenty days by Letters to the King and Queen, commanded that he should receive Condemnation, and be deliver'd to the Secular Arm. A little afterwards therefore, new Powers were granted by the Pope to Thielby, Bishop of Ely, and Boner, Bishop of London, to degrade Cranmer from his Orders Presbyteral as well as Archiepiscopal, and give him up to the Civil Magistrate to be

Burn'd; which on the 14th of February was accordingly perform'd.

While Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer liv'd together, these holy Men by frequent Letters mutually animated one another with unshaken Courage, to suffer Death it self for the Truth of the Christian Faith. But this intercourse being put to an end, by the taking away the two latter, the Desire of Life began to sieze upon Cranmer, and his Constancy was weaken'd by the subtilty and restless Importunity of a Spanish Fryar. So that, seduc'd with the hopes of a Pardon, he retract'd in writing the Doctrines he had formerly taught; which Retraction was afterwards printed and publish'd: But this avail'd him little; for whether it were that Pole wou'd no longer endure to be kept out of the Archbishoprick, or (which is more probable) that the Queen's deadly Hatred of him, and thirst of Revenge for her Mother's Divorce, wou'd be satiated by nothing but his Blood; after he had been deluded into the firmest Confidence of Life, he was barbarously hurry'd to Death, and burn'd with the most savage Cruelty in the same place, where Five Months before, his Friends Ridley and Latimer had been crown'd with Martyrdom. The day being fix'd for his Execution, one Cole, by the appointment of Cardinal Pole, preach'd a Sermon on the Occasion at St. Mary's. Cranmer was brought thither and plac'd over against the Pulpit, and exhort'd by the Preacher to persist in the Faith of which he had lately publish'd a Confession, and that to Death it self; which, he told him, 'twas the Will of the Magistrate to inflict on him this day. That the Divine Vengeance for the Death of Moor and Fisher under King Henry cou'd not otherwise be satisfy'd. But before his Execution 'twou'd be most acceptable to God and all good Men, if he wou'd make publick Declaration, that his Conversion to the Unity of the Catholick Church was Real and Sincere.

'Tis no wonder that Cranmer was in the utmost Consternation at such an unexpected Denunciation; yet recollecting himself, he rose from his Seat, and without the least Discovery of Fear, made an excellent Speech to the People, in which having promis'd many things concerning Reformation of Life and Morals, he repeated the principal Heads of his Doctrine, and briefly explain'd his Faith, affirming, that in the power of the Pope was contain'd and establish'd the Kingdom of Anti-Christ; and finally, represented how heinously he had offended God by renouncing the Truth. He declar'd therefore his Resolution, That his Right Hand which had so impiously sinn'd, in subscribing the Doctrines propos'd by the Enemies of Truth, should be the first to suffer Punishment. He wou'd have proceeded, but was hinder'd by the Clamours and Reviling of the Romanists, whose Hopes he had so fairly eluded, and hurry'd immediately to the Place of Torment. There he stood, expos'd, the most

'ence." In his younger Years bred under Cardinal Woolsey, and so brought up to State Business: Upon Woolsey's Disgrace, he was taken by King Henry into his Service, and became his Secretary of State; and was sent Ambassador to the Pope. He was very Obsequious to that King, and forwarded all his Inclinations; and especially was very instrumental in his Divorce from Queen Katherine; under whose Daughter nevertheless, this present Queen, he obtained so much Favour and Honour.

1556. piercing Spectacle in the World, sufficient (one wou'd think) not only to extort Compassion from his Enemies, but to melt inanimate Things into Tears: The Primate of England, that lately Flourish'd in the highest Honour and Authority with Princes, most venerable for his great Sanctity of Life, for his Age, Person, Learning, Gravity, and innumerable Excellencies of Mind, now by the Malice of the Romanists, dress'd in a ridiculous old Habit, baited with Scurrility and contemptuous Revilings, and drag'd to a most inhuman and tormenting Death. When he was bound to the Stake, as soon as the Fire was kindl'd, he rais'd his Left Hand to Heaven, and thrusting out the other, held it in the Flames, not removing it, except once to stroak his Beard, till it was quite consum'd. At last, as the Flame encreas'd, lifting up his Eyes, he cry'd out, Lord, receive my Spirit! and continuing as motionless as the Stake to which he was ty'd, endur'd the violence of the Torture till he expir'd. Tho' his Body was consum'd to Ashes, his Heart was found intire and untouch'd: Which remarkable Accident, if it had happen'd to one of the other Party, must certainly have Canoniz'd him. And here let not the Reader be offended, if I make a little bold with the Rules of History, and insert these Verses written in Latin by our Countryman Skinner, on the Martyrdom of so extraordinary a Man.

Succubuit sanctus Præsul CRANMERUS, iniqua Pontificum Rabie, fraude doloq; perit. Quod Verbi invicto dejecerat Ense Papatum, Quod docuit pura quærere mente Deum; Quodq; Antichristi subverterat impia Regna, Regna piis Anglis, heu! tolerata diu: Hinc pius & clemens crudeli addicitur igni, Dantur & innocui Membra cremanda Viri. Huc ubi jam ventum est, dextram projecit in ignem, Projectamq; tenens, talia dicta dedit: Primum peccasti, primum & sentire dolorem Debes, ob Christo dextra inimica meo! Immotamque tenet, dum deflagraverat omnis, In cineres totam dum cecidisse videt. Cætera cum pereant flamma (mirabile dictu) Cor manet illæsum post ubi flamma perit. Ecce invicta fides! Cor inviolabile servat, Nec mediis flammis Corda perire finit.

To bloody Priests, inflam'd with savage Zeal,
A guiltless Victim martyr'd CRANMER fell;
Because he dar'd the conqu'ring Sword employ,
Of Sacred Writ their Empire to destroy.
Restor'd old exil'd Truth, and made Religion shine
With native Charms sincere, and Purity Divine.
Rescu'd his Country from the Tyrant Chain,
Too long endur'd, and crush'd the Papal Reign.
For this the Heav'nly Prelate must expire,
Doom'd by hot Bigots to consuming Fire.

Yet dauntless at the Stake the Hero stood,
And stretch'd his Right Hand to the kindl'd Wood;
Foe to my God, this Rebel Hand, he said,
Be tortur'd first, that first my Faith betray'd!
He held it thus, while his own Eyes survey
The ravenous Element devour its Prey.
And when his Body too fulfill'd this Fate,
To Ashes turn'd; —prodigious to relate!
From its fierce Task, the Recreant Fire withdrew,
And left his Heart unsing'd, and whole to View!
Heav'n gave this Witness to his pious Fame,
And 'twas his Victor-Faith preserv'd it in the Flame.

Besides Crammer, many other Professors of the Reformed Faith were this Year Sacrific'd in Flames to Popish Cruelty, to the Number of no less than Eighty four of both Sexes. Nor was the Rage of these Times exercis'd only on the living: The Bones of Martin Bucer and Paul Phagius, who had been long bury'd, were dug up, formally arraign'd for Heresy, and with much savage Ceremony publicly burn'd in the Market-Place at Cambridge. Peter Martyr's Wife, who dy'd at Oxford, was likewise rak'd out of her Grave, and basely bury'd in a Dunghill. The Memory and just Honours of Bucer and Phagius were afterwards restor'd by Queen Elizabeth, with great Solemnity; and the Bones of Martyr's Wife being once more remov'd from so vile a Repository into the Church, to prevent the like Mockery for the future, were mingl'd with the Remains of Frideswid, a Female Saint held by the Romanists in the highest Veneration.

On the same Day that Crammer ended his Life, as we have related, Pole took Sacred Orders at Greenwich; and the next day, Naboth being dead, he possess'd himself of his Vineyard, being Consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury. Three days afterwards, on the Feast of Annunciation, attended by many of the Nobility to Bow-Church, he receiv'd the Pall with great Pomp and Ceremony.

About the same time was discover'd a Plot to Rob the Exchequer, which was now well fill'd with Spanish Money, to the Value of Fifty Thousand Pounds: The Names of the Conspirators were Udall, Throgmorton, Peccam, Daniel, Stanton, besides others that made their Escape, and White who discover'd 'em. Being taken, they were all Executed. Sir Anthony Kingston, who was Apprehended on suspicion of being concern'd in this Design, before he cou'd be brought to London, dy'd on the Road; And this is all I find concerning this Plot.

In the Month of July new Tumults and Seeds of Sedition began to spring up in Norfolk, but were timely suppress'd, by the Apprehending and Punishing the Authors, who were one Cleber, and three Brothers nam'd Lincoln. (x)

Novem-

(x) This Plot extended its self as far as Suffolk and Essex. The Conspirators were certain English that lurked in France; who, by dispersing Letters and Proclamations, did all they could to blow up into Heats and Insurrections the People in those Three Counties; many whereof were Well-wishers to K. Edward's Reformation, and had been hardly used by the Queen, from whom they had deserved very well: But they of themselves without any Commandment, apprehended the Practisers, as many of them as they could find. These, for the better furthering of their Design, had sent over a bold Man, one Condemned, called (not Cleber, as this Author calleth him from all the Presents sent from his Master to our Court. But this Loss was a Trifle, compar'd to that of Richard Chancellor, worthy of Immortal Memory, a most skilful Pilot, that first discover'd the Passage to those Northern Parts, and now more solicitous for the Embassador's Safety than for his own, was swallow'd up in the Sea.

England never perhaps receiv'd any Embassador with more Magnificence. On the 25th. of March, King Philip having about a Week before return'd from Flanders, he was admitted to Audience; and having declar'd the Subject of his Embassy, stay'd at London till the 3d. of May, and then honour'd with rich Presents, return'd to his own Country.

Lord Stourton Hang'd, March 6.

On the 6th. of March, Charles Lord Stourton, for having in his own House cruelly Murder'd one Hargil and his Son, with whom he had been long at variance, was deservedly Hang'd at Salisbury, together with four of his Servants who assisted him in the Murder. After he had knock'd 'em down, and cut their Throats, he bury'd their Carcasses in a Pit Fifteen Foot deep, in hopes that the Villany wou'd be conceal'd, or if it were discover'd, that he shou'd have the Queen's Pardon; because he had always shewn himself a most Zealous Partisan of Popery. But Providence wou'd not permit so horrid a Villany to lye hid; and the Queen, who had the strictest regard to Justice, except in Matters wherein She was blinded by Her Religion, was averse to all mention of a Pardon: So that this Nobleman suffer'd the Punishment due to his Crime, and had no favour above common Murtherers, except that he was hang'd in a Silken Halter.

On the 24th. of April, Thomas Stafford landing on the Northern Coast with a small Force of Exiles, and some Foreigners, took by Surprise Scarborough, which in time of Peace was but slightly Guarded; and dispersing thro' the neighbouring Countries Declarations, importing, That Queen Mary, who had not the fairest Title to the Crown, had betray'd it to the Spaniards, invited the People to Arms. By the Care and Diligence of Nicholas Wootton Dean of Canterbury, the English Resident at Paris, his Designs were discover'd to the Council before his Arrival in England. And six Days after, the Earl of Westmorland got him seiz'd, and brought to London, where he was Executed on the 28th. of May; and the next Day three of his Accomplices, Streckley, Proctor and Bradford, were Hang'd at Tyburn.

The Queen engaging in Her Husband's Quarrel with France, which the Emperor had bequeath'd to him, together with the Inheritance of his Crown, publish'd a Proclamation on the 7th. of June, in which She complain'd of "many Injuries done to Her by the French King, in supporting and encouraging the Duke of Northumberland and Wiat in all their Rebellious Conspiracies against Her: That Dudley and Ashton had form'd their Plot at the House of his Embassador, and that his Kingdom was afterwards a Receptacle for 'em, where he yet Entertain'd, and gave 'em Countenance. And finally, that he had lately furnish'd Stafford with Ships, Men, Money, and Ammunition, to enable him, if possible, to Dispossess Her of Her Crown. For these Reasons She forbade all Her Subjects to send any Merchandise into France, or Traffick with a Nation, whose Prince She accounted Her Enemy, and against whom She determin'd to declare immediate War.

Tho' the Matter of these Complaints was true, yet She wou'd have forbore the denouncing of War, if the five Years Truce concluded a little before between Philip and the French King, had not been broke by the Pope's Instigation; so that War being now commenc'd between 'em, She wou'd not separate Her Husband's Cause from Her own. For the Pope, who had an old Grudge against the Emperor, when he knew that he had resign'd his Kingdoms and Principalities to his Son Philip, and was retir'd into Spain, by the Cardinal of Lorrain, gave no Rest to Henry of France, to whom he had promis'd the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, till he had engag'd him in a War against the Spaniards.

For this Reason the Pope highly resent'd Queen Mary's arming in the Quarrel of Her Husband: Therefore, not knowing how to be reveng'd of Her, (who was the sole Cause of England's Breach with France) he resolv'd Stow's History, but) Cleyberye, or Clayberd; who gave himself out to be the Earl of Devon. That Earl was now, by Leave granted, in his Travails abroad in Flanders or Italy, where at Padua he soon after dyed. They also made use of the Lady Elizabeth's Name; and the Queen her Sister first told her of it: Whereupon she wrote a very earnest Letter to the Queen, in detestation of them and their Practices. This Cleyberd was afterward taken in High-Suffolk, and Executed at Bury.

1557. to discharge his Resentment upon Pole, whom (as we observ'd before) he sufficiently hated : And this the rather, because Pole, tho' he knew the Pope was the Author of this War, yet press'd him, and that with much earnestness, tho' with equal Reverence, by Letters and Embassadors, to mediate a Peace. Upon this Account, he took from Pole the Legantine Power, and recalling him to Rome, appointed in his stead Peter Peyto, a Franciscan Fryar, whom he created Cardinal and Legate, and design'd him afterwards Bishop of Salisbury. When the Queen had Information of this, She took care in the first place to keep it conceal'd from Pole, prohibiting not only the new Cardinal to enter the Kingdom, but all others too whom She expected to bring any Mandate from the Pope about this Affair ; and carefully intercepting the Letters, gave Orders to her Embassador at Rome, to represent to his Holiness how much he wou'd endanger the unsettl'd Catholick Religion in England, if he put any Disgrace upon so great a Man, whose Authority had born a mighty sway in Converting the Nation. But Pole in the mean time, having some way or other got Intelligence of this, laid by the Silver-Cross, the Ensign of his Office, nor wou'd afterwards exercise the Legantine Authority, till by the Intercession of Ormaneto the Pope's Dattary in England, he was restor'd to his former Dignity.

July 7. By this time the War was grown very hot ; and Philip, who for the managing of it had left England on the Seventh of July, was now Besieging St. Quintin in Picardy with an Army of Thirty five thousand Foot, and Twelve thousand Horse, which was afterwards augmented by a thousand Horse, Four thousand Foot, and Two thousand Pioneers from England. On the Tenth of August, the French endeavouring to throw Succours into the Town, were miserably Defeated ; and tho not above 2500 were Slain, yet many of these were Men of Rank, and many more taken Prisoners. Among the latter was Morancy the Constable of France, and his Son, the Dukes of Montpensier and Longeville, Ludovico Gonzaga, Brother to the Duke of Mantua, the Marshal of St. Andrew, the Ringrave, Roch-dumaine, the Count Rochfoucault, the Baron of Curton and many others. The chief of the Slain were John of Bourbon Duke of Anguien, the Viscount of Turen, the Son of Roch-dumain, the Lords of Chandenier, Pont-dormy, and almost all the Captains of Foot. King Philip's Loss amounted not to above 50 Men.

On the Eighth Day after this Victory the Town was taken by Storm, and all that were in it put to the Sword, or made Prisoners of War. The Admiral Coligny, with his Brother D' Andelot who shortly after made his escape, Jarnac, St. Remy, Humes, and many other Noblemen were taken. The Son of the Lord Fayette, Salevert, Ogier, Vicques, La Barre, Easting, and Gourdes were kill'd. Of the English, among a few others, fell Henry Dudley, Northumberland's Youngest Son, struck by a Canon Ball, and Sir Edward Windsor, who were the first that enter'd the Town.

This Year was remarkable for a great Scarcity of Corn in England before Harvest, and for as great a Plenty afterwards *.

Wheat was Sold at Four Marks the Quarter : Within the current of a Month it fell to the low rate of Five Shillings. Wherein I rather admire the insuing Cheapness than the Dearth, having my self in the Year 1595. [that is near 40 Years after] paid double the former dear Price. Former English Edit.

But what I shall next relate, I shou'd think much more remarkable, if I had not lately happen'd to see the like. On the 7th of Septem. near Two Hours after Sun-set, a Rainbow was seen in the West, when the Moon had been risen about an Hour ; 'twas my Chance (that I may compare Similar Accidents, though at different times) to see the like appearance on the 24th of November, 1604. When about the same space of two Hours after Sun-set, as I was upon the Road fourteen Mile Westward of London, a white Cloud appear'd, form'd into the Arch of a Circle, which did in all respects resemble a common Rainbow, except only that it was but of one Colour, and instead of the Sun, had the Moon for its Opposite.

(x) The Queen's last Parliament began Thursday January the 20th, the 4 and 5 of Philip and Mary. Where the Archbishop of York, now Lord Chancellor, declared this Parliament called for Aid to be given to her Majesty. Remark That day the Commons House by entire Consent chose for their Speaker William Cordell, Esq; one of the Queen's Privy Council, learned in the Laws of the Realm, and Master of the Rolls. On Saturday he made an eloquent of Parliament. Oration to the Queen ; and immediately after she made him Knight.

Now for some Matters of Remark happening this Session. January the 24th. Serjeant Brown and Mr. Read came from the Lords, and required Mr. Speaker and 10 or 12 of the House to speak immediately with certain Lords appointed. After the Meeting the Speaker shewed from the Lords, that it was convenient to seek for the sure Defence of the Realm, and a Relief for the same. And in order to enter into that Consultation, that the Lords had appointed Three Earls, Three Bishops, and Three Barons. Unto these were Nominated One and Thirty of the Lower House. This shews the Nation was at this time under great Fears and Apprehensions ; as they might well be, Calais being taken, and a French Army so near ; and at open Wars with France and Scotland.

On the 4th of February the Bill was read for a Subsidy, and Two Fifteens, and Tenths. And the 10th day Mr. Speaker declared, that he had opened to the Queen his Commission touching the Grant of the Subsidy. Which the Queen, he said, took thankfully, and gave them presently hearty Thanks, and al the Realm.

The Nation was at this time inveterately offended with the French ; as appeared by several Bills read in the House against them : As (1.) A Bill to make void Letters-Patents made to Frenchmen to be Denizens. Another Bill to 1558. Prefage of the French Counsels, had forewarn'd the Queen to take more Precaution of this City, and had offer'd his Assistance for its Security. But because it lay commodious for his adjoyning Netherlands, in suspicion of Spanish Craft disguis'd under this fair Proposal, we declin'd the accepting of it, though the Event confirm'd Philip's Augury: For the Duke of Guise * march'd suddenly thither with a great Army, and sat down before it on New-years-day, over-against that part which is call'd Sandgate. Then dividing his Army into two Bodies; with one he attacks the Ref-bank, and with the other, Newnambridge at the same time, that by taking these he might cut off all Succour from England by Sea, or by Land from Holland. The Garrison being surpriz'd, and sensible of their own weakness, presently surrender'd both Places. Then the Besiegers begun to batter the Town between the Watergate and the Prison to make a diversion, for they design'd the Attack in another Place. When they had continued this for some time, and the English had no apprehension of the Castle, the Enemy on a sudden rais'd a Battery of 15 Pieces of Canon, and fir'd on it with such Violence, that the Noise was heard all that day to Antwerp, distant above a hundred English Miles. Towards Night they had made a considerable Breach, yet there was no approaching the Walls because of a deep Ditch full of Water, in which the besieg'd plac'd their greatest Security. The Enemy therefore with extraordinary Diligence dug a Trench from thence to the Sea, by which when the Tide went out they drain'd it, so that they march'd through without Opposition, the Water reaching but Navel high; they found the Castle almost Defenceless, and possess'd themselves of it immediately, and had taken the Town too, if Sir Anthony Ager * with a small Force had not stop'd their Progress, in which Conflict that Valiant Knight was kill'd. The Lord Wentworth, Governour of the City, seeing 'twas impossible to maintain it, Capitulated, and after many Contentions surrender'd upon these Articles. That the Garrison and Inhabitants shou'd depart without carrying anything away; but the Lord Wentworth and Fifty others, whom the Duke of Guise shou'd choose, shou'd remain Prisoners. Thus was this important Place taken which had remain'd in the possession of the English above Two hundred Years *.

expulse the French Denizons, and other French Persons out of the Realm; Another, for an Imposition to be gather'd of Frenchmen inhabiting this Realm; Another Bill for them to pay a yearly Contribution to Melcomb Regis, and for the Fortifications of divers other Places: Yet another Bill to expel French and Gaissen Wines. But none of these Bills pass'd into Acts: Yet the Bill for the Expulsion of all French Denizons as well as others, was very near passing, there being 106 with the Bill, and 111 against it. But the Bill that pass'd, and was made an Act, was severe enough; viz. to Expel all Frenchmen and other Persons born under the French Obeisance, not being Denizons, and not to return again during the Wars between the French King and the Queen: And that upon the Misdemeanour of any Denizon, committed contrary to the Laws of this Realm, the Queen might repeal all their Letters-Patents for their Denizonship, or as many of them as her Highness shall think good, made since 32 H. VIII. The Reason urg'd in the said Act, was, That these French did daily from time to time discover the Counsil, State and Privities of this Realm, and compass, imagine and procure sundry Mischiefs and Damages to be done by that Nation.

Bill about Sanctuaries.

An Act was made this Parliament, which was read two or three times the last Parliament, That Accessories in Murder and divers Felonies, should not have their Clergy. To which was added in the Bill at first, That they should not have Sanctuary too. But because that Addition might hinder this useful Bill to pass, the Churchmen being very fond of that Privilege of their Churches, it was thought convenient to leave it out. And a distinct Bill was brought in concerning Sanctuaries; that is, as it seems for the putting them down.

But Fecknam, Abbot of Westminster, for the sake of his Church to which that Ancient Privilege belonged, oppos'd it. There was now a new Bill put into the House more favourable to Sanctuaries; viz. what Churches should be made Sanctuaries: which was for the restraining the Number and Commonness of them. The Abbot claim'd this Privilege for his Church. And it was order'd, that he should come to the House with his Counsil the next day, to declare what he could say for the Privilege of Sanctuary at Westminster. So on Saturday February 12th the Abbot came, and brought divers Patents of old Kings for granting of this Sanctuary; and then desired the House to consider for the Continuance of the same. And a day was given him to be at the House again with his Learned Counsil: Who then accordingly appear'd, with Mr. Plowden a common Lawyer, and Dr. Story a Civilian; Alledging his old Grants of Kings of this Realm, and also the present Queen's Grant.

The Queen was devoutly addic'ted to the Observation of the Rules of Holy Church; and the first day of Lent now at hand, she thought fit, February the 22d. to signify her Pleasure to the House by Mr. Speaker, that they should not Sit on Ash-Wednesday.

March the 5th, the Speaker told the House, that it was her Majesty's Pleasure, that as for the Bill for answering the Queen's Revenue, for that it extended to Accomptants, and that they had already accounted, they should not procede further therein.

When the House was upon the Bill for the Confirmation of Patents granted by the Queen, or to be granted during Seven Years to come; of Honours, Castles, Manors, Lordships, Lands, Reversions, &c. one Mr. Copley, a Member of the House, stood up, and said boldly, That he feared the Queen might thereby give away the Crown from the right Inheritor. It seems as though he had in his Mind King Philip's getting the Crown after the Queen, or some unfair dealing with the Lady Elizabeth; which indeed was a great Jealousy that possess'd the English Nation since that Spanish Match. But this Speech the House could not but take Notice of, and called them irreverend Words concerning the Queen's Majesty: And by Mr. Speaker the House commanded, that Copley should absent himself till Consultation were had thereon. After Consultation taken, and it was agreed to have been a grievous Fault, he was called in, and shew'd the Sense of the House. But he required them to consider his Youth; and pray'd that if it were an Offence, it might be imputed to his Young Years. Upon this, it was order'd, that the whole House by Mr. Speaker might declare this Offence to the Queen, and to request her Majesty to extend her Highness's Mercy towards him. And in the mean time Copley is committed to the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms. Two days after, viz. March the 7th, the Speaker acquainted the House that he had declared to the Queen the Matter touching Copley; and that her Pleasure was, That he should be examined, whence such Matter as he spake of did Spring. And that nevertheless her Majesty would consider the Request of the House to her for him. No question it sprung from the Fears of King Philip's Access to the English Monarchy.

The same day about Four in the Afternoon, the Speaker with the rest of the Commons came before the Queen to her Royal Seat, (the Lords also there present) and made his Oration, exhibiting the Books for the Subsidy of the Clergy; and that she would give her Royal Assent unto such Bills pass'd by the Houses, as might stand with her Majesty's Pleasure. Then her Highness gave her Consent unto Sixteen Acts; and the Lord Chancellor Prorogued the Parliament unto the 5th of November next.

1558. fle. And since that time neither in France, which our Kings once possess'd almost entire, and of which our Henry VI. had been Crown'd King at Paris in the year 1431: Nor in Normandy or Aquitaine, the ancient Patrimony of the Kings of England do our Princes retain any thing, except the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, which have continu'd firm to us ever since the Conquest.

While the French thus advanc'd in Picardy, Queen Mary to prevent their Designs had prepar'd a Fleet to send Succours, but they were so long detain'd by contrary Winds, that they were render'd ineffectual.

And perhaps it does no where appear in History, that upon any occasion Providence hath by more manifest Signs declar'd how highly it disapproves, that the publick Tranquility shou'd be disturb'd by Wars begun for the sake of Ambition only, or private Advantage.

King Philip (to begin with him) against whom the King of France and the Pope unjustly conspir'd, enlarg'd his Possessions by a double Victory, each very great and memorable. Cardinal Caraffa, and the Duke of Palatine, who for their own Ends had perswaded the old doting Pope to kindle this Flame between these Princes, suffer'd Death for it afterwards under his Successor Pius the Fourth. Pope Paul himself, after the French were defeated at St. Quintin, by their being necessitated to withdraw their Forces out of Italy, was left expos'd without defence.

To the Mercy of Mary was punish'd for the rash Violation of her League with France by the Loss of Calais, which went so near her Heart, that 'tis believ'd to have occasion'd her Death the Year ensuing. As for the French King, who at the Pope's Infligation broke his Five Years Truce; what his Fortune was at the Battel of St. Quintin we have already shewn; and that it may not be thought his Loss was compensated by the taking of Calais, another Overthrow which follow'd in a few Months will be found to turn the Balance.

The Battel of Graveling. In June, de Termes, Governour of Calais (who succeeded Strossly Slain) made an incursion into the Netherlands, with an Army of about Eleven thousand Men. And leaving Graveling and Burburg behind him, took Berges, Dunkirk, and several other Towns, ravaging all that Coast as far as Newport. When King Philip heard of this, he was alarm'd, left the Duke of Guise shou'd follow too with his Forces, and so he shou'd be Surrounded. But observing that he spent all his time about Arlon and Vireton, he took an opportunity to fall upon the French before they were Reinforc'd. He gave the Command of this Enterprize to Count Egmont, his Lieutenant-General in the Netherlands, who having drawn a sufficient Force out of the neighbouring Garisons, to the Number of about Fifteen thousand, puts himself between Dunkirk and Calais, to cut off the Enemies Retreat.

De Termes, who hitherto expected the Duke of Guise, began now to think of drawing off, but too late; for he found himself inclos'd on all sides, and no possibility of Escape, unless he cou'd hew a Way thro' the Enemy with his Sword. He therefore made an Attack, † and a bloody Fight commenc'd; in which Despair on one side, and the Remembrance of late Injuries, with a Thirst of Revenge on the other, animated both Parties to do Wonders.

While the Victory was in suspense, during the Heat of the Battel, which was upon the Shore, * Ten English Men of War by good Fortune sailing by, and observing the Engagement, fir'd on the French so furiously, and made so great a Slaughter, that they began to give ground, and at last were entirely broken and defeated.

The Spanish Troops renew the Fight. Form. Engl. Edit. For De Termes had for his Security betaken him to the Shore, hoping that way with much less hazard to have gained Passage. Form. Engl. Edit.

The French lost in this Action Five thousand Men, part in the Battel, part in Flight, and great Numbers push'd into the Ocean. Their chief Officers were almost all taken; among whom was the Marshal himself, with Senarpont, Villebon the Governor of Picardy, Annebalt Son of Claud the late Admiral, the Earl of Chaune, Morvilliers, and many others. Two hundred fled to our Ships, and tho they might easily have been Drown'd, obtain'd Quarter, and were carry'd Prisoners to England.

This Battel was fought on the 13th. of July; and about the same time the English being desirous of wiping out the Ignominy of the Loss of Calais by some extraordinary Exploit, sent out a Fleet of 140 Sail, of which Thirty were Flemings, with Orders to make an Attempt upon Brest: But the Lord Clinton Lord High-Admiral, finding no opportunity to effect this, sail'd to Conquet; and making a Descent, took, plunder'd, and burn'd the Town, together with the Monastery of Saint Matthew, and the adjacent Villages; after which he return'd to his Ships. But the Flemings greedy of Plunder, made a further Incursion into the Country; and not suffering themselves to be recall'd in time, were attack'd by the Lord Kersimon, who cut off Five hundred of 'em.

Conquet taken and Burn'd by the English.

This was about the latter End of July. At the same time King Philip was near Amiens with a great Army, and King Henry with a much greater narrowly observ'd his Motions. At last they fix'd their Camps; the first on the South-side of the River Anthy, and the latter on the North of the Somme; so near each other, that 'twas thought every thing seem'd to threaten an Engagement. But they had far other Designs: For King Philip, being inferior in Strength, thought it not safe to venture a Battel; and Henry had receiv'd too great a Shock before, and knowing the hazard of Attacking a Victorious Enemy with Troops dishearten'd by a double Defeat, wou'd not run the Chance of being ruin'd. For these Reasons they fortify'd their Camps with such care and diligence, as if each expected an Attack. In the mean time some Motions were made of a Peace: They consider'd that the Strength of both their Armies consisted in Foreigners, who wou'd share the Fruits of a Victory, but the Calamity of a Defeat wou'd fall heaviest on themselves, and their Subjects; and therefore they inclin'd to a Treaty. To manage this, the Commissioners on King Philip's side were the Duke of Alva, the Prince of Orange, Ruyz Gomez de Silva, Granvel Bishop of Arras, and others; and for King Henry, the Constable, the Marshal of St. Andrew, the Cardinal of Lorraine, Morvilliers

A Treaty.

1558. williers Bishop of Orleans, and Ambespine Secretary of State. They differ'd upon the Article of restoring Calais, which disturb'd the whole Negociation: For the French wou'd by no means agree to it; and King Philip thought, that to end the War on any other Terms, wou'd be to abandon the Cause of his Queen, which in Honour he cou'd never do. But Queen Mary's Death, which happen'd on the 17th. of November, ended this Controversy. The Emperor Charles Vth. dy'd too not long before; and thus the Treaty broke off.

Here I must not omit what the Connexion of Affairs wou'd not suffer me to mention before: That on the 28th. of April, the Nuptials of Francis the Dauphin of France, and Mary Queen of Scots, were celebrated at Paris with extraordinary Magnificence. But this Alliance lasted not long; for two Years after, Francis dy'd, (having first succeeded to the Crown by the Death of his Father) and left his Bed to a more happy Possessor, Henry, the eldest Son to the Earl Lenox; from which Parents sprung our K. James the First. * (z)

This Year had a very sickly Autumn, and was remarkable for Fevers, which swept away great Numbers, and particularly of the Clergy. Of the Episcopal Rank alone, Thirteen are reckon'd to have dy'd a little before, or after the Queen. Cardinal Pole scarce out-liv'd her a Day: He had held out against his Distemper for some Weeks, till being reduc'd to extreme weakness, as if the News of the Queen's Death had stab'd him to the Heart, he dy'd at Three a Clock the next Morning. His Body in a Coffin of Lead was Interr'd at his Cathedral of Canterbury, with no other Epitaph than this short Inscription:

Depositum Cardinalis Poli.
The Remains of Cardinal Pole.

He was a Man of extraordinary Learning, Modesty, and of a most engaging Temper, prudent, and very dextrous in Affairs: In short, nothing had been wanting to his consummate Excellencies, if the Roman Religion had not unhappily debauch'd him from his natural Clemency, into Severity against the Professors of the Reform'd Religion.

The Queen dy'd at St. James's November the 17th. a few Hours before Break of Day. She was without doubt Pious, Merciful by Nature, of unblemish'd Manners, and excepting her Religion, every way worthy of praise. But as this prompted her to the Effusion of so much Innocent Blood, 'twas just that the Sentence of the Prophet should be fulfill'd on her; The Blood-thirsty shall not finish half their Days. For she was cut off in the Two and fortieth Year of her Age, having Reign'd but Five Years, Four Months, and Eleven Days: Whereas her Sister who succeeded Her, Reign'd with Mildness and in great Prosperity Nine times as long, and reach'd almost twice her Age.

There are various Opinions concerning the Cause of Queen Mary's Death. To relate what I find in Authors of good Credit; 'Tis said, that in the beginning of her Sickness, her Friends supposing that King Philip's Absence afflicted her, endeavour'd by all means to divert her Melancholy: But all prov'd in vain; and the Queen abandoning her self to Despair, told 'em, She should dye, tho they were yet Strangers to the Cause of her Death; but if they wou'd know it hereafter, they must dissect her, and they should find Calais at her Heart: Intimating, that the Loss of that Place was her Death's Wound. The Death of her Father-in-Law * Charles the Fifth in Spain, was likewise thought to have considerably augmented her Sorrow. Her Liver had been over-cool'd, as we formerly observ'd, by another Distemper; so that these Things probably hasten'd her End, and threw her by degrees into a Drop-

Things transacted this Session.

Journ of Parliament.

(z) The Second Session of the Parliament of 5. and 6. of Philip and Mary, began November the 5th. During this Session the Queen dyed; and so nothing of the Debates of the House came to perfection. Yet to give some Account what was now doing; It was now a very sickly time for burning Agues and Feavers, which were very mortal both this and the last Year, and carried off abundance of People, as our Histories shew us; the Distemper being also infectious: Which occasioned this Parliament to order one James Thacker, Burgess for Darby, to be absent by Licence of the House, he having reported that the Town was fore infected whence he came. And within a few days after, it was ordered, That each Burgess that was Sick, should not take Damage by his Absence during his Sicknes, for not being in the House: And that where Suit was made, that some Burgesses being Sick might be removed, and Writs sent out for others in their Places, the House did resolve they should not be moved, notwithstanding their Sicknes.

There were a few Bills read: As, a Bill to avoid French Wares. A Bill for the Attendance of Knights and Burgesses in Parliament Assembled. A Bill for Payment of Tithes out of the late Religious Lands. A Bill for the Corporation of Trinity-Hall in Cambridge.

November 14. Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor declared to the House, that divers of the Lords would come to confer with the House about weighty Affairs of the Realm; and therefore required the House to tarry their coming. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, Earl of Salop, Earl of Pembroke, the Bishops of London, Lincoln and Carlisle, Viscount Mountague, Lord Admiral, and the Lord William Howard, came into the House, sitting where the King's Privy-Council used to sit. Then the Lord Chancellor by his Oration declared, that of Necessity for the Safeguard of this Realm from the French and Scots, a Subsidy must be had. Mr. Speaker and the Privy-Council then sat from them on the lowest Benches. After this Declaration made, the Lords departed.

November the 17th. Mr. Read and Mr. Solicitor came from the Upper-House, and said, That the Lords required Mr. Speaker and the House to come unto them, where they should hear certain Matters, that the Lords had to communicate to the House. Whereupon, immediately he with the rest of the House went up. And the Lord Chancellor told them, that God had taken the Queen to his Mercy; but had furnished us with another Sovereign Lady, my Lady ELIZABETH her Grace: And then willed the Knights and Burgesses to resort to the Palace, where the Lords would come, and cause her Grace to be Proclaimed Queen of England, &c. And immediately after, the said Proclamation was there made.

She was Bury'd at Westminster, in the midst of the Chappel on the North side of the Monument of Her Grandfather King Henry the Seventh. Where her Sister Elizabeth was afterwards buried with Her: And over Both, the Pious Munificence of King James erected a Noble Mausoleum, befitting the Majesty of such Mighty Sovereigns (aa).

(aa) It is said by Sanders, that when Q. Mary saw that she must dye, she sent some Noble Persons to the Lady Elizabeth, who was to Succeed her, to desire certain things of her; but especially these Two, viz. That she would take care to repay what Sums she, the Queen, had taken up of her Subjects for the Publick Service; in truth, for the unadvised War she had entred into, the better to please her Husband Philip. The other, That she would not permit the Catholic Religion then Constituted and Established in England to be overturned again. Both which, that partial and passionate Author saith she promised, but performed neither.

This Queen Mary borrowed indeed a great deal of Money, both this Year, and the former; viz. Anno 1557. Then she borrowed of the City of London, and most rich Men in all parts of the Realm. For sending abroad great Numbers of Privy Seals, she required an 100 L. apiece of all such as were judged Wealthy, whether Gentlemen or other. Which caused great Murmurings among the People; and that because there had been lately great Payments made by Act of Parliament. But yet notwithstanding, this last year of the Queen, she again required Loans of Money throughout all Parts. And now she fell from borrowing by 100 Pounds to borrowing of 50 L. 40, 20, nay 10 L. according to her Peoples Abilities. This made greater Murmurings than before. And this it seems troubled the Queen as much. Whence she made it one of her last Requests to her Successor to see these Loans satisfied, since she could not live long enough to get another Aid granted her by Parliament.

In short, the Queen dyed with little Lamentation, condemned almost of all for her Severity and Shedding so much innocent Blood upon the only pretence of Religion; and for the waste of the Treasure of the Realm, the irreparable Loss of Calais, Hamme, and Guisnes, and all the Dominions Lands and Treasure there; and making Strangers too much acquainted with the State of England, and secret Affairs of the same. So that it was God's Compassion upon this Realm to take away this Queen, and in her Place to set up her Sister the Lady Elizabeth, whom God by special Miracle had preserved in her Innocence from the Malice and unwearied Attempts of the Enemies of true Religion, to bring her to her End: And in these Endeavours joyned her Sister also.

Her Funerals were Celebrated the 13th and 14th of December, with a Pomp suitable to her Quality, by special Order of the Queen her Sister to the Marquis of Winchester L. Treasurer. Her Body was brought from St. James's where she dyed, in a Splendid Charet with Attendants and Ceremony usual on such Occasions; and so by Charing-Cross to Westminster Abby: Met at the Church door with Four Bishops, and the Lord Abbot Mitred. Her Body being brought into the Church, lay all Night under the Hearse with Watch. On the next day December 14. was the Queen's Mass, and White, Bishop of Winchester made her Funeral Sermon; wherein he so extolled her, and by many Expressions so much depreciated the former Kings and the present Queen, that by reason of the Offence taken at his Sermon, he was commanded to keep his House; and afterwards in the Month of January appearing before the Privy Council, and receiving a Reprimand from them he was set at Liberty.

And now to look back upon the State of this Reign, and so to take a farewell of it, a very Reverend Man that lived in the midst of these times shall be our Informer. 'Surely, saith he, the brief Remembrance of things chaunced [that is, under this Queen] may appear lamentable to be considered. As what immoderate Raynes and Tempests raged in one Year. What intollerable Heats and Drowghts in another Year: What Penury and Scarcity of Corn and Victual; what Hunger and Famine thereof followed; what Sicknes, what Agues, what strange Mortalities reigned and raged, wherewith the eldest and Gravest Personages of all Degrees and Conditions, were in great numbers wasted and consumed; What Misfortunes commonly fell to Women with Child in their Delivery; what Fiers chaunced, far above the wont of other Years of Princes Reigns; in many places wasting whole Villages, Towns and Churches: Again, what Cruelty was seen executed by firing Old Men and Women, Young Men and Maids, without choise whether the Women were with Child, or free from Children: What proscriptions and Banishments of Learned Men out of the Realm; and such as taried within the Realm, how they were driven to Corners, spoiled and impoverished; and such as could be gotten shamed openly by vile Penances and shameful Recantations: And furthermore, what Rapes and Vilanies committed, above the common practiced Disorder, by Strangers and Foreigners; What Impunities won and purchased to the unchaste Generation, to recourse again to their old Trade of leud Living, after they had confounded the Priestshafte Matrimonies, so established and Authorized by the high Laws of the Realm: Then at last, what Dishonour and Loss the Realm suffered by losing that notable Borderer CALTSE, aforesometimes so valiantly won and gotten by King EDWARD the Third; and to these unfortunate Days (of refusing the great Adversary of all Christian Realms the Pope of Rome again) politiquely and chargeably Maintained and Defended in good and sure Possession, to the Comfort of the whole Realm, to the terror of all our Foreign Enemies: I say, to consider all these Particularities, as they might deserve to be set out at length, what English Heart could forbear Tears, and not inwardly Sigh and Lament the Misery? Which heavy Infelicities the English Children yet unborn shall weep at, and wail, to consider the same.

HISTORY OR
OF ENGLAND, DURING
The whole Life and Reign of ELIZABETH late Queen thereof.

Written by WILLIAM CAMDEN, Clarenceux King at Arms.

The AUTHOR's Preface to the first Edition.

EIGHTEEN Years and more are now past, since William Cecil Lord Burghley, Lord High Treasurer of England, imparting to me, who then thought nothing of any such matter, first his own Collection, and then Her Majesty's, of Papers, Letters, Memorials, &c. order'd me from thence to compile an Historical Account of the first Beginnings of the Reign of Queen ELIZABETH: with what Intent I know not, unless, while he had a Desire to eternize the Memory of that Renowned Queen, he would first see an Introduction thereinto by my Pains in this kind. I obey'd him, and not unwillingly, lest I might seem either to neglect the Memory of that most Excellent Princess, or to fail his Expectation and (which I priz'd as dear as them both) the Truth itself. For in these Papers, if any where, I had confident Hopes to find the real Truth of Things lodg'd, as it were, in so many Repositories.

But at my very first Entrance upon the Task, an intricate Difficulty did very much discourage me. For I lighted upon great Piles and Heaps of Papers and Writings of all sorts, reasonably well digested indeed in respect of the Times, but in regard of the Variety of the Arguments, very much confused. In searching and turning over whereof, whilst I labour'd hard, cover'd with Dust, to gather fit Matter together, (which I diligently sought for, but more rarely found than I expected) that Noble Lord died, and my Industry began to flag and wax cold in the Business. Not long after, that Incomparable Princess also render'd her Celestial Soul to God: when I stood in expectation for some time, full of Hope that some other Person, haply some one of that great number of Learned Men, who through her Favour and Bounty did abound both with Wealth and Leisure, would render her this due and deserved piece of Gratitude. But when I certainly found, that some, who were best able, could not, for their more weighty Employments; and others (I know not for what Causes) fairly desir'd to be excus'd; I buckl'd afresh to my intermitted Study, and ply'd it harder than before. I procur'd all the Helps I possibly could for writing it: Charters and Grants of Kings and great Personages, Letters, Consultations in the Council-Chamber, Ambassadors Instructions and Epistles, I carefully turn'd over; the Parliamentary Diaries, Acts and Statutes, I thoroughly perus'd, and read over every Edict or Proclamation. For the greatest part of all which, as I am beholden to that most Excellent Gentleman Sir Robert Cotton, Knight and Baronet, who has, with great Cost and successful Industry, furnish'd himself with the choicest things relating to History and Antiquity; (for he readily and willingly gave me Light and Direction in my Business from his own Knowledge of things:) so, Reader, if I shall in any thing profit or delight thee in this Undertaking, thou art deservedly obliged to give him Thanks for the same.

Mine own Cabinets and Writings I also search'd into: because tho' I have been a studious Regarder and Admirer of venerable Antiquity, yet have I not been altogether careless of later and more modern Occurrences; but have my self seen and observ'd many things, and receiv'd others from credible Persons that have been before me, Men who have been present at the transacting of Matters, and such as have been addicted to the Parties on both Sides, in this Contrariety of Religion. All which I have weigh'd and examin'd in the Balance of my own Judgment, (such as it is) lest I should at any time thro' an unwary Credulity incline to that which is false. For, the Love of Truth, as it has been the only Incitement to me to undertake this Work; so has it also been my only Scope and Aim in the Performance of it. And indeed, to write History without a resolute Adherence to Truth, is, as it were, to pluck out the Eyes of the finest Creature in the World; and, instead of wholesome Liquor, to present a Draught of Poison to the Readers Minds.

All such things therefore as are wont to obscure and prejudice the Light of Truth, I resolv'd to remove. Ignorance, and (which spring from thence) doubtful Uncertainty and flat Falsity, I have to the utmost of my Power dispell'd by the bright Lustre of untainted Fidelity lodg'd in those Monuments and Records, which are beyond all Exception: and perhaps, I have thereby attain'd to an equal Knowledge of those Affairs, with some who have been long and deeply vers'd in State-matters. Prejudice I have shun'd, by reason it takes away a Man's Judgment, and so hoodwinks the Minds of Men in Matters both of Religion and State, that like dim Eyes they can behold nothing clearly. As for Danger, I fear'd none, even from those who think the Memory of succeeding Ages may be extinguish'd by present Power. And let such remember, that never any were severe and cruel towards Writers, for keeping to the Truth, but they have heap'd Dishonour upon themselves, and Glory upon the other. The Hope of any Gain has not drawn me aside. To set the Dignity of History to Sale, to me (who have always contented my self with a mean Estate) has ever seem'd base and servile. Suspicion either of Affection or Disaffection can here have no place. For of all those that I am to mention, I know scarce one by whom I have receiv'd any Benefit or Advantage, nor one from whom I have received any Injury: so that none can reckon me among such as are either obnoxious or malicious. As for the living, I have said but little either in their Praise or Dispraise. By inveighing against the Enemies of my Country, to aim at the Reputation of a good Commonwealths-man, and at the same time to get the Character of a bad Historian, was look'd upon by me as a thing very ridiculous. This I have been careful of, that, following Polybius's Directions, I might have an Eye to the Truth only. Nor do I think that any one will find me wanting in a Freedom of Speech, join'd with Modesty, becoming an Historian; but the Licentiousness, Malignity and Backbiting, now-a-days cloak'd under the counterfeit Shew of Freedom, and every-where entertain'd with a plausible Acceptance, I for my part utterly detest. Things manifest and evident I have not conceal'd; Things doubtful I have interpreted favourably; Things secret and abstruse I have not pry'd into. The hidden Meanings of Princes (says that great Master of History) and what they secretly design, to search out, it is unlawful, it is doubtful and dangerous: pursue not therefore the Search thereof. And, like Halicanassæus, I am angry with those curious inquisitive people, who will needs seek to know more than by the Laws is permitted them.

As for other matters; tho' I am not ignorant that Affairs of War and Policy are the things proper to History; yet Ecclesiastical Matters I neither could, nor indeed ought I to omit. (For Religion and the Weal-publick can never be separated.) But forasmuch as the Writer of the Ecclesiastical History may justly challenge those things as belonging to himself; I for my part have not touch'd 'em but with a light and chary Hand. And whereas it stands with the Rules and Dignity of History, to handle Busineses of greatest Weight and Importance, and not to enquire after small matters; I have not insisted upon small things: yet some such there are, which if they please not one, another may be glad to know. Circumstances I have not in the least omitted, that not only the Events of Affairs, but also the Reasons and Causes thereof, might be understood. That of Polybius pleases me mightily. Take away from History Why, How, and To what end, things have been done, and Whether the thing done has succeeded according to Reason; and all that remains will rather be an idle Sport and Foolery, than a profitable Instruction: and tho' for the present it may delight, for the future it cannot profit. I have not given my own Judgment either out of Prejudice or Affection, but writing with an undistemper'd and even Mind, I have rather sifted out the Sense and Opinion of others; and scarce interposed my own any where, tho' by the by, since 'tis a Question whether an Historian may lawfully do it. I leave every one to judge according to his Fancy. Speeches and Orations, unless they be the very same verbatim, or abbreviated, I have not meddled withal, much less coin'd 'em of my own Head. Short Sentences I have seldom interlaced, nor adorn'd my Discourse with those nice Observations which the Greeks aptly term ΕΠΙΣΤΑΣΕΙΣ, whilst my sole Business has been to inform the Mind. Digressions I have avoided: Words of form I have used: Matters relating to Topography and Genealogy I have not neglected; and in Chronology I have follow'd the Series and Order of Time as near as might be, beginning the Year, as our former Chroniclers have usually done, from the first of January.

My Work I have entitl'd by the Name of ANNALS, in regard I have dispos'd every thing in its proper Year: for I have learn'd of Tacitus, that weighty and remarkable Occurrences are to be digested by way of Annals; and that the principal Business of Annals is, to preserve virtuous Actions from being bury'd in Oblivion, and to deter Men from either speaking or doing what is amiss, for fear of future Shame. Besides, a coarser and shorter Style (such as this of mine) is proper and peculiar to things written by way of Annals.

Upon these Foundations I set my self to writing, with this Intention and Design I went forward, and in composing, polishing and perfecting my Undertakings I resolv'd to spend my whole Pains at spare times, and to bequeath em by my last Testament to that honorable Gentleman Jacobus Augustus Thuanus, who has with singular Commendations of his Fidelity and Moderation, begun an History of his own Time. And this I did, lest one so much respected by me (as indeed all Strangers are) should, as one unacquainted in a foreign State, be at a Loss in the Affairs of our Country.

But in this my purpose I was (I know not by what Fate) prevented, and a great part of these Annals were sent over to him some Years before, when they lay yet shadow'd in their first Lineaments, and were scarce well begun, disfigur'd with Blurs and Dashes, and Chasms and Patches here and there cobb'd together, as they slip from my hasty Pen, and worse mangl'd by the Transcriber. Out of these, by taking away some things, changing and adding others, he has inserted some few Passages in the Eleventh and Twelfth Tomes of his History, but indeed by his grave and solid Judgment much rectify'd and refin'd. But whereas he, according to the Proportion of his Work, (for he undertakes an Universal History of his Time) has only cull'd a few Passages concerning England and Ireland, and omitted a great many things that may please, and perhaps behove those of our Country to be acquainted with; and having myself heard that the Knowledge of our Affairs is earnestly desir'd by Foreigners, and that not without some Check and Reproach of our Remissness in communicating them; I again settl'd myself to the Work I had for some time discontinued; I read it all over and consider'd of it again, added some things, and in some measure polish'd the Style of it, tho' without any affected Flights of Eloquence, or quaint Ways of Expression. For, I think it sufficient, if, like a Picture drawn in weak and faint Colours, it is placed in a good and advantageous Light.

Yet after all, whether I should publish it or not, I could not well determine. But the truth is, those Censures and Prejudices, that Hatred and Calumny, which, I foresee, advance their Ensigns, and sound the Charge against me, have not so much discourag'd me, as my Love of Truth, my Affection to my Country, and the Memory of that Princess (which among Englishmen ought to be held for ever sacred) have born me up against those men, who having shaken off their Allegiance to their Prince and Country, endeavour to eclipse the Reputation of one, and the Glory of t'other, by spitting forth their Venom and inveterate Malice, in their scandalous Libels publish'd in foreign parts; and at this very instant (as they stick not to own) are ready to leave to Posterity, in a large Volume, a Monument of their Lewdness and Dishonesty. For my part, I desire nothing more than that I may be like myself, and they like themselves. Posterity will give every one the Honor due to him.

What the Loftiness of the Argument requires, I confess, and am sorry, I have not come up with; yet what Pains I was able, I have willingly bestow'd. My self I have not in the least satisfy'd, either in this or my other Writings; yet shall I think my self well rewarded for my Labor, if by my ready Willingness to preserve the Memory of Things, to relate the Truth, and to train up the minds of men to Honesty and Wisdom, I may thereby find a place amongst the petty Writers of great Matters. Whatever it be,

To God, my Country and Posterity, at the Altar of Truth, I dedicate and consecrate it.

INTRODUCTION.

Queen Elizabeth's Lineage
by the Father.

By the Mother.

THE Lineage and Descent of ELIZABETH, Queen of England, was by her Father's side truly Royal: for she was Daughter to King Henry VIII. Grand-daughter to Henry VII. and Great-grand-daughter to Edward IV. By the Mother's side her Descent was not so high; yet Noble it was, and branch'd out by many and great Alliances both thro' England and Ireland. Her Great-grand-father's Father was Jeffery Bolen, a Man of a good Family in Norfolk, Lord-Mayor of the City of London, in the Year 1457. and at the same time honour'd with the Dignity of Knighthood. A sincere honest Man he was, of such Estimation, that Thomas Lord Hoo and Hastings, Knight of the Order of S. George, gave him his Daughter and one of his Heiresses to Wife; and of so large Means, that he match'd his Daughters into the Noble Houses of the Cheyneys, Heydons and Fortescues, left his Son a fair Estate, and bequeath'd 1000 l. Sterling to the Poor in the City of London, and 200 l. to the like in Norfolk. This Man's Son, William Bolen, was one of the eighteen Knights of the Bath, made at the Coronation of King Richard III. to whom Thomas Earl of Ormond (who was in such Favour with the Kings of England, that he alone of all the Noblemen of Ireland, had his Place and Vote in the English Parliament, and that also above the Barons of England) gave his Daughter and one of his Heiresses in Marriage. By her (besides Daughters marry'd to Shelton, Calthrop, Clere and Sackvill, wealthy Men, and of great Families, and other Children) he had Thomas Bolen; whom, being a young Man, Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, afterward Duke of Norfolk, (a Man much renown'd for his worthy Services and Achievements in the Wars) made choice of to be his Son-in-law, giving him his Daughter Elizabeth in Marriage: and Henry VIII. after he had perform'd one or two very honorable Embassies, made him first Treasurer of his Household, Knight of the Order of S. George, and Viscount Rochford; and afterwards Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, and Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal. This Thomas, among other Children by his said Wife, had Anne Bolen; who in her tender Years was sent into France, and there waited first on Mary of England, Wife to Lewis XII. and then on Claudia of Bretagne, Wife to Francis I. and after her Death on Margaret of Alencon, a prime Favourer of the Protestant Religion then springing up in France. Being return'd into England, and admitted one of the Queen's Maids of Honor, and being now twenty two years of Age, King Henry, in the thirty eighth Year of his Age, did for her Modesty, mix'd with a French Grace and Pleasantness, fell deeply in love with her; and when he could not overcome her Chastity, he sought to make her his Wife, in hopes of Issue-Male by her.

He (to fetch the matter a little higher) began now, after seventeen Years Marriage, to grow weary of Queen Katharine his Wife, a Lady of very Religious Behaviour, and Spanish Gravity; howbeit many times miscarrying in the Fruit of her Womb, and having but one only Daughter living, namely the Lady Mary. And this he did thro' the cunning Artifice of Tho. Wolsey, Cardinal, who being now in the Height of Power with the King, had in a manner no Command over himself. For, bearing a Grudge to the Emperor Charles V. Queen Katharine's Sister's Son, for denying him the Archbishoprick of Toledo, and because he had not favour'd him in his aspiring to the Popedom, and being now (out of Malice to Charles) so devoted to the French King, that he design'd King Henry a Wife out of France; he caus'd a Scruple to be put into the King's Head, who was already prone enough to his own Desires, that his present Marriage with Queen Katharine, who before had been his Brother Arthur's Wife, was forbidden by the Law of God, notwithstanding Pope Julius II. had dispens'd therewith. Afterwards he himself press'd it often upon him, how heinously he had offended God in marrying Queen Katharine, and in what a great Sin he continued to live, by retaining her; that he had incur'd the Sentence of Excommunication, and that God had already evidenc'd his Anger against this so unlawful a Marriage, who would not suffer any Issue-Male, tho' once or twice conceiv'd, to live; and that nothing else could be expected, but that those bloody Wars so lately laid asleep would again break out with fresh Slaughters, unless a lawful Heir to the Crown were once certainly known. To the end therefore that all Scruple might be remov'd out of the King's Mind, and his Soul, which had for so many Years been polluted with Incest, unburden'd, and withal the Safety and Security of the Realm by the undoubted Succession of a lawful Issue provided for, she was to be divorced from him.

Hereupon the King petition'd Pope Clement VII. that he would depute Commissioners to hear and examine the Cause; and that either the Dispensation of Pope Julius might be confirm'd by the Authority of Holy Scripture, or he might be absolv'd from the Sentence of Excommunication, and it might be decreed that the present Marriage was no Marriage, but null and of no force, and that he might be at liberty to contract Marriage with any other Woman whatsoever, any Canon to the contrary notwithstanding. The Pope made Wolsey and Cardinal Campeius his Deputies: to which Campeius he also privately deliver'd a Bull, wherein, favourably inclining to the King's Desire, as far as with a good Conscience before God he lawfully might, he granted all things, in case it should prove that the Marriage contracted with Queen Katharine were declared to have been, and to be void and null. But this Bull he appointed to be conceal'd or publish'd, according as the Emperor's Affairs in Italy succeeded. Now were Questions every where started, whether it were justifiable by the Law of God for the Brother to take his Brother's Widow to Wife: and if this was forbidden by God's Law, whether it might not be made lawful by the Pope's Dispensation. But when several Universities in Christendom, and many very learned Men, had by their joint Suffrages declared such a Marriage to be repugnant to the sacred Laws of both Testaments, notwithstanding the Bishop of Rome's Dispensation; the King began to be violently in love with Ann Bolen; and withal, the Cardinal repenting too late of what he had done, and being put forward with Anger, so wrought under-hand with the Pope, that he refus'd to confirm by his Papal Authority the Judgments of the Universities, and the Cause was prolong'd and delay'd from day to day both at Rome and in England: for the Cardinal stood in fear of Ann Bolen, who, being addicted to the Protestant Doctrine, hated his unreasonable Pomp and Pride. The Pope also stood in doubt of the Emperor, who was now very strong in Italy, and most stiffly defended the Cause of his Aunt Queen Katharine. Neither yet would the Pope incense King Henry, who had not long before, when he was taken Prisoner by the Imperialists, by his Arms and Money, procur'd his Liberty.

King Henry, tho' he were herewith much displeas'd, yet did he smother it at present; and first himself by his Embassadors and Letters, and then the Prelates and Nobility of England, by a Supplication sign'd and subscrib'd with their Hands and Seals, with humble Intreaties casting themselves at the Pope's Feet, besought him, that what the two Universities of England, the University of Paris, and several other Universities, with divers learned and grave Men, both at home and abroad, had affirm'd to be true, and were ready to defend and maintain for Truth, as well by Word as Writing, might (to use their own words) be confirm'd by his Apostolical Authority. And an extraordinary infelicity it would be, (say they) if this could not be obtain'd of the See Apostolick, by that Prince, whose only Help had upholden and supported the Authority of the See Apostolick; who, when it was laid at by many, oppos'd them several times, partly by his Pen, and partly by his Word and Authority; and yet he alone could not enjoy the Assistance of her Authority. But that he might enjoy it, they besought him again and again, lest Civil Wars should break forth anew about the Title to the Succession.

The Prelates also, fearing lest the Pope should interdict the Realm, or excommunicate the King, did by their own particular Letters put him in mind of the woful Diffension formerly between Pope Alexander III. and Henry II. King of England; and among other weighty Reasons, they with humble Prayers advis'd him in those very words, in a manner, which Gilbert Bishop of London at that time used. Your ardent Zeal we most humbly beseech you for a time to restrain within the Bounds of Moderation and Sobriety, lest by pronouncing either the Sentence of Interdict, or that final Declaration of Excision or Excommunication, you suffer innumerable Churches to be miserably subverted, and (which God forbid) irrevocably turn away from your Obedience as well the King himself, as infinite numbers of People with him. Better it is that a Member be join'd to the Head, tho' it be maim'd, than quite cut off, and cast from the Body. Maim'd Members may be heal'd again, but being once cut off, they never unite to the Body more. Cutting off brings Despair, whereas the Chirurgeon's wary Hand many times heals the Wound. Better it is therefore, if it so please, that at the present you do your best to heal the Wound, (if any there be) than by cutting off so noble a Part from God's Church, you bring Matters (which are already in a high Confusion) into greater Disorder than can be express'd. Then at length, does the Spirit of Kings know how to be overcome, when it has overcome; and is not ashamed to yield, when it has vanquish'd. With Mildness it is to be dealt withal, and to be overcome with Admonitions and Patience. For, what if Patience either already shew'd, or to be shew'd a little longer, do bring some Loss of temporal Concernments? ought there not to be a slackening of Severity, when the Ruin of the People is threatn'd? Are not many things to be thrown overboard, when the hideous Confusion of Sea and Waves menaces Destruction?

But when the Pope and his Cardinals gave no Ear to these things, but neglected them for the space of five Years or thereabouts, taking it in Disdain that the Pope's Power in Dispensing should be called in question, and thought fit that the King should be cited to appear at Rome, they constrain'd the King (being a Prince full of Spirit, and already exasperated with the Perverseness of some Church-men at home, and who thought, that in regard of the Equity of his Cause, he was most unjustly dealt withal, in consideration of his Royal Dignity, most unworthily; and in respect of his Deserts, from the Church of Rome most ungratefully) that at one and the same time in a manner he both put away Queen Katharine, depriv'd Cardinal Wolsey of his Goods and Possessions, laid a great Fine upon the Bishops, for owning and submitting to his Legatine Power in prejudice of the King's Prerogative, abolish'd the Authority of the Bishop of Rome, took upon him the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England next under Christ, which was given him by a Synod and the Universities of England, advanc'd Ann Bolen, (clad in her Robes of Honour, with her Golden Coronet on her Head) to the Dignity of Marchioness of Pembroke, with the Consent of the Peers of the Realm, for the Nobility of her Birth, and the great Merit of her Vertues, (so the Words run) took her to Wife, and commanded her to be inaugurated Queen; whilst Pope Clement VII. chafed in vain at it, decreed the former Marriage to be valid and Canonical, and pronounc'd the King to have incur'd the Pains and Penalties of the greater Excommunication.

By this Marriage was born the Lady ELIZABETH at Greenwich upon the Thames, September 7. 1533. And shortly after, the former Marriage contracted with Queen Katharine, was, by the Authority of Parliament declared to be void and incestuous, and this with Queen Ann to be just and consonant to the Law of God: the Lady Elizabeth, if the King should fail of Issue-Male, was declared Heir apparent to the Crown; and an Oath of Allegiance taken by all the Subjects, to the King and his Heirs by Queen Ann. And when Paul III. purpos'd to pronounce Sentence afresh at Rome against this Marriage, and at home an holy Maid or Nun in Kent, (being suborn'd and set on by some Religious persons) as if she were mov'd with a divine and prophetick Fury, utter'd many things against the same, and against the King; the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, with all manner of Authority to reform Errors, Heresies and Abuses in the same, was given to the King by the Estates of the Realm, and the said Oath of Allegiance to the King's Heirs by Queen Ann confirm'd. Nevertheless, scarce were three Years fully expired, when, falling into new Loves, Jealousies, Rage, and meditating Blood and Slaughter, that he might make way for the new Fancy he had to Jane Seimour, he call'd

Queen Ann to her Trial, accusing her, upon a light Suspicion, of Adultery, after she had miscarri'd of a Male-child she went withal. Queen Ann clear'd herself so far of the matters objected against her, that the Multitude that stood by judg'd her to be innocent, and merely circumvented. Nevertheless, her Peers condemn'd her. Being condemn'd, she very handsomely and pleasantly by a Messenger sent her singular Thanks to the King, for the Favours he had heap'd upon her, viz. that, altho' she were descended of no very honorable Lineage, he had advanced her to the noble Dignity of a Marchioness, to the Honor to be his Bedfellow, and to the high Condition of a Queen, and (beyond all the rest) that when he could exalt her no higher upon Earth, he would now raise her up to Heaven, where she should enjoy eternal Glory amongst holy and innocent persons. Her Death she underwent quietly and christianly, wishing all Happiness to the King, and forgiving her Enemies.

The King the very next day after marry'd Jane Seimour; and declar'd, by Authority of Parliament, the Marriage with Queen Ann, as well as that with Queen Katharine, to be flatly unlawful and void, and their Daughters, the two Ladies Mary and Elizabeth, to be therefore illegitimate, and to be excluded from the Succession to the Crown. Queen Jane fell in labour of Prince Edward, and presently dy'd, the said Prince being fain to be cut out of her Womb, and succeeding his Father after in the Kingdom. The King, being but little troubl'd for his Queen's Death, presently applied himself to find another Wife, both in Italy and France, to strengthen himself with new Alliances. Nevertheless, being doubtful and unresolv'd in Mind, and timorous of every thing, whilst he stood in fear of the

Papists for Rebellions formerly rais'd; and the Nobility should attempt new Commotions at home, or join with forein Enemies, some of them for slight Causes, and some without any Hearing, he cut shorter by the Heads. Many of the Religions, for their Obstinacy in maintaining the Pope's Power, he put to death as Traitors; and out of Avarice, as before he had done the lesser, so now he pluck'd down the greater Abbies, Places of venerable Antiquity and Majesty, and seiz'd upon their Wealth, which had been so many Years heaping together, taking Advantage from the Miscarriages of humane Frailty, and their dissolute manner of Life. And withal he burn'd the Protestants as Hereticks, by a Law which they call'd The Six Articles, made against those who oppos'd the Doctrine of the Church of Rome concerning Transubstantiation, one Kind in the Sacrament of the Eucharist, the unmarried Life of Priests, Vows, Private Masses, and Auricular Confession. Inasmuch as at one and the same time and place, he rag'd against the Papists by hanging, drawing and quartering, and against the Protestants by burning them alive. Whereby he grew so terrible at home, and was taken for such a Tyrant abroad, that he was rejected first by Mary of Lorraine, the Duke of Guise his Daughter, whom he woo'd, being Rival therein to James King of Scots, his Nephew; and then by Christiana of Denmark, Duchess of Milan, Niece to Charles V. At length with much ado he obtain'd Ann of Cleve to Wife, thereby endeavouring to secure the Friendship of the Protestants in Germany: whom as soon as he had marry'd he cast off, loathing her, as not beautiful enough for a Prince, giving himself over as well to Arrogance as Lust; pretending the Cause to be, because she had been formerly betroth'd to the Duke of Lorraine's Son, and charging her with I know not what womanish Impotency: and all to bring over her Head Katharine Howard, Daughter of Edmund Howard, and Niece to Thomas Duke of Norfolk; whom the next Year after he beheaded, as guilty of Incontinence before the Marriage, and took to Wife Katharine Parr, of a Knightly Family, whom he left the second time a Widow.

Perceiving now his Body to be much decay'd thro' the Intemperance of his Youth, and being enraged against the French King, because he had assisted the Scots against the English, but more favourably inclined toward the Emperor Charles, (who forgetting the Divorce of his Aunt Q. Katharine, had secretly given him sure Hopes of Reconciliation to the Church of Rome, in which business the French King had formerly deluded him) he enter'd into a Treaty with Charles against the French. Then designing to invade France, the more to engage the Emperor to him, and to quiet his exulcerated and gall'd Conscience, he propos'd to the Estates in Parliament, that if he should die, and his Son Edward also without Issue, first the Lady Mary, and, if she should fail of Issue, then the Lady Elizabeth, should succeed in the Kingdom. But if all they should die issueless, then the Crown to be devolv'd upon such Persons to whom he should either by Letters Patents, or by his last Will and Testament, assign the same. Which was with the ready and cheerful Consent of all men enacted and establish'd, upon pain of High-Treason to the Opposers thereof. After his Return out of France, where he had taken Bologne, with a vast Expence of Money, whilst he lamented the Distraction of England through new Opinions daily springing up in it, (and England herself sate sighing and groaning to see her Wealth exhausted, her Money embas'd and mingl'd with Copper, her Abbies demolish'd which were the Monuments of antient Piety, the Blood of her Nobility, Prelates, Papists and Protestants, promiscuously spilt, and the Land embroil'd in a War with Scotland) being swell'd up with Fat, he breath'd out his last, of a virulent Inflammation call'd S. Anthony's Fire in his Thigh, in the beginning of the Year 1547. A magnanimous Prince he was, in whose great Mind were confus'dly mix'd many eminent Vertues with no less notorious Vices.

Prince Edward his Son, being yet scarce ten years old, succeeded him; his Uncle Edward Seimour, Duke of Somerset, being made Protector: under whose auspicious Government, a notable Victory was obtain'd over the Scots at Musselburg, whilst the English by Force of Arms, demanded the Performance of a Contract concerning Mary Queen of Scots espousing to King Edward. Also the cruel and bloody Law of the Six Articles, and other Laws made by King Henry VIII. against the Protestants, were repeal'd; those for abolishing the Popes Authority confirm'd; the Mass wholly abrogated; Images remov'd out of Churches; the Books of both Testaments printed in the Vulgar Tongue; Divine Service celebrated in the same; and both Kinds administred in the Eucharist. But sacrilegious Avarice ravenously invaded Church-livings, Colleges, Chauntries, Hospitals and Places dedicated to the Poor; as things superstitious: Ambition and Emulation among the Nobility, Presumption and Disobedience among the Common-people, grew so extravagant and insolent, that England seem'd to be as it were in a downright Phrensie, miserably languishing at the very Heart, by reason of Rebellions, Tumults, Factions, embasing of her Money, and all the Mischiefs and Miscarriages that usually happen under an Infant-King. Hereupon also follow'd Damages abroad: the Strong-holds of the English in Scotland and France were lost: Bologne, which cost so dear, with all the Forts rais'd by the English in the Country about it, as also the Ordnance and Munition, were betray'd to the French for Money, to the incredible Dishonor of the English Nation: whilst England, now rent with civil Seditions, was not able to defend the same; and Charles the Emperor, being sud to for his Assistance, according to the late Confederacy, deny'd to relieve it, (as being won by the English after the Confederacy was made) and even refus'd to take it into his own Hands, when it was offer'd him gratis. And, to increase the Infelicity of these Times, the Protector, not aware of the cunning Practices of Dudley Duke of Northumberland, was condemn'd of Felony, by a Law newly made, for attempting to kill the King's Counsellors, (namely Northumberland and others) and beheaded; his Son was by a private Law dispossess'd of the greatest part of his Inheritance and his Father's Honours; and the King himself, now destitute of the Assistance of his Friends, and exposed to the Cruelty of ambitious Persons, was taken away by an untimely Death, (whether thro' any natural Disease, or by Poison, is uncertain) leaving behind him an incredible Mist of himself among the People, for his singular and rare Vertues above his Years.

In this doleful Time, when Dudley had by his subtil Contrivances dissolv'd the Knot of brotherly Love between the Protector and Thomas Seimour his Brother, taking Occasion from a womanish Emulation betwixt the Queen Dowager, now Thomas his Wife, and the Dutches of Somerset the Protector's Wife, among other things to convict Thomas of High Treason, it was objected, that he intended to seize the King's Person, and to take the Lady Elizabeth, the King's Sister, to Wife. All this she was utterly ignorant of, and far from any Suspicion, growing up daily to Riper Years, and continuing in great Grace and Favour with King Edward her Brother, (who call'd her by no other Name than his sweet Sister Temperance) as likewise in singular Esteem with the Nobility and People. For she was of admirable Beauty, and well deserving a Crown, of a modest Gravity, excellent Wit, Royal Soul, happy Memory, and indefatigably given to the Study of Learning; insomuch as before she was Seventeen Years of Age, she understood well the Latin, French, and Italian Tongues, and had an indifferent Knowledge of the Greek. Neither did she neglect Musick, so far as it became a Princess, being able to sing sweetly, and play handsomly on the Lute. With Roger Ascham, who was her Tutor, she read over Melanchthon's Common-Places, all Tully, a great part of the Histories of Titus Livius, certain select Orations of Isocrates, (whereof two she turn'd into Latin) Sophocles's Tragedies, and the New Testament in Greek: by which means she both fram'd her Tongue to a pure and elegant way of speaking, and inform'd her Mind with apt Documents and Instructions; daily applying herself to the Study of good Letters, not for Pomp and Ostentation, but in order to Use in her Life, and the Practice of Vertue; insomuch as she was a kind of Miracle and Admiration for her Learning among the Princes of her Time.

But these her liberal Studies were interrupted by the Death of her Brother King Edward; whose Breath was scarce out of his Body, when certain Messengers were sent from Dudley Duke of Northumberland, (who affect'd the Crown for Jane Grey, to whom he had betroth'd his Son) to move her to resign her Title to the Crown for a Sum of Money, and certain Lands to be settl'd on her. She modestly answer'd, that her elder Sister the Lady Mary was first to be agreed withal: for as long as the said Lady Mary liv'd, she for her part could challenge no Right at all. Shortly after, the Lady Jane Grey, Grand-daughter to the second Sister of King Henry VIII. was publickly proclaim'd Queen of England. To colour which, it was pretended, that the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth were by Act of Parliament judg'd illegitimate, which Act was never duly repeal'd; (notwithstanding that the King their Father had by the same Law declared, that they should succeed in order after Edward VI. in case he should fail of Issue: and that the said Sisters could not by the Law of England hereditarily succeed King Edward, because they were not Germans, that is, of the whole Blood by Father and Mother, but (as our Lawyers term it) of the half Blood. It was also alledg'd, that Henry VIII. by his last Will and Testament convey'd the Title of the Crown to the said Lady Jane Grey. And withal it was objected, how dangerous it might be, if either the Lady Mary or the Lady Elizabeth should marry a foreign Prince, who might restore the Bishop of Rome's Authority, at present thrown out of England, and subject the English to a foreign Yoke. And to the same purpose also they produced Letters Patents of Edward VI. made a little before his Death, and sign'd with the Hands of many Noblemen, Bishops, Judges, and others.

Nevertheless, the strong Inclination and Affection of the Nobility and Commons, towards King Henry VIII's Daughters, within twenty days dispers'd this Storm, to the fatal Ruin of the Duke and the Lady Jane; and the Lady Mary was proclaim'd Queen over England: who coming to London with an Army, the Lady Elizabeth went to meet her with five hundred Horse, lest she should be wanting to her Sister's and her own Cause, which was then so much concern'd.

In the first Parliament which Queen Mary held, whatsoever had been decreed against the Marriage between Queen Katharine, her Mother, and K. Henry VIII. was repeal'd, and the said Marriage adjudg'd to be consonant to the Law of God, and valid to all Intents and Purposes, for these Reasons: Because it had been contracted and celebrated with the Consent of their Parents, wise and prudent Princes, by Advice of the gravest Men, as well in England as Spain, and upon mature Deliberation with the most learned Men of all Christendom, and completed and perfected by the Procreation of Children betwixt them. The same Form also of Religion and Service of God, and Administration of the Sacraments, which was in use at the Death of Henry VIII. was restor'd; howbeit without any Acknowledgment or Mention at all of the Pope's Authority: which very much troubl'd both the Queen and Cardinal Pool, who both of them were of opinion, that in the matter of the Marriage the Consent of the Parents and Judgment of the wise and learned Men depended merely and solely upon the Dispensation of Pope Julius II. and were highly offended that the Use of the Sacraments was, without the Pope's Authority, permitted to such as were not yet solemnly receiv'd receiv'd into the Church. But the Estates of the Realm (as Queen Mary found) were afraid to admit and acknowledge again the Authority of the Bishop of Rome, which they had now shaken off. Neither would they endure that the Queen should lay down the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, which most of the Bishops, Nobility and Commons had confirm'd by Oath to Henry VIII. his Heirs and Successors; besides, many of them had increas'd their Estates by the Revenues of the Church. But she was heartily desirous to lay it down, as being persuaded that her whole Title to the Crown was upheld and strengthned by no other means but by the Power of the Bishop of Rome, who had given Sentence in her behalf, after her Father had procur'd her to be declar'd illegitimate. And indeed at that time many bore such an Hatred against the Pope's Power, and the Thoughts of a foreign Yoke, that Sir Thomas Wyatt and some Kentish-men, within ten days after the Marriage betwixt Queen Mary and Philip of Spain, broke forth into open Rebellion, being persuaded that it was made up to no other end, but, by the Power of the Spaniards, to hamper the English-men's Necks more straitly under the Yoke of the Bishop of Rome, and to make away the Lady Elizabeth, the next Heir to the Crown of England. And the Emperor Charles V. well knowing the Temper of Men in England, laid such Ruks and Delays in Cardinal Pool's Way, (who was coming into England, in quality of a Legate from the Pope) and that not without the Queen's Privy, lest he should give occasion of Offence, while Matters were yet unsettl'd, that he came not into England till after fifteen Months, when the Queen's third Parliament was now holden, and the Marriage betwixt Queen Mary and King Philip celebrated, by Dispensation of Pope Julius III. because they were within the second and third Degree of Consanguinity, and the said Charles the Emperor had formerly contracted Marriage de futuro with the Lady Mary, then a very Infant. Pool at last dismiss'd by the Emperor, came into England, and being restored in Blood, proposed to the Estates, with Prayers and great Intreaties, that the Laws against Hereticks might be reviv'd and reinforc'd, that all the Laws enacted against the See of Rome, since the Twentieth Year of Henry VIII. might be repeal'd, and that the whole Body of the Realm might be reconcil'd to the Church of Rome. All which with much ado he at last obtain'd, but not till such time as by the same Statute the Revenues taken by King Henry VIII. and Edward VI. from Abbies, Colleges, Bishopricks, &c. were confirm'd to the Queen and the present Possessors, lest the Peace of the Kingdom should be disturb'd. Hereupon he presently absolv'd the Clergy and Laity from the Guilt of Schism; a solemn Mass was celebrated at Rome by Pope Julius III. himself for Joy, Processions were decreed, a Jubilee appointed, and plenary Indulgences granted to every one who should give God Thanks for the Re-uniting of the Kingdom of England. To Rome were sent Anthony Viscount Montacute, Thurlbey Bishop of Ely, and Sir Edward Carne, to give Thanks for Pardon of the Schism, and to tender in the name of the King, Queen and Realm, due Submission and Obedience to the Pope and See Apostolick. To whom in the Apostolick Palace and Court of Kings, was granted by Paul IV. (for Julius was now dead) a publick Consistory or Audience, their Obedience accepted, the Pardon and Absolution given by Cardinal Pool, approv'd and confirm'd. And the more to oblige Queen Mary and King Philip, the Pope, out of his plenary Apostolical Power, erected Ireland into a Kingdom for ever, and honor'd and adorn'd it with Regal Title, Dignity, and Preeminences, &c. All which notwithstanding the Estates of Ireland had by their own Authority before amply confer'd on Henry VIII. and the Queen herself already used and enjoy'd. But these things are not proper to this place.

Now the Romish Religion seem'd to be fully established in England. Nevertheless, the Ecclesiasticks of the Realm, seeing small Hope of Issue by the Queen, who was now forty Years old, barren and sickly, still stood in Fear of the Lady Elizabeth: for they knew she was bred up in the Protestant Religion, and perceiv'd all Mens Hearts and Eyes to incline towards her, as towards the Rising Sun. Seriously therefore they consulted from the first beginning of Queen Mary's Reign, that the Religion now restored might receive no Detriment by her means. To make away a Princess of the Blood, by Sword or Poison, seem'd to the soberer part, and to Queen Mary herself, (naturally a mild and loving Princess, tho' she did not bear her much Goodwill, by reason of the Grudges and Displeasures betwixt their Mothers) a heinous Sin. But some other ill-disposed Persons thought the contrary, who were of opinion, that for the establishing of the Catholick Religion, any thing was to be attempted, any thing committed, tho' in itself never so unjust. And it fell out very opportunely for 'em, that Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir Peter Carew, Sir James à Croftes, and other Protestants, had seditiously rais'd Tumults and Commotions, and endeavour'd to make up a Marriage between the Lady Elizabeth and Edward Courtney, Earl of Devonshire. Hereupon she, as privy to the Design, was committed to Prison: and first flying Reports were given out, that she was accessory to the Rebellion; then some were try'd for their Lives, and others put to the Rack. Croftes openly affirm'd with solemn Protestations, that she was not accessory to, or had any Hand in the Sedition. And Wyatt (who they said had secretly accus'd her) publicly declared the same, just before his Execution. Nevertheless she was hurry'd to and fro, had Keepers set over her, her Servants and Waiting-women clapt up in Prison, and herself us'd with more Severity, than is generally exercised towards Personages of her Rank and Dignity.

Mean time, Henry II. King of France chears her up by private Letters full of Love and Affection; and promising her great matters, invites her into France: whether out of real Love I cannot say, or whether it were with design to render her more suspicious, and make way for the Queen of Scots (who was design'd for his Daughter-in-law) to the Crown of England after Queen Mary. Christian III. King of Denmark (who had lately profess'd the Protestant Religion) makes her likewise many kind Offers, and withal addresses her privately on behalf of his Son Frederick: which was no sooner perceiv'd by the Papists in England, but they again threaten her with new Mischiefs, and suspecting their future Security, affirm, That the Romish Religion, the Queen and Realm, can never be safe, while she's alive. Needs must she then be cut off, either as a Trairess, or as an Heretick. At the same time, whilst great Cruelty was us'd against the Protestants of lesser note, John Story, Doctor of Law, and other mercilless Men declar'd in their Meetings, that the Root of Heresie (meaning her) was rather to be pluck'd up, than the smaller Branches to be leapt off. The Lady Elizabeth now guiding herself as a Ship in blustering Weather, both heard Divine Service after the Romish manner, and was frequently confess'd; and, at the pressing Instances and Menaces of Cardinal Pool, profess'd herself, for fear of Death, a Roman-Catholick: yet did not Queen Mary believe her, as remembring that she herself, in the like Fear, had, by Letters written with her own Hand to her Father (which I myself have seen) not only for ever renounced the Pope's Authority in England, but also acknowledg'd her Father to be Supreme Head of the Church of England under Christ, and her Mother's Marriage with King Henry her Father to have been incestuous and unlawful. Neither could the Cardinal himself and the rest of the Bishops be persuaded she was real, who for securing the Romish Religion, wish'd she were made away. But this very much grated the Ears of King Philip, Queen Mary's Husband, and the Spaniards, who were more favourable to the Lady Elizabeth; not so much pitying the Condition of the afflicted Maiden-Princess, as providently regarding their own particular Interests. For, they foresaw, that if once the Lady Elizabeth were made away, the Kingdoms of England, Ireland, and Scotland, might, by Mary Queen of Scots,

Since therefore they could not without Impiety make away the Lady Elizabeth, some thought best to remove her at a Distance out of England, and to match her with Emanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy. Neither did this please the Spaniard, who had before design'd her for his Son Charles. And Sir Thomas Cornwallis, one of the Queen's Council, dissuaded it, alleging that the People of England would take it very ill, nay, would not at all endure, that the next Heir to the Crown should be convey'd out of the Land. At the same time Queen Mary, out of her inveterate Hatred to the Lady Elizabeth, and because the said Lady was averse to a Marriage with a Savoyard, was so transported with Anger, that she loaded her with Checks and Taunts, and stuck not ever and anon to affirm, that Mary Queen of Scots was the certain and undoubted Heir to the Crown of England, next after herself. These Consultations against the Lady Elizabeth were diverted by a War declared by Queen Mary against the French, in Favour of her Husband: which tho' it were the chief and principal Cause of the War, yet other Reasons also concurr'd, and those very real and plausible, viz. That the French, contrary to the Articles of the former League, had, by his Ministers, encourag'd and supported the Rebellions of the Duke of Northumberland and Sir Thomas Wyatt, and the Designs of Dudley and Ashton against her: That he had commission'd Pirates against the English Merchants, furnish'd Stafford with Arms and Shipping to seize upon Scarborough-Castle, attempting Calais by sinister means, suffer'd the English Money to be embas'd in France, and invaded the Netherlands, which the English were bound by Agreement to protect. ELIZABETH,

Anno 1558.

Queen of ENGLAND.

AFTER the Death of Queen Mary had been, for some time, kept private; the first News thereof was brought to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal then in Parliament; (the Two Houses having sat for some little time before.) They were seiz'd at first with a mighty Grief and Surprize, but soon wore off those Impressions, and with an handsome Mixture of Joy and Sorrow, upon the Loss of a deceased, and the Prospect of a succeeding Princess, they betook themselves to Publick Business, and with one Consent agreed, that the Lady ELIZABETH should be declar'd the true and lawful Heir of the Kingdom, according to the Act of Succession, made 35 Henry VIII. Upon this, the Members of the Lower House were call'd up, and Heath Archbishop of York and Lord Chancellor of England, acquaints 'em, (not without a deep and visible Concern) "That the Church and State had lost a most pious and excellent Queen; a Loss which every private Subject would have Reason to judge insupportable, had it not pleas'd God (in Mercy to the English Nation) to preserve still the Lady ELIZABETH, the other and surviving Daughter of King Henry; of whose Right of Succession, since no Doubt could or ought to be made, the House of Peers only wanted their Consent, to proclaim her Queen, out of hand. No sooner had he said this, but there pass'd (as it were) a solemn and general Vote of a Long Life and Happy Reign to Queen ELIZABETH; and when the Session was ended, she was, with Sound of Trumpet, and the loudest Acclamations of the People, first proclaim'd in Westminster, and after at the Royal-Exchange, Queen of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith. Thus happy and glorious was the Beginning of her Reign, and (to say Truth) she possess'd through the whole Progress of it, as firm and large an Interest in the Hearts of her People, and was caref'd upon all occasions of a Publick Appearance, with as chearful Marks of Honor and Respect, as any Prince before her.

She was now about the Age of Twenty Five, and had been so well disciplin'd in the excellent School of Adversity, as to become Mistress of a Prudence above her Years; and of this she gave an early Proof in the Choice of her Ministers: For she made of her Privy-Council, Nich. Heath Archbishop of York, a Person, as I hinted before, of singular Prudence, and a well-temper'd Judgment; as likewise, William Pawlet Marquess of Winchester, Lord High-Treasurer, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel, Francis Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Edward Stanley Earl of Derby, William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, Edward Lord Clinton, Lord High-Admiral, and William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Cheiney, Sir William

Peter, Sir John Mason, Sir Richard Sackvill, Kts. and Nicolas Wotton Dean of Canterbury. All these had been of Queen Mary's Privy-Council, as well as of her Religion, but then the better to conform herself to the present Posture of Affairs, she joins with them these Servants of her own, William Parr Marquess of Northampton, Francis Russel Earl of Bedford, Thomas Parry, Edward Rogers, Ambrose Cave, Francis Knolles, and William Cecil, who had been Secretary to King Edward VI. and a Person of rare and uncommon Abilities; and not long after she admitted Nicolas Bacon, and made him Keeper of the Privy-Seal. These were every Man of 'em Protestants, and had held no Places nor Employments under Queen Mary. On those, as well as on all others which she afterwards admitted into the Ministry, she bestow'd her Favours with so much Caution, and so little Distinction, as to prevent either Party from gaining the Ascendant over her, whereby she remain'd Mistress of her own self, and preserv'd both their Affections, and her own Power and Authority entire.

Her first and great Concern, after her happy Settlement on the Throne, was to restore the Reform'd Religion; and tho' she made but very few privy to the Design, yet so well was she persuaded of its Purity and Orthodoxy, and had built upon the Principles of Reason and Education such an high Opinion of its Primitive Truth and Simplicity, that she was fully resolv'd to countenance and support it. Then she advises with her Council, about securing the Ports, and entrusting the Lieutenantcy of the Tower to some person of approv'd Fidelity: That a new Commission should be dispatch'd to Thomas Earl of Suffolk, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who had kept that Country (of itself mutinous enough) quiet and in good order, with but 320 Horse, and 860 Foot in Garrison: That the Judges Patents should be renew'd, that (it being then Term-Time) the Course of the Law might not be stop'd; with this Clause inserted, that they should not dispose of any Offices: That new Justices and Sheriffs should be appointed in every County: That no Bills of Exchange should be sent abroad; and that Preachers should decline all Controversial Points of Religion. Then for foreign Affairs, it was advis'd, That Ambassadors should be dispatch'd to the Courts of Christian Princes, to notify the Death of Queen Mary. Accordingly Sir Thomas Challoner was sent as Envoy to Ferdinand Emperor of Germany, with a Packet under the Queen's own Hand, wherein she advises him, "That her Sister was dead, and that thro' the Goodness of God, and in virtue of her own Hereditary Right, and the Peoples Consent, she was now invested in the Succession; and that she desired nothing more, than the Pre-

Ann. 1. " Friendship which had been so long kept up
" between the Crown of England, and the House
" of Austria. The Lord Cobham was afterwards sent to the Spanish Netherlands, with Instructions to the same purpose, as likewise with a Patent to impower the Earl of Arundel, Thurlby Bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton, who had been some time before employ'd by Queen Mary, to negotiate a Peace at Cambray, to act afresh in the Queen's Name; and with them to join in Commission the Lord Howard of Effingham. About the same time was Sir Henry Killegrew privately employ'd to feel the Pulse of the German Princes, and to attempt the composing their Differences, by the Study of a Religion which was both pure and peaceable. D. B. was sent over to the King of Denmark, and Armigille Waad to the Duke of Holstein.

King Philip, upon the News of Queen Mary his Consort's Death, apprehending the utter Loss of his new Title, and Power with the English, (things of the weightiest Importance to him) as also that the Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, would, in favour of the Queen of Scots, unite with France; thought it now time to press in good earnest a Match with Q. Elizabeth, which he did by the Mediation of the Count of Feria; promising withal, to procure from the Pope a special Dispensation in favour of his Pretensions.
This Motion could not but produce in the Queen very uneasy Resentments, when she reflected, that to reject the Suit of one of the first Princes of Europe, and one who had greatly obliged her, must carry with it an Appearance of In-discretion, mix'd with Ingratitude. Nor could the King of France sit ealie or unapprehensive under the Prospect of this new Alliance, which his Spanish Enemy was like to contract with England; wherefore he is busie at Rome, by his Engine the Bishop of Angoulême, in hindering the Grant of this Dispensation, forasmuch as Queen Elizabeth was not only suspected as a Favourer of the Reformation, but was accounted illegitimate beside: But all this was done in the dark, that he might give no Umbrage to the English, under the present Fluctuation of Affairs. The Count of Feria, to accomplish the Match, possesses the Roman-Catholicks then in England, " That " this was the only sure way to preserve their
" antient Religion, and the Dignity of it, which " should they not take hold of, he could not
" but pity the State of the English Nation, as a " Country drain'd of its Treasures, without Sol" diers, defenceless, and expos'd for want of " proper Forts and Ammunition; and, in a " word, as a Kingdom that wanted wise Men of " its Council. And, in truth, the Face of England look'd at this time dismally forlorn, being not only imbarqu'd in a War with Scotland and France, but overcharg'd with a vast Debt, contracted by Henry VIII. and Edward VI. beside the Consumption of the Treasury, the scandalous and expensive Loss of Calais and the Country of Oye, the Religious Heats and Dissensions of the People: To which might be added, the Queen's being stripp'd of her most powerful Friends, and unsupported by the Alliance of sorein Princes.

She declines the Proposal.

After a serious Debate with herself, concerning the Proposals of the Marriage on foot, the Queen soon resolv'd, that the Marriage of a Woman with one who had been her Sister's Husband, was, by a Parity of Reason, equally for-bidden, and therefore equally unlawful, as one contracted by any Person with his Brother's Relict, and by necessary Consequence, no Bull or Decree of the Pope could make it otherwise. And she saw moreover, that the Espousing a Match upon these dispensing Terms, would be little less than a tacit Confession of her own Illegitimacy, since her Father King Henry begot her upon Katharine of Spain, whom he had put away, as being his Brother's Widow. And when most of the Universities of Christendom, and the Convocation of Divines at London, had confirm'd and justify'd this latter Match; whereas that with Queen Katharine was adjudg'd null and unlawful;

being therefore at length determin'd, she dismisses
her Royal Suitor, with a modest and respectful Answer, such as became the Reserv'dness of a bashful Virgin, but which proceeded in truth from the Scruples of a Religious Queen. But whilst he was urging the Queen to a Compliance by frequent Letters and repeated Instances, and she in the mean while receiv'd his Addresses, and treated his Character suitably to the advantageous Thoughts she had of so accomplish'd a Prince; there was not wanting a Set of Courtiers, who made it their business to exclaim against the Spaniards, as a stiff and haughty sort of People; and among these were some of the Privy-Council, who did not fail to infuse this Notion into the Queen, (being jealous, without doubt, that a Mind in suspense might at last pitch on the wrong side) " That herself and
" her Friends would be undone, and all England
" into the bargain, should she allow the Pope's " Dispensing Power in this or any other matter
" whatever. That two Popes had successively " declared her Mother's Marriage with Henry
" VIII. to be void and unlawful; and that un" der the Shelter of their Verdicts, the Queen
" of Scots immediately laid Claim to the Crown
" of England: That the Pope would never be " brought to revoke that Sentence, and that she " could not expect any Justice on the side of " Rome, which had already treated her Mother
" and herself with so much Baseness. And be" side all this, that the French King used all pos" sible Efforts at Rome, to get Mary Queen of " Scots declared lawful Queen of England.

The Queen's Inclinations being now quite drawn off from so dangerous an Alliance, and bent solely upon the Interest of the Protestant Religion, she thought she could not do God better Service, nor put a more effectual Stop to Philip's Application, than to begin some Alterations in the Church. For, when she had made a Change in Religion, she did not in the least doubt, but there would follow a proportionable one in his Affections: She therefore order'd that a Committee of her best Counsellors should forthwith sit, to concert proper measures for the suppressing the Romish, and re-settling the Protestant Faith; To examine what the dangerous Consequences might be of such an Establishment, and to find out fit Expedients to prevent 'em. These they readily foresaw were of two sorts; Such as threatned 'em from abroad, or else such as were like to spring up at home. The Dangers they most apprehended from abroad were either the Thunder from the Pope's Bulls, (the Sentence of Excommunication, which was a Surrendering the Kingdom to the Insults of forein Invaders) or else the Resentment of his Christian Majesty, who might possibly snatch at a Pretence by this means to retard the Motions of the Peace begun at Cambray, if not to advance the Queen of Scots Quarrel into a War with the English, as being now profess'd Hereticks, as well as avow'd Enemies: At least 'twas fear'd he might raise Commotions in Scotland, which was but too much devoted to his Interest. Nor did things look better on the side of Ireland, which was a Nation bigotted to Popery, and prone enough to Rebellion.

1558. Ann. 1. lion. And besides all this, the Spaniard bore too great a Sway in the Netherlands, to be look'd on as a good Neighbour at this Juncture. At length they came to this Conclusion, that as for the Popes Censure, it signify'd not a Rush; but that 'twas necessary not only to embrace the Offer of a Peace, if tender'd, but rather than fail, to sue for it at the French King's Hands; in as much as Scotland would be concluded with in the same League. It was likewise judg'd necessary, that the Protestants of that Kingdom and France be protected, and Berwick, and the Frontiers of England towards Scotland and Ireland, secur'd and fortify'd with abler Garrisons: And no less adviseable, to cultivate in the first place a good Agreement with the Spaniard, at any Rate; and to ratifie the ancient League with the House of Burgundy. But now on the other side, the Mischiefs impending nearer home, were most dreaded from those Peers who were remov'd from the Council-Table, from the Degradation of the Bishops and others of the Clergy, from the Influence of the several Judges, and the Justices of Peace in every County, and in a word from the Common-People, who made themselves considerable in Queen Mary's Reign, for embracing the same Persuasion she was of: Since these were all to be remov'd from their Places, and to be made subject to stricter Penalties (a Course which Queen Mary took before with the Protestants) and none but those of the Reform'd Religion were to bear any Office in the Government, or take upon 'em the Headship of any College in either of the Two Universities; and beside, all Popish Masters and Presidents were to be remov'd from the Universities, and all the School-Masters, that were so affected, were to quit the Charges of Eton and Winchester, and all other Schools: And as for such of the Reformation, as were for setting up new Schemes and Models of Church-Discipline, they were to be suppress'd betimes, and but one Religion to be countenanced and establish'd; because a Diversity of Persuasions among Englishmen (who were known to be a warm and warlike People) would be likely to foment perpetual Broils and Quarrels between 'em. The Care of purging the Liturgy, which was publish'd in English in Edward VI's Time, was committed to Parker, Pilkington, Bill, May, Cox, Grindall, Whitehead, Divines of noted Learning and Moderation, and to the very ingenious Sir Thomas Smith, Kt. The Management of which Affair was left solely in the Hands of the Marquess of Northampton, the Earl of Bedford, John Grey of Pyrgo, and Cecil.

The Liturgy is order'd to be corrected.

She allows the publick Service in English.

In the mean while, some Ecclesiasticks there were, of a Temper too impatient to wait for the slower Remedies which the Laws might provide, who began to preach the Reform'd Doctrine with too unwary a Freedom, first in private Houses, and then more publickly in several Churches, and other form'd Assemblies: By which means, they drew after them a numerous Confluence of such Hearers, whose chief Property 'tis to have itching Ears; and at length proceeded so far as to bandy controversial Topics among themselves, and to wrangle about 'em with those of the Romish Communion. In somuch that, to cut off any farther Occasions of such Religious Heats, the Queen put out a very strict Proclamation, forbidding any such Disputes for the future. Notwithstanding she freely consented, that the Epistles, the Gospels, and the Ten Commandments should be read in English to the People, but without any Comment or Paraphrase; as also that the Lords-

Prayer, the Apostles Creed, and the Litany should be repeated in the Vulgar-Tongue; That in other things the Romish Ritual should be kept in use, till the Parliament should fix the Method of Religious Worship. Mean while the Queen took care to perform her Sifters Funeral-Rites, with great State and Magnificence, in Westminster-Abby; and not long after she paid the like Tribute to the Memory of Charles V. who in less than Two Years (by an Example not very common among Princes, but far more honorable than the most glorious Triumphs) laid down his Empire, and bid adieu to the World, in order to enjoy the blessed Leisure of serving God, and saving his Soul.

In the Beginning of the New Year, the Q. creates William Parr, who had forfeited his Peerage for Treason in Queen Mary's Reign, once more Marquess of Northampton, and makes Edward Seimour, Baron Beauchamp, and Earl of Hertford, who had by an Act clandestinely obtain'd, and back'd by the Malice of his Enemies, been dispossest of the Title, and a great Part of the Estate left by his Ancestors; Thomas Howard Second Son of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, was honour'd with the Character of Viscount Howard of Bindon, Henry Cary of Hunsdon, her Cousin-German by Mary Bolen, and Oliver St. John of Bleinesho, were created Barons, who were all adverse to the Romish Superstition. Now came on the Queen's Coronation, who advanced in a well-form'd Cavalcade, from the Tower of London to Westminster, and receiv'd the most grateful Acclamations of her Subjects in her Passage through the City; a Tribute they were the more encouraged to pay, by the gracious Looks and Expressions the Queen us'd upon this Occasion.

She restores some Noblemen, and creates others.

Is crown'd

The next day she was crown'd and anointed with the usual Ceremonies, by Oglethorpe Bishop of Carlisle, the Archbishop of York and some others refusing to assist at the Solemnity, out of a scrupulous Regard and Tendernefs to the Romish Religion, which it seems they grew the more solicitous for, by reason that the Q. had not only been season'd and brought up in that of the Protestants, but had lately forbid the Bishop in saying of Mass, to elevate or lift up the Host, and had allow'd the Use of the Litany, Epistles and Gospels (meer Abominations with Men of their Temper) in the Vulgar-Tongue. Tho' no Objection could be made to her Piety and Devotion, who not only paid her private and daily Addresses to God, the first thing after she rose, but attended the publick Service at her own Chappel, at the appointed Times, and always on Sundays and Holidays; where she behaved herself with a Reverence and Devotion suitable to her Greatnefs. She us'd to frequent the Lent-Sermons dress'd in Mourning, as the gravell and most primitive Habit; tho' she would often mention what she had read of her Predecessor Henry III. "That he had much rather put up an humble devout Petition to God himself, than hear the finest Harangues about him, from the Lips of others. As for the Doctrines relating to the Cross, the Blessed Virgin, and the Saints, she had very honourable Sentiments of them; and as she treated them with Regard herself, so would she never endure to hear them slighted or vilify'd by others. Some few days after this, the Parliament met, in the which it was in the first place Resolv'd, Nemine contradicente, "That Queen Elizabeth was, "and (to use the Words of the Act) ought to "be, as well by the Law of God, as the Common and Statute-Laws of the Realm, the Nevertheless that Act of her Father's, which related to the Exclusion of her and her Sister from the Succession, remain'd still unrepeal'd: And this was look'd on, in some Mens Opinion, as a great Flaw in Bacon's Politicks, (whom the Queen rely'd on as the very Oracle of the Law, in Cases of this Nature) and the rather, because Northumberland had us'd it as an Argument both against the Queen and Mary; for which Reason Queen Mary had got it repeal'd, so far as herself was concern'd. And besides this, some factious Spirits might plot some Mischief against her, as a pretended Usurper, tho' it be a standing Maxim of the Laws of England, "That the Crown takes away all Defects. Another sort of Men there was, who thought this a very wise Part in Bacon, who considering the Perplexity and Uncertainty of Parliamentary Laws and Statutes, and that the very same things that seem'd to favour the Interest of Queen Elizabeth, laid a Stain upon the Cause and Credit of her Sister, was therefore very shy of rubbing an old Sore, which Time had now pretty well heal'd; and chose rather to refer to that Act of the 35. of Henry VIII. which seem'd to bear an equal and fair Regard to the Reputation of both.

In this Session, after other Debates, an Act pass'd for Restoring to the Crown its ancient Jurisdiction in Matters Ecclesiastical; which was done by renewing the Laws of Henry VIII. repeal'd by Queen Mary, against the See of Rome; and those of Edward VI. in favour of the Reformation: And likewise by Enacting, "That whatever Rights, Privileges, or Spiritual Preeminences, had been formerly in Use, and establish'd by any Ecclesiastical Authority whatever, for visiting the Clergy, and correcting all kinds of Error, Heresie and Schism, with other Abuses and Disorders; should be for ever annex'd to the Imperial Crown of England: That the Queen and her Successors might be empower'd to give their Letters Patents to some particular Persons, for the due Exercise of that Authority; on this Condition however, that they should not determine any thing to be Heresie, but what had been so defined time out of mind, either from Canonical Scripture, the four first Oecumenical Councils, or some other, according to the genuine Sense of Holy Writ; or should hereafter be so defined by Authority of Parliament, with the Consent of the Clergy of England, in Convocation: That all Ecclesiastical Persons, and Magistrates, who receiv'd Pensions from the Exchequer; such as should take any Degree in the Universities; Wards that were to sue their Liveries, and be invested in their Livings; and such as were to be admitted into the Queen's Service, &c. should take an Oath to acknowledge the Queen to be the Supreme Governor of her Kingdoms, (for the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England did not at all relish) in all Causes, as well Spiritual as Civil; all foreign Princes and Potentates being excluded the Privilege of taking Cognizance of any Causes within her Dominions.

This Act was vigorously oppos'd in the House of Lords, by Nine Bishops, (who were all that of the Fourteen yet living were then present) viz. the Archbishop of York, Heath; the Bishop of London, Bonner; of Winchester, White; of Worcester, Pate; of Landaff, Anthony; of Coventry, Bayne; of Exeter, Turbeville; of Chester, Scot; of Carlisle, Ogletborpe; and by the Abbot of Westminster, Feckenham. Of the Temporal Lords not one oppos'd it, but the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Anthony Brown Viscount Mountague, whom in Queen Mary's Reign the Parliament had sent to Rome with Thurlby Bishop of Ely, to procure that England might be restored to the Unity of the Church of Rome, and Obedience to the Apostolick See. He, out of a Sentiment of Zeal and Honor, press'd it very home, "That it would be a very disgraceful Reflexion for England, which was so lately, and so well reconciled to the Apostolick See, to make so sudden a Revolt from it: And moreover, that the Hazard would be as great as the Scandal, should the Pope thunder out his Excommunication, and expose the Nation, by that means, to the Resentment of its neighbouring Enemies, upon the Score of this Defection: That he, for his part, had by Authority of Parliament, and in the name of the whole Body of England, tender'd Obedience to the Pope; the Performance of which he could by no means dispense with. He was therefore more and more importunate with them, that they would not withdraw themselves from the See of Rome, to which they were beholden for the first Propagation of the Christian Faith, and the constant Defence of it ever since. But when this Matter came to be canvass'd in the Lower House, it was carry'd by a considerable Majority of Votes; the Papists in the mean while being much disgusted, and pretending that Protestants were chosen Knights of the Shires, and Burgeesses for Cities and Corporations, on this very Design; and that the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Arundel, Men of the biggest Interest among the Nobility, had, to serve their own Turns, or Hopes at least, beg'd Voices; and that Cecil underhand play'd the same Game.

Whilst these Differences held as to Points of Religion, it was order'd by Proclamation, that no Man should speak irreverently of the Sacrament of the Altar, and that the Communion should be administer'd in both kinds. A Conference was also appointed at Westminster, to be held between the Romanists and Protestants, before the Two Houses, against the last of March. The Disputants chosen for those of the Reformation, were Richard Cox, Whitehead, Edmund Grindall, Robert Horne, Edwin Sands, Edmund Guest, John Elmer, and John Jewel; Those on the Papists side, were John White Bishop of Winchester, Ralph Bayne Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, Thomas Watson Bp. of Lincoln, Dr. Cole Dean of S. Pauls, Dr. Langdall Archdeacon of Lewis, Dr. Harpsfield Archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr. Chadsey Archdeacon of Middlesex. The Questions propounded were, 1. Concerning the Reading Divine Service in the Vulgar-Tongue. 2. Of the Authority of the Church in appointing or abolishing Ceremonies, for Edification-sake. And 3. Of the Sacrifice of the Mass.

But all this came to nothing: For, after they had exchanged a few Words about penning down the Arguments on both sides, because, it seems, they could not agree upon a Method for managing the Dispute; those of the Protestant side began to triumph, as if they had the Advantage, whereas the Romanists complain'd of foul Play, inasmuch as they had not above a day or two's Notice of the Questions to be debated; and that Bacon the Keeper of the Great Seal (a very indifferent Divine, and a profess'd Enemy to the Papists) sat as Judge of the Conference. But the naked Truth of the Matter was, That they durst not, upon cool and better Thoughts, call into Question Points of such high Consequence, and which their own Church had never submitted

A Conference held between the Papists and Protestants;

1559. Ann. 2. mitted to a Debate, without the Pope's Leave and Approbation; whereupon the great Cry among them was, "When shall Men be satisfy'd about their Creed, if they were suffer'd at all Turns to call it into Question? That Disputes about Religion always ended on the Court-side; and a great deal more to the same purpose. Nay, so warm were the Bishops of Lincoln and Winchester, as to declare it their Opinion, "That the Queen, and all those that were the Abettors of this Separation from the Church of Rome, deserv'd to be excommunicated for their Pains: and for this they were imprison'd. But such as had better heads among the Party, thought it proper to refer this Censure to the Pope, lest, as they were Subjects themselves, they should be taken for Men of rebellious Principles, or so many Ringleaders or Trumpeters of Sedition. Neither was the Bishop of Rome ignorant of these Transactions, who in a great Petition commanded Sir Edw. Carne, a Welsh Knight and a Lawyer, who had managed Three successive Embassies at Rome, for Henry VIII. for Queen Mary, and now for Queen Elizabeth, to lay down the Character of Envoy, and to use the very Words of the Mandate) "by Virtue of the verbal Command, and oracular Sentence of the most Holy Lord the Pope, in Respect to the Holy Obedience due to him, and under pain of the greater Excommunication, and the Loss of all his Goods, not to depart the City, but to take upon him the Charge of the English Hospital. The Meaning of which was, to prevent his giving Intelligence at home, of any secret Attempts the French were practising against the Queen; a thing which the Love he bore his Country, had hitherto made him very carefully do; tho' some are of Opinion, that this crafty Gentleman made his Absence from home his own Choice, out of the bigotted Zeal he bore to the Religion of the Place where he was.

A dispute arises about Calais.

In the mean while, (not to insist, at present, upon Parliamentary or Ecclesiastical Matters, in Prejudice to the Order of Time, which is to be observ'd in the first place) the Commissioners of England and Spain (who managed the Negotiation of a Peace at Cambray) stickled hard with the French for the Restitution of Calais, but could by no means gain their Point; tho' they offer'd to discount above Three Millions of Crowns due from the French, upon a fair and legal Contract: The Spaniard, by Reason it was lost upon his Account, and foreseeing likewise that it would be for the Interest of the Netherlands, to have it under the Jurisdiction of the English, did really and generously side with England; whereas he would otherwise have rejected all Overtures of Peace: The French objected, on the other hand, That Calais alone was no competent Satisfaction for what Damages the English had done the French, since by their Assistance it was, that many Towns had been taken by the Spaniard, a great many Villages of Little Britain had been burnt and pillaged by the English Fleet, Trade (the very Sinews of a Common-Wealth) was stop'd and interrupted, and vast Sums expended, in preventing any Descent the English might make upon them.

And besides this, Calais was the antient Inheritance of the Crown of France, that had been lost and recover'd by several Wars, and was therefore by no means to be restored at this time of day; nay, that the Parliament of France had made an Order to this purpose; for, that the Restitution of it would be in effect, to put the Weapon once more into the Enemy's Hand, and to alienate for ever the Affections of the People from their Prince; and that the Demands of the English were, for that Reason, not only unjust, but irrational. The English pleaded, on the other hand, the Reason and Equity of their Claim, forasmuch as Calais had been for some hundred Years, reckon'd as a Branch of the Crown of England, was obtain'd by a Right both of Conquest and Inheritance, and given in lieu for some other Places, which the Kings of England had resign'd: That as for the Damages they pretended, they ought to lie at the Spaniards Door, who drew the English into this War against their Wills; from whence, considering the Loss of their Forts and Men, they receiv'd a very considerable Damage, without one Advantage to balance it: Again, that all the Decrees of France, however well contrived for its own Interest, were never the more square and equitable on that account; and that Calais could not be refused under any Colour of Justice, when all the Places which had been taken in the last War, were already restored by Compact to the other Princes. The French rejoind, That all this was done, on the score of some Matches that were then on foot, between the other Princes: They made therefore this Motion, That a Marriage should be agreed to between the eldest Daughter of the Queen of Scots, and the eldest Son of Queen Elizabeth; That this Daughter should have Calais for her Dowry, and that the Queen of Scots should renounce all the Right she claim'd in England: Or else, that Queen Elizabeth's eldest Daughter should marry the eldest Son of the Queen of Scots, and the English at the same Time relinquish their Title to the Kingdom of France: That all the Debts owing from France to England, should be remitted, and Calais remain still in the Hands of the French. To these Proposals the English gave little heed, looking on them as so many Amusements, or things in Prospect only, contrived on purpose to spin out the time. Matters were come to this pass, when the Spaniard had Intelligence, that Queen Elizabeth did not only refuse the Offer of a Match from that side, but had made great Alterations in Religion.

King of Spain dis-oblige by the Q.

So that from this time he began to slacken his Endeavours for the restoring of Calais, which before had been very zealous and hearty; and the Spanish Commissioners, not being able to brook these Delays, at a Time when the French and they seem'd well agreed in all other Points, pretended they would not engage themselves any farther in a War for Calais, unless the English would furnish them with larger Supplies both of Men and Money, to carry it on for six Years. Hereupon the Cardinal of Lorain takes heart, and boldly assures the Spanish Delegates, "That the Queen of Scots, his Niece, was the true and undoubted Queen of England, and that the King of Spain, if he had any Regard to Justice, ought to use his utmost Endeavours to get Calais deliver'd into the Hands of his Niece, who was the rightful Qu. of England. This was no good Musick in the Ears of the Spaniard, who was rather jealous of the growing Power of France, and endeavour'd therefore to steal out of England the Lady Katharine Grey, Grand-daughter to Henry VIII's Sister, that they might have one to set up against the Queen of Scots and the French, should things go otherwise than well with Queen Elizabeth; and so to prevent the Accession of England and Ireland to the Crown of France. And they made likewise very pressing Instances for advancing a Truce between England and France, till Matters came to a full Accommodation; and that Calais, in the mean mean time, should be deliver'd into the Hands of the Spaniard, as an indifferent Umpire or Guarantee: But this the French, as well as the English, refused to comply with.

He attempts to steal the Lady Katharine Grey out of England.

Queen Elizabeth was aware of this before, and she was very sensible there was no Good to be expected from Spain, after the Refusal of the Kings Addressees, and the Reformation she had made in Religion: She knew likewise well enough, that the Treaty of Cambray was set on foot with no other design, than to suppress the Protestant Religion; and in Truth, as she was a Woman, and her Exchequer in no very good Condition, she seem'd more disposed to a Peace, than to engage in a War, tho' never so just, it having been an usual Maxim with her, "That there was more Honour in settling a prudent and advantageous Peace, than to determine Matters by the longest Sword, and the most powerful Armies."

And she was of opinion besides, that it would not redound to the Honour of England, or herself, to be reduced to the Necessity of supporting her Interests by a Dependence on Spain: That it was therefore more convenient to make a separate Peace, and to concert Measures with the King of France, about the Business of Calais, being solicited thereto by several Letters not from him only, but from Montmorency High-Constable of France, and Francis of Vendome, and by as many Messages from the Duke of Guise, convey'd by the Lord Grey, who having been taken Prisoner at Guisnes, was for that purpose discharged by him. The Care and Management of this Affair was committed to Guido Carvalcanti, a Nobleman of Florence, but brought up in England, with whom the French King having held a private Conference, judg'd it much the safer way, that these Matters should be canvass'd in some obscure Corner of England or France, by Commissioners privately appointed, and without the Spaniards Knowledge: But on the contrary, Q. Elizabeth being, tho' a Maid, yet Mistress of a truly Masculine Spirit, roundly declared, that she was a Princess absolutely free to manage her own Affairs, by herself, or such Ministers as she should think fit to make use of: "That altho', during her Sisters Reign, there was nothing done without the Spaniards Advice and Consent, she for her own part would have this Part acted, not in the dark, but at the Castle of Cambray, (which lay very near the Town) between her own Deputies and those of France, and the Spaniard be no way consulted in the Matter. By this means she fell into as ill Terms with Spain, as she had done before upon her Refusal of the Match, and the Alterations she had made in Religion. Nevertheless, the French King used all possible Precaution; and the better to sift her Inclinations as to Spain and the Marriage, desired, in the first place, to be resolv'd in Two Scruples: One was, "That should he yield up Calais, before he knew what Choice the Queen would make of an Husband, Calais might very easily fall into the Hands of the Spaniard, who would be ready to purchase it at any rate; and that Wives would deny nothing to Husbands they lov'd: The other was, Whether or no (as the Spaniards bragg'd) the English had made such a sort of League with the Spaniards, as obliged them to wage War with any they should think fit to oppose? To this the Reply was, "That the Queen had so tender a Concern for her Kingdom, and was so true a Mother of her People, that she would never give up Calais in compliment to an Husband, and were she inclined to do so, the People of England would never suffer it: That there was no such League with Spain, but only a bare amicable Correspondence; and that she was entirely at liberty to enter into such Articles with any other Prince, as might best serve to promote the Interest of England: That for this Reason it was thought adviseable, that the Commissioners for both Parties should treat about making up the Differences, and concluding a Peace at the Castle. Those appointed on the Queen's side, were Thurlby Bishop of Ely, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord High-Chamberlain to the Queen, and Nicolas Wotton Dean of the Metropolitan Churches of Canterbury and York: For the French King, Charles Cardinal of Lorraine, Archbp. and Duke of Rheims, first Peer of France, Annas Duke of Montmorency, Peer, Constable and great Master of France, Jaques Albon Seigneur of St. Andrew, Marquess of Fronsac, and Marshal of France, Merweiler Bishop of Orleanse, and Claud Aubespine, Secretary to the Privy-Council. Between these was there a Peace concluded, in Terms to this effect:

I. That neither Prince should invade the other, or assist any that should.

II. That if the Subjects of either should attempt any thing against this Peace, they should be punish'd, but the Peace not broken.

III. That there should be a Free Trade.

IV. That Ships of War, before they put to Sea, should give Security, not to commit any Act of Piracy upon the other's Subjects.

V. That the Fort of Aymouth in Scotland should be razed.

VI. That the French King should, for the Term of eight Years, peaceably enjoy the Town of Calais, with all Appurtenances, and sixteen great Pieces of Ordnance.

VII. That when this Term was expired, he should restore the same and the Town to Q. Elizabeth.

VIII. That eight foreign Merchants not subjects to the French King, should engage for the Payment of Five hundred thousand Crowns, as a Penal Fine for not restoring Calais.

IX. That notwithstanding, the Queen's Title to the said Town should hold good.

X. That five Hostages should be deliver'd, till such Time as the Merchants should sign the Bond.

XI. That if any thing, during the said Term, should be attempted to be alter'd directly or indirectly, by Force of Arms, either by the Queen herself, or any of her Subjects, by her Command or Authority, against the most Christian King, or the Queen of Scots, that then they should be free and disengaged from all Promises or Contracts whatever, and the Hostages and Merchants be instantly discharged.

XII. That if any thing should be attempted to be alter'd on the side of the most Christian King, the Q. of Scots, or the Dauphin, against the Queen of England, they should be obliged, from that Instant, to quit the Possession of Calais.

In the very same Place, at the same Time, and by the same Ministers, was the Peace concluded between the Queen of England, and Francis and Mary, King and Queen of Scotland; in which were certain Articles equally respecting both Parties, concerning the Granting of Safe-Conduct to Murderers, Robbers, Plunderers, and Vagabonds. Which being sign'd and ratify'd at Upsalington, by Thomas Earl of Northumberland, Cutberd Tonstall Bishop of Durham, William Lord Dacres of Gillestland, James Croft Captain of the Town and Castle of Berwick, Managers for England; and the Earl of Morton, the Baron of Humes and S. Clere, Dean of Glasgow, Commissioners for Scotland; Peace was proclaim'd thro' the whole Kingdom, between the Queen of England, the King of France, the Dauphin, and the Queen of Scots: Which proved ungrateful News 1559. Ann. 2. News to the People, who esteem'd it a great Disgrace to the English, that Calais which they had lost, might not be restored them. The Blame hereof was, by the Protestants, laid on the Papists and Bishops; and they again return'd it upon the Governor, the Lord Wentworth, who was a Protestant. On this Pretence was this Gentleman call'd in question, in Queen Mary's Reign, without being heard, or so much as present to plead for himself; but being again call'd to his Trial, upon the Turn of Affairs, he was both heard, and acquitted by his Peers. But Ralph Chamberlayne the Governor of Calais-Fort, and John Harleston, who had the Charge of the Tower at Rife-Bank, were afterwards condemn'd as Traitors for quitting their Posts, tho' the Sentence was not executed.

The Parliament being now just ready to be dissolv'd, 'twas the general Opinion, that the Commons should address the Queen to marry as soon as might be; but the Peers refused to second this Motion, for fear they should be suspected of a Design to serve their own Ends by it. Wherefore Thomas Gargrave Speaker of the House of Commons, with some of the House, accosts the Queen, (having first obtain'd leave) and then making his Apology, from the Consideration of his Place and Office, the Queen's Candor, and the Importance of the Matter, he craved Audience, and then made a Speech in the following Terms:

The Speaker's Address to the Queen

"There is nothing that we more earnestly desire of God in our daily Prayers, than that the Happiness we have hitherto enjoy'd, in the Equity and Justice of Your Majesty's Government, may be continued to this Nation, down to the latest Posterity. But how to effect this, amidst all the Variety of our Aims and Endeavours, we must profess our selves at a loss, unless either your Majesty were to reign for ever (a Blessing which 'twere in vain to hope for) or would vouchsafe to accept some Match capable of supplying Heirs to your Royal Virtues and Dominions, which God grant, since it is the hearty and united Wish of all your Subjects. It ought to be the main Concern of Persons of all Ranks and Degrees whatever, (of Princes especially) that, since they are mortal themselves, they may secure the Kingdom from that Fate. Now it is in your Majesty's Power to confer this kind of Immortality upon your Kingdom of England, by accepting an Husband, who may prove a Support and Comfort to you, in all Changes of Fortune; besides that your Majesty's Temper and Age, Person and Fortune seem to plead hard for such a Change of State. For it cannot be doubted, but the single Zeal and Affiduity of such a Relation will dispatch more Business, and to better purpose, than the joint Endeavours of a great many, who are less concern'd: Nor indeed can any thing have a worse Influence upon the Publick, than that a Princess whose Marriage must needs produce the Twin-Blessings of Peace and Safety to a Kingdom, should, like a Nun profess, condemn herself to a single State. Since your Majesty has receiv'd the Kingdom by way of Inheritance, from your Royal Ancestors, you ought to continue it down to such, as may prove the Glory and the Security thereof. Besides, the Kings of England have ever shewn a more than ordinary Concern, that the Royal Family might not be extinct for want of Issue: Hence was it, that your Royal Grand-father Henry VII. did (within our freshest Memory) provide suitable Matches for his Sons Arthur and Henry, tho' they were both very young. And for the same Reason, your Royal Father courted Mary Queen of Scots, for his Son Prince Edward, who was then but eight Years old. And it is not very long since your Sister Queen Mary, though pretty well advanced in Years, was married to Philip of Spain. Now, if the Loss of Barrenness, whether it fell to the Share of Princes or Peasants, was always looked on as the most grievous Misfortune, what a weighty Guilt must that Princess contract, who shall make this Punishment her Option; from whence innumerable Evils must arise to the Common-wealth, and such Misfortunes as are not even to be thought of without Dread and Horror. That Matters may never come to this sad Pass, not only the small Number of us that are here present, but all England in general, and every one of your Subjects in particular, cast themselves at your Majesties Feet, and with the deepest Concern tender this humble but pressing and earnest Address. So far the Speaker; to whom the Queen made this Reply.

Gentlemen,

"The Respect and Kindness which yourselves and the rest of my Subjects express for me, is too great and visible, though the Occasion is ungrateful, not to leave very grateful Impressions on me; because I am persuaded they flow from Hearts well affected both to me and my Government. As for the Match you seem so pressing to insist on, it has been my settled Judgment a long time, that I was born into this World, to promote and advance the Glory of God in the first place, to the utmost of my Power. And to this end, I have made choice of such a State, as is free from the Incumbrance of Secular Pursuits, and gives me the most Leisure for the Service of God: And could the Applications of the most potent Princes, or the very Hazard of my Life, have diverted me from this Purpose, I had long ago worn the Honours of a Bride. These were my Sentiments, when I was but a private Person; but now that the Care and Weight of a Kingdom lies upon my Shoulders, to add to these the Incumbrance of the married State, would be no point of Discretion in me: But, that I may give you the best Satisfaction I can, I have long since made choice of a Husband, the Kingdom of England. And here, continues she, is the Pledge and Emblem of my Marriage-Contract, which I wonder you should so soon have forgot. (With that she shew'd them her Finger, with the same Gold-Ring upon it, with which she had solemnly and formally betroth'd herself to the Kingdom, at her Inauguration) After she had paus'd a little, I beseech you, said she, Gentlemen, charge me not with the Want of Children, forasmuch as every one of you, and every English-man besides, are my Children and Relations; of which if the Providence of God (which Heaven forbid) deprive me not, I cannot fairly be esteem'd childless. I cannot but in the mean time applaud your Generosity, for not imposing a Husband upon me, for that indeed would neither become you, who are born my Subjects, nor me, consider'd as an absolute Princess. Nevertheless, should it so please God, that I should at any time alter my Condition, I here promise to do nothing contrary to the Advantage of the Nation; but to make such a Choice, to the best of my Power, as that the Kingdom may enjoy a Nursing-Father as well as Mother: But should it

And, for my own part, I desire no better Character, nor fairer Remembrance of me to Posterity, than to have this Inscription on my Tomb, when I come to pay my last Debt to Nature; Here lies ELIZABETH, who liv'd and died a Maiden-Queen.

Other Acts pass'd this Session.

During this Meeting were several Acts pass'd, besides those already mention'd, relating to the Offering Violence to the Queen's Person; concerning the Restitution of Tithes and First-Fruits to the Crown, the Uniformity of the Publick Service of the Church, viz. the Liturgy and the Sacraments, which in Edward VI's time, were to be used and administred in all Churches, with very little Variation, under a certain Penalty to such as should presume to corrupt them, or resort to any other. There pass'd likewise another for frequenting the Publick Service upon Sundays and Holidays, on pain of Twelve-pence Forfeiture, to all such as should absent themselves, to be employ'd for the Use of the Poor. Another there was, to suppress factious Reports against the Queen; and several more about Merchandize, Shipping, the Cloth and Iron-Trade, and unlawful and riotous Meetings. One more there was, (not to name the Rest) concerning the Archbishops and Bishops Demesns, viz. That they should not give, grant or lease out the Livings of the Church, but for one and twenty Years, or three Lives, to any other than to the Queen and her Successors, reserving the old Rents. But this Law was never printed. Howbeit that Exception (to the Queen) however prejudicial to the Church, turn'd to the Account of such Courtiers as abused the Queen's Favour, and of those Bishops who were of a narrow and covetous Spirit; till at last 'twas quite expunged, to the great Benefit of the Church, in the Beginning of King James's Reign.

In this Parliament there was not a Man attainted, a thing that had been very usual in the first Session of that Court in other Princes Reigns; Gregory Fines Lord Daeres, and Thomas, his Brother, were restored to their Title and Estates, forfeited by their Father's Attainder, who suffer'd in Henry VIII's Reign; Henry Howard, afterwards Earl of Northampton, and his three Sisters, the Children of Henry Howard, Earl of Surry, who was beheaded upon very slight Pretences, by Henry VIII. just before his Death; John Grey of Pyrgo, Brother to the Marquess of Dorset, Sir James Crofts, Sir Henry Gates, convicted of Treason in Queen Mary's Reign; and several others.

Liturgy to be read in English.

Upon the Rising of the Parliament, the Liturgy is (by the Authority of the same) introduc'd into the Churches in the vulgar Tongue; Images are taken down with as little Disturbance as might be, and the Popish Bishops and others of the Clergy have the Oath of Supremacy tender'd them, the very same which most of them took in the Reign of Henry VIII. Such as refus'd the Oath were depriv'd of their Livings, Bishopricks, and other Ecclesiastical Preferments. The number of whom all the Kingdom over, according to their own Accounts, (and we may reckon in England above 9400 Ecclesiastical Preferments) amounted to no more than 80 Parish Rectors, 50

Prebendaries, 15 Heads of Colleges, 12 Arch-deacons, and as many Deans, 6 Abbats and Abbesses, and 14 Bishops, being all that then sat, (except only Antony Bishop of Landaff, who was the Scourge of his Diocese). The Bishops were, 1. Richard Heath Archbishop of York, who had some time since quitted the Office of Lord Chancellor, and had lived many Years in an happy and religious Privacy at his Mannor of Cobham in Surry, being in so good Favour with the Queen, that she made him many obliging Visits.

2. Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, who had been Ambassador to the Emperor, His Holiness, and the French King; but had always mix'd such a natural Roughness with his Commission, as to deserve to be generally construed as a cruel and barbarous Man, and on that account had been a Prisoner a great part of his Life.

3. Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, a most exquisite Master of Critical Learning; one that had run through many Stages of Honour at Home, and discharg'd many Embassies abroad with much Reputation; and who in his Youthful Days had stiffly oppos'd the Popes Supremacy in a long Letter to Cardinal Pool; and died at Lambeth in a considerable old Age.

4. Thomas Thurlby Bishop of Ely, did likewise Reside here, after he had very commendably acquitted himself in a certain Embassy relating to the tendering of Obedience to the See of Rome, as well as in the management of the Treaty at Cambray.

5. Gilbert Bourn Bishop of Bath and Wells; a Person who had deserv'd very well of that See.

6. John Christopherson Bishop of Chester, an excellent Grecian, who had faithfully Translated many things out of Ensebius and Philo, for the benefit of the Christian Church.

7. John White Bishop of Winchester; a Man moderately Learned, and a tolerable Poet for those Times.

8. Thomas Watson Bishop of Lincoln; a Person vers'd in the more knotty Points of Divinity; but of a stiffness in his Humour next to fullen or morose.

9. Ralph Payne Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, a second Restorer of the Hebrew Tongue, and who had been Regius Professor thereof at Paris when Learning was encourag'd under Francis the First.

10. Owen Ogletborp Bishop of Carlisle.

11. James Turbervill Bishop of Exeter. And

12. David Poole Bishop of Peterborough.

Afterwards Fekenham Abbot of the Benedictines at Westminster was depriv'd, a learned and good Man, who liv'd to a great Age, and by many Publick Largesses to the Poor got the good Will and Esteem even of his Enemies.

These Persons were first sent to Prison; but most of them were soon after committed to the Custody of their Friends, or the Bishops, those two refractory Persons excepted, viz. Lincoln and Winchester, who threatned to Excommunicate the Queen. But three, viz. Cuthbert Scot of Exeter, Richard Pate of Worcester, and Thomas Goldwell of St. Asaph, and many Nuns, left the Kingdom of their own accord. And several Noblemen did afterwards follow their Example. The chief of which were Henry Lord Morley, Sir Francis Inglefield, Sir Robert Peckham, (both of them Privy-Counsellors to Queen Mary) Sir Thomas Shelly, and Sir John Gages.

The most Learned that could be found among the Protestant Divines were recommended to the vacant Sees of such Bishops as were deceas'd, or had quitted the Kingdom.

Matthew

1559. Ann. 2. Matthew Parker, a Person of great Learning and Piety, and of a Modesty equal to both, and who had been Chaplain to Henry VIII. and Dean of the Collegiate-Church of Stoke-Clare, was Elected to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, and Consecrated at Lambeth, after the usual Solemnities of a Sermon, the Invocation of the Holy Ghost, and the Administration of the Sacrament, together with the Imposition of Hands by three formerly depriv'd Bishops, viz. William Barlow Bishop of Bath, John Scory Bishop of Chichester, Miles Coverdale Bishop of Exeter, and John Suf-fragan of Bedford. He afterwards Consecrated Edmund Grindall, a most excellent Divine, Bishop of London; Richard Cox, Tutor to Edward VI. Bishop of Ely; Edwin Sands, a fluent and elo-quent Preacher, Bishop of Worcester; Rowland Merick, Bishop of Bangor; Thomas Young, an ex-quisite Common Lawyer and Civilian, Bishop of St. Davids; Nicholas Bullingham, Doctor of Laws, Bishop of Lincoln; John Jewell, a Person of uni-versal Learning, Bishop of Salisbury; Richard Da-vis, Bishop of St. Asaph; Edward Guest, Bishop of Rochester; Gilbert Barkley, Bishop of Bath; Thomas Bentham, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield; William Alley, an eloquent Commentator, Bishop of Exeter; John Parkhurst, a perfect Master of human Learning, Bishop of Norwich; Robert Home, a Man of a strong and pregnant Wit, Bi-shop of Winchester; Richard Chiney, a strict Luthe-ran, Bishop of Gloucester; and Edmund Scambler, Bishop of Peterborough; besides William Barlow, whom he settled in the See of Chichester, after he had been, in the Reign of Henry VIII. successively Bishop of St. Davids and Wells; and John Scory he Confirm'd Bishop of Hereford, a Person of Sense and Learning, and who had been Bishop of Chichester before. In like manner Young, being translated from St. Davids to the See of York, did in that Province consecrate James Pilkington, a Man of singular Parts and Probity, Bishop of Duresm; John Best, Bishop of Carlisle; and Wil-liam Downham, Bishop of Chester. The Chara-cter of these Men, and the Sufferings they un-derwent during their Banishment in Q. Mary's Reign, or their Concealment in England, I leave to the Pen of Church-Historians.

Now there being a very great Dearth of lear-ned Men, several Mechanics, Men of the same level for Sense and Learning with the Romish Priests, made a shift to work themselves into Ec-clesiastical Promotions, and to compass good Prebends and fat Benefices. Nevertheless the greater part of the Popish Priests themselves thought it would turn to better account, in re-spect of their Religion and Themselves, to re-nounce the Pope's Authority, and swear Alle-giance to the Queen, were it for no other End than the Exclusion of the Protestants out of their Churches, and the Relief of such of their own Party who had been displac'd. This they judg'd a piece of Discretion highly meritorious, and upon that score hop'd the Pope would be so good as to dispense with their Oath upon such an Oc-casion.

Such were the Alterations of Religion made in England, to the astonishment indeed of the whole Christian World, that they made so little noise and bustle. However, sudden they were not, (for such Changes are seldom suffer'd) but sober and gradual: For (to repeat the substance of what I said before in very few Words) Popery kept the same footing in England for an entire Month and more, which it had at the death of Queen Mary. 'Twas the 27th of December before the Epistles, Gospels, the Decalogue, the Lord's Prayer, the Creed and the Litany were suffer'd to be us'd in English; and it was not till the 22d of March that the Parliament agreed to re-peal the Act of Edward VI. in favour of admi-nistring the Lord's Supper in both Kinds. On the 24th of June it was, that in virtue of an Act for the Uniformity of Publick Worshipp, and the Celebration of the Sacraments, the Sacrifice of the Mass was put down, and the Liturgy ap-pointed to be us'd in the Vulgar Tongue. In July the Oath of Supremacy was tender'd to the Bishops and others; and in August the Images were pull'd down, broken and burnt. But for-asmuch as some scurrilous Wits defam'd her Ma-jesty for having assum'd the Title of Supreme Head of the Church, and the Office of the Priesthood into the bargain, she was pleas'd to signify by an exprefs and publick Writing, "That she pretended to no more than what had "of a long time justly belong'd to the Crown; "i. e. to claim, under God, the Supreme Right "and Government over all the Estates of the "Realm, whether Ecclesiastical or Temporal; "and, That no Foreign Power had or ought "to have any Authority or Jurisdiction over "them.

'Twas this new Scene of Religion which, ac-cording to the Remark of Politicians, made Eng-land the freest Nation in Christendom: For, besides that 'twas now fairly rid of the Pope's foreign Yoke, twas a much Wealthier Kingdom than for some Ages it had been; for a vast Sum of Mony was now kept at Home, which, to the great impoverishing of the Nation, had been continually Exported to Rome for First Fruits, Indulgences, Appeals, Dispensations, Palls, and such Trumpery.

The Reform'd Religion being now Establish'd by Parliament, the Queen's chief Care and Con-cern was how to guard and protect it from the several Attacks and Practises of such as were its profess'd Enemies on that score: And as she would admit of no Innovations herein, so she studied how to square her own Life and Actions by so even a balance, as to preserve the Chara-cter of one not given to change. On which ac-count it was that she chose for her Motto, Semper Eadem, i. e. Always the same. And as for all her other Counsels or Deliberations, they seem'd to center in this Point, The Security of her King-doms. For 'twas a common saying with her, That she studied the Peoples Welfare so heartily, that it was a prejudice to her own. If she had any other aims, they were levell'd chiefly at these Marks, The gaining the Affections of her Subjects, the Dread of her Enemies, and the Esteem of all the World: For she was not to learn, that those things have a very sure and stable Foundation which are begun with Deliberation, and carry'd on with Industry and Care. How much she ex-ceeded even herself and her Sex in the strength and vigour of her Counsels and Endeavours, and the Sagacity she us'd in preventing, oppo-sing, or diverting any Mischiefs that threaten'd her Government, the present and succeeding Times may learn from those authentick Records which are to deliver down to Posterity the Hi-story and Affairs of this Kingdom.

About this time the Emperor and the Catho-lick Princes interpos'd, by several Letters, in favour of the depriv'd Bishops, and that the Ro-manists might enjoy the Liberty of separate As-semblies in some Towns and Cities of the King-dom. To whom the Queen's Answer was, "That altho' those Popish Bishops had openly "and insolently brav'd the Laws and disturb'd "the Peace of the Kingdom, and did still ob-stinately reject that Doctrine which many of "themselves, when they enjoy'd Places of Ho-nour and Trust under Henry VIII. and Edward VI. had recommended to others both by their Pens and from their Pulpits; That she design'd nevertheless to treat them very favourably, in regard to the Character and Intercession of so Great Princes, tho' she should disoblige her better Subjects by it: But as for having any private Chappels for their use, That she could not grant, either in Honour or Conscience, nor indeed with any Safety to her Government.

Nor had she any reason to make such a Grant, since 'twas plain that England had not embrac'd any strange or new-fangled Faith, but the very same which Christ commanded, the Primitive Catholick Church received, and the Oldest of the Fathers jointly approved of. And more than this, That to allow of Churches, in which different Modes of Worship were used, besides that 'twould be a plain and gross violation of the Legal and Parliamentary Authority, it would amount to the same thing, as the Engrafting one Religion on the Stock of another, and by that means distracting Peoples Minds, nourishing a Spirit of Mutiny and Faction, and putting all things into disorder. And this would be not only bad enough in itself, but a dangerous Precedent and of ill Consequence to Protestants and Themselves too; nor indeed would there be any Advantage or Safety at all in it. That she had therefore resolved, of her natural Clemency, and especially at the instance of those Great Persons, to try if she could cure the haughty Spirit of some by a seasonable Convivance; but not so neither, as to indulge and cherish the peevish Humour in them.

to the Q.

The King of Spain having cast off all Pretensions to Elizabeth, and being upon his Marriage with the French King's Daughter, is not however a little perplexed about England, which he had no mind to see united to the Crown of France: And the better to retain the Honour of so considerable a Kingdom in his own Family, he persuaded the Emperor Ferdinand, his Uncle, to offer one of his Sons in Marriage to Queen Elizabeth; which he did, by Letters full of Respect; and pressed the Affair very closely by Gaspar Preinor, Free-Baron in Stribing; and the King of Spain himself offers her Majesty his best and heartiest Offices, to bring it about; whilst she in return has both her Ships and Ports at his Service, to facilitate his intended Voyage into Spain, and pays him other Services and Compliments by the Hands of Sir Thomas Chaloner.

The Fr.
King attempts to

Queen of Scots Q. of Engl.

The French King, on the other hand, in favour of the King, his Son, the Dauphin, and of Mary Queen of Scots, (but, we may suppose, with a glance upon England) forbore to draw his French Forces out of Scotland, according to his Agreement; but, instead of that, he sent over privately French Supplies, and dealt more vigorously with the Pope to get Queen Elizabeth declared an Heretick and Illegitimate, and Mary confirmed Lawful Queen of England. But these Policies the King of Spain and the Emperor did privately Countermine by their Agents at Rome. Nevertheless the Guises had sooth'd the Vanity and Ambition of the French King into so sanguine an hope, that the Queen of Scots, their Niece, would prove the Instrument of uniting England to the Crown of France, that he makes an open Claim of England for his Son and Daughter-in-law; and gave orders, when he found he could do nothing at Rome, that this Title should be used in all publick Instruments, Francis and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of Scot- land, England and Ireland: And every where appointed the Arms of England to be Quartered with those of Scotland, whether in the common Household-Stuff upon the Walls, or in the Herald's Coats; whilst, in the mean time, the English Ambassador complained in vain, that this was an high Affront to his Royal Mistress Queen Elizabeth, with whom he had lately entred into a Friendly Alliance; whereas he had done no such thing in the Life-time of Queen Mary, who had proclaimed War against him. Besides, he had in Pay several Regiments of Horse and Foot in readiness both in France and Germany, to be transported into those Parts of Scotland which bordered upon England. So that Queen Elizabeth could not but be jealous of the French King's Designs, who seemed to intend nothing less than the absolute Ruin of the Protestants. But it seems all his Attempts were defeated by his sudden Death at a Tilt which was held at the Solemnity of his Daughter's Marriage with the King of Spain, and his Sisters, with the Duke of Survoy: And very seasonably for the Queen, whose Title he had prepared himself to oppose with all his Might, both in Scotland and France. However this did not hinder her from paying all due Honours to his Ashes, and performing those Funeral Rites in St. Paul's which belonged to a Crowned Head and an Allie; and she sent besides a Compliment of Condolance to his Successor, Francis, by Charles, Son to the Lord Howard of Effingham, at this time Admiral of England and Ireland; who was likewise to Congratulate him upon his Succession, and to desire a continuance of that Friendship which so lately commenced between the two Crowns.

But Francis and the Queen of Scots, his Consort, (by the Advice of the Guises, who now Ruled all in France) began to act publicly as King and Queen of England, and were so far from disclaiming the borrowed Arms of England, that they made the greater shew and boast of them: And when Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, the Queen's Ambassador in Ordinary, a Wife and Brave Man, demanded the reason of this Proceeding, he received for answer, That the Queen of Scots might very lawfully bear them, with some small note of distinction, were it but to shew her nearness of Relation to the Blood-Royal of England. But Throckmorton flatly denied it to be any way consistent with the Law of Arms, for any one to usurp the Arms of another Family, who was not an Heir-Apparent of the same. But they afterwards remonstrated, That she claimed the Arms of England for no other reason than to oblige the Queen of England to disclaim the Arms of France. To this he replied, by putting them in mind of what Dr. Wotton had urged before at the Treaty of Cambray, viz. "That twelve of the Kings of England had carried the Arms of France, and that by so unquestionable a Right, that in all the Treaties which had passed between the English and the French, not one single Exception was used against it. At last this point was gain'd at the Instance of Montmorency, a Rival of the Guises, that the Title and Arms of England and Ireland should never be Quartered with theirs for the future; for he could not apprehend it for the Honour of the King of France, that any other Title or Arms should be used or engraven in the King's Seal than those of the King of France: That this one Title was as good as a great many; and that the former Kings of France assumed no other Character when they put in their claim to Naples and Milan, &c.

But

1559. But, in good earnest, from these very Arms and Titular Pretences, which Henry of France bestowed on the young Queen of Scots, by the Counsell of the Guises, have flow'd, as from their proper Fountain, all those Disasters in which she was afterwards involv'd. For this very thing it was that occasion'd the Queen's profess'd Breach with the Guises, and fomented a private Grudge in her against the Queen of Scots, which was blown up into a mighty Flame, by the Malice of some Rival Parties on both sides; to the increase of which likewise several Accidents concurred to raise it to such an height as not to be extinguish'd but by her Blood. So true is it, that the Crown admits no Competitor, and that Princes have a very nice sense of Injuries.

The ground of the Quarrels between England and Scotland. Some time after this three Hostages only were sent over for Calais, whereas, according to the Treaties, there should have been four. The English Merchants are ill used in France, and a Servant belonging to Throckmorton the Ambassador, is in the open Streets forced into the Gallies by Francis, Grand-Prior of France, and Brother to the D. of Guise. The Ambassador himself had like to have been Pistoll'd in his own House, and was abusively serv'd in Plate which bore the Arms of England and France together. At the same time Monsieur de Brossy is sent with a form'd Body of Men into Scotland, and Gallies are hasten'd into the British-Seas from Marseilles, and the Mediterranean.

The Fr. break the Treaty with the English. And send Soldiers into Scotland. The Scots refuse to obey the Queen-Regent. About this time the Protestants in Scotland, that stil'd themselves Congregationers, being overpersuaded by some clamorous Churchmen, and Knox especially, that furious Zealot against Kingly Government, that 'twas properly the Peer's business to authorize the Suppressing of Idolatry, and to compel Princes to keep within the Bounds of the Laws; they did thereupon refuse to pay Obedience to the then Regent, the Queen's Mother, a Lady of great Virtue, and fell to making Alterations in the Church, Burning and Plundering all Places devoted to Religion in a most outrageous manner, having drawn to their Party, Hamilton Duke of Chastel Herault, (a Person of the first Interest in the Kingdom, and one who had been exasperated by the French) and decoy'd several others of the Chief Nobility in hope of sharing between them the Revenues of the Church: Insomuch, that they gave occasion to the Regent and the French Forces in Scotland to suspect, that Religion was the least thing in their Thoughts, and that their real Design was a Revolt: And James Prior of St. Andrews, the Queen's base Brother, (afterwards E. of Murray) who was Ringleader of the Party, was accus'd of an Attempt to get the Crown from his Sister's Head.

He, in the mean time, disowns the Charge, and solemnly protests that he had no other aim than the Glory of God, and the Liberty of his Country, which he could not choose but bewail now he saw it oppress'd by the Regent and the French.

They crave Aid of Queen Elizabeth. The Heads of the Congregation began now to inform Queen Elizabeth of their Grievances, in a patherick Address deliver'd by William Maitland of Lidington, Lord-Secretary. The purport of which was, "That from the time the Queen of Scots was marry'd to the Dauphin, the Face of the Government was changed, that foreign Soldiers pillaged all that came to their Hands, and that the best Places of the Kingdom were bestowed on Frenchmen; that the Castles and Forts were delivered up to their Custody, the Sterling Coin of the Kingdom was mixt and adulterated to enrich them; and that the French, by these and such like Arts, were

"forming a Project to seize on the Government "should things happen amiss with the Queen. Cecil (whose excellent Advices and Assistance the Queen always made use of upon Emergencies of this kind) employ'd Henry Percy, afterward Earl of Northumberland, to lift the Intentions of the Heads of the Congregation, and the Measures they designed to take for compassing their Ends; and on Condition that Succour should be sent them, upon what Terms a good Correspondence must be set on foot between the two Kingdoms.

They answered, with their Eyes lift up to Heaven, "That they had no other Design in the World than the promotion of God's Glory, the sincere Preaching of his Word, the Extirpation of Idolatry, the shunning the Rage of their Persecutors, and the preservation of their ancient Liberty; that, for their parts, they were at a loss how to bring all this about, but hoped that God's Providence would happily finish what it had begun, to the Confusion of their Enemies; and for an Union between the two Kingdoms, that was the very top of of their Wishes; and to cultivate and improve it they would contribute all the Money, Credit and Resolution they were Masters of.

The Debates concerning these Matters went but slowly on in England, by reason the Scots were but slenderly provided with Men and Money, and could not well trust one another. They are advis'd only not to put things at all Adventures, to the hazard of a War. But as soon as it appeared that the Marquis of Albeuf, the Queen of Scots Uncle, levied Forces in Germany, by the Rhinegrave's assistance, to carry on the Scottish War, that Pieces of Ordnance were convey'd to the Sea-Ports, and greater Preparations made than were necessary to quell a few unarmed Scots, (for that was the Pretence) and that the French, the better to win the Danes into a Confederacy with them, had promised, that the Duke of Lorain should quit his Claim to the Kingdom of Denmark, and that they did more strenuously endeavour to procure the Bishop of Rome's Censure against the Queen, and his Declaratory Sentence for the Queen of Scots Right to the Crown of England, Sir Ralph Sadler, a Person of great Discretion, was dispatched to the Borders of Scotland to advise with the Earl of Northumberland, Warden of the Middle-March, and with Sir James Crofts, Governor of Berwick. For the Politicians in England were at a loss where these things might end, unless it were in the Invasion of the Kingdom, and the attaining by force that which their Arms and Titles did already pretend to.

This Point was every seriously Canvass'd at Home; on one side since it would look like a very ill Precedent for a Prince to assist the Sedition of his Neighbour's Subjects; on the other, 'twas an act of Impiety to leave those in the Lurch who embraced the same Religion. And 'twould be but an odd piece of Politicks to let the French, the sworn Enemies of England, and the Pretenders to the Crown of it, when they enjoy'd a settled Peace all round them, to remain in Arms in Scotland, a Neighbouring Nation, and so conveniently situated for Invading England on that side where both the Nobles and Commons of the Kingdom were most affected to Popery. This would be much the same in effect as to betray the Quiet and Safety of the whole Nation to its Enemies. That slower Counsels were now therefore to be laid aside, and Arms to be speedily provided, forasmuch as true English Wisdom had always chose to prevent their Enemies

1559. Ann. 2.

These Matters are Debated in England.

'Tis Resolv'd that the Fr. be forc'd out of Scotland.

1559. Ann. 2. mies Approaches, rather than to wait for them : And that 'twas always lawful both to prevent and keep Dangers at a distance, and that by the same Arts and Stratagems used by the Enemy to promote or bring them forward. That as for England, it could never be safe, but when powerfully Armed ; and never safer than when there was nothing to be apprehended from Scotland. To prevent any fear of this kind, that Succours were to be sent to the suffering Protestants, and the French to be drove out of Scotland, for that they were to be wrought on by Force, not Advice ; through the fatal neglect of which, not long since, Calais was lost, to the great Shame and Detriment of the Nation. And a very little before, upon a mighty fair pretence of Peace on their side, Ambleteul and the Forts about Boulogne, were surpriz'd and taken, whereby Boulogne it self of Necessity surrender'd to them.

Nor could it be otherwise expected than that Berwick and the Frontier-Towns must run the same Risque, unless they took up Arms on the first Occasion, and were so wise not to trust the smooth Disguises used by the French in Scotland, as to their Inclinations for Peace, since 'tis plain that the French are cunning Politicians in contriving their ambitious Designs, and are Masters of a vast Revenue to put them in execution : Insomuch, that it has grown into an English Proverb, That France could neither be Poor nor Peaceable for three Years together. And Queen Elizabeth used very frequently that Expression of Valentinian, the Emperor, Choose the French for your Friends, but not for your Neighbours. This was therefore the result of the whole Matter, That it was Just, Honest, and even Necessary and Convenient, to drive the French, as soon as possible, out of Scotland.

English Soldiers are sent by Sea and Land into Scotland.

Accordingly William Winter, Master of the Naval-Stores, is sent with a Fleet into Bodotria, (now Edinburgh-Frith) who, to the great Consternation of the French, falls furiously on their Men of War lying by the Shore, and also on the French Forces in the Isle of Inchkeith. The Duke of Norfolk was made Lord-Lieutenant of the North-Parts towards Scotland ; William Lord Grey, an excellent Soldier (who had made a brave but unsuccessful Defence of Guisnes against the French) was made Warden of the Middle and East Marches ; and Thomas Earl of Sussex, who had been Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in Queen Mary's Reign, was sent back in the same Quality, with Instructions to be very particularly careful that the Irish (who were a People Rude and Wild enough, and so by consequence the more Superstitious) were not Inveigled by the French into a Rebellion, on pretence of Religion. That he should Fortify Ophale with strong Garrisons, and should bestow large Parcels of Lands on the oldest and best-deserving Soldiers, to be possess'd by them and the Heirs-Male of their Body for ever. That he should restore Surley-Boy, a Scotch Irishman, to those Possessions he claim'd by Inheritance in Ulster, to hold in Fee for Duties to be by him perform'd. That he should make a moderate Advance of the Queen's Revenues, and model her Exchequer there by that of England.

Francis Earl of Shrewsbury dies.

At this time Francis Talbot, one of the Lords of the Privy-Council, died. He was the fifth Earl of Shrewsbury of his Family, and left his only Son George to succeed him, whom he had by Mary, Daughter of Thomas Lord Dacres of Gillefland.

The Third Year of her Reign.

As soon as the Duke of Norfolk arriv'd at Berwick, he was join'd by James, the Bastard, Prior of St. Andrews ; the Lord Retbuen, and others ; who, on the behalf of the Duke of Castle-Herault and other Allies, enters into a League with him in the name of the Queen of England, to this effect. Whereas the French endeavour against all Right and Reason to subdue Scotland, and unite it to the Crown of France, the Queen of England shall oblige herself to take into her protection the Duke of Castle-Herault, Heir-Apparent to the Crown of Scotland, together with the Nobles and Commons, as long as the King of France holds Mary Queen of Scots in marriage, and one Year after. She shall furnish an Army at Land, and equip a Fleet at Sea with all necessary Supplies, in order to drive the French out of Scotland : That she shall not make Peace with the French, but on condition that Scotland have and enjoy its ancient Liberties. That the Forts which the English help'd to recover to the French shall be raised out of hand, and deliver'd to the Duke of Norfolk, to do with them as he shall think fit. The English shall fortify no places in Scotland but by the consent of the Duke of Castle-Herault and the Peers of the Land. That they shall lend the English what Assistance they can. That they shall treat all the Enemies of England as their own ; and shall not establish an Union between the Crowns of France and Scotland on any other Terms, than those already fix'd by right of Marriage. That if England should happen to be Invaded by the French on this side the River Tine, the Scotch should be obliged to send 2000 Horse and a 1000 Foot under the Queen of England's Pay : But if the Invasion were beyond the Tine, they should assist the English with what possible Forces they could, and maintain them for 30 Days, as they used to do for the Defence of Scotland. The Earl of Argile, Lord-Chief-Justice of Scotland, shall do his best to reduce the North of Ireland to better Orders, upon such Terms as could be agreed on between him and the Lieutenant of Ireland. Lastly : They agreed on the Measures to be taken on both sides in case Mac-Conel or any of his Party from the Western Isles should attempt any thing in Scotland or Ireland. For the better performance of this Treaty, Hostages should be sent into England before the English Army enter'd Scotland ; which Hostages might be changed every four or five Months at the pleasure of the Scots, during the Marriage between the French King and the Queen of Scots, and a Year after. The Duke of Castle-Herault, and the Earls and Barons of Parliament concern'd in the League, shall sign these Articles with their Hands and Seals within 20 Days. And withal, in regard that the Queen takes these Measures purely in respect to a good Neighbourhood and Correspondence with the Scots, as well as the Rescue of them from a Yoke of Slavery, they shall openly declare, That they will pay Allegiance to the Queen of Scots and her Husband in all things that do or shall not interfere with their ancient Liberty.

And now was there a Discovery made, as well by several Dispatches from foreign Princes, as private Letters that were intercepted, That the French were resolv'd to invade England ; and Sebastian Martigues, a young Nobleman of the House of Luxemburg, arrived in Scotland, with 1000 Foot, all disciplin'd Men, and one or two Cornets of Horse. D'oifely, a French-man, and one of the Queen Regent's Council, made an insolent Proposal to the Scotch Nobility at Ayrmouth near Berwick, of investing by Force the King and Queen of Scotland, in the Possession of England. But they, being well enough acquainted with the Difficulty of the Undertaking, and to avoid the Suspicion of being inclined to break the Peace they so lately agreed to, rejected 1560. Ann. 3. And the Motion. Nevertheless, the best Advice the Queen-Regent could give Martignes, could hardly give Check to that railing Ambition, which prompted him at any rate to invade England. But his Mettle was soon cool'd, when the Marquess of Albeuf, who set sail for Scotland with a bigger Force, after the Escape of a violent Tempest on the Coast of Holland, was, with the Loss of some Ships and a great many Men, driven back to Diep, from whence he had set sail.

Spaniards stop the English Provisions

French labour the Recalling of the English from Scotland.

They protest against the Queen, and are answer'd.

About this time arrived from Spain one Philip Starvelly of Glaion, a Knight of the Golden-Fleece, and Master of the Ordnance, to remonstrate the Complaints of the French, against the Queen, in relation to Scotland, and to mediate a Peace, in the Name of the King, his Master; but withal, he privately advised the Queen to carry on her Designs in Scotland, with her utmost Vigour and Resolution; tho' the King of Spain, on the other hand, openly refused the Transportation of her Naval Provisions to England, which she had made at Antwerp; insomuch that she was forced to get fresh Supplies from Germany. Nor was Starvelly's Proposal without some very suspicious Circumstances, viz. That some Spanish Troops should be sent to Scotland, in Conjunction with some French Regiments, to quash the Rebellion there, and to be at the same time a Check upon the French, should they attempt any thing upon England. All this while Michael Scurry the French King's Ambassador in ordinary, urged the Queen several times to call home her Fleet and Army out of Scotland: Nor did she seem averse to it, provided the French might be call'd home too. But both Parties using Pretences for Delay, the Matter was shifted off from time to time, till J. Monluc, Bishop of Valence, a Person no way ill inclined to the Protestant Interest, came out of France; who, upon his Arrival, declared, that he had receiv'd no Orders relating to this Affair: However, being a Man of Sense and Address, he used all possible Persuasions for calling home the Land and Sea-Forces out of Scotland; and roundly maintain'd, that the bearing the Arms of England, was no Injury to the Queen, but a Credit rather to the Blood-Royal of England. But when neither the one nor the other Project would go down, the first being thought absurd, and the other dangerous, Scurry intreated Starvelly, and the Bishop of Aquila, Ambassador in ordinary from the King of Spain, that they would be present as Witnesses to his Protestation against the Queen, for her Breach of the Treaty of Peace; which they refused, as having no Warrant for such a Procedure. He made, nevertheless, his Protest, in a very long Speech: To which there was a printed Answer, in which her Majesty protested to the whole World, That the Breach of the Treaties, and all the Grounds of the War, had proceeded purely from the French; and that nothing could have been more grievous or distastful to her, than this War; and more of this kind, as may be easily collected from what has been said already, and by a former Manifesto, wherein she declared, That tho she had receiv'd the basest Injuries and Affronts, in that her Arms and Title had been usurped, yet could she never be induced to believe, that this was done by the Consent of the King or Queen of France, or the Princes of the Blood; but by the ill Practices of the Guises, who had abused the Wealth of the King and Kingdom of France, in order the better to wound England, through the Sides of the Scots: Wherefore, for her part, she could not be regardless of her own and her Peoples Safety. And without all question, the Guises, out of their Affection to their Niece the Queen of Scots, and their Enmity of Elizabeth, on the score of Religion, and out of an Ambition to deserve well of France, by the Addition of new Kingdoms to it, left no Stone unturn'd to compass the Death of Queen Elizabeth; depending on the Promises of some of her Subjects, that were no Favourers of the Reformation. But the Feuds and Discontents which sprung up in France, about transferring the Government from the Princes of the Blood, to the Guises, diverted 'em from their Purpose. And she herself used so watchful a Precaution against their base Machinations, that she became, from this Moment, the Wonder of her Friends, and the Terror of her Enemies.

The same day that Grey came with his Forces into Scotland, Scurry and Monluc made very pressing Instances, to have the Army call'd home again; and fed the Queen with Hopes, that Calais would be restored, as soon as she commanded it back. She answer'd plainly, That she very little valued Calais, a poor Fishing-Town, in comparison of the Safety and Security of all Britain. And the very same day, she dispatch'd into Spain, Anthony Browne, Viscount Montacute, a Person who had the Reputation of a wise Man, but a rigid Catholic withal, and one who was like to be more welcome, on that score; who with Sir Thomas Chamberlaine, her Majesties Resident there, should acquaint the King of Spain, among other Matters, upon what just and warrantable Grounds she had sent an Army into Scotland, viz. the same already mention'd. And should shew him moreover, That the Queen of Scots, an infirm young Woman, was marry'd in France, to a crazy King, without hope of Issue: That by the Practices of the Guises, a Plot was laid to ensnare Hamilton, Duke of Chastel-Herault, who was by Authority of Parliament declared Heir-Apparent to the Crown of Scotland; together with his Son, who was travelling in France: That their Designs tended to an Union of the two Crowns of France and Scotland, and not to secure the latter for the Queen; which how dangerous Consequence it might be of to his Provinces in the Netherlands, as well as to Spain, he might please to take into his serious Consideration. On the other hand, That the Confederate Nobility of Scotland were not to be branded for Rebels, when they had no other Ends than to preserve the Kingdom (as they were in Duty bound) to the Queen and her lawful Successors; which they could rates, not, without a palpable Injury to themselves and theirs, suffer to be undermined by the Stratagems of the Guises, or made over to the French.

Leith besieged.

In the Beginning of April, the English Army, consisting of 1200 Horse, and 6000 Foot, came before Leith. This Town is situated on Edinburgh-Frith, the greatest In-let of all Britain, where the River Leith discharges itself into the Sea; and yields a very convenient Harbour for Shipping, scarce Two Miles from Edinburgh, the Metropolis of Scotland: And by reason of so commodious a Situation, the French had fortify'd it as a Place of Reserve for their Auxiliary-Troops. Martignes draws out his Companies of Foot, and attacks the English in the Van to keep them from a Hill, where he thought they would intrench themselves: But after a Skirmish of about four Hours, he was beaten back to the Town, with the Loss of some on both sides: Then they began to cast up Trenches, and raise Batteries, from whence they annoy'd the Town, as much as from their Ships. The French made some Sallies, but with more Courage than Success, and gave many Proofs of their Bravery: They won the Trench (among other Advantages) on the 15th. of April, nail'd three great Pieces, and took Sir Maurice Berkly Prisoner. But Sir James Crofts and Cuthbert Vaughan soon drove them from their Post, and beat them into the Town,

Town, with a considerable Slaughter. At the same time Arthur Grey, Son to the Lord Grey, who commanded in chief, was shot in the Shoulder. After this, the Camp was remov'd nearer to the Town, because the great Shot fell short of it, by reason of their too great Distance. And not long after, a Part of the Town, and some Granaries, by chance took fire, to the great Terror of the Inhabitants. This the English endeavour'd to increase, by directing thither their great Guns, and in the mean time they enter'd the Ditches, and took the Height of the Walls. On the 6th. of May (according to an Agreement between the English and Scots) they attempt to scale the Walls, and take the Town; but by reason their Ladders were too short, and the Mote deep, upon their stopping the Sluice, they were repuls'd, and put in Confusion by a Shower of small Shot from the Hills, which kill'd some, and wounded more. The Blame of this Disgrace lay at Crofts's door, for that he, not approving the Design, (whether out of his real Opinion, or Favour to the French, or Malice to Grey, I will not take upon me to determine) had staid at his Post, like an idle Spectator, without offering to support the distressed Party. Most certain it is, that Norfolk and Grey impeach'd him by private Letters to the Queen, not only on this Account, but also for holding a private Correspondence with the Queen-Regent of Scotland, and opposing this Expedition: Whereupon being afterwards examin'd in the Council-Chamber, he was remov'd from his Government of Berwick, and Grey placed in his Room. Nevertheless, he was not quite out of the Queen's Favour, who afterwards made him (and that for good Reasons) Comptroller of her Household. The English and Scotch being a little balk'd by this ill Fortune, Norfolk encourages 'em forthwith, by sending fresh Supplies: After this they had some little Skirmishes, till the French King, being advertised that his Men were so block'd up at Leith, that no Supplies could reach them, either by Sea or Land, by reason of the great Distance, and that new Tumults sprung up every day at home; granted Authority to the Bishop of Valence, and Charles Rochefaucalt Randon, to compound Matters with Q. Elizabeth's Commissioners, who immediately dispatch'd into Scotland William Cecil and Nicolas Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York. For the King and Queen of France and Scotland, thought it too mean a Condescension for Princes to debate Things on a Level with their own Subjects; and Murray made such Proposals, as, in Cecil's Opinion, were neither fit for Princes to grant, nor Subjects to ask. During this Parley, Mary of Lorain, the Queen's Mother, and the Regent of Scotland, departed this Life; a pious and wise Princess, who had suffer'd the most bitter Reproaches, from some virulent and furious Preachers (as may be seen in their own Church-History, call'd in by Queen Elizabeth, when 'twas just going to the Press) as likewise from the Hands of the Congregation, who, as native Counsellors of the Kingdom, had, in the Name of the Q. of Scots and her Husband, by their own Authority, excluded her from the Regency, as one that oppos'd the Glory of God, and the Liberty of the Scots. The Articles agreed upon by the Commissioners, three Months after the Siege was laid, were as follow.

The Treaty at Edinburgh and the Articles thereof.

The Treaty of Peace in the Castle of Cambray, between Queen Elizabeth and Henry II. of France, shall be renewed and confirmed.

The Treaty made at the same place between England and Scotland shall be likewise ratify'd.

Preparations for War shall be at an end on both sides.

The Fort at Aimouth in Scotland shall be raised.

The King of France and Queen Mary shall quit the Arms and Title of England and Ireland.

The Debate concerning Reparations to be made to Queen Elizabeth; and about Caution for the fifth Article is refer'd to another Meeting to be held at London; and if it cannot then be adjusted, the Catholick King to decide the Matter.

The King and Queen shall be fully reconcil'd to the Peers of Scotland, their Subjects.

The Confederates, his Catholick Majesty more especially, shall be comprehended.

This Treaty shall be Sign'd within sixty Days, and an Oath taken on both sides for Confirmation thereof.

This Peace was Proclaim'd thro' the Camp and Town to the general Satisfaction; for all Sides began to be weary of the War: The English, for the miserable Waste of the Country all about; the French for want of Victuals, and the Scots for want of Pay: And 'twas a Peace without doubt which all Britain found its Advantages, as it tended to secure the ancient Liberties of Scotland, and to preserve the Honour and Safety of England, which had now nothing to fear on the side of Scotland; so that the English were ready to acknowledge, with all possible Cheerfulness, that Queen Elizabeth was the Author of their Safety, as on the other side the Scots with equal Satisfaction own'd her the Defender of their Liberties.

She, all this while, like a true Mother of her Country, was so mightily Intent upon the Publick Welfare, that she seem'd to have no room in her Thoughts for the Addresses of the most Potent Princes. For she was at one and the same time Courted for Charles Duke of Austria, a younger Son of the Emperor Ferdinand, by the Count of Elphenstein; and the Protestants of Scotland recommended to her James Earl of Arran, as the likeliest Method for uniting the divided Kingdoms of England and Scotland. But this Motion was presently rejected, tho' without any Disparagement to the Character of the Person. Next appear'd Errick King of Sweedland, by the means of his Brother the Duke of Finland, whom Gu-stavus (their Father) had some time before his death sent into England upon this Errand; and with the more hopes of Success, because he profess'd the Queen's Religion: Nay, he was so credulously bent on the business, that he had Thoughts of coming into England himself; tho' the Dane resolv'd, out of a Grudge to him, to intercept his Passage, as thinking it no way for his Interest for England and Sweedland (which has Denmark just between them) to be united by this Match.

The great Affection and Respect which this Prince express'd to the Queen, She most gratefully acknowledg'd, and assur'd him, 'That he should be very welcome to England, but that she could not as yet prevail on herself to change a single Life, in which she had found so much satisfaction for the other State. She desir'd him therefore to ask any other Instance of her Friendship, and whether he succeeded or not, she would endeavour to let him see he had not thrown away his good Inclinations. She advis'd him likewise to use no Delays in the choice of a Wife, and wish'd he might gain one answerable to his Worth and Merit. With this Answer John Duke of Finland return'd Home about six Months after, having left no Method unattempted for advancing the Match, by Court-

1560. Ann. 3. ing the Queen every Day, giving rich Presents to the Courtiers, and drawing the Love and Respect of the Meanest, among whom he would often scatter some pieces of Silver, assuring them withal, that when his Brother came, he would be as free of his Gold. Notwithstanding he was ill used by his Brother at his return, who, it seems, was jealous, that he had manag'd the Courtship rather for his own self than him. He therefore still continu'd his Suit for two Years together, and sent fresh Proposals by Nicholas Guldenstein. And so lightly Amorous was he withal, as the same time to make Love to Philip the Landgrave of Hesse's Daughter; and when that would not do neither, he took up with a Young Woman of very mean Extraction.

The Queen's Answer to Archduke Charles. But Charles of Austria could not but hope, that the House of Austria, which had the good Luck to make the most Honourable Alliances, would grow yet more Considerable by the addition of England; and that he should be the happy Instrument of getting a Toleration at least, if not an Establishment for the old Religion. Neither did the Queen dash all his Pretensions at once; for she declar'd before Elphenstein, and by Letters to the Emperor, 'That among the many Honourable Offers she had made her, there was not any more so than the Proposal of Charles of Austria; but that however she was not capable of being frighted by pass'd Dangers, nor footh'd by any prospect of Honour, out of her Resolution of living Single, which yet was not so confirm'd as to make her abjure a marry'd State; and she had a very good assurance, that the God, upon whose Goodness she relied in all things else, would direct all her Thoughts in this and other matters, to her own and her People's Welfare.

Adolph D. of Holstein arrives in England. About this time Adolph Duke of Holstein, Uncle to Frederick II. King of Denmark, at the instigation of the Dane, came into England, in order to break off the Match with the Sweed, and not without some hopes of a more Honourable one for himself, occasion'd by a Letter, wherein the Queen, it seems, had wish'd, That he were as nearly Allied to the English as he had been in times past to the Spaniard; and moreover promis'd him great Civilities. To whom, besides an honourable Reception, she gave the Honour of the Garter, and a yearly Pension; and engag'd him to her Interests by so respectful a Treatment. He was a Prince that had acquir'd a mighty Reputation in the Wars, upon his late Conquests of the Dith-Marsians in Furland.

Sir Will. Pickering. Nor were there wanting at Home some Persons who fed themselves (as Lovers use to do) with Golden Dreams of marrying their Sovereign. Sir William Pickering, (for instance) a Gentleman well Born, of a narrow Estate, but much esteem'd for his Learning, his handsome way of Living, and the Management of some Embassies into France and Germany. Next to him was Henry Earl of Arundel, a Person of an ancient and noble Family, and very Rich, but withal declining in Years. Not to forget Robert Dudley, the Duke of Northumberland's younger Son, restor'd by Queen Mary to his Honour and Estate, a Person of Youth and Vigour, and of a fine Shape and Proportion, whose Father and Grandfather were not so much hated by the People, but he was as high in the favour of Q. Elizabeth, who out of her Royal and Princely Clemency, heap'd Honours upon him, and sav'd his Life whose Father would have destroy'd her's. Whether this was from any real Virtues in him, whereof he gave some appearances; or in regard of the common lot of their Imprisonment in Queen Mary's Days; or that there was something in his 1560. Ann. 3. Birth or the Planets that rul'd it, which occasion'd this Sympathy of Thoughts, I cannot determine: But most certain it is, that the favour or disfavour of Princes to several Persons is govern'd by a secret kind of Fatality. For the Queen having made him Master of the Horse, as the first token of her Friendship and Esteem, she made him Knight of the Garter (to the amazement of all) in the first Year of her Reign; and prefer'd to the same most Honourable Order the D. of Norfolk, the Marquis of Northampton, and Earl of Rutland.

In the interim the Lord Viscount Montacute, Ambassador in Spain, shews the King the necessity of the Scottish War; and acquits the Scots, to the best of his power, from the charge of Rebellion. He did it, but after a very cool manner, and like one that was a firm Bigot to the Romish Religion, says that no other Faith was brought into England, but what was consonant to the Scriptures, and the four first Oecumenical Councils; and insists upon the renewing the Treaty of Burgundy, that had been formerly made between the Predecessors of the King of England and Spain; but receives for answer, that

The restoring of this Treaty was needless. (Tho' it must be confess'd, that the renewing of Treaties is not only very customary among Princes, but highly reasonable, as being indeed the very life of all Covenants, and an evidence to the World of their mutual good Understanding, and he himself and his Father Charles, in the Treaty of Marriage with Queen Mary of England, in the Year 1553, had oblig'd themselves to confirm the same Compact). He then proceeds to lament the Changes of Religion in England, as likewise the sending of an Army into Scotland, and relieving the Rebels, and complains that he had no Intelligence of these Matters till it was too late. Nevertheless he did indefatigably oppose the Practices of the French, who endeavoured to Excommunicate the Queen, and laboured by his Agents at Rome, that no such Censure might pass without his consent. He likewise gave secret Intimations (for his own advantage) tho' they happen'd to be too late to have it inserted in the Articles with the French, That the English might be allowed to drive the French out of Scotland if they should offer to return again; and that a Caution should be put in for the restoring of Calais. The Viscount however easily saw that the King was disoblig'd, and the Queen discover'd it likewise, not barely by the Marks I have mention'd, but by his return of the Garter into the Viscount's Hands, which seem'd to be a direct breach of all future good Correspondence with the English. But he was much more nettled at a repulse he receiv'd afterward, when by the Solicitations of the Count of Feria, (who had married the Daughter of William Dormer by Mary Sidney) he sent an Ambassador into England to interceed on behalf of Jane Dormer, the Daughter of Thomas Newdigate, Widow of Sir Robert Dormer Kt. and Grandmother to the Countess of Feria, as likewise of Clarentia, an old Lady that had been much in the Favour and Secrets of Queen Mary, and her chief Almoner to some poor Women; and of Richard Shelly, afterwards call'd the Prior of the Order of St. John in England, and Thomas Harvey, great Favourers both of the Romish Religion, and in good Esteem with the King of Spain; that they might have leave to Reside in the Netherlands and Spain, whither they had withdrawn themselves, without Licence obtain'd, on the account of their Religion, for 'twas a Proviso in the ancient Laws of England, That under Pain of the Forfeiture of Goods and Chattels, none but Peers of the first Rank,

Rank, and Merchants should (without the King's special Licence) leave the Kingdom, or reside in foreign Countries beyond such a fix'd Time; and that too, either for the recovery of their Health in a warmer Climate, or for the improvement of their Minds in the Universities, or the instructing themselves in the Art of War: And (as she wrote in answer to the King of Spain) 'Twas beyond all Precedent, that such a Licence should be granted to Women, as to permit them to live always out of their own Country; and tho' the thing was not in itself of any great Concernment, yet since they were not like to receive any advantage by such an absence which might prove equal to the bad influence which such Examples might have upon the Commonwealth; She therefore thought it a Liberty no way fit to be granted.

The Count of Feria incenseth the Pope against the Queen.

The Count of Feria taking this for an Injury done to himself, that he might not pass it by unreveng'd, forc'd a Servant of Chamberlain's, the English Ambassador in Ordinary for Spain, into the Inquisition, on pretence of Heresie: And being enrag'd at the Queen and the English, he blew up the King's Resentments into a greater flame, his Wife not being able to draw him from these measures. Nay, there goes a Report, that he temper'd with Pius IV. the Bishop of Rome Elect, to get her Excommunicated: But he (on what pretence I cannot say) sent unto her Vincentio Parpalia, Abbat of St. Saviour, with private Instructions and flattering Letters, which I shall here give you entire, tho' it may perhaps submit me to the Censure of having transgress'd the exact Laws of History.

To Our Dearest Daughter in Christ, ELIZABETH, Queen of England.

The Popes Letter to the Q.

" Our most beloved Daughter in Christ, Greeting and Apostolical Benediction, How earnestly we desire (as by our Pastoral Duty bound) to take effectual care of your Salvation, and to provide for your Honour and the Establishment of your Kingdom, both God, the Searcher of Hearts, knows, and you may learn yourself, from the Instructions we have given to our beloved Son Vincentio Parpalia, Abbat of St. Saviour, a Person not unknown to you, and well approv'd of us, to be communicated to you. We do therefore (most dear Daughter) exhort and persuade your Highness again and again, that you would lay by those ill Counsellors who love themselves better than your Interest; and that you would proceed in the fear of God, and acknowledge the time of your Visitation, and yield Obedience to our paternal and wholsom Admonitions: By doing which you may promise yourself every thing at our Hands that you can desire, not only towards the Happiness of your Soul, but the Establishment also of your Royal Dignity, according to the Authority, Place and Function intrusted to us by God; who, if you return into the Bosom of the Church, (as we hope and wish you may) are ready to receive you with the same Affection, Joy and Honour, wherewith the Parent in the Gospel received the Prodigal upon his return. Tho' our satisfaction will be so much higher than his, as he rejoic'd for the sake of one Child's Salvation only, whereas you, as virtually containing all the People of England, will give us occasion to Congratulate the happy Conversion of yourself and the whole Nation; and the same will you minister to all our Brethren in general, (whom, God willing, you will in a little time understand to be Conven'd in an Oecumenical and General Council, for the Extirpation of Heresies) as well as to the whole Church: Nay, you will fill Heaven itself with joyful Acclamations; and by so memorable an Action, perpetuate the Glory of your Name, and purchase a much richer Diadem than what you now wear. But of this the abovemention'd Vincentio has Directions to transact with you more at large; and will declare unto you our Fatherly Affection; whom we pray your Highness to treat with all possible Candour, to hear him cheerfully, and repose as entire a Faith in what he says, as you would in ourself.

Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, &c. 15 of May 1560, in Our First Year.

What was the Substance of Parpalia's Instructions I have never learnt; for I do not think they were given in Writing, and to guess at random, I shall forbear as the Trick of common Historians. That Queen Elizabeth still consisted with her Motto, Semper Eadem; and that the Pope lost his aim, is a thing known to all. 'Tis said that the Pope plighted his Faith, 'That he would Disannul the Protest against her Mother's Marriage as unjust, settle the English Liturgy by his Authority, and grant the use of the Sacraments to the English under both Kinds, in case she would reconcile herself to the Romish Communion, and Bow to the Supremacy of his Chair; and more than this, that several Thousand Crowns were promis'd to those that should effect this.

The time was now come for confirming the Treaty of Edinburgh; which after the Queen had Ratify'd by a solemn Oath, and sent it over to the King and Queen of France, to be Sign'd by them, according to Agreement, Throckmorton, the Queen's Residentiary in France, could by no means persuade them to sign; no more could Sir Peter Mewtas Kt. who was sent into France on that Errand, altho' in that very Commission, which empower'd the Bishop of Valence to draw up the said Treaty, they had most expressly engag'd themselves to continue the same, bona Fide, and on the Word of a King. They alledged these Reasons for their refusal: That the Scots had entered into the League of Berwick with the English, not by the King's Authority, but of their own Head, which they ought not to have done, for that it was entred upon by Rebels, and confirm'd by counterfeiting the Hands and Seals of their faithful Subjects; and besides, That they had not paid the Obedience consented to and promis'd in the said Agreement.

During these Debates, Francis II. King of France departed this Life, before he was quite 18 Years of Age, in the Second Year of his Reign, leaving the Queen of Scots a Widow, whether to the greater Grief of the Popish, or Joy of the Protestant Party, all Britain over, is not easily said.

Q. Elizabeth being now a little more secure, to the end the Church might remain without any corrupt Mixtures, and gain surer Footing, and that the Nation might advance in Glory and Wealth, put out two very seasonable Proclamations. The one was to command the Anabaptists, and others of the same Heretical Principles, which had flocked to the Sea-Coast-Towns from Beyond-Sea, under pretence of escaping Persecution, and had infected the Kingdom with the Venom of their Doctrines, to depart the Realm within twenty Days, whether they were Natives or Foreigners, on Pain of Imprisonment and Loss of Goods and Chattels. The other was against

1560. Ann. 3. *And Sacilegiou
Person* against all Sacrilegious Persons, who under colour of abolishing Superstition, began to pull down ancient Monuments, to deface the Epitaphs and Escutcheons of the noblest Families, and other venerable Remains of Antiquity, which even the mad Zeal of some profane Persons in King Henry VIII. and Edward VI.'s time left standing, and likewise to rob the Steeples of their Bells, and to unroof the Churches for the sake of the Lead.

*Westminster-Abby made a Collegiate
Church.* She likewise converted Westminster-Abby, a Place remarkable for the Coronation and Interment of the Kings of England, and the keeping of the Royal Standards, into a Collegiate-Church; where, to the Glory of God, and Improvement of Learning, she placed a Dean, Twelve Prebendaries, a Schoolmaster, an Usher, Forty Scholars, (call'd Queen-Scholars, whereof six or more to be yearly sent to the Universities) besides Chaplains, Singing-men, Twelve Pensioners, &c. Which Royal Bounty has not fail'd of producing a plentiful stock of learned Men, for the benefit of both Church and State.

Coin is re-duc'd to the intrinsic value. And then, to the great advancement of her Glory, she began by degrees to call in all the Brass Money, and restore Coin to its Current and Sterling Purity, and to repair the Honour of the Kingdom, by preventing the Cheats of those who adulterated the Coin both at home and abroad, exchange'd the best Manufactures of the Nation for the worst Money, and exported the Current Cash into Foreign Parts. She took care also, that the Prices of such Wares as were kept at too high a Price (to the great damage of the Publick) should be proportionably abated, especially where Soldiers, Pensioners, Servants and Day-Labourers, were like to be the Sufferers. And this she happily effected, without the least Disturbance, in a very few Months. First, by prohibiting the melting down of any Money, whether Brass or Sterling: Then by reducing Brass Money to its just Value; the Brass Penny to an Half-penny Sterling; the Two-penny Piece to Three-half-pence; the Sixpenny to a Groat, and another Teston to Twopence-farthing, which was as much as the Silver in them amounted to. And, in the last place, by purchasing the same from the Owners with good Money, (to her own loss) provided it were brought into the Mint within such a time. We may therefore own ourselves indebted to Queen Elizabeth, that we have had better and purer Money in England than had been seen in two hundred Years before, or indeed than what had pass'd in any Part of Europe besides. Within a while after, she coin'd a pure sort of Money (which we call Sterling) for the Kingdom of Ireland, the same Piece to pass for a Shilling in Ireland, and for Ninepence at Home. And a most glorious and memorable Action it was, and such an one as King Edward VI. could not, and Queen Mary durst not undertake. After K. Henry VIII. had made the first Experiment of any of the Kings of England, in mixing Brass with the Coin, to the great Disparagement of the Nation, and the Damage of his People and Posterity, besides the scandalous Example he left the World of his Riot and Excess, considering that his Father had left him more Wealth than any other Prince before him had left his Successor. A great stock he had amass'd by Taxes and other Collections, (tho' not so great as we are inform'd by Cardinal Poole, who tells us that he demanded more than all the Kings before him since the Norman Conquest). And a mighty Treasure he had raised, besides, when by an Act of Parliament, he seized on all the Lands in Ireland, which the English held in their absence, all the First-Fruits and Tenth of Ecclesiastical Preferments in England and Ireland; and all the Rents, Revenues and Moveables, of Abbies and Monasteries. Before the end of this Year died Francis Hastings Earl of Huntington, the second Earl of that Line, who had by Katharine Pool, Daughter of Henry Lord Montacute, Brother to Reginald Pool the Cardinal, Henry his Heir and Successor, and many other Children, who agreed better in Temper and Affection, than in Persuasion and Principle.

In Ireland Shan-Oneal, a Nobleman of great Power and Interest in Ulster, the true and lawful Son of Con-Oneal, surnam'd Bacco, or the Lame, (created by Henry VIII. Earl of Tir-oen) for fear the Laws should call him to account for the Murder of Matthew Lord Dunganun, his Base-Brother (falsely suppos'd to be Legitimate) for depriving his Father, who soon after broke his Heart, of his Government, and taking upon himself the Title of Oneal, by no other Election than a wild cast of his Shoe over his Head, thought it his best way to break out into an open Rebellion. Whereupon 500 Foot were sent out of England, and some Regiments of Horse rais'd in Ireland. But after some slight Skirmishes, when he found himself unable to cope with the English, and that he was grown Odious to his Party, and was likewise oppos'd by Surly-Boy, James Macconell, and O-donel, he threw down his Arms at the entreaty of his Kinsman the Earl of Kildare, and promis'd to come to England and crave the Queen's Mercy; which he did, as shall be made appear in its proper place.

In the beginning of the Year, Francis Earl of Bedford was sent into France to Condole the Death of Francis, and to Congratulate his Successor Charles IX. upon his Accession to the Throne. He, by himself, and with Throckmorton, made repeated Instances to the Queen of Scots to confirm the Treaty at Edinburgh; but all to no purpose: For all the answer she gave, was, 'That she must maturely Pause upon so grave a matter; and that she neither could nor would sign it without the Advice of the Scottish Nobility. Notwithstanding, Throckmorton was still very pressing upon this Head, both with her, the Cardinal of Lorain, the rest of the Guises, her Uncles, and her Base Brother, who was lately come into France. But when the matter was shifted off from day to day, and sham Excuses made use of, Queen Elizabeth suspecting some dangerous Plot was hatching against England, resolved to prevent it. She dispatches therefore Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, to cultivate a good Agreement amongst the Nobility, which when founded in the unity of Religion, is like to last longest; and to give them also to understand, that the Princes of Germany had entred into a Combination against the Bishop of Rome, and that the Queen, his Mistress, heartily wish'd that the English and Scots were included in the same. That now was the fittest Opportunity (whilst the Queen of Scots was a Widow) to compose all Differences between the English and Scots, (who had maintain'd so long a Variance, at so vast an Expence of Blood on both sides) either by their making a perpetual Truce with England, or by breaking off all those ancient Leagues and Engagements with France, which had been made the occasions of so much Variance between the English and Scots. And lastly, to give private Intimations to the Scots, not to permit the Queen-Dowager to marry

The Q. of Scots is denied safe Passage from France to Scotland. Mean while the Queen of Scots, designing a Journey to Scotland, (having sent d'Oisely, a Frenchman, away before) requested Queen Elizabeth to grant her safe Conduct for crossing into Scotland, and that d'Oisely might pass by the way of England. But the Queen in the presence of several, denied both Requests, alledging as the cause of this Denial, That she had not yet ratify'd the Treaty at Edinborough, according to her promise; which if she would sign, she assures her of all possible Civilities she could expect from a Queen, a Relation, or a Neighbour, whether she pleas'd to go by Sea, or through England. The Queen of Scots being nettled at this Repulse, sent for Throckmorton, and held him in a long Discourse upon this matter, which I shall briefly hint out of his own Letters, (tho' I shall have occasion to touch on some things already mention'd) on purpose to give a clearer Account of the Rise and Progress of those Heats and Divisions which have been between two the most Potent and Wise Princesses of the Age. This then was what she spoke to Throckmorton, when she had clear'd the Presence of all her Attendants, and others.

The Q. of Scots Expostulates the case with Throckmorton. 'How Weak I may prove, or how far a Woman's Frailty may transport me, I cannot tell; however I have no mind to have so many Witnesses of my Infirmary, as your Mistress had at her Audience of my Ambassador d'Oisely. There is nothing disturbs me so much, as the having ask'd with so much Importunity, things I could well enough have been without. I can (by God's leave) return to my own Country without hers, as I came hither in spite of the Teeth and Opposition of her Brother, King Edward; neither do I want Friends both able and willing to conduct me home, as they have brought me hither: But I was willing rather to make an Experiment of her Friendship than of any others. I have often heard you say, that a good Correspondence between her and myself is very convenient for the sake of both our Kingdoms, yet were this her opinion, she had hardly deny'd me so small a Request. But perhaps she bears a better Inclination to the Scots my Rebellious Subjects, than to me their Sovereign, her Equal in Royal Dignity, her near Relation, and the undoubted Heir of her Kingdoms. Do you imagine it possible there can ever be that real Fidelity and Affection between her and my Rebel-People, that may be entertain'd between her and me? Sure I am, she has reduc'd me to such Straits, that I have been forc'd to ask Aid and Assistance where I had the least inclination to do it; and it has been a matter of great astonishment to them, what should make her of late assist my own Subjects against me, and prevent my return, now I'm a Widow, into my own Country. Besides her Friendship I ask nothing at her hands; I neither trouble her, nor meddle with the Affairs of her Government: Not that I am ignorant, that there are now in England a great many Male-Contents, that are no Friends to the present Establishment. She is pleas'd to upbraid me as a Person little Experienc'd in the World. I freely own it: But Age will cure that Misfortune. However, I am old enough to acquit myself honestly and courteously to my Friends and Relations, and to encourage no Reports of her which would misbecome a Queen and her Kinswoman. I would also say, by her leave, that I am a Queen as well as she, and not altogether Friendless; and perhaps I have as great a Soul too; so that methinks we should be upon the level, as to our Treatment of one another. But I shall make no Comparisons, for they are odious, and but one remove from Strife and Envy. As for the Treaty of Edinborough, it was made in the King my Husband's Life-time, whom I was oblig'd in Duty to submit to in all things; and if he delay'd the signing of it, 'tis he ought to bear the blame, not I. After his death, the Parliament of France left me to my own Council and Measures. And as for my Uncles, they refus'd to concern themselves in Scottish Affairs, for fear of giving Offence either to Queen Elizabeth or the Scots. The Scots now here with me are private Persons, and not fit to Advise with on such Critical Occasions: As soon as I have consulted the States of the Kingdom, I shall be ready to give a reasonable Answer; and I am the more intent on my Journey, that I may be able to make the quicker dispatch. But she, it seems, designs to stop my Journey; so that either she will not let me give her Satisfaction, or else is resolv'd not to be satisfy'd, perhaps on purpose to keep up the Disagreement between us. She has often reproach'd me with my being Young; and I must be very Young indeed, and as ill Advis'd, to Treat of Matters of such great Concern and Importance, without the Advice of my Parliament. The Wife, as I have been inform'd, is neither oblig'd in Honour nor Conscience, by what her Husband does. But that Point I don't dispute. But thus much I can say with truth, that I have done nothing to my dear Sister, but what I would be very willing should be done to myself. I have not been wanting in any friendly Offices to her; but she disbelieves or overlooks them. I could heartily wish I were as near to her Heart as I am to her Blood, for that would be a most valuable Alliance. God forgive them (if any such there are) that do ill Offices between us. But pray tell me, Sir, you that are her Ambassador, why is she so very angry with me, who never disoblig'd her by Word or Deed?

To this Throckmorton answer'd: I have no other Commission than to bear your Majesty's Answer relating to the Confirmation of the Treaty at Edinborough: But if you please to bear the Grounds of her Majesty's Resentment, I shall give a brief Account of it, and lay aside the Ambassador till I have so done. As soon as the Queen was Crowned, your Majesty thought fit to assume the Arms and Title of the Kingdom of England, which you had not done in Queen Mary's Reign; I leave your Majesty to judge, whether a grosser Indignity could be well offer'd to a Prince; private Persons could, in my opinion, very ill digest such an Affront, much less Princes.

But (reply'd she) My Husband and his Father would have it so, and it was by their orders. Since their death, and the date of my Freedom and Disengagement, I have quite forborn those Arms and Title; and yet I cannot be satisfy'd that 'tis any Injury to the Queen, if I, who am a Queen too, and Grand-daughter to King Henry VIII's eldest Sister, should bear these Arms, since others, more remotely Allied, have done so. And most certain it is, that Courtney, Marquis of Exeter, and the Duchesse of Suffolk, Niece to Henry VIII. by his younger Sister, did by special Grant bear the Arms of England, with Limbs or Borders for a difference.

Seeing that these things did not at all satisfy Queen Elizabeth, who was fully convinc'd, that the Queen of Scots used these Delays to cherish some fine Prospect or new Hopes she had conceiv'd, ceiv'd, because she had mention'd nothing to the States of Scotland relating to the Treaty, altho' they had several times met since the death of her Husband. The Queen being now on her Journey, sends again for Throckmorton to Abbeville, where she mildly demanded of him, by what Methods she might satisfy his Royal Mistress? By Confirming (returns he) the Treaty of Edinborough, as I have more than once told your Majesty. To which she reply'd, I desire you to hear me, and then judge whether they be not very cogent Reasons which the Queen takes for vain Excuses and Delays. The first Article in that Treaty, for confirming the Truce at Cambray, does not in the least concern me. The second, which relates to signing the Treaty, there made between the English and Scots, was ratify'd by my Husband and myself, and cannot be repeated, unless in my name only, whereas my Husband is expressly nam'd therein. The third, fourth and fifth Articles are already answer'd and fulfill'd; for there are no farther Warlike Preparations: The French Garrisons are remanded from Scotland; the Fort at Aimouth is raised to the very Ground; I have, since my Husband's death, quitted the Arms and Title of England. To raise and strike them out of all the Moveables, Buildings and Charters in France, is a thing no way in my power; and 'tis more than I can do to send back the Bishops of Valence and Randon, who are no Subjects of mine, into England, to appear at a Conference about the sixth Article. As for the last Article, I hope my Rebel-Subjects will not complain of any great Severity toward them. But she, I perceive, designs to prevent any Proofs I might shew of a merciful Disposition towards them, by resolving to hinder my return. What is there now behind in this Treaty that can any way prejudice the Affairs of your Mistress? Nevertheless, to give her the fullest Satisfaction I can, I design to write to her about these Matters with my own Hand, tho' she should not vouchsafe me an answer but by her Secretary. But I would advise you, who are an Ambassador, to act suitably to that Character; I mean, rather to qualify and compose Matters, than to aggravate and make them worse.

But neither had those Letters their desir'd effect on the Queen, who could not so easily forget the Usurpation of her Arms and Title. And she began to be something uneasy lest she should assume them a second time, were she not bound by a solemn Oath and signing of the Treaty to forbear the Encroachment.

The Q. of Scots returns to Scotland.
Her gentle Government.

In the interim, the Queen of Scots finding a convenient Opportunity, set sail from Calais, and arriv'd in Scotland, having escap'd the English Ships in a Fog. These, some thought, were a Squadron in respect appointed for her Convoy: Others judg'd they were out for the suppression of Pirates: And some believ'd they were sent to intercept her Passage; for James the Bastard return'd very lately thro' England, and gave private Advices to intercept her, both for the Safety of the Queen, and the Interest of Religion. And Lidington was likewise of the same mind, (being pleas'd at d'Oisely's stay in England) lest (as his Letters intimate) her return should raise mighty Storms, put a stop to all Intercourse with England, whether by Posts or Expresses, weaken the Party best affected to the English, and, in a word, treat the Protestants of Scotland with extreme Rigour and Cruelty, not as Traytors, but Hereticks, as Queen Mary of England had done before her. But, to say truth, she used all possible Clemency to her Subjects upon her return, made no Changes in Religion, (tho' tumultuously set up) but began to Govern the Kingdom by wise and excellent Laws. And she sent to Queen Elizabeth, by Lidington, Letters from herself and the Nobility, wherein she expressed an hearty desire to make and maintain a good Correspondence; and requested her to think of some Measures for the settling a firm and lasting Peace between the two Kingdoms. But she conceiv'd there was no better or surer Method to effect this, than for Queen Elizabeth to declare her, by Authority of Parliament, Heir-apparent to the Crown of England, in case herself should have no Issue.

This was a great surprize to Queen Elizabeth, who had long expected the Ratification of the Treaty at Edinborough, which she had promis'd both in Writing and by Word of Mouth. Nevertheless she gave this Answer; "That as for the Succession, she hoped the Queen of Scots would not rob her of the Scepter, or her Children, should she have any. She promis'd not to diminish any part of her Title to the Crown of England, tho' she had, through the Instigations of some ambitious Spirits, assum'd the Arms of it, for which she ought in Justice to make Reparation. To declare her the Successor of her Kingdoms, she conceiv'd was the way rather to dissolve than settle a good Understanding; because Successors are always suspected Persons to those who sit at the Helm. The People, out of a natural Levity, are apt to court the rising, and leave the setting Sun, were it only that they are weary of the present: And those that are Successors declar'd, would find it impossible to contain their own Ambition, and the Hopes of others, within the bounds of Sobriety and Reason. So that, should she consent to settle upon her the Crown in Reversion, she should destroy her best Security with her own Hands; and not only prepare her Winding-Sheet, but dig her own Grave even in her Life-time."

Having given this Answer, she dispatches Letters, by Sir Peter Mewtas, to urge once more the Confirmation of the Treaty. Nor did the Queen of Scots give a direct Refusal, yet signify'd, that it could not well be done till the Affairs of Scotland were in a more settled Posture. Mean while, Queen Elizabeth gave a most Splendid and Courteous Reception to her Uncles in their return through England, namely Aumarle the Grand-Prior, and Albeuf, with other French Persons of Quality, who had conducted her into Scotland. However the English Merchants were, by the Duke of Guise's means, ill treated upon the Coast of Bretain, their Ships being seiz'd and made Prizes. And there were Engines secretly at work at Rome to procure an Excommunication against the Queen. But Pius IV. the then Pope, thought a gentle Treatment would do best. For he press'd her, as I observ'd in the Passages of the last Year, by very soft and endearing Letters. And now, there being a Day appointed for the Council of Trent, (which was open'd before, and shut up again by reason of frequent Wars) for taking away all Differences in Religion, and all the Princes, whether Catholics or Downright Enemies to Popery, having receiv'd a kind Invitation. The Pope sent the Abbat of Montinego with very obliging and affectionate Letters. But the Abbat staid in the Netherlands till he had first sued for a fair Reception in England: For there was an ancient Act, which provided, That the Pope's Nuncio's should not set a Foot in England without leave obtain'd, and an Oath taken, that they would attempt nothing there which might be any ways prejudicial to the King or the Liberties of the People. And the Council of the Nation judg'd it not very safe to admit him, in regard that so many in all Parts of the Kingdom were such Implicite Slaves to Popery, and used all possible Endeavours both at home and abroad to embroil the Quiet of the Nation. After the refusal of the

The English Merchants abused.

The Pope courts the English to the Council of Trent.

1561. Ann. 4. Abbats admission, the Bishop of Viterbo, the Pope's Nuncio in France, dealt earnestly with Throckmorton, to prevail on his Mistress to send her Ambassadors to the Council; and many Princes of Christendom, the Kings of France, Spain and Portugal, Henry Cardinal of Portugal, and above all, the Duke of Alva (who yet had a profound Respect for the Queen) persuaded her by Letters rather to acquiesce in the Council of Trent's Determination in cases of Religion, which was the only Pillar and Support of Christianity and good Government, than in the private Opinions of a few, however Learned and Considerable. The Queen answer'd, That she desir'd, with all her Heart, an Oecumenical Council, but a Popish one she would never honour with an Ambassador: That she had no business with the Bishop of Rome, whose Authority was abrogated in England by Act of Parliament: Nor was it his but the Emperor's Prerogative to call Councils: Nor had he any Sovereign Power above other Bishops, as far as she could find.

The Queen's Answer.

The death of Sir Henry Carne.

The same time the Abbat (who was the last of the Pope's Nuncio's into England) was denied access hither, died at Rome Sir Henry Carne, whom we have mention'd before, a prudent Man, and a good Civilian, who was Knighted by the Emperor Charles V. and was the last Ambassador from the Crown of England to the See of Rome.

When Chamberlayne, the English Ambassador in Spain, found that this Answer had still worse Effects on the Mind of that Prince and Nation, as implying in it an Affront to the Pope, (for the death of the French King had now remov'd all Apprehensions of the falling of England, Scotland and Ireland under the French Government; so that the English were now less consider'd) he had his Audience of Leave to return home. And in his room was appointed Sir Thomas Chaloner, who no sooner arriv'd in Spain, but, being a Man that could not bear a Slight, and having been several times Ambassador in Germany, where he met with nothing but Complaisance, earnestly press'd to be call'd home again, because his Trunks and Portmantua's had been examin'd, according to the Custom of the Country. But Queen Elizabeth gave him to understand, That an Ambassador had no Affronts to resent, but the direct Violation of his Prince's Honour.

Q. Eliz. prepares for War.

And now this Wise and Careful Princess, (having pretty well settled Church-Affairs) in order to prevent any Hostile Attempts, and secure herself and her Subjects in the fruition of a settled Peace, tho' her Treasure ran low, yet began to stock her Armory with all necessary Ammunition, expending a vast Sum for Arms in Germany, because those she bought up at Antwerp were stop't by the Spaniard. She caused a great number of Iron and Brass Pieces to be cast. And GOD, who seem'd to befriend all her Undertakings, discover'd a most rich Vein of pure Brass, which till now had lain unthought of, near Reſwick in Cumberland, which not only supplied the Necessities of the Kingdom, but yielded Brass enough for other Countries too. About this time, the Stone call'd Lapis Calaminaris, so necessary for Brass Works, was by the same good Providence found in England, in great abundance. She likewise caus'd the first making of Gunpowder in this Nation, that she might not be oblig'd to beg or purchase it of her Neighbours. She increased also the Garrison of Berwick, which consisted before of 500 Men. She likewise advanced their Pay, that so it might be worth the while of gallant Men and brave Soldiers to serve. And the Town she fortify'd with several New Works, which were finish'd in a very short time. She sent discreet and worthy Men to repair and rebuild the Forts and Castles within 20 Miles of the Borders of Scotland. She rigg'd out her Fleet with all manner of Tackling and Ammunition, so that it may be allow'd to have been the best Equipp'd Navy that was ever set out by the English. For the defence whereof she built a Castle on the Banks of Medway near Upmore, (the usual Harbour for the Fleet) and augmented the Sailors and Mariners Pay: So that she was justly stil'd by Strangers, The Restorer of the Naval Glory, and the Queen of the North-Sea. Neither had she occasion to hire Ships from Hamburgh, Lubeck, Dantzick, Genoa and Venice, which was her Predecessors case. The Wealthier Inhabitants of the Sea-Coasts did likewise follow the Queen's example, in building Ships of War with all imaginable Cheerfulness, insomuch that in a little time the Queen's Fleet, in conjunction with her Subject's Shipping, was so Potent, that it was able to furnish out 20000 Fighting Men for Sea-service. Moreover, the Noblemen and Commons were every where as Industrious in providing themselves Arms; so that every Nobleman's House was a compleat Armory. There were also observ'd frequent Musters, and the young Men were trained up to the Arts of War, and Exercis'd in Mock-Campaigns. And the Country-People, after an Act had pass'd for the Transportation of Grain, began to mind their Husbandry with double Diligence, and even beyond the Provision of the Laws, by breaking up Grounds which had lain fallow Time out of Mind. About that time the Queen did also put a stop to the Avarice of those Merchants who furnish'd the Emperor of Russia, and other Enemies of Christendom, with Arms and Warlike Stores against the Polonians. She likewise curb'd the Exorbitances of the Officers of the Exchequer, who had reserv'd the Pensions assign'd to those Ecclesiasticks who had been turn'd out of the Abbies: For she gave orders, that all of them who were living, and not known to have some Preferment, should be paid to a Farthing.

A Protestation in favour of the Polonians.

She revoked likewise certain Warrants, which had been issued out for victualling the Fleet, giving Money to the Commissioners to buy it, without burdening the People. She design'd likewise to have taken away the Commissions relating to the Provision for her own Household, some Countries having agreed some time after, to furnish it at a certain Rate, to get rid of the Collectors; a kind of Vermin, which the Queen call'd Harpies. 'Twas about this time too (if my Memory fail not) that she increas'd the Salary of the Judges, and first allow'd 'em Provision for their respective Circuits: And tho' in the main she was a little saving, yet she was not to learn where, when and how far to extend her Bounty, being indeed an equal Friend to Thrift, and Benefactor to Merit; for whereas King Henry her Father, notwithstanding he had three Children, squander'd away a great part of his Royal Revenue; as also did King Edward and Queen Mary, who had none; she, tho' without Children, gave very little of her own Demesns, or indeed any thing beside, but on condition, it should (in default of Issue-Male) return to the Crown. On which Account, her thrifty and prudent Management deserves a very grateful Remembrance from her Kingdom and Successors.

In the midst of this careful Emulation between Queen and People, for the Nation's Good, which began now to revive and flourish again; this sad Accident happen'd: The beautiful Spire of the Cathedral-Church of S. Paul in London, was fir'd by Lightning, near the Top: 'Twas a singular Steeple Ornament to the City, and of a wonderful Height,

Heighth,

1561. Ann. 4. Heighth, viz. Five hundred and twenty Foot from the Ground, and Two hundred and sixty from the Tower on which it stood, being fram'd of Timber, and cover'd with Lead. And so violent was the Rage of the Flame downward, (to the great Terror of the City) that in five Hours it quite consum'd it, and all the Roof of the Church, which was very large, and cover'd likewise with Lead. But the Arches, which were built of Stone, remain'd entire. However, by the large Bounty of the Queen, who supply'd a great Quantity of Money and Materials, and by Contributions from the Clergy and others, the Roof, and all but the Spire, was soon repair'd.

Death of E. of Bath. This Year departed this Life John Bouchier, a Person of antient Nobility, the second Earl of Bath, of that Name; and the Lord Fitzwarin, who left many Children by Eleanor, Daughter of George Lord Roffe. His Grandson William, by his eldest Son, came to the Estate and Title.

The Fifth Year of her Reign.

1562. First civil War in Fr. Things now in France began to grow ripe for Tumules and Commotions; whilst, during Charles IX's Minority, the private Ambition of Rival Princes was cloak'd on each side with the specious Pretence of Religion; and the Protestants, in the mean while, were very severely treated. And whereas the Papists in England began, on this occasion, upon what Views I cannot guess, to whisper about many things in private Clubs and Cabals, intimating that the Protestants in England would come under the same Restraints. Every Place was fill'd with Jealousie and Apprehension.

Countess of Lenox and her Husband committed. Margaret Countess of Lenox, Niece to Henry VIII. by his eldest Sister, was committed to the Custody of Sir Richard Sackville; and the Earl of Lenox, her Husband, who held a private Correspondence with the Queen of Scots, to the Custody of the Master of the Rolls; and both were under Confinement some time.

The Poole and others arraign'd. Arthur Poole and his Brother, Great-grandchildren to George Duke of Clarence, Brother to Edward IV. Anthony Fortescue, who had marry'd their Sister; and others, were try'd, for conspiring to withdraw into France, to the Duke of Guise; and from thence to return, with an Army, into Wales; and so proclaim the Queen of Scots Queen of England, and Arthur Poole Duke of Clarence. All which they ingenuously confess'd at the Bar; protesting notwithstanding, that they design'd not to put these Projects in Execution, during the Life-time of Q. Elizabeth, who, they believ'd, would die before the Year was at an end, (having, it seems, borrow'd this Conjecture, from some Pretenders to Judicial Astrology.) Upon this, they were condemn'd; but receiv'd their Pardon, for the sake of that Royal Blood, that ran in their Veins. But the Lady Katharine Grey, Daughter to Henry Grey D. of Suffolk, who claim'd a much nearer Kindred to the Queen, was, in a great many Mens Thoughts, very severely us'd. For, altho' she was Grand-daughter to Henry VIII's other Sister, and marry'd to Henry, eldest Son to the Earl of Pembroke; from whom she was soon after lawfully divorc'd, after she had suffer'd a long Slight and Contempt, and was so far gone with Child, as to be very near her Time. She was committed to the Tower, declaring then that she was lawfully marry'd to Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford, by whom she was now with Child. He therefore being sent for from France, whither he had, by the Queen's Leave, gone for his Pleasure, confess'd as much in publick, and was clapt up under the same Confinement. The Condemn'd, but are pardon'd.

Lady Grey committed.

And the Earl of Hertford.

Archbishop of Canterbury and others were appointed Delegates to try this Cause, without Appeal; and when he could not, within the Time fix'd, produce a sufficient Certificate of the Marriage; the Archbishop proceeded to pronounce a definitive Sentence: That his Cohabitation with her was unlawful, and that for their Incontinence they ought, both he and she, to be punish'd according to their Deserts. This Sentence was, by John Hales, a Person dogmatical enough, but withal of great Learning, argu'd against, as unjust and unreasonable; this being his Argument, That their very Consent made 'em Man and Wife: Whereupon he was also committed to Custody.

Shortly after, she was brought to bed of her first Son, in the Tower; and afterwards had another by Hertford, who had bribed the Keepers. But for this, Edward Warner, Lieutenant of the Tower, who was privy to the whole Intrigue, paid dear enough, by the Loss of his Place, and his Commitment afterwards. And Hertford himself was, in the Star-Chamber, impeach'd of three Crimes; 1. That he had debauch'd a Virgin of the Blood-Royal, in the Queen's Palace. 2. That he had broken Prison. And 3. That he had abus'd her a second time. He protested, That he was lawfully marry'd to her; and did not deny, but that he had pass'd some Doors of the Prison, which stood open, to support and comfort her under the Rigour of her Sentence; and to pay her the Respects and Obligations of an Husband. Hereupon, he was for every Offence fined Five thousand Pounds, and condemn'd to Nine Years Imprisonment: Nevertheless by the Advice of his Council, he said not to enter his Appeal against the Archbishop's Sentence, and to continue so to do under-hand, tho' lately he has publickly and freely retracted the same. She, after several Years past, in Prison, (if I may make Mention of such distant Times and Things) being seiz'd with a grievous Sickness, beg'd the Queen's Pardon, before Hopton, Lieutenant of the Tower, that she had contracted Marriage without her Knowledge: And after she had recommended her Children, and her Husband's Discharge, to the Queen's Mercy, she took a quiet and peaceable Farewell of the World.

He's find.

The War at this time breaking out afresh in France, between the Princes of the Blood and the Guises, both sides (as I have observ'd) making Pretence of Religion, to serve their Cause and strengthen their Party; Queen Elizabeth began to entertain some Fears, lest England should feel the Flames of the Neighbouring War. For, she had been inform'd, that the Guises, to gain Anthony of Bourbon, King of Navarre, to their Party, had made a private Offer to him of the Kingdom of Navarre, and to procure for him in Marriage the Queen of Scots, with the Kingdom of England, for her Portion: And all this by the Wealth of Spain, and the Authority of the Pope, who should dissolve the Marriage of Navarre, with his Wife, who was an Heretic; and depose Queen Elizabeth, for the very same Reason. Hereupon, she dispatch'd thither Sir Henry Sidney, a Person of approv'd Abilities and Reputation, to dive into the Bottom of this Business, and to persuade the Heads of each Party to an Accommodation. But Things were now gone too far to admit of any Remedy of that kind; wherefore Sidney return'd out of France, and immediately sent to the Queen of Scots, to adjourn the Interview which she had desired with the Queen in England, till the ensuing Year, or till the Wars of France were at an End. The great Debate now was, whether it would be convenient that such an Interview should pass between the Two Queens; and

whereas the Queen of Scots was the first that desired it, there was a fair Probability that she did it to serve her own Ends, and to nick the Juncture; that so she might either strengthen her Title to the Crown of England, or the Hopes at least, and Expectations of the Catholics in England, and her Kinsmen, the Guises, in France. Others, on the contrary, were of opinion, that such a Conference might prove the Occasion of a happier and better Correspondence: That it might tend to break, by degrees, the Confederacy between the French and the Scots, and to win over the Queen of Scots to the Reform'd Religion. Others again observ'd, that such Interviews do generally lay the Foundation rather of Emulation than Friendship: That one side is always apt to envy the Wealth and Grandeur of the other: That Appearance does not always answer Report, as to the Point of Beauty and bodily Proportion, Wit, and other Qualities of the Mind; and on Consequence, that Faults will be found, on one side or t'other. Neither did the Queen of Scots think it safe to trust herself to Queen Elizabeth, with whom she had disputed her Claim to the Kingdom: And her Thoughts were yet undetermin'd which side to choose, when she heard, that Queen Elizabeth appear'd openly for the Protestants of France; whilst she consider'd, (as she wrote herself) That on her Father's side she was descended from England, and on her Mother's, from France: That in France she had been a crown'd Queen, and was now a Queen Dowager, and Heir Expectant of the Crown of England: That she ow'd much to her Uncles in France, who had brought her up; and was as desirous likewise of standing fair in the Thoughts of her Sister Q. Elizabeth. Nevertheless, she was afraid, (so penetrating a Sense had she) that by engaging in a firmer Friendship with the Queen of England, she should lessen the Favour of the French King, be forsaken by the Guises, her Uncles, and lose her Portion, which was paid out of France; and all for preferring the precarious Favour of Q. Elizabeth, which, to use her own Expression, is but personal at best, before the steadier Friendship of her Allies the French. Hereupon, the Conference, which had stuck so many Months on hand, after several Articles likewise proposed, came at last to nothing: Especially when the Queen of Scots refused any Interview, unless the Parliament would declare her Heir Apparent to the Crown of England, or Queen Elizabeth adopt her for her Heir, in order to establish a lasting Union between the Two Kingdoms, which had been so often desir'd. If these Concessions were made, she faithfully promis'd the strictest Adherence to Queen Elizabeth's Service, without any Regard to the Resentments thereof of her Uncles the Guises. She also hinted in her Letters, that she was the more earnest in these Particulars, because she was inform'd, there were some very busie in setting up another Pretender; and for no better Reason, than the Protection of Religion, tho' she had given a Toleration for that of the Protestants, in Scotland.

But the Cardinal of Lorain using at the same time his utmost Persuasions with the Emperour Ferdinand, to get his Son the Archduke Charles, in Marriage, for the Queen of Scots, who was then a Suitor to Queen Elizabeth: The latter sent her word by Sir Thomas Randolph, that if she listen'd to the Cardinal, the great Enemy of the English Nation, as to any thing relating to that Match, 'twould prove the ready way to dissolve the good Agreement between England and Scotland; if not to exclude her from any Hopes of succeeding to the Crown of England; which that she might not come short of, she warn'd her as a Friend, to make choice of such a Husband, out of the English Nation, as might be both acceptable to her, and lay the Foundation of a firm Peace between the two Kingdoms at the same time, and secure her Succession to the Crown, which could never be declar'd till her choice were publickly known as to this matter.

Tho' so many Cares together were enough to keep Queen Elizabeth's Mind in suspense, yet she had her Eye and Thoughts chiefly upon the Wars of France, that they might not from Normandy be translated to England. To avoid which, after serious and close Deliberation, she took under Protection the French King's Subjects in Normandy, who craved her Assistance, and made a certain Contract with the Prince of Conde, Rohan, Coligni, and others, 'That she would pay them an Hundred thousand Angels; That she would send them over into France 6000 Men, whereof 3000 to be employ'd in the Defence of Diep and Roan; and that they should deliver up to her as a Cautionary-Town, Franciscopolis, a Town built by King Francis I. at the Mouth of the Seine, call'd by the English New-Haven, and by the French, Haure de Grace; which Town Three thousand English Soldiers should hold and defend in the French King's Name, till Calais should be restored. The very same Day that this Agreement was made, she publish'd a Manifesto, declaring her design herein, viz. 'That she sent an Army into Normandy, not to reduce that Country, tho' it had been the ancient Inheritance of the Kings of England, and wrested from them by force, without the least pretence of Claim; but to preserve it indeed for the French King, being yet a Minor, and to rescue it from the Tyranny of the Guises, who had begun already to practice the utmost Barbarities upon those of the Reformation, to endeavour to defraud her of her Right and Title to Calais, and at last to seize on the Coasts of Normandy, from whence they might be ready on all occasions to Invade England which lay so near them, that they thought it in their Hands already. So that she could do no less than prevent their Designs, unless she would have it thought that she intended to leave her Brother and Allie, the young King and his oppressed Subjects, in the lurch; enviously oppose the Peace of Christendom, and (what was the greatest thing of all) unless she would appear the Betrayer of her own Religion, Peace and Security. And whereas Paul Foix, the French Embassador in England, much importun'd her that the Vidame of Chartres, Hayes, and others, who had subscrib'd the Compact, might be given up to the King as Traytors to their Country, according to the Treaty of the Castle of Cambray; she excus'd it by Letters to his Majesty, and exempted them from all Blame, laying it on the turbulent Spirit of the Guises, who had engag'd his Father, and Brother, and Himself, on this tempestuous Scene of War.

In September one part of the English Army arriv'd at New-Haven, under the Conduct of their Commander Sir Adrian Poinings, and was receiv'd by the Inhabitants with great demonstrations of Joy, as was likewise the other at Diep. The Earl of Warwick, General of the whole Army, came somewhat later to New-Haven, having been twice driven back into England by foul Weather. They made some little Excursions into the Country thereabouts. To prevent which, the Rhinegrave came and encamp'd near them. Nevertheless, several slight Skirmishes pass'd between the French and English; and the Seamen belonging to the Fleet scour'd the Seas in the mean time, and

Ann. 5. This Year John Vere, the sixteenth Earl of Oxford of that Honourable Line, paid his last Debt to Nature; who by his first Wife, Daughter of Ralph Nevill, Earl of Westmorland, had Katharine, afterwards Wife to the Lord Windsor; by his second Wife, Margaret Golding, he had Edward Earl of Oxford, (who was in a fair way to spend his Estate) and Mary, afterwards married to Peregrine Bertie Lord Willoughby.

Sean-Oneal comes into England. He defends himself. And now came Sean-Oneal out of Ireland to perform the Promise he had made a Year ago, with a Guard of Gallo Glasses arm'd with Hatchets, all bare-headed, their Hair flowing in Locks upon their Shoulders, on which were yellow Surplices dyed with Saffron, or stain'd with Urine, with long Sleeves, short Coats, and Thrum-Jackets, which caus'd as much staring and gaping among the English People, as if they had come from China or America. He was receiv'd with great Kindness, when howling and falling down at the Queen's Feet, he own'd his Crime, and receiv'd her Majesty's Pardon. Being ask'd on what Pretence he had Excluded Hugh, his Brother Matthew's Son, from the Estate of his Ancestors, he sternly reply'd, (as he had done in Ireland) 'That there was good Reason for't, 'because himself, who was the lawful and undoubted Heir of Con, as being born of his lawful Wife, was now invested in his Father's Estate, whereas Matthew was the Son of a Blacksmith at Dundalk, and born after his Marriage with his Wife, one Alison, but artificially Father'd upon Con, by his Mother, on purpose to rob him of the Honour and Patrimony of the O-neals; which tho' he had patiently suffer'd, yet none of the same Family would ever do it. That the surrender made by his Father to Henry VIII. and the second grant of it from the King to him by his Letters-Patents, did signify just nothing, forasmuch as Con had no Estate he could make over beyond his own Life; nor could he surrender it, but by the consent of the Nobility and People who had conferr'd on him the Honour of O-neal. That such Letters-Patents were moreover insignificant, unless there was a certain Heir of the Family acknowledg'd by twelve Men, which in this case was never done. For his part, the Laws of God and Man had made him the undoubted Heir, as being his Father's eldest Son, born in lawful Wedlock, and entitul'd O-neal by the joint consent of the Peers and Commons, according to the Law of that Country, call'd Tanistry, by which a Man grown is to be prefer'd before a Child, and the Uncle before the Nephew, whose Grandfather outlives his Father. Nor did he usurp any Authority over the Nobility of Ulster, but what his Ancestors before him had legally exercis'd, as he was able to make very good Proof of. The Queen seeming very well contented with this Account, dismiss'd him with Honour; and in return he did her, for some time, very good and faithful Service against the Hebridian Raparees.

1563. The Sixth Year of her Reign.

A Parliament call'd, and good Laws fram'd. In January the Parliament met at Westminster, and made several good Laws for the Relief of the Poor, the Ordering of the Navy, the Support and Improvement of Tillage, besides others for Punishing Vagabonds, Forgers of Evidences, Conjurors and Fortune-tellers, and such as should commit Sodomy or Perjury; one there was likewise for Translating the Bible into the Welch

Tongue, and another for the Preservation of the Queen's Majesty and the Realm, and avoiding those Inconveniences and Abuses for the future which had arose from the usurp'd Authority of the See of Rome. And the better to curb the Sawciness of those that maintain'd the same, 'twas made High-Treason for any Thrice to assert by Writing, Word or Deed, the Authority of any foreign Prince, Prelate or State, in Spiritual Matters, in England, or any other of the Queen's Dominions; or to refuse the Oath of Supremacy to the Queen in matters Spiritual, or over Persons Ecclesiastical, after it had been twice tender'd; yet so, as that they should not fall under an Attainder, nor forfeit their Goods and Chattels; nor that this Oath should be exacted from any Peer of the Realm, or any Person of eminent Quality, (whose Allegiance the Queen did not in the least question) nor indeed of any, but such who were, had been, or should be in Holy Orders, or did then bear, had born, or should bear some Ecclesiastical Office; or that, after warning given, should refuse to observe the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England; or should dishonour the same in Publick, whether by Word or Deed; or should celebrate or hear Mass, &c. as may be seen in the Statute. The Parliament moreover, as a Congratulatory Compliment upon the happy turn of Affairs, granted the Queen several Subsidies, viz. the Clergy one, and the Laity another, besides two Fifteenths and Tenths, in consideration of her having reform'd the Faith, restor'd Peace to her Kingdoms, rescu'd England and Scotland from the Common Enemy, retin'd the Coin, rebuilt the Navy, provided Ammunition for Sea and Land, and, in a word, for the extraordinary Care she us'd in France for the Security of its young King, the Safety of the Kingdom of England, and the regaining of Calais. A Fifteenth and a Tenth (to take some notice of it for the sake of Strangers) is a certain Tax on every City, Burrough and Town, not upon every Man in particular, but a general Sum, in proportion to the Fifteenth part of the Wealth of the respective Places. A Subsidy we call that which is impos'd on every single Person, as they are Assess'd by Poll, according to the Value of their Goods and Lands. But neither is the one or the other Tax ever laid but by Act of Parliament. In the meanwhile the Prince of Condé, in his expeditious Journey to the English Auxiliary Troops in Normandy, was stop't in that remarkable Battel at Dreux, and taken Prisoner by the Duke of Guise, and with him and several more, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, who was in the Engagement, and had before voluntarily surrender'd himself to the Protestants, on purpose to communicate some private Advices to them. But in a little time he receiv'd his Liberty, and paid the Sum agreed upon to Coligny, who with the Auxiliary Forces march'd to the Castle of Caen, which he presently Besieged, and by their assistance spent less time in obliging Caen, Baieux, Falaise and St. Lo, to a Surrender.

Whilst these things were acting in France, Queen Elizabeth signify'd to the King of Spain, by Chaloner, Her Embassador there, 'That she had sent over an Army into France to prevent the Guises (who were grown Insolent, and aim'd at her Ruin) from Transplanting the War into England, and to take Possession of New-Haven, which had been deliver'd up to her till she receiv'd Satisfaction for Calais. His answer was, That if Calais was the whole of her Demand, he freely comply'd with her: But if it was made a Religious War, he must, for his part, abide by the Oldest Religion. As for the Guises, he could not but think them too Weak and Inconsiderable for the most Potent Queen of

The Bishop of Aquila likewise, the Spanish Ambassador then in England, frequently told the Queen, that the King, his Master, neither could nor would desert his Brother the King of France on the present Juncture. To whom the Queen made no other Reply, than that of an old English Proverb: Every Man must secure his own House, and I mine. Nor was the King of Spain insensible that the Queen, at the very same time, was very importunate with the Protestant Princes of Germany, by Henry Knolls and Christopher Monts, for the Relief of Condé, and the Support of the common Interest of the Church; which the Spaniard being much offended at, sought what Occasions he could against her on the score of Religion likewise.

Hostages for Calais endeavour to escape.

The French Protestants desert the English.

War Proclaim'd on both sides.

The Fr. sent out of New-Haven.

Mean while the French Hostages, who were sent into England for Five hundred thousand Crowns for the restoring of Calais, seeing things look sullenly and as if they would end in War, attempted to escape out of the Kingdom: But just as they were ready to take Shipping, they were brought back again, with John Ribbald the famous Pilot, who came privately into England to Convoy them away. There was a Peace agreed on in the mean time between the King of France and the Prince of Condé, (who pleas'd himself with the hopes of being Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, and Husband to the Queen of Scots) as likewise the Protestants, without any regard to the Queen of England. And they declar'd unanimously, that unless the English would depart from New-Haven, the Agreement for restoring Calais, included in the Treaty at Cambray, should be null and void. And there was a Proclamation sent out, giving liberty to all Frenchmen to Assault, Seize and Plunder any Englishmen, as long as they held possession of New-Haven. The same liberty did the Queen grant, by way of Reprisal, to the English, That they should treat all the French, but what dwelt in London, as Enemies, so long as they remain'd Masters of Calais. Hereupon the English put to Sea with an incredible large Fleet, and Block'd up both the French and Spaniard; so that the Queen was forc'd to excuse their Piracies on the Spaniards, by a special Ambassador, and to restrain those Insolencies herein by a Proclamation.

The Earl of Warwick, Governor of New-Haven, when he saw the French so unsteady to their Duty, and, on the slightest Rumours of a Peace, caballing both among themselves and with the Rhinegrave (who lay with a Body of Forces in the adjoining Country) to betray the Town and dispossess the English, he remov'd out of it all the French Protestants as well as Papists, and seiz'd on their Ships. This the French took very heinously, complaining that the English design'd not so much the Protection of the distress'd French, as the bare Possession of the Place; and charg'd them as being injurious to Strangers. Certain it is, that nothing did so much alienate the Minds of the Normans, Aquitanes and Poictons formerly, and the Hearts of others who were under the English Jurisdiction in France, than that they were thought and treated as Foreigners. And now do the French begin to make all possible Preparations for a Siege; and at the same time the King and Condé make as pressing Motions, by Briquemot and d'Alvy, in England, for the re-delivery of New-Haven. Neither did the Queen refuse it on these Terms, That the King of Spain should become Guarantee for the restoring of Calais within the time limited: That the Treaty of Cambray should be confirmed by the Oaths of the King, the Queen-Mother, and the Princes of the Blood, and approved in every Parliament of France, and some of the first Nobility to be deliver'd as Hostages.

In the mean while, there was a very raging Sickness in the Garrison at New-Haven; and of the Recruits sent thither for their Relief, Two hundred perish'd by Shipwreck, with their Commander Sir Tho. Finch Kt. and two Brothers of the Lord Wentworth; through which Misfortune, when they almost despair'd of keeping the Town, Sir Thomas Smith, Ambassador in ordinary in France, was order'd to propose the restoring of that Town in lieu of Calais, and that the Business should be determin'd by the Umpirage of the King of Spain, who had married the French King's Sister. But this they reject'd, alledging, that the King of France own'd no Superior, nor would he refer his Concerns to the Arbitriment of any Prince whatever; and Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, was by them roughly Treated, who was commission'd to inspect these Matters, on suspicion that he being dexterous enough in raising popular Tumults, was return'd for that purpose, and they charg'd him with coming into France without a Pass, whereas he had Credential Letters, and others also from the French Ambassador in England; nor would they so much as allow him an Hearing, assuring themselves, it seems, of the surrender of New-Haven, upon the account of the Sickness which was so violent there. The Constable Montmorency, with the chief of the Nobility, arriv'd there about this time, and Condé came soon after with the chief of the Protestants. The English, who could not but wonder for what reason the Minds of the French Protestants were so suddenly chang'd, were inform'd by them, that since the Peace was concluded, their Religion, in which they differ'd from their Countrymen, was no longer concern'd, but the Safety of their Country, in the defence of which every one ought to join. Montmorency sent a Trumpet to Warwick to Summon him to a Surrender; who was sent back with Sir Hugh Pawlet to assure him, that the English were prepar'd to suffer the last Extremities before they would yield up the Town without the Queen's Orders. So the Works being finish'd, and the Batteries having play'd for several Days, some Breaches were made, the Conduits stop'd, and the Water drawn out of the Ditch, which lay higher than the Sea. The French push on the Siege with Vigour, and the English give them as brave a Repulse, but yet there perished more Souls by the Sickness than by the Sword.

Queen Elizabeth having Intelligence of this, express'd with Tears her Commiseration of the sad state her People were reduc'd to; and that she might no longer expose her bravest Men to the Fury of two Enemies, the Sickness and the Sword, she set out a Proclamation, wherein she commended the Valour of her Commanders and Soldiers, and gave orders to Warwick to Capitate upon Honourable Terms. He immediately sent Pawlet, Sir Maurice Dennis, Treasurer of the Garrison, Horsey and Pellham to Montmorency, to agree upon Articles of Surrender. And soon after these were agreed on: That the Town, with all the Ammunition, Shipping and Furniture, which belong'd to the French King and his Subjects, should be surrender'd: That the larger Tower should forthwith be deliver'd up to Montmorency: That the Prisoners taken on both sides should be exchange'd without Ransom; and, That the English should have free liberty to depart in six Days, if the Wind serv'd, with all things that belong'd to the Queen and them. The Hostages deliver'd were Sir Oliver Manours, the Earl of Rutland's Brother, Leighston, Pelham and Horsey. The last that staid was Colonel Edward Randolph, who out of a Piety never enough to be commended, carry'd upon his Shoulders the sick and diseased Soldiers 1563. after it had stood the Siege of a Sickness more violent than the Enemies Fire, left at last to the French, after the English had been Masters of it eleven Months; during which time there were swept away by the Plague, Somerset, John Zouch, Alberick Darcy, Drury, Entwessel, Ormesly, Vaghan, Croker, Cockson, Prowd, Saul, Kemis, all stout Commanders. There were slain likewise the two Tremaines, Brothers, Sanders, Bromfield the Master-Gunner, Robinson Bailiff of the Town, Strangers an expert Seaman, and Goodall an excellent Miner.

The French King was very bountiful of his Te Deum's for the recovery of this Town; the Papists all over the Kingdom were mightily exalted, and made their boasts, That the English were thrust out of France by the same Protestants that invited them thither; and that this would prove the ground of a lasting Dissention between those Parties. D'Hospital, the Chancellor, made a fine Harangue to Congratulate the French on this Occasion, and to dress up the matter, he reported on a false Hearsay, That the English Fleet appear'd with fresh Recruits before the Town the next Day after 'twas surrender'd: And he went so far as to declare, that the English had by this War quitted entirely all Claim and Pretensions to Calais. The Soldiers that were brought back to England sick of the Infection, scatter'd the bad Influence thereof so unhappily, that it seiz'd on the whole Kingdom in a miserable manner; and there were carry'd out of the City of London alone, which consists of an hundred and twenty one Parishes, 21530 Corps.

The Duke of Guise, Uncle to the Queen of Scots, being slain in the heat of the Civil War in France, her Dowry-Money, which used to be paid out of France, was stoppt, Hamilton Duke of Castle-Herault turn'd out of his Dukedom, and the Scots excluded from being of the Lifeguard to the French King; and this the Queen highly resented. The Cardinal of Lorain, another of her Uncles, being apprehensive that this might provoke her to desert the French and court an English Interest, once more set on foot, by the Agency of Crook, a Match with Charles of Austria, and tender'd the County of Tyrol in Jointure. She imparts the matter to Queen Elizabeth, who by Randolph repeated the same Advice she had given her before in relation to this Point: And farther, she recommended to her in plain terms Robert Dudley, (whose Wife, one Robser's Heiress, died of a fall from some high place) and engag'd farther, That if she would marry him, she should be declar'd by Act of Parliament, her Sister, Daughter, or Heir to the Crown, in case she herself died without Issue. As soon as the Queen-Mother, and her Uncles in France, had learnt this from Foix, the French Ambassador in England, they look'd on this Proposal with so much Contempt, and thought it so gross a Disparagement to her Royal Blood and Character, that they promis'd her not only the payment of her Jointure, but to settle the Scots in the Possessions of their ancient Liberty, and to grant them new Privileges also, if she would adhere firmly to the French Interests, and have nothing to say to that Motion. They moreover suggest'd to her, That Queen Elizabeth could never be in earnest when she made this Proposal, but under a disguise, as if she had a mind to Dudley herself. Neither was there any trusting to Acts of Parliament; for in England, what one decreed another repeal'd: Besides, 'twas the great aim of all the Politicks of England to keep her by all possible Arts from marrying at all.

The Queen of Scots came not to any Resolution herein, but referr'd herself to a Conference, having her Thoughts mightily taken up with her Affairs at Home, which now lay in great Confusion and Disorder; for Murray imprison'd the Archbishop of St. Andrews for continuing to say Mass; nor was he discharged from his Imprisonment, and Pardon'd, without much submission and entreaty. The warmer Party of Churchmen did also thro' Murray's Authority, outrage a certain Priest that said Mass at Court, (which the Laws allow'd) and yet came off with Impunity. Neither was she able to suppress those who were up in Arms, tho' she took all imaginable care of the Publick Welfare, by granting a general Amnesty, augmenting the Judges Salaries, enacting wholesome Laws, punishing Adultery with Death, and often hearing Causes herself in Court, that she might carry things even with Persons of every Rank or Degree.

In this Year of Troubles, to the great Grief of the Protestants, died William Lord Grey of Wilton, Governor of Berwick, a Person who had gain'd a considerable Reputation in the Wars, and lost a great part of his Estate by the payment of a heavy Ransom, when he was taken Prisoner in France. To whom succeeded, as Governor of Berwick, Francis Earl of Bedford. About this time died also Alvares a Quadra, to the as great mortification of the Papists. He had been Ambassador from Spain to England, and had fed his Countrymen with hopes of restoring the Roman Catholick Religion in England; and was a mighty Intimate with the Pools, whom I have mention'd before. This made him look'd on with a jealous Eye, as one that aim'd at the Disturbance of the Publick Tranquility, and the Breach of Correspondence between the Queen and the Spaniard. Upon which the Queen mov'd the King of Spain to recal him home. But he excus'd it under the varnish of Religion, and wrote back to the Queen, That Princes were in a miserable case, if their Ministers must be called home upon every petty Disgust; nor did he a little resent to have his Ambassador confin'd to his own House, without his knowledge or Consent, and stand the Test of publick Examinations and Reproofs; and all for no other reason, than that he had given shelter to an Italian that fled thither, having discharg'd a Pistol at another, and afterwards secretly carry'd him off.

From this time the Spaniard was more enrag'd against the English, making use of this pretence, That the English Pirates were very troublesome to the French upon the Coasts of Spain, and design'd to annoy the West-Indies. And 'twas not long before this glowing Rage broke out into a flame, the King of Spain sending Richard Shelly, who left England for his Religion, and was therefore a most implacable Enemy to his Prince, on an Honourable Embassy to Maximilian the elected King of the Romans, to Congratulate him upon his Nomination: And moreover, he seiz'd on some English Merchantmen in the Ports of Batavia, (now call'd Andalusia) because the English had, in giving chace to the French, taken some Ships from the Spaniards.

This Year likewise did William Lord Paget depart this Life, a Person pretty Ancient, and of whose good Qualities had advanc'd him to high Characters of Honour. For so great was the merit of his Learning and fine Parts, that King Henry VIII. made him his Secretary, sent him Ambassador to Charles the Emperor, and to Francis I. King of France; and nominated him as one of the Lords-Justices of the Kingdom during his Son's Minority. King Edward VI. made him Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, and Comptroller of his Household, rais'd him to the Honour of a Baron, and made him Knight of the Garter, 1563. Garter, (which notwithstanding Dudley Duke of Northumberland dishonourably stript him of, and Queen Mary as honourably restor'd, as due to the Character of one who had deserv'd so well at the Hands of the Government) and at last made him Lord Privy-Seal, which is the fourth Place or Degree of Temporal Honour. (For K. Henry VIII. had, by Act of Parliament, consign'd the first Place to the Lord-Chancellor, the second to the Lord-Treasurer, the third to the President of his Majesty's Council, and the fourth to the Lord Privy-Seal; who were likewise to take place of all Dukes, except those of the Royal Blood). Queen Elizabeth, by reason of his great Age, which rendred him unfit for the Publick Service, eas'd him of that Care, at his own request, and retain'd an Affection and Value for him, tho' he was a strict Zealot of the Romish Church. He left three Sons, Henry and Thomas, who succeeded one another in the Title, and Charles, whom I shall have frequent occasion to speak of. He marry'd likewise several Daughters into noble Families.

And the same Debt was paid to Nature by Mancours, or de Maneris, Earl of Rutland, being Son to Thomas the first Earl of this Family, and Nephew of George Lord Ross, by the Daughter of Thomas St. Leiger and Ann his Wife, (who being Sister to Edward IV. brought a great accession of Honour to this Family) and Great Grandson to Robert, who having marry'd the Daughter and Heir of the ancient Lord Ross, brought into his Family both a Barony and a most plentiful Estate. This Henry had by Margaret Nevil, Daughter of Ralph Earl of Westmorland, two Sons, Edward and John, both successively Earls of Rutland; besides a Daughter, marry'd to William Courtney of Powderham.

Duchess of Suffolk

The same Year did Frances Dutchess of Suffolk end a miserable Life, being Daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, by Mary second Sister to Henry VIII. and Queen-Dowager of France, after she had seen her Daughter, the Lady Jane, Proclaim'd Queen of England, and not long after Beheaded, and her Husband undergo the same Fate in some little time. The Lady Katharine, her second Daughter, she liv'd to see marry'd to the Earl of Pembroke's Son, divorc'd from him, and confin'd to the Tower. And the Lady Mary, her third Daughter, thrown away, by an unequal Match, upon Keyes the Groom-Porter at Court: And herself, last of all, so far forgetting the Greatness of her Descent, as to accept for an Husband Adrian Stokes, a Gentleman, but in mean Circumstances; which how much soever it might tend to her Dishonour, yet she seem'd to do it for her own Security.

The Seventh Year of her Reign.

Now did France begin to triumph, having once more Peace within her Borders; which indeed was in a great measure owing to Queen Elizabeth: For they were the more forward to agree among themselves, that they might stop the Torrent of the English Bravery, which what Havock it had made in former Times, when, upon a private Quarrel, they were called thither by the Duke of Burgundy, they could not easily forget. When by this means the heat of the War betwixt England and France was rather smother'd for a time, than any lasting Peace concluded, the Queen, having been ungratefully Treated by the Protestants of France, resolv'd no longer to hazard her own Safety to secure other Men's, and began to entertain cool and serious Thoughts as to a Peace. This she Negotiated by Sir Thomas Smith, a Person of excellent Sense and Conduct;

Peace be-

and the French agreed thereto. Throckmorton, who then liv'd in France, a kind of Prisoner at large, was join'd with him in the same Commission. France submitted the matter to the Management of Morvillier, Bishop of Orleans, and Jaques Burden, Secretary; who in April subscrib'd to these Articles at Troyes in Champaign. That neither Party should invade the other: That the Acts of private Men should bind themselves only: That there should be a Free Trade on both sides: That Rebels and Traytors should not be shelter'd: That no Letters of Reprisal should be granted: That all Hostilities should be forgot: That the reservation of Rights and Titles of all Actions, Claims and Demands, which they have or pretend to have the one against the other respectively, shall remain to them safe and entire; and, That Defences and Exceptions shall likewise be reserv'd. The next Day these Articles were agreed on apart, viz. That a certain Sum of Money should be repaid to Queen Elizabeth at set Times: That the Hostages should be deliver'd and return'd from England, upon payment of Six hundred and twenty thousand Crowns; and, That after the Treaty was settled, Throckmorton should be at Liberty to return to England. The French express'd their Joy at the Conclusion of this Peace, by publick Bonfires, as is usual on such Occasions. The Queen of England swore to the Treaty in presence of Gonor and Foix; and some time after the French King did the same in presence of the Lord Hunsdon, who at the same time invest'd his Majesty with the Order of the Garter, a Robe of Honour, and a Collar of Roses, having the Picture of St. George hanging at it, &c.

About this time arriv'd in England another Ambassador, in the room of the Bishop of Aquila, who died some Months before, viz. Don Diego, Gusman de Sylva, Canon of Toledo; a Person of a venerable Aspect and Gravity. In the interim, the English had met with very indifferent Usage in Spain, by the means of Roderico Gomez de Sylva, who bore them a Grudge, as being Protestants. But the Duke of Alva found a Temper to qualify this; whether in respect to the English, as he pretended, or in spite to Gomez, is hard to say. Nor had the English better Treatment in the Spanish Netherlands. Cardinal Granvill attempted (on the score of Religion too) to foment a Difference between the English and the Netherlanders, who had maintain'd an happy Union and Commerce hitherto. For he it was that made the Netherlanders complain, by Assonville, of the Imposition of unreasonable Customs on their Wares in England, (which notwithstanding was done in the Reign of Philip and Mary) and likewise of the Prohibition, by Act of Parliament, of many of their Manufactures. The English complain'd on the other hand, that their Goods were seiz'd in the Netherlands on very slight Pretences, by virtue of some new Orders which forbid the Exportation of some Goods: That Passage was denied through the Netherlands for Horses, Saltpeter and Gunpowder, out of Italy and Germany: That burdensom and unheard of Imposts were strictly demanded for Provisions, Anchorages, Horses, &c. And all this contrary to the Treaty of Commerce concluded heretofore, call'd, The Grand Treaty.

Mean while the Dutchess of Parma, Governess of the Low-Countries, Prohibits the Importation of such Wares and Manufactures into England from the Low-Countries, as were forbidden in England; and not long after forbids the bringing of English Cloth into the Netherlands; using it for a Pretence, that the Plague very lately rag'd in England to an high and dangerous degree. But, in truth, the Cardinal Granvill's Policy was at the bottom of all, which aim'd at putting into ferment the Spirits of the Clothiers in England, and

and many more that had an immediate Dependence on them, when they perceiv'd their Cloth was not Exported, besides that the Cloth-Manufacture might be set up in the Netherlands to the Detriment of the English. At this the English were so nettled, that they took occasion, under colour of fearing the Spanish Inquisition lately brought into the Netherlands, and the prospect they had of future Disturbances there, to settle the Manufactory for the Wares of England at Emden upon the River Ems in Friesland. On the other hand, the Governels of the Netherlands Interdicts all Commerce between the Netherlands and the English at Emden, or elsewhere, or to bring any Merchandizes bought of them into the Low-Countries, on pain of Forfeiture.

Open Trade between the English and the Netherlands restor'd by Gusman.

These were Methods which Gusman thought too sharp to do either side any good: For he was a wise Man, and knew well enough how great gainers the Netherlands were by Trading with England. And for the same reason it was that Lodowick Malanus Earl of Flanders, about the Year 1338, inveigled the English, by the Grant of some large Privileges, to settle the Staple of English Wool at Bruges in Flanders. For, ever since that time, the Resort has been so general of People of all Nations into Flanders, to buy off the English Cloth, and other English Commodities, that 'tis incredible what an Advance it has made of the Merchants and Retail-Trade, and as much it has improv'd the Fishery and Shipping of the Netherlands. Insomuch, that the English Wool has prov'd to them more than an imaginary Golden-Fleece; and from thence was deriv'd that famous Order of the Golden-Fleece, and the full Coats of the Dukes of Burgundy. 'Tis most unquestionably certain, (and I have it from good Books of Accounts) that the Trade between the English and the Netherlands, hath amounted yearly to above twelve Millions of Ducats. Hence it was, that he wrought so hard to make up the matter, and so effectually, that the Trade which had been stop't was put in Statu quo, and all Orders and Decrees on both sides to the contrary, from the first of January, in the first Year of Queen Elizabeth, were suspended till farther Orders from Commissioners appointed on both sides. But the Year following, when some Proposals were started on this Head, by the Lord Viscount Montacute, Nicholas Wotton, and Walter Haddon Master of the Requests, Deputies for the English; Montigni, Affonville and Joachim Agidius, Commissioners for the Netherlands, the Troubles in the Netherlands put a stop to the Conference, after it had been agreed, that there should be an open Trade till one Prince should denounce War against the other; and the Merchants in that case to have forty Days Notice to dispose of Themselves and their Effects.

Q. Eliz. visits Cambridge.

These things being so far settled abroad, the Queen took a Progress for Pleasure into the Country, and visited the University of Cambridge, one of the Eyes of the Kingdom; where, after a splendid and courteous Reception, and the Entertainment of the Schools and the Stage, Plays and Disputations, she took a view of the Colleges, and acknowledg'd their Civilities in a Latin Oration, commending the plenty and variety of good Learning that abounded there, and recommended the Study thereof as their first and greatest Care, with a Promise, that she would be always ready to Promote and Encourage them.

At her return, she created Robert Dudley, who was Master of the Horse, and very much in her Favour, and whom she had mark'd out (as I hinted before) for an Husband to the Queen of Scots,

Baron of Denbeigh; and gave him the Place, and some Revenues thereto belonging; and the more effectually to recommend him to the Queen of Scots's Favour, the next Day she made him Earl of Leicester, a Title to be held by him and the Male-Heirs of his Body, lawfully begotten, for ever. On which account, she had likewise created his eldest Brother Ambrose, Lord Lisle and Earl of Warwick. Dudley, after these Honours were so bountifully heap'd upon him, to ingratiate himself with the Queen of Scots, whose Favour he was willing to purchase at any Rate, accus'd the Lord-Keeper Bacon to the Queen, as having interpos'd in the Business of the Succession to the prejudice of the Queen of Scots, and as being privy to a Book, wherein Hales, whom I have had occasion to mention before, attempts, in case the Queen should die, to devolve the Crown, by a Lineal Descent, upon the House of Suffolk. Hereupon Hales was committed to the Tower: But Bacon (who denied the Charge) was, with much ado, restor'd to the Queen's Favour by Cecil, who in the Particular of the Succession ever inclin'd to declare his Opinion, as he resolv'd always to do, unless the Queen demanded his Thoughts herein; of which there was little danger, since she never heard any Discourse with so much uneasiness as that concerning her Successor. When on the other side, those that had most Sense and good Estates were not concern'd for any thing more than this, for that the Differences in Religion had this Influence upon the Zealots of the Reformation, to make them think the Queen of Scots ought to be Excluded from the Succession upon a few nicer Punctilios in Law, however clear and unquestionable her Title was in other respects. And among the Papists, the greatest Part, the cooler Heads at least of the Party, were of opinion her Pretensions were good, and ought to stand, being firm and according to Law: And others again were for setting up Margaret, the Queen of Scots Aunt, and Wife to Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox, and her Children, of whom they conceiv'd mighty Hopes, as being English-Born. These things the Queen of Scots was not altogether ignorant of; who, to prevent them what she could, sent for Matthew Earl of Lenox into Scotland, by Advice of her Aunt, the Countess of Lenox, under pretence of restoring him to his ancient Hereditary Estate, but in truth and reality, to advise with him in these Particulars. Who by his Wife's means obtain'd the Queen's Leave and Letters of Recommendation, when he had been Banished from his Country about twenty Years.

This Gentleman (to give some light into the matter by going a little higher) was a branch of the same Family with the Stuarts, the Royal House of Scotland, and had Royal Blood in his Veins: For Mary, the Daughter of James II. King of Scots, bore to James Hamilton a Son, James I. Earl of Arran, of that Line, and a Daughter Mary, Wife to Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox, the first of this Christian Name. James Earl of Arran divorc'd his first Wife, and marry'd in her Life-time Fenetta of Betone, the Cardinal of Betone's Aunt, by whom he had James Duke of Castle-Herault, whom his Enemies hence would needs have to be illegitimate; Mary the Earl of Arran's Sister bore to Matthew, John Earl of Lenox, who being slain by the Hamiltons whilst he was endeavouring the enlargement of James IV. left this Matthew Stuart, we are now speaking of, a Person in very high esteem with K. James V. for his Father's sake. But Matthew, after the King's death, and when 'twas visible that all pass'd through the Hands of the Hamiltons, withdrew 1564. Ann. 7. drew into France, from whence being sent back into Scotland by Henry the French King, to prevent any Detriment to the Kingdom from Hamilton's Regency, he did his Country good Service. Nevertheless, being a frank and open-temper'd Person, he fell into the Snare laid by the Cardinal of Betone and Hamilton; and in a little time lost the French King's Favour. And when 'twas come to that pass, that there was no staying at Home, nor returning to France, he came into England, and put himself under the Protection of Hen. VIII. who frankly receiv'd him as a Person whose Interest was considerable in the West of Scotland. And tho' the Hamiltons condemn'd him, and made sale of his Estate; yet King Henry acknowledged him next Heir to the Crown of Scotland, after Mary, then an Infant, and gave him Margaret Douglas, his Niece by his eldest Sister, to Wife, with an Estate in England to the value of Seventeen hundred Marks per Annum: And this Agreement he made with him, That he should deliver into the King of England's Hands the Castle of Dunbritton, and the Isle of Bute, with the Castle of Rothsay; which tho' he resolutely undertook, yet the Success did not answer.

The Cause why Lenox was call'd Home.

This Matthew, Earl of Lenox, was now sent for Home, and his Banishment taken off by the Prudence and Foresight of the Queen of Scots; who restor'd him likewise to his Estate, as well to engage him against any Attempts from James her base Brother, whom she had made Earl of Murray, as likewise to cut off all Pretensions to the Crown of England on the side of Henry Lord Darley, the Son of this Matthew. For, should he, who was a young Person, of Royal Blood, born in England, and in great Favour with the English, happen to match into some Powerful Family in England, she was afraid, that he, with such a fair Prospect before him, might be a Bar to her own Title to the Succession to the Crown of England; and the rather, because in most Men's Opinion he was look'd on as the Heir, immediately after her. Nor did she more earnestly desire any one thing, than that she might be so happy to devolve the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland on some Person of Scottish Extraction, who might entail the Succession thereof in the Name and Family of the Stuarts. This Queen Elizabeth got some notice of, and to prevent it, advertis'd the Queen of Scots, by Randolph, That that Marriage was so far disapprov'd by all the English in general, that she had prorogu'd the Parliament contrary to the Advice of her Council, lest being at present disoblig'd, they should take this very Opportunity to promote some Act against her Title to the Succession. And that it might not hereafter come to this, and that she might likewise give the greater Satisfaction to the English, she advis'd her to think of some new Match; and on this occasion, she once more press'd her to accept the Earl of Leicester, whom she had made an Earl on purpose to qualify him the better for her Favours.

A Conference about a Match between the Queen of Scots and the E. of Leicester.

Hereupon the Earl of Bedford, and Randolph the Earl of Murray and Lidington, were appointed Delegates to Treat about this Match at Berwick, in the Month of November. The English Commissioners promis'd a most inviolable Friendship, a constant Peace, and to secure to her the Succession, provided she would accept this Offer: For on this condition Queen Elizabeth had promis'd to declare her by Act of Parliament her Adopted Daughter or Sister, as soon as the Marriage was over. The Scottish Deputies maintain'd, on the other hand, that it fell much beneath the Character of a Princess, who had been Court'd by Charles, the Emperor Ferdinand's Son, as well as by the French King, the Prince of Conde, and the Duke of Ferrara, to stoop so low as to Marry an Upstart Earl, and a Subject of England, with no other Settlement or Portion but that of Expectation; nor was it much for the Queen of England's Honour to recommend so mean an Alliance to a Princess and her Kinswoman: But she would give a very acceptable proof of regard for the Queen of Scots, would she permit her to make choice, by her own Inclination, of one who would be ready to make a Peace with England, and make her a yearly Settlement, and would she confirm her Title to the Succession by Act of Parliament.

It seem'd to be Queen Elizabeth's great aim, through the Management of this whole Affair, to fix the Succession to the two Crowns upon an English Bottom, tho' she went but slowly to work about it. The Queen of Scots, after two Years delay, and when she had fix'd her Eye and good Inclinations upon the Lord Darly, suspected she had been Trick'd, and that the true reason of Queen Elizabeth's propounding this Match, was to reserve to herself the first Choice of all the rest, or at least to admit Leicester's Addresses with more decency, after he had gain'd the consent and good-liking of a crown'd Head. But the Scottish Commissioners being true to their Interests, had resolv'd to break off any Match, no matter how, which they found likely to interfere with their Power over the Queen. Queen Elizabeth advis'd them to prevent her Marriage with Darly; and Leicester himself, in hopes of enjoying Queen Elizabeth, secretly advertis'd Bedford not to be too warm in the Business; and on the suppos'd ground of his entertaining these Hopes, he was thought to be an underhand Assistant to the Lord Darly's Pretensions.

The Eighth Year of her Reign.

The Lord Darly, in the mean time, at the importunate and humble Request of his Mother to the Queen, got leave, tho' with much Difficulty, to go into Scotland, and to make a stay of 8 Months, under colour of enjoying a share in his Father's Restoration: And in that most sharp Winter, when the Thames was frozen over, he came to Edinburgh in February. He was indeed a Gentleman whose Person might well become the Honour of a Crown, extremely Handsome, and of a Temper as well mix'd as his outward Proportions. The Queen of Scots fell in love with him at the first sight; and the better to smother the Flame, she was always entertaining Randolph, the English Ambassador, with Discourses about a Match with Leicester. At the same time she was working at Rome to get a Dispensation; the Lord Darly and herself being so near of Kin, that the Canon-Law demanded a Dispensation. Upon the discovery of all this, she sent Lidington to Queen Elizabeth to gain her consent for Consummating a Marriage with the Lord Darly, and that she might not be debarr'd so Natural a Privilege upon Hopes and Prospects merely precarious.

Queen Elizabeth breaks the Business to the Trustiest of her Privy-Council, who, through Murray's Insinuations, were easily led into the belief, that the Queen of Scots's design in this Marriage, was to corroborate her Title to the Crown of England, to renew her old Claim, and to introduce Popery once more; and that she would not want some Adherents on the score of the Succession's being hereby with more certainty secured, since there was a prospect of Heirs that would probably descend from this Match; and others also, out of the good Affection they bore to the old Superstition, inasmuch as to their own Knowledge, most of the Justices of the Peace

1565. Ann. 8. Peace throughout England were Popishly affected. For the better prevention of these ill Effects, they judg'd it adviseable, in the first place, to Address the Queen out of hand to marry some Person, and so secure and fix the Succession upon her own Issue. (For the great fear was, that should the Queen of Scots Marry and have Issue, the certainty of Succession would cast the Balance of the Peoples Affections on her side). And then again, that this would be a means to encourage the Reform'd Religion, and keep down Popery: The one, by some Abatements of things merely Indifferent to some warmer Sticklers on the Protestant side; and the other, by committing such Popish Bishops to Custody afresh, as had been displac'd, and were, in the Sickness time, dispers'd up and down the Countries, by empowering the Bishops to Exercise the Ecclesiastical Laws to their utmost extent against that Bug-bear, the Pramunire, which the Common-Law had thrown in their way, by suppressing Books sent by Harding and other Divines (who had fled their Country) out of the Netherlands, by removing some Scottish Priests that were harbour'd in England; by depriving the English Fugitives of their Benefices, hitherto enjoyed by them; and by compelling the Judges (who were almost all of them Catholics) to take an Oath of Supremacy. But in order to break off the Match with the Lord Darby, 'twas thought expedient to alarm Scotland, by raising of Soldiers in all the Parts adjacent thereto, and to put more Men into the Garrison of Berwick; that the Countess of Lenox, the Lord Darby's Mother, and her Son Charles, should be committed to Custody; that the Earl of Lenox and the Lord Darby, should be call'd back to England upon Pain of forfeiting their Chattels and Estates, before any Treaty were clap'd up with France and Spain; that the Scots who oppos'd the Marriage, should be Protected; and that the Lady Katharine Grey, with the Earl of Hertford, should now receive some Countenance at Court, as being the only Persons the Queen of Scots seem'd to be jealous of as Co-rivals to her in the point of Succession. And this was look'd on as the most probable Expedient to put a stop to the Match.

Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was dispatch'd away to the Queen of Scots, to put her in mind, That what one could but once resolve on in one's whole Life, could never be too well consider'd before-hand. That those who Marry'd in haste, commonly Repented at leisure, but chiefly indeed to push on the Business of a Match with my Lord Leicester. That the design'd Match with her Cousin was directly against the Pope's Authority. For 'twas Queen Elizabeth's great desire, that the Succession might rest in some Person whom she should choose of the English Blood, tho' some again thought, that the Religion of both Kingdoms would fare better, should she die without Issue. She answer'd however, That Matters were now gone too far to be recall'd, nor had Queen Elizabeth any reason to be disoblig'd, since by her Advice she had now made choice, not of a Foreigner, but an Englishman, and withal a Descendant of the Blood-Royal of both Kingdoms, and the first Nobleman of all Britain. Lidington, who was all this while in England, had several times mention'd to Leicester the Marriage with the Queen of Scots as no impracticable thing; as he also did to Norfolk, a Person who deserv'd better to be the Husband of a Queen: But he always wav'd it with a modest Refusal.

The Queen of England, to retard this Match which was now drawing to a Conclusion, calls home Lenox and the Lord Darby his Son, as her Subjects, according to the Tenour of the Licence granted by her; the Father modestly excused himself by Letters; the Son humbly requests her Majesty not to oppose his Honour and Advancement, and represents it as probable, that he may by this means be capable of doing some Service to England, his Native Country; and makes a frank and generous Profession of his Esteem for the Queen of Scots, above all other Persons whatever; who in Requital of it, soon after confer'd on him the Honor of Knighthood, and the Titles of Baron of Ardmanock, Earl of Ross, and Duke of Rothsay. And five Months after his Arrival in Scotland, she advanced him to her Royal Bed, by the Consent of most of the Nobility; and had him proclaim'd King: But Murray, who had been all this while plotting to serve his own ambitious Ends, and under the fine Cover of Religion, had drawn to his Party the Duke of Chastel-Herault; was much offended at the Match: And others upon it broke out into an open Rebellion, making these Queries among themselves; Whether a Papist might be lawfully made their King? Whether the Queen of Scotland was at liberty to make her own Choice? Whether the States of the Realm might not impose one merely by their own Authority?

The Queen of England, who was very well acquainted with the Modesty and good Temper of Darby, and the sincere and honest Inclinations of his Father, was so far from being uneasy at the Matter, that she really pitied her Kinsman and the young Queen, who had to do with a boisterous kind of People, so long exempt from the Discipline of Kingly Government, that they would now hardly bend their Necks to the Royal Yoke. And she was now totally freed from all Jealousie or Apprehension on that side, when she saw the Queen, her Rival, rather sink than advance in Power, by so mean an Alliance, when she had likewise the Lord Darby's Mother in her own Hands, and foresaw that this would raise great Commotions in Scotland, a Thing which very soon after happen'd: For, some of the Peers of Scotland, the chief of whom were Murray and Hamilton, slighting the Match; the one, because 'twas carry'd on without the Queen of England's Consent; the other, out of Envy to the House of Lenox; but both under a Religious Pretext; set up their Standards in order to break it off: so that the Queen was obliged to raise some Forces, to solemnize her Wedding with the more Security. And so briskly did she and her Husband prosecute the Rebels, that they were driven into England, before the Succours promis'd from thence could come to their Assistance. The Queen of England granted to Murray underhand a Retreat in her Kingdom, as being a Person well inclined to the English; and sent him secret Supplies of Money by the Earl of Bedford, till his Return into Scotland; which, as we shall shew, happen'd to be the next day, after David Rizo was slain. The Causes of the Queen's harbouring Murray and the Scottish Rebels, in England, were these: Because the Queen of Scots had protected Taxley, Standon and Walsh, English Fugitives into Scotland, and Oneal also, an Irishman; and had conspired with the Pope, against the English; and had not done Justice upon the Pirates, &c.

The Marriage of the Queen of Scots being now over, those who were for the real Advancement of the Protestant Interest, thought nothing could better or more effectually promote that End, than if Queen Elizabeth would be now pleas'd to think of marrying in earnest, and by that means defeat the Hopes the Queen of Scots might harbour, as to the Succession. And very seasonably for that purpose did the Emperour Maximilian II. make honourable Proposals of a Match

Match with his Brother Charles, by Adam Smir- corite, his Ambassador. About which time there arose (for what Reason, unless on the Score of this Marriage, is hard to guess at) very great Heats at Court, between the Earl of Suffex, who was a Friend to the Match, and Leicester, who out of different Hopes and Views, privately oppos'd it: (So natural is it for Men advanced above their Pretensions, to entertain boundless and extravagant Hopes; tho' Suffex was highly to blame for upbraiding the other as an upstart Nobleman; who (as he used to say by way of Reflexion) had but two Ancestors to boast of, his Father and Grand-father; and both of them Traitors to their Country.) Hereupon the Court was divided into Parties and Factions;
and the Earls, whenever they went abroad, carry'd great Retinues of Servants with Swords and Bucklers, with iron Pikes pointing out at the Bosses (according to the then Mode) as if they resolv'd to have a Trial of Skill for't. But after some Days had pass'd, the Queen reconciled 'em, or rather occasion'd 'em to smother their Refe-nements. As for the Feuds of the Nobility, and that common Motto [Divide & impera] now us'd as a Mock-Phrase, the Queen utterly condemn'd them; as being of opinion, that the Force of Authority lay very much in the ready Inclinations of such as were to obey: However, she took some kind of Delight, and made some Use too, of the little Piques and Jealousies which sometimes happen'd among her Women.

In the mean time, she had not so far discarded from her Thoughts the Affairs of Scotland,
but within a Month or two after the Consummation of the Marriage, she sent into Scotland, Tamworth, a Gentleman of her Privy-Chamber, to put the Queen of Scots in mind, not to break
the Peace, and to expostulate with her the Business of her hasty Match, with a Native of En- gland, and a Subject, without her Approbation;
and to demand withal, the Return of Lenox and the Lord Darby, his Son, into England, according to the Tenour of the Treaty; as likewise, that Murray should be receiv'd into Favour. She having receiv'd private Notice of the Matter, gave the Ambassador no Audience; but promis'd, by Articles in writing, on the Word of a Prince, that neither she nor her Husband would attempt any thing prejudicial to the Queen of England, her lawful Heirs, or the Tranquillity of the Kingdom; either by harbouring Fugitives, making foreign Treaties, or by any other means whatever; yea, that they should be ready to contract such an Alliance with the Queen and Kingdom of England, as might make for the Safety and Honor of both Nations: That they would make no Innovations in the Religion, Laws or Liberties of England, if ever the Crown should come to their Share: But all this on condition, the Queen would stand bound by the same good Intentions, to Herself and Husband, and would, by Act of Parliament, establish the Succession in her Person and lawful Issue, and, in default thereof, in Margaret Countess of Le- nox, her Husband's Mother, and her lawful Heirs. As for other Matters, she had acquainted the Queen with her Marriage with the Lord Darby, as soon as she had resolv'd to marry him, but that she had receiv'd no Answer: That she had answer'd her Majesty's Demands too, foras-much as she had not accepted a Foreigner, but an English, and one of the highest Extraction, and the most worthy of her good Affections of any in all Britain. That it seem'd strange to her, she might not enjoy the Company of one, whom God and the Laws had made so entirely her own,

and be deny'd the Liberty of keeping Lenox at home, who was a Native Earl of Scotland. As for Murray, whom she had found her profess'd Enemy, she earnestly requested her to leave her Subjects at her own Disposal; since she pretended not to interpose, in the Cases of English Subjects. With this Answer Tamworth return'd, his Reception having been, in his Judgment, much beneath his Character; for being a forward and talkative Man, he had aspers'd the Queen of Scots with several reflecting Speeches, and re-fus'd to give her Husband the Title of King.

About this Time, there were some lucky Emergencies, that tended much to the Honor of Queen Elizabeth: For the Fame and Opinion of her Vertue, had oblig'd Cecily, Sister of Errik Cecily
King of Swethland, and Wife of Christopher Mar- quels of Baden, to undertake a Journey from the Mar- farthest Parts of the North, through Germany, on quels purpose to make her a Visit; tho' at the same Baden time she was big with Child. The Queen gave comes to an honorable Entertainment both to her and her England Husband, assign'd her a yearly Pension, and stood God-mother to her Son, whom she christ-ned Edward-Fortunatus. And Donall Mac-carty Mac-carty
More, an Irish Lord of Note, deliver'd a very More large Estate to the Queen, on his Knees; on More

Death of Sir Tho.
Chaloner.

In the middle of October, this same Year, died Sir Thomas Chaloner, soon after his Return from his Embassy in Spain; a Man of Eminence, who was born at London, and educated at Cambridge, and very well qualify'd, both as to Arts and Arms. When he was young, he serv'd under Charles V. in the Expedition of Algier; where he suffer'd Shipwreck, and having swam as long as his Arms and Legs would give him leave, at length he caught hold of a Cable with his teeth, and so escaped, tho' with the Loss of some of them. In the Reign of Edward VI. he acquitted himself with so much Bravery, at Musselborough-Field, that he was Knighted by the Duke of Somerset. In Queen Elizabeth's Reign, he went on an honourable Embassy, to the Emperor Ferdinand, and remain'd in that quality almost Four Years; where he wrote Five elegant Books of Poems, De Republica Anglorum instauranda, whilst (as he phras'd it) he liv'd Hyeme in furno, aestate in horreo, i. e. In Winter in a Stove, in Summer in a Barn. He was bury'd in S. Paul's Church in London, and had a Funeral answerable to his Worth, at which Cecil attended as chief Mourner: For, his Son Thomas, who was afterward Governor to Henry Prince of Wales, was not then advanced to Man's Estate.

Mother; Henry Champenoun, Philip Butshide, Richard Greenville, William Gorges, Thomas Cotton, and others.

In June following, was the Queen of Scots, to the perpetual Advantage of all Britain, happily brought to bed of her Son James, (since King of Great Britain) of which she soon after inform'd the Queen of England, by James Melvin. The Queen, tho' she secretly envy'd her Rival the Honor of being a Mother before her, yet did she dispatch away Sir Henry Killigrew, to congratulate with her upon her safe Delivery, and the Birth of a Son; and to caution her withal, not to favour any longer Shan-Oneal, who was then in Rebellion in Ireland; nor to harbour Christopher Rokesby, who had fled from England: As likewise to punish some Rapparees, who infested the Frontiers.

Queen Elizabeth, as she was now taking her Progress for Recreation, to shew herself as favorable to the Muses at Oxford, as she had done at Cambridge already, made a Visit to that University; where she receiv'd a magnificent Welcome, and stay'd Seven Days; being extremely delighted with the Pleasantness of the Place, the Beauty of the Colleges, and the Wit and Learning of the Students, who diverted her Majesty a great part of the Night, with Plays; and spent the Day in graver Exercises: For which she return'd 'em her Thanks in a Latin Speech, and so took of them and the Place a most gracious Farewel.

As soon as she return'd to London, the Parliament met, (and a very full one) the First of November, being the Day appointed for their Meeting: And after the Passing of a Bill or two, they began a close Debate about the Succession; inasmuch as the Queen seem'd to have made a Vow of Virginity, having never in eight Years time, entertain'd a serious Thought of Marriage; whereas the Papists, on the one hand, were big with the Hopes of finding it fix'd in the Queen of Scots, who had now born a Son; and the Protestants, on the other hand, purpos'd to themselves, some one Person, some another, as they were severally inclined; and every one (according to the Degree of his Respect for his Religion, and its Security) foreboded sad and troublesome Times, should the Queen die without settling the Point of the Succession. Nay, they broke out at length into that Heat and Clamour, as roundly to tax the Queen with a Disregard of her Country and Posterity; defamed Cecil with slanderous Libels, as a pernicious Counsellor, and curs'd Huic the Queen's Physician, as having dissuaded the Queen from marrying, on Pretence of some Impediment and Defect in her. The Earls of Pembroke and Leicester did likewise openly, and the Duke of Norfolk with more Caution, profess it their Opinion, that the Queen ought to be obliged to a Husband, or a Successor be declared by Act of Parliament, even against the Queen's Will: But they soon made their Submission, and obtain'd their Pardon.

Yet they and the rest of the Upper-House being very solicitous on the matter of a Successor, besought the Queen, by their Speaker, the Lord Bacon, according to the Duty they ow'd to God, their Allegiance to their Prince, and Love to their Country, 'That since at present they found themselves Blessed by her Influence, with all the Advantages of Peace, Justice and Clemency, she would provide them a lasting continuance thereof: But this they affirm'd could never be their Fortune till she pleas'd to Marry, and fix the Succession. They therefore humbly intreat and beseech her in the first place to make her Choice how, where and when she shall think fit,

The Ninth Year of her Reign.

The Beginning of this Year, Charles IX. King of France, sent Ramboulet into England, to compliment the Queen with the Privilege of conferring the Order of the Cockle-shell of S. Michael, on what two Noblemen she thought fit. She made choice of the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Leicester; of Leicester, as her Favourite; of Norfolk, as a Person of Honor of the first Rank.

Leicester
& Norfolk made Knights
of the French Order of
S. Michael.

These Persons Ramboulet install'd at the Queens Court at Westminster, after that in the King his Master's Room, he had taken his Place amongst the Knights of S. George, at Windsor. This French Order the Queen held as a great Honor; because she had not remember'd any Englishman to be elected into it, besides her Father Henry VIII. her Brother King Edward VI. and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk: And therefore she could not but appear greatly concern'd, as she was a true Esteemer of Honor, to find it at length profited and sunk so low, that any Man, without Distinction, might be created Knight of it; nor was she so tender of Punctilio's, as not to have at least an equal Regard to the Good and Welfare of her Subjects; for whereas the Unseasonableness of the Weather gave some Cause to apprehend a Dearth, she not only forbade the Transportation of Grain out of the Kingdom; but took care for the Importing of vast Quantities thereof.

Queen's Care, when a Dearth
was apprehended.

In the mean time, Henry Earl of Arundel, a Peer of the greatest Interest among the Nobility, after the Expence of a vast Treasure, on the vain Hopes of enjoying the Queen; and those Expectations being now defeated, (Leicester growing apace in the Queen's Favour, and his Interest at Court declining as fast) got leave, under colour of mending his Health, but in reality to give himself some Diversion, under his Disappointment, to depart the Kingdom. But others of the English Nation, who conceiv'd themselves framed by Nature for Arms, not Idleness; went into Hungary, to pursue the War against the Turk, at the same time that Gentlemen from all Parts of Europe, upon the Rumor thereof, flock'd thither. Among whom, the chief Persons were, Sir John Smith Cousin-German to K. Edward VI. and Son to the Sister of Jane Seymour, the King's 1566. Ann. 9. fit, and so to bless the Kingdom with the firmest Supports thereof, the Heirs of her Body. And that she would likewise agree with her Parliament, to determine and appoint a Successor in case she or her Children (which God forbid) should die without Issue. They profess'd they had several Reasons for making this so importunate Request, viz. The fresh Apprehensions every Body was seiz'd with upon the ill State of her Majesty's Health: The Occasion that presented, when the Parliament was now sitting, and ready to Debate that Point with the utmost Application: The Terror she would by this means strike into her Enemies; and the immortal Joy she would kindle in the Breasts of all her Subjects. They applaud the Actions of her Predecessors, who in the same Instance had made wise Provisions for their Posterity, and condemn'd that Saying of Pyrrhus, who resolv'd to leave the Kingdom to him that had the sharpest Sword. Moreover, they humbly Represented, what a Labyrinth of Miseries this unhappy Kingdom would needs be plung'd in, should she depart this Life without appointing a Successor: That this would occasion such Civil Wars and Commotions, as would leave the Conquerors in possession of nothing but Misery. That she was going the way to Destroy Religion, Eclipse the Laws, and stop the Course of Justice, were it so that she left the Nation without a Prince, who is the very Soul of the Law, and that the Kingdom must needs become a Prey to a foreign Power. Other Calamities they reckon up, and urge them under all possible Aggravations, which must needs oppress the whole Nation, should it so happen that she should die without Issue. Nor did they omit to press her by Advices, Precepts and Examples, borrowed from Scripture itself.

The Commons press the Queen in a rougher manner.

But these things were not manag'd with the same Temperance in the Lower-House; for Bell and Monson, great Lawyers, with Dutton, Paul Wentworth, and others, grated hard on the Queen's Royal Prerogative; and maintain'd amongst other Points, That Kings are bound to appoint a Successor: That the Affection of the Subject is the most impregnable Bulwark and Support of the Prince; but that Princes can no otherwise gain this Affection, than by providing for the Welfare of their Subjects, both whilst they live and after their death; which can by no means be done, but where 'tis certainly known who shall succeed to the Throne. That the Queen, by not appointing a Successor, did at once provoke the Wrath of God, and alienate the Hearts of her People; whereas, would she possess the Affections of her Subjects, and the Favour of God, and live for ever in the Remembrance of her People, she must of course nominate a Successor: If not, she would be rather a Step-mother of her Country, or something worse, than the Nursing-mother thereof, as being seemingly desirous that England, which liv'd as it were in her, should rather expire with than survive or outlast her. That none but timorous Princes, or such as were hated by their People, or fainthearted Women, did ever stand in fear of their Successors; nor can that Prince with any reason apprehend Dangers from a Successor, who is fortify'd and secur'd by the Love and Duty of his Subjects.

The Queen presents this Address.

The Queen heard all this with no little Regret, tho' for a while she either overlook'd it, or at least seem'd so to do: For she knew by Experience what the Hazard would be in nominating a Successor; forasmuch as in Queen Mary's Reign many of the Nobility and Commons had already withdrawn their Loyal Respects, and fix'd their Eye on her as the Person to succeed. Whatever was done in the Queen's Bed-Chamber was presently brought to her; and Wiat and others, Men greedy of Innovations, had plotted against the Queen, to advance her to the Throne even against her knowledge, and without the least consent from her. She knew very well, that the way to curb the hopes of Competitors, and keep them within bounds of Duty, was to keep every one of them in suspense, and not declare a Successor at all. She was not ignorant, that Sons had been so fired with an ambitious desire of Governing, as to take up Arms against their Parents; nor could it be thought that remoter Kindred should act with more Duty and Affection. She had likewise collected from her own Conversation with Books, and sometimes took occasion to hint it in Discourse, That there had seldom been any Designation of Successors in a Collateral-Line. That Lewis of Orleans, Successor of Charles V. and Francis of Angoulême, Successor to Lewis in the Throne of France, were never Declared, and they succeeded for all that without the least disturbance. That the Declaration of Successors in England, had generally prov'd the Ruin of the Persons so Declar'd: For Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, appointed Heir of the Crown by King Richard II. was in a little time cut off. His Son Edmund, on the same account, suffer'd twenty Years Imprisonment in Ireland, and there died. John de la Pool, Earl of Lincoln, design'd Successor by Richard III. after his Son's death, was always look'd on with a jealous Eye by Henry VII. and in conclusion was slain in the Field, whilst he attempted to bring about his Designs; and afterward his Brother Edmund was beheaded under Henry VIII. But these things may perhaps appear somewhat foreign to the matter.

Now there being some still who did not forbear to insist with too much Heat and Insolence on the Points already mention'd; and to back their Pertness with Invectives and Abuses, the Queen commanded Thirty to be call'd out of each House and make their Appearance before her. These she endeavour'd to smooth and qualify by the most obliging Expressions; and after a Reproof that carry'd Sweetness mix'd with Majesty, she diverted them from their Resolution, and promis'd them to manage things not only with the Care of a Prince, but the Tenderness of a Parent. And whereas the House had offer'd greater Subsidies than usual, on condition she would declare a Successor, she utterly refus'd those extraordinary Grants, accepted a smaller Sum, and with a Commendation of their Respects to her, abated the fourth Payment of the Supply already Granted, saying, That Money in her Subject's Purse, was as good as in her own Exchequer.

She pacifies these Heats by kind Words.

The Queen remits part of her Subsidy;

The last Day of this Session she made a short Speech to both Houses, the Abridgment of which take as follows. "Whereas the Words of Principles are observ'd to make the deepest Impression on the Minds of their Subjects, I have this therefore to offer to you. I have been always a most unaffected lover of Truth, and have ever pleas'd myself with the Thoughts that you are so too. But it seems I have been deceiv'd: For I had the Leisure to observe this Session, that Hypocrisy has walk'd it's Rounds under the Mask of Liberty and Succession; and there have not been wanting some among themselves who have stickled for the full Grant or the absolute Refusal of the Privilege to Dispute the Point of the Succession, and its Establishment. Had this been granted, these Persons had been gratify'd so far and makes a tart Speech to the two Houses.

1566. Ann. 9. "far as even to occasion their Triumphs. And should we have denied, they had been provoked to draw upon us the general Odium of our People, which our worst Enemies have never yet been able to do. But their Politicks were ill tim'd, their Counsels precipitate, and they were not quick-sighted enough to look into the Event: However they have by this means given us an hint to distinguish our Friends from our Foes. 'Tis easie to observe, that this entire Assembly is made up of four sorts of Men. Some have been Contrivers and Abettors, some Actors and Advisers in these Affairs, whereas a third sort has been cajol'd and decoy'd by these fair Speeches, whilst a fourth sort again have said nothing, but stood amaz'd at such bold Freedoms, and these certainly are the least to blame. Can you imagine, Gentlemen, that as to the Affair of the Succession, your Safety and Security is no way consulted or provided for? Or, that we design to inroach on your Liberties? That be still as far from us as it has yet been ever remov'd from our Thoughts. We cannot deny indeed but that we thought it necessary to stop you when you were just upon the brink of the Precipice. There is a time for every thing: 'Tis possible you may have a wiser Prince after me, but you will hardly enjoy one more truly Affectionate to you. For our part, we cannot tell whether we shall ever have the Opportunity of meeting such a Parliament again; 'tis however your best course not to try Experiments on the Patience of your Prince; tho' we do leave with you this Assurance, That we have still a favourable Opinion of the greater part of you, and continue to every one the same place in our good Will and Affection.

All is quiet and made up again. Thus did the Discretion of a Woman lay asleep all these Commotions; which were in time so settled and compos'd, that very few but Malecontents and Traytors appear'd very solicitous in the business of a Successor. Certain it is, that most Men, whatever they may pretend, have no other Regards, as to National Affairs, but what relate to their own Peculiar. Nevertheless, that the Succession might not lie altogether in the dark, nor the Person whose undoubted Claim the Queen asserted, she cast Thornton, who was then a Reader of Law in Lincolns-Inn, into the Tower, upon the Queen of Scots Complaint, that he had call'd her Title in question.

Queen openly favours the Queen of Scots Title.

During this Parliament, besides other things for the publick Advantage, it was unanimously declar'd, That the Election, Consecration, Confirmation and Instalment of the Archbishops and Bishops of England (which some had abusively call'd in question) were Lawful; and that the said Bishops were Elected and Consecrated duly, and according to the Acts and Laws of the Land.

And it was likewise Enacted, That both they, and all such as should be hereafter Consecrated, were and should be esteem'd as duly and lawfully Consecrated, notwithstanding any former Law or Canon to the contrary. For the Papists had traduc'd their Ordination as false and counterfeit; perhaps because the Uction, the Ring, the Crozier-Staff, and the Benediction were omitted, and for their not being duly Ordained by three Bishops, who were able to derive their Ordination, by a regular Succession, down from the Apostles and our Saviour's time; ††† which notwithstanding they might really have done, (as appear'd by the Records) having receiv'd their Ordination, with the Solemnity of Prayers, Invocation of the Holy Ghost, the Imposition of three Bishops Hands, the Devotion of a Sermon, and the Celebration of the Lord's-Supper. About this time there were Restraints laid, and proper Punishment inflicted on some riotous People, who Mobb'd and Insulted in the open Streets those Reformers commonly call'd Promoters.

And now came on likewise the Day appointed for the Baptism of the young Prince of Scotland; for whom the Queen of England being importun'd to stand Godmother, she sent the Earl of Bedford with a Font of Gold for a Present, and expressly commanded, that neither he, nor any of his Retinue, should give the Title of King to the Lord Darby. This Solemnity being over, the Earl of Bedford, according to his Instructions, transacted with the Q. of Scots a Reconciliation between herself and her Husband, (for it seems there were some Enemies on both sides, who had used ill Arts to impair that Friendship and good Agreement that had been between them) and likewise a Confirmation of the Treaty of Edinburgh. The latter she flatly refus'd, alledging there was somewhat in the Treaty which might prejudice her and her Children's Claim to the Crown of England. Yet she promis'd to send Commissioners to England to Treat of that Matter with some Alteration, viz. That she should disuse the Arms and Title of England so long as Q. Elizabeth and her Heirs should live; as if she conceiv'd herself engag'd by the Treaty to renounce them for good and all. These Commissioners were likewise to inform her how basely she was impos'd on by the mischievous Arts of those who made an ill use of the Openness and Good-nature of her Husband. She began now to grow Weak and out of Order, and commended the young Prince, her Son, to the Protection of Queen Elizabeth, by several Letters, wherein (to use her own Words) Tho' she knew herself to be the undoubted Heir of England after the Queen, and that there were many Attempts used to invalidate her Title, she promis'd however no longer to insist on that Point; but to assist and serve her with the truest Friendship against all Persons whatsoever.

The E. of Bedford goes Embassador to Scotland on the Chriftening of the young Prince.

The Tenth Year of her Reign.

But before the return of the Commissioners from the Queen of Scots, and a Month or two after the Solemnity of the Christning, the Queen's Husband was by some bloody and barbarous Hands murder'd in his Bed at Midnight, being then in the 21st Year of his Age; and to make the Surprize the greater, the House was blown up by Gunpowder, and his Body cast out into the Orchard. This was soon nois'd all Britain over, and the Fact cast upon Morton, Murray, and others of the Conspiracy; but they were so insolent as to lay it at the Queen's door. What George Buchanan has related of this Patiage, both in his History, and a little Book of his, entitled, The Detection, every one may learn from the Books themselves. But forasmuch as Murray's Gold may be presum'd to have set a Byass on his Temper, and to have made him as being Partial enough to have his Writings condemn'd as spurious and false by the States of Scotland, upon whose Credit one may more safely depend; and he himself having (as I am inform'd) often blam'd himself with Tears in the King's Presence, to whom he was Tutor, for having employ'd his Pen in too virulent a strain against that excellent Princess; and having wish'd on his Death-bed that he might live so long as to recal the truth of that Fact, and wipe off those Aspersions he had rashly and unjustly fix'd on her Credit, if his Age would give him leave, and People not take him for a Dotard. Give me leave on this account to offer on the other side as much as I can learn of the whole Story, and that without the least tincture of Prejudice or Favour, and according to the best Informations I can borrow from those Writings which came out at that time, (but which in favour to Murray and ill-will to the Queen, were suppress'd in England) as well as from the Letters of Ambassadors and other Persons of Credit and Consideration.

Digression
to the affairs of Scotland.

James,
Prior of St. Andrew, aims at the Government of Scotland.

In the Year 1558, at the time of the Marriage of Francis the Dauphin and Mary Queen of Scots, James the Queen's base Brother, commonly called the Prior of St. Andrews, (as being Head of the Religious Order of the Metropolitane Church of that name) being out of humour with so grave a Title, press'd hard for some more splendid Character of Honour and Distinction; which the Queen refusing him, by the advice of the Guises, her Uncles, he return'd to Scotland in a Discontent, and under the specious colour of Reformation and Liberty, began to disturb the publick Peace; and so far he went, as in a Juncto of Confederates to alter the Face of Religion without the Queen's knowledge, and to remove the French out of Scotland by the help of English Forces he had call'd in for that purpose. When Francis the French King was dead, he hasten'd to his Sister in France, and endeavour'd to clear himself of all that had been done in Scotland in prejudice to her Honour or Interest, and solemnly promis'd and gave his Oath, to do her all the good Offices a Sister might reasonably expect from a Brother. And being in hopes that the Queen, who had been Bred up from a Child in the Pleasures of France, would hardly return into Scotland, he manag'd the Matter with the Guises to have some Scottish Nobleman made Regent of that Kingdom, and made broad signs that none was fitter than himself. But when he was sent back into Scotland with a bare Commission, empowering the States of the Realm to Meet and Consult about the Publick Good, he was so nettled at the Disappointment, that he return'd by the way of England, and insinuated to the English, that if they desir'd the Church should flourish in Scotland, Peace be preserv'd at Home, and the Queen's Person safe and secure, they ought to use all possible Endeavours to prevent the Queen of Scots passage into Scotland. She however passing by the English Ships in hazy Weather, arriv'd safely in Scotland, and was still so kind to her Brother, as in a manner to place the entire Administration on his Hands. Yet was not this enough to clip or cure his Ambition, which he made every day and every way fresh discoveries of: For he could not forbear perpetually complaining to his Friends, that the Warlike Nation of the Scots as well as the English, was Rul'd by the Distaff: And he often quoted Knox, whom he esteem'd beyond a primitive Father, for this scrap of Politicks, That Kingdoms are the claim of Virtue, not Extraction: That Women were never made to Govern Kingdoms; and, That they were mere Monsters on a Throne. He set his Friends likewise to persuade the Queen to depute four Persons of the Royal Family of the Stuarts to succeed one another in the Kingdom, provided she should die without Issue, without distinguishing whether they were legitimate or not; hoping, no doubt, that he should make one in the number, as being the King's Son, tho' by the wrong way. But the Queen wisely considering, that such a Constitution was repugnant to the Laws of the Land, that 'twould be a prejudice to the right Heirs, a very ill Precedent, and of dangerous Consequence to the Substitutes themselves, as well as a Bar to her own Marriage, gently answer'd, That she would take some time to advise with the States about an Affair of that Importance. And to shew her Generosity to her Brother, she conferr'd on him the Earldom of Mar, and afterward of Murray, (because the former Title was contested) and prefer'd him to an honourable and advantageous Match, not knowing at the same time that he aim'd at the Regency, and gave it out, that he was the true and lawful Son of King James V. To clear his way to the Throne, he us'd his Interest with the Queen to crush the Noble Family of the Gordons, who had a great many powerful Adherents; so that he was jealous of this Family on his own account, and in regard of the reform'd Religion. Hamilton, the Duke of Castle-Hevaul, (the next reputed Heir to the Crown) he procur'd to be Banish'd the Court; and Arran, his Son, to be Imprison'd; Bothwell he Banish'd into England, and all that he thought capable of standing in his way, he stript of their Titles and Preferments; nay the Queen herself seem'd to be under the Discipline of a Pupil; and his great Art and Care was to keep her from so much as thinking of an Husband. And no sooner did he perceive that the Emperor Court'd her for his Brother on the one hand, and on the other the King of Spain for his Son, but he strenuously endeavour'd to divert her from both Matches, alledging, That a foreign Prince was really, and would be thought incompatible with the Liberties of Scotland; and that in former Times, whenever the Throne devolv'd on a Female Heir, they had taken no Husbands but of the same Blood and Nation. But when he found it was the general Desire of her Subjects that she should Marry, and learnt by Notwithstanding, when he found the Queen had a real Passion for the Lord Darly, and grew more indifferent to him, he repented his Project, and tamper'd with Queen Elizabeth to cross the Match.

Disturbs her Nuptials. The Marriage being now Consummated, and the Lord Darly declar'd King, and the Queen revoking at the same time the Grants made to him and others in her Minority, contrary to Law, he with others join'd in a Rebellion against the King and Queen, under pretence, that the new King was no Friend to the Protestant Religion, and had marry'd without the Queen of England's consent. But without putting it to the hazard of a Battel, he fled to England, and there despairing to find any Abettors, he transacted with Morton, a Man of Depth and Subtilty, and his intimate Friend and Assistant, that seeing the Marriage could not be dissannull'd, yet some Method might be contriv'd to dissolve that closer Union by which their Affections were rivetted one to another. Nor was it long before they found a very seasonable Opportunity; for there happening some Difference between them, the Queen, to keep down the Aspirings of the young Prince, and preserve the Royal Prerogative to herself, began to place her Husband's Name last in all publick Acts, and to leave it out in all the Stamp for Coin. Morton being a Man unluckily Dexterous in fomenting Divisions, insinuates himself, by Flattery and Wheedles, into the King's good Opinion; and persuades him to wear the Crown of Scotland against the Queen's will, and to get rid of a Woman's Government, since 'twas the business of that Sex to Obey, not to Rule.

He endeavours to set the K. and Q. at odds. By this Advice, he had hopes not only of alienating the Queen, but the Peers and Commons too, from the King. And to work the Effect on the Queen in the first place, he makes use of several slanderous Reports to move the King to take away the Life of David Rizo, a Piemontois, left he, by the Foresight he was Master of, might give a check to their Designs. (This Rizo was a Musician, and came the Year before into Scotland with Morett the Ambassador; and for his exquisite Skill was entertain'd at Court; and so far got the Queen's Favour, as to be employ'd in writing French Letters; and in her Secretary's absence, did in great measure supply his room). And then, to inflame the Queen the more, he persuades the King to assist in Person at the Murder, with Reuven, and the rest of the Assassins, who, together with him, breaking, at Supper-time, into the Queen's Privy Chamber, while she was sitting with the Countess of Argyle, Assaulted Rizo as he was Eating at a Side-board of something from the Queen's Table; (as the Waiters of the Privy-Chamber usually do) and all this in the Queen's Eye, who was big with Child, and had like to have Miscarry'd for Fear; afterwards they clapt a Pistol to his Breast. This done, they dragg'd him into a Lobby hard by, and murder'd him in a most barbarous manner, locking the Queen up in her Privy Chamber, whilst in the mean time Morton guarded all the Avenues.

David Rizo murdered. This Murder was committed the Day before Murray was, according to his Summons, to make Appearance, and answer to the Charge of Rebellion before the Parliament. He appear'd the very next Day, when he was least expected; and such was the Confusion of Affairs, that no Evidence came at that time against him; information that it look'd as if Rizo's Murder had been dispatch'd the sooner in regard to Murray's Indemnity. Nevertheless the Queen, at her Husband's Requests gave a courteous Reception, and seem'd to place an unsuspected Confidence in him. But the King beginning by this time to reflect on the foulness of the late horrid Fact, and perceiving the Queen did very much regret it, was himself much concern'd thereat, begg'd her Favour and Pardon with Tears in his Eyes, and freely own'd, that Murray and Morton had over-persuaded him to the Murder. And from that time he conceiv'd so mortal an Aversion to Murray, (for as for Morton, Reuven and others, they were fled to England with Murray's Letters of Recommendation to the Earl of Bedford) that he was contriving to remove him out of the way. But being not Old and Wise enough to conceal his Thoughts, or Courageous enough to put them in execution, he was so much a Courtier and kind Husband, as to tell his Wife, the Queen, that it would be for the Interest of the Kingdom, and the Security of the Royal Family, to have Murray made away. She abhorring the very Motion, fell to dissuade him by Threats from such a Design, hoping that they might be reconcil'd again. But the King being vex'd to find the Bastard stand so well in the Queen's Favour, unadvisedly communicated the same Design to others. When this came to Murray's Ears, he begins to Plot upon the King's Life; tho' covertly, and under the mask of a most officious Allegiance, and makes use of Morton's Counsel, tho' absent, to this purpose.

'Twas the opinion of these two Persons, that the best method to be taken, was to draw off the Queen's Affection from the King, it being not well knit since the late Breach, and that Bothwell ought to be engag'd in the Design, who was lately reconcil'd to Murray, and in so good Terms with the Queen, that 'twas the easier to flatter him with the hope of a Divorce from his Wife, and the Possession of the Queen, when she was a Widow. To bring this about, and to abet and skreen him from all Opposition, they oblig'd themselves under their Hands and Seals; imagining that if the Project took effect, they could by one and the same Act, murder the King, bespatter and lessen the Queen among Persons of all Ranks, suppress Bothwell, and get the entire Regency into their own Hands. Bothwell, being a lewd and ill-principled Man, and mad as well as blind with Ambition, accepted the Terms, and villainously acted the Murder, whilst Murray had withdrawn himself to a Country Seat he had at some distance, not above fifteen Hours before, not only to avoid suspicion, but to assist the Complotters to the better advantage, and derive the Odium and Jealousie of the Fact upon the Queen. No sooner was he return'd to Court, but he and the rest of the Juncto recommended Bothwell to the Queen for an Husband, as not altogether unworthy of her Regard, on the score of his Family and good Services against the English, and his singular Fidelity withal. They insinuated farther, That as she was a single and solitary Person, she was the less capable of stemming the Tide of Tumult and Sedition, of preventing the treacherous Designs of her Enemies, and sustaining the weight of publick Affairs: That therefore she would do well to admit him to her Bed, and Board, and Council-Table; who had the Will, the Power, and the Courage to Enterprize any thing. And so powerfully did the Poison work, that she, being scar'd out of her Judgment by two such Tragical Murders, and having in her Thoughts the fresh impresson of Bothwell's Fidelity and Services to herself and her Mother, was prevail'd on to give her Consent; but with this Proviso, that her young Son should be every way secur'd, and Bothwell legally acquitted of the Murder, and from his former Marriage.

A Protest concerning the Murder of the Lord Darnley.

It may not be amiss to insert here the publick Protestation made by George Earl of Huntley, and the Earl of Argyle, relating to this Matter; of which I myself have seen a Copy, under their own Hands, directed to Queen Elizabeth. 'Forasmuch as Murray and others, to conceal their Rebellion against the Queen, whose Authority they would fain usurp, do openly calumniate her, as guilty of the Murder of her Husband; we do publickly protest and witness these things following: In the Month of December, 1556. when the Queen lay at Cragmillar, Murray and Lidington acknowledg'd before us, that Morton Lindley and Reuven slew David Rizo, with no other Design, than to save Murray, who was at that very time to be proscribed: That therefore they might not appear ungrateful, they greatly desir'd, that Morton and the rest, that withdrew themselves, on the Murder of Rizo, might be permitted to return: But this, they said, was impossible, unless the Queen were divorced from her Husband; which they promis'd to effect, would we but give our Consent. Afterwards Murray promis'd to me Huntley, that my antient Estate should be restored to me; and that I should be an eternal Favourite with the Persons now abroad, if I would favour the Divorce. Then we apply'd to Bothwell for his Consent; and last of all we address'd the Queen, and Lidington intreated her, in the Name of us all, to reverse the Banishment of Morton, Lindsey, and Reuven. The King's Errors and Mis-carriages, those especially against the Queen, he fail'd not to aggravate with all imaginable Bitterness; and shew'd how much it concern'd the Queen and State, to have a Divorce drawn up; it being impossible for the King and Queen to be safe together in Scotland. She made Answer, she had rather retire for some time into France, till her Husband came to be sensible of his youthful Heats; for she would not willingly have any thing done to the Prejudice of her Son, or her own Dishonour. To this Lidington reply'd, we, who are of your Majesty's Council, will look to that. But I command you, says she, to do nothing that may stick either upon my Honour or Conscience: Let things remain as they are, till God pleases to provide a Remedy: That which you imagine may be for my Good, may possibly have a contrary Effect. To which Lidington answer'd, Please to leave Matters to us, and you shall find we will do nothing unfit, or what the Authority of Parliament shall not well approve of. Hereupon, since the King happen'd to be basely murder'd a few days after, we do, from the real Persuasion of our Conscience, fully and certainly believe, that Murray and Lidington were the Authors, Abettors, and Contrivers of this Regicide, whoever were the Actors. (So far they.)

Bothwell acquitted of the King's Murder.

The great and sole Concern of the Conspirators now was, to get Bothwell clear'd of the Guilt of the King's Murder. A Parliament therefore is call'd on this very Account, and a Proclamation issu'd out, for the Apprehending such as were suspected of the Fact. And whereas Lenox, the deceas'd King's Father, impeach'd Bothwell, as the Regicide, and press'd hard that he might be brought to his Trial in Parliament; this was also granted, and Lenox commanded to appear in two and twenty Days, in order to prosecute the Defendant. On the Day appointed was Bothwell arraign'd, and acquitted by his Judges, and Mor- ton's Management, (the Queen of England not having sent any Instructions to Lenox, who could not appear in the City, where he had so many Enemies, without visible Hazard of his Life.)

This Business thus dispatch'd, the Confederacy so manag'd the matter, as to work up a great part of the Nobility to comply with the Marriage, and to set their Hands to a Writing to that purpose, for fear, if he had sunk from his Hopes, he should have betray'd the whole bloody Secret. This Match with Bothwell (who was created Duke of Orkney, or the Orcades) help'd very much to increase the Suspicion of the Queen's being accessory to the Murder; and this was heightened by several Letters which the Complotters dispers'd and sent about; and they conspir'd, in private Cabals held at Dunkeld, to depose the Queen and destroy Bothwell. Yet Murray, to make himself appear innocent of the whole Intrigue, ask'd the Queen's Leave to go into France, and to remove the least Shadow of Jealousie, recommended his whole Estate to the Care and Management of the Queen and Bothwell.

He had scarce got out of England, when the very same Persons that had acquitted Bothwell of the King's Murder, and gave him their Consent to marry the Queen, under their own Hands; were up in Arms against and ready to seize him: But in truth they gave him secret Notice to provide for himself; and all, lest he should discover the whole Plot, after he was taken; and that they might make this Use of his Flight, to charge the Queen, with the better Face, with the King's Murder. Next they went so far, as to seize on her Person, and treated her in the vilest and most contumelious manner; and allowing her but poor and ordinary Cloathing, they imprison'd her at Loch-Levin, and put her in the Custody of Murray's Mother; who having been James V's Mistress, insulted basely the captiv'd Queen's Misfortune, and made her Brags, that she was the lawful Wife of James V. and that her Son Murray was his legitimate Issue.

As soon as Queen Elizabeth had certain Advices of these things, she was touch'd with so hearty a Resentment of this insufferable Insolence of the Queen her Sister and Neighbour's Subjects, (on whom she would sometimes bestow the Epithets of perfidious, cruel, and ungrateful) that she sent Sir Nicolas Throckmorton into Scotland, to expostulate with the Confederates this rude and inhumane Treatment of their Queen, and to concert Measures for Restoring her to her Liberty and Authority, for Punishing the King's Murderers, and Conveying the young Prince into England, rather than France, for his better Security. What I shall from this time deliver concerning these Matters, during the Stay of Throckmorton in Scotland, you are to take on the Credit of his own Letters, which, without all Doubt, were fair and authentick. Throckmorton found in Scotland a great many inveterate Enemies against the Queen; who refus'd, in plain terms, both him and the French Ambassadors Croc and Villeroy, the Freedom of Access to her: And yet what Measures to take, as to the Queen, they could not agree among themselves. Lidington and some others judg'd it the fittest Course to restore her to her Authority, on these Terms: That the King's Murderers should be punish'd according to Law: That Care should be taken about preserving the Person of the Prince: That Bothwell should be divorc'd from her, and Religion establish'd. Others conceiv'd it would be much better to remove her to England or France, there to remain in perpetual Exile, on condition the French King or the Queen of England would be Guarantees, that she should give up the Government to her Son and some of the Nobility, and 1567. and abdicate the Kingdom. Others were of Opinion, that she should be try'd, and condemn'd to perpetual Confinement; and her Son crown'd in her Room. And others again, That she ought to lose her Crown and her Life together; and this was the Doctrine which Knox and others of that Brotherhood, made the Pulpits ring with.

Throckmorton, on the other side, quoted several Passages out of the Scriptures, to shew the Necessity of obeying the higher Powers; and vigorously maintain'd, That the Queen was subject to no Tribunal, but that of the Judge of Heaven and Earth: That not one Magistrate in Scotland, but carry'd an Authority deriv'd from her; and therefore to be revok'd at her Pleasure. Against this they objected a special Privilege of their Kingdom, and that in extraordinary Emergencies particular Acts must be made; borrowing their Arguments from Buchanan, who about that time, at the Instance of Murray, wrote his pernicious Dialogue, De Jure Regni apud Scotos; wherein he maintains, That the People have the Power of creating and deposing Princes, quite contrary to the Tenour of the History of Scotland. However this did not discourage Throckmorton from asserting the Queen's injur'd Right, and desiring Admission to her; tho' Lidington would sometimes answer, That he must not expect a Freedom which had already been deny'd to the French Envoy: That they must not disoblige the King of France, to gratify the Queen of England, whom they had lately experienced to promote only her own Interests, when, to serve her own Turn, she remov'd the French out of Scotland; and (to give a later Instance) as she gave but a cold Treatment, and a kind of unwilling Protection, to the Scots who had withdrawn themselves, on the score of David Rizzio's Murder: Moreover, That he ought to take Care, his pressing Importunity upon this Head did not urge the Scots to crave Assistance from the French, in Neglect of the English: And by the French Proverb, Il perd le jeu, qui laisse le parti, i. e. He loses the Game, that quits the Side; the English ought not to desert the Scots, their Friends.

After this, they deliver'd to Throckmorton a long Scroll, in form of a Protest, though without any Names subscribed; That the sole Design of putting the Queen under her present Confinement, was to separate her from Bothwell, (for whom she had an Affection, that might prove fatal to the State) till the Heat of two Passions, her Love for him, and her Anger against them, were a little qualify'd and appeas'd: And they desired him to acquiesce in this Answer, till the rest of the Peers were assembl'd. The Queen however was committed to more close and severe Restrictions, after all the Tears she shed, and Intreaties she us'd, for a better Treatment; if not as she was a Queen, yet at least as she was the Daughter of a Crown'd Head, and the Mother of their Prince; a Sight of whom she often requested, but in vain. But (not to insist on every private Affront she suffer'd at their Hands) they at length endeavour'd, by smooth Words, to wheedle her into a Resignation of the Kingdom; and to excuse herself, on the score of Sickness, or the Fatigue of Government; or (as others more politickly advis'd) first to abdicate, and then to get away, when her Guard was less'n'd, and her Confinement relax'd. When these Methods would not take, they began to threaten her with a publick Trial, and to impeach her with the Crimes of Incontinence, Regicide, and Tyranny: Of the last, as she had broken the Laws and Privileges of the Kingdom, viz. those which Randon and D'Oysel had confirm'd in her's and the King of France's Name. At last they so far prevail'd, by threatening her with Death, as to engage her, without being heard, to set her Hand to three Writings: By the first of which, she resign'd the Crown to her Son, who was scarce 13 Months old: The second confer'd the Regency on Murray, during the Minority of her Son: And in the third, these Governors were nominated for the young Prince, (should Murray refuse the Charge) James Duke of Chastel-Herauld, Matthew Earl of Lenox, Gillespie Earl of Argyle, John Earl of Athol, James Earl of Morton, Alexander Earl of Glencarn, and John Earl of Marre. Next, she represented to the Queen of England, by Throckmorton, that she had resign'd upon Force, and sign'd the Instrument by the Persuasion of Throckmorton, who had assur'd her, that a Resignation extorted in Prison, was a real Act of Force; and so, void of itself. But we shall have occasion to touch these Passages more largely, when we come to the Occurrences of the next Year, and the Accusations and Defences of both Parties, before the Delegates commission'd at York.

The fifth day after her Resignation, James, the Queen's young Son, was anointed and crown'd King; and John Knox preach'd the Coronation-Sermon: And the Hamiltons enter'd a Protestation, That it should not prejudice the Duke of Chastel-Herauld's Title to the Succession, in Opposition to the House of Lenox. But Queen Elizabeth order'd Throckmorton not to attend at the Coronation; lest she should be thought to encourage the injurious dethroning of a Prince, by the Presence of her Ambassador. The twentieth day after the Resignation, returns Murray from France into Scotland; and three days after that he waits on the Queen, with some others of the Cabal, charges her with a great Heap of Crimes, and like a holy Confessor as he was, advis'd her to a serious Repentance, and Invocation of the divine Mercy. She then began to lament the Irregularities of her Life past, acknowledged some of the Faults she was charg'd with, excus'd others, and some she extenuated on the account of humane Frailty; but the greatest part she utterly deny'd: She intreated him to undertake the Charge of the Government, in her Son's Name; and beg'd him, with repeated Importunity, to spare her Reputation and her Life. He said, it was not in his Power to grant the last, but that 'twas a Request proper to be made to the Estates of the Realm: But yet, the best way to secure both, would be to take and follow these Advices; 'Not to disturb the Quiet of the King and Kingdom: Not to endeavour an Escape from her Confinement: Not to engage the Queen of England, or the King of France, to make an Invasion upon Scotland; or foment a War at home: And to throw off all Affection for Bothwell, and all Thoughts of a Revenge upon his Enemies.

And now being declar'd Regent, he obliges himself by an Instrument under his hand, not to meddle with the Business of War or Peace, the King's Person and Marriage, or the Queen's Liberty; without the Advice and Consent of the rest of the Association; and he sends Lidington to desire and caution Throckmorton, not to interpose any more on the Queen's behalf. For he and the rest would rather suffer the worst that could happen, than agree to her Enlargement; the Effect of which would be, that she would still caress Bothwell, bring her Son into Danger, and her Country into Trouble, and themselves into Banishment and Disgrace. 'We know, says he, what Harm England can do us by a War: You can ravage our Borders, and we can do as much for yours; and we know as well, that the French will have a better Regard to the antient Treaty between us and them,

But for this, he refus'd to Lignerol the French Ambassador any interview with the Queen till Bothwell was secured; and he added more Weight every Day to the Queen's Sorrows, and Strictness to her Confinement, contrary to his Promise to the French King. Thus far out of Throckmorton's Letters.

Murray causes some of the Rep'cides to be Executed. Shortly after Murray caus'd to be Executed, John Hepburn, Paris a Frenchman, Daglish and some other of Bothwell's Servants, who were present at the King's Murder. But they (quite contrary to his expectation) protested before God and his Angels, that they were inform'd by Bothwell; that Murray and Morton were the chief Agents in the King's Death. The Queen they acquitted from any share in the Fact; as also Bothwell himself, when he was Prisoner in Denmark; attesting several times in his Health, and on his Death-bed, and that with the most solemn Asseverations, that the Queen was in no degree privy to the Regicide. And about fourteen Years after, when Morton was to suffer, he confess'd that Bothwell had tamper'd with him to consent to the Murder; which when he absolutely refus'd, unless he had the Queen's Hand for his Warrant, Bothwell made answer, That this could not be, for it she was not to have the least Intimation of such a Design. Cabal towards the Ambassador, was highly stomach'd both by Queen Elizabeth and the French King, as an Affront to the Royal Prerogative. So that they began to appear for the Hamiltons, who adher'd to the Queen. And Pasquier, the French Ambassador, solicited the Queen of England to attempt her Restoration by force. But she thought it the better method to put a stop to their Trade both with France and England, till she were set at Liberty; and by this means to set the Lords and Commons at odds, who at present seem'd but too firmly united against the Royal Interest. But to adjourn a little from the Affairs of Scotland.

Calais demanded.

Hospital's answer to the demand.

At the end of eight Years, when Calais was, according to the Articles of the Treaty at Cambray, to be restor'd to the English, Sir Tho. Smith was sent into France, with Sir William Winter, Master of the Naval-Stores, and there they demanded, with Sound of Trumpet, and with an Audible Voice, in the French Tongue, before the Gate of Calais next to the Sea, the Town and Territory of Calais, with a proportion of Ammunition, according to the Treaty. And presently was there an Act of this Register'd by a Publick Notary, and certain Merchants of Germany, and others of Holland, were call'd as Witnesses thereto. Some time after, he went to the King at Fossat-Castle, and there he and Sir Henry Norris, Ambassador in Ordinary, made the same Demand again. The King referr'd the Matter to his Council; and Michael Hospital, Chancellor, debated the Case in a grave and form'd Speech to this purpose. 'By the same Right the English demand Calais, they may as well lay claim to Paris; for the one as well as the other was won by Arms, and both were lost the same way. The English plead a new Title to Calais, whereas the Title of the French is of the same date with the Kingdom itself. Altho' the English had it in Possession about Two hundred and thirty Years, yet the Right was as much in the Kings of France, as were the Dukedoms of Guiene and Normandy, which the English detain'd a long time by force. Now Calais with those Dukedoms the French had not purchas'd, but recover'd by the Sword. The prescription of Time by them pretended, is of no Consideration among Princes, but the Right always takes place, and by the Law of the 12 Tables, the Authority remains perpetual against an Enemy. The English use great Precautions in making of Treaties, and yet in the late one at Trois, after they had commenc'd a War for the sake of Calais principally, yet Calais was not so much as mention'd; so that they seem'd to have quite abandon'd their Pretensions to that place. The Treaty of Trois was but a renewing of a former Treaty; so that the same League was but made twice over; nor is that Clause, relating to the Reservation of Rights, any manner of Objection, because it concerns merely small and insignificant matters, whereas this of Calais is of the weightiest Consideration. The Attempts of Francis II. in Scotland, could by no means affect the Right of Calais. Indeed the very Aims of private Persons are in some respects liable to the Laws; but the case of Princes is quite different. As for the Attempts in Scotland being a Kingdom held as a Jointure, the English ought to expostulate the matter with the Queen of Scots, since they are so expert at guessing the Designs of Francis and the Queen: But as for themselves, they made bold to seize on New-Haven in France, under colour of keeping it for the King, held it by force, and put a strong Garison therein with suitable Provisions; and at the same time furnish'd Conde and the Confederates with Money. And therefore they have forfeited their claim to Calais through their own Misconduct. It hath pleas'd God to reduce Calais into the Hands of the French, and so to end the War between France and England, Nations which his Providence had parted by the Interposition of a very wide Channel; as 'tis in the Poet.

Et penitus toto divisos Orbe Britannos.

Britain (a lovely Isle) which Seas divide,
As a choice Tract, from all the World beside.

The Queen of England would also much better consult her own Welfare and Convenience, by keeping on a fair Correspondence with France, than by re-demanding Calais. In a word, none would be found Sanguine enough to persuade the King to restore Calais; or had any the Assurance to do so, he would deserve Death, if not a worse Doom, after it, for his pains.

To this Smith reply'd, 'That he did not expect to find the antiquated Title which the French had to Calais insisted on at this time of Day: But he now perceiv'd that whatever the French had got, right or wrong, into their Clutches, they would make bold to call their own, as if their Title hung at their Sword's point; and they matter'd not whether they held it with a good or an ill Conscience. The French persuade themselves they hold Calais by right of Recovery, whereas they only hold it on Compact: Nor will they admit of any later Treaty; and seem fully resolv'd not to stand to one Title of their Promise in reference to the Restitution of Calais. But these Pretences must bear down all Reason and Sense. As for the Encomiums bestow'd on the English, for their Coolness and Discretion in the management of Treaties, those the French have generally assum'd to themselves in derogation from the English; besides, the renewing of Treaties is what may be turn'd upon the French as a fitting Repartee, for that the Queen demanded Calais, because the French forfeited their claim when they attempted Changes and rais'd Com-motions

1567. Ann. 10. motions in Scotland: On the contrary, the French would exclude the English from Calais, on pretence that the Queen afterwards made an Assault upon New-Haven. When neither side (continues he) would abate any thing in this Dispute, a Peace was concluded at Troyes; and if a Renovation was the effect of that, this very fresh Claim cancell'd the Right of the French to Calais, and confirm'd that of the English, whose turn was not yet come, their claim to Calais being not to commence till the end of eight Years. Here rising from his Seat, and applying himself to the Council of France, 'I appeal, says he, to the Consciences of you who are here present, whether upon the Motion we made to have our Right to Calais reserv'd in express Terms, and their urging the omission of that Clause, because the Time was not yet expired, it were not agreed on by mutual consent, that it should be tacitly imply'd under that Paragraph, viz. All other Claims, and Demands shall remain safe and entire; and in like manner the Exceptions and Defences shall be reserv'd. As for New-Haven, the English made a peaceable Entry, being invited by the Inhabitants and Noblemen of Normandy, and under Protestations to keep and secure it for the French King. So then, they made no Hostile Attempts upon the French King, nor any Alterations in prejudice of the Treaty: And tho' they held it, 'twas not in any Right of Property, but as a Pledge or Security that they should have Right done 'em as to Calais, which had been so long detain'd. The claim whereof, both as to the Point of Possession and Propriety, did devolve upon the Queen, upon the Attempts made by the French in Scotland directly contrary to the Treaty. As for the Money, it was lent to Conde and the Confederates, with no other intent than to pay off the German Soldiers, who were ready to Mutiny, that they might not Ravage the King's Countries and Towns; all which the King had owned in his Edict to have been done, A bon fin, & pour notre Service; that is, To a good end, and for our Service. This, and more to the same purpose was urged by Smith.

Then the Constable, Montmorency, held up a Sword without a Scabbard set with Flower-de-Luces, (the Badge of his Place) and talked much of the mighty Provisions the English made in New-Haven, as if they had been enough to conquer all Normandy instead of one poor Town. There is no reason, says Smith, to wonder at this, because the English, who lie upon the Sea, know very well that they cannot command the Winds, which command that; and therefore they made sufficient and seasonable Provisions for the future. The French, after this, making heavy Complaints that the Protestant French Refugees were not deliver'd (according to Agreement) to the French Ambassador on demand, adjourn'd the Business till another time, till at length it dwindled into nothing on the account of a Civil War which soon after sprung up in France. And it cannot be doubted but the French had fully determin'd not to restore Calais. For, as soon as 'twas taken, they demolished the old Forts and began new ones, and let the Houses and Lands, besides those they gave away quite, for fifty Years.

Whilst these things were transacting in France, Count Stolberg came into England from the Emperor Maximilian, to treat about a Match with the Archduke Charles, and the Queen had a little before dispatched the Earl of Sussex to the Emperor on the same occasion, and with a Compliment of the Order of St. George. He, out of Respect to his Country, and the Envy he bore to Leicester, used all possible Efforts to bring about a Match between the Queen and some foreign Prince, that Leicester's Hopes might be defeated. And Sussex had it commonly in his Mouth, That a foreign Prince had the preference of any Englishman, tho' of the first Rank, in respect of Honour, Power and Wealth. Which occasioned one, of another Opinion, to say pleasantly in his presence, Where Honour, Power and Riches, are the three things only consider'd in a Marriage, the Devil and the World are the Match-makers. Yet Leicester soothing himself still with the same hopes, practis'd with the Lord North (who travell'd as a Companion with Sussex) to make Remarks upon all that was said and done, and privately to defeat all the Advances Sussex should make with the Archduke, by some tacit hints, that the Queen was not at all inclin'd to marry, whatever she pretended, or Sussex endeavour'd to make appear to the contrary. Nor was he less busy at home in filling the Queen's Ears with the several Inconveniences attending on a foreign Alliance. He represented to her the effects of a late Match between Queen Mary her Sister, and Philip of Spain, which embroil'd her in continual Troubles, and brought England under the danger of a Spanish Yoke. He pleaded, that the Customs and Tempers of Foreigners could hardly be learnt, which yet are things absolutely necessary to be discover'd in an Husband, who should be of the same Spirit and Disposition, as well as of the same Flesh with his Wife. That 'twas a very irksom and uneasy Life to converse with a Language and Deportment altogether strange and foreign. That the Off-spring of such foreign Marriages was usually uncouth and defective. That Strangers infected a Kingdom with new Methods and odd Customs. That when Princes match'd abroad, they augmented others Kingdoms, not their own, subject themselves and theirs to a foreign Dominion, and discover the Secrets of their Government to Strangers. That an Husband, who is a Stranger, will, out of a natural Regard for his Country, prefer his own Countrymen to the English. That England needs no foreign Aid, since she is strong enough to defend herself and others against all foreign Assaults. That the addition of a new Kingdom brings nothing but Care, Trouble and Expence, along with it; And that Empires, like human Bodies, sink under their own weight. That the usual Saying (that Marriages at home lessen the Royal Character) is applied by some Persons in meer Affront to the Nobility, whereas the Queen herself, whose Virtues have raised her to the Dignity of a Throne, owes her Extraction to, and borrows her Regal Title from, the Noble Blood of England: And therefore 'tis that the Kings of England have in their occasional Letters to Dukes, Marquesses, Earls and Viscounts, always given them the Title of Cousins.

Sussex, in the mean time, pass'd with a very fine Retinue by Antwerp, Cologne, Mentz, Worms, Spire, Ulm and Ausburgh, in his way to Austria; where he was honourably Entertain'd 5 Months together at the Emperor's Charge, and held daily Conferences with him about Affairs of moment; and among others, the Marriage with the Archduke. After this, on a Day fix'd for the purpose, he Installed the Emperor, at Evening Service, Knight of the Garter, tho' his Conscience would not allow him to be present at Mass. From this Negotiation there sprang some Difficulties relating to Religion, the Duke's Maintenance, the Title of King, and the Point of Succession; all which were warmly canvass'd on both sides. For the Title, the Archduke was to bear that of King of England; then for the Difficulties arise as to the Match.

The matter is let fall thro' delay.

Sussex sent to the Emperor to Treat of a Match with the Archduke

the Succession, the Laws of the Land debarred him of that, because 'twould be an Injury to the Children they might have. But 'twas agreed however, that he should be their Guardian during their Minority; and this was all that was granted to Philip of Spain when he marry'd Queen Mary. Now in relation to his Maintenance, if he would consent to maintain at his own Charge the Train and Equipage he brought into the Kingdom, the Queen would be ready to furnish all other points of Grandeur answerable to the State of a Prince, and bear the other Expences too rather than fail. But touching Religion, there the matter stuck. The Emperor demanded, and his Son likewise, the Privilege of a Publick Church for himself and his Servants, where might be perform'd Divine Service after the Romish manner. When this Point could not be gain'd, the Emperor contriv'd a middle Way, which was, the having a private Chappel in some part of the Court, where he might enjoy the Worship of God quietly, (as the Ambassadors of Catholick Princes were allow'd to do in their Houses) And this to be permitted on these Conditions: That no Englishman should be admitted to it; nor himself, nor any of his Domesticks, speak any thing to the Disparagement of the Religion establish'd; nor countenance any that do: That if his Way of Worship happen'd to give any Offence, he should oblige himself to forbear it for a time; and that he should also be present with the Queen, at the Service of the Church of England. To be short, after this Business had pass'd a long and thorow Consultation in England, the Queen's Answer was: That should she admit of this, she must wrong her Conscience, and make a palpable Violation of the Laws, if not endanger her Honour and Security. But if the Arch-duke Charles thought fit to come over into England, and visit the Queen; his Voyage might perhaps be worth his while. Upon the whole, Suffex was honorably dismiss'd, and went something out of his Way to Graetz, to take his leave of the Arch-duke, who was not to look for any other or more favorable Answer from the Queen: For a very little Time serv'd to efface the very Traces of those Designs, which had been carrying on for Seven Years together; and by very honorable Steps and Applications: There remain'd, however, that good Understanding and Friendship between the Two Princes, as made the Emperor, on all occasions, thwart the Pope's Practices against Queen Elizabeth. It was not long after, that the Arch-duke married Mary, the Daughter of Albert V. Duke of Bavaria, by whom he had the Queens of Spain and Poland, besides other Children.

The Negotiation proves unsuccessful.

Archduke marries.

About this time arriv'd in England Stephen Twerdico and Theodore Pogorella, from the most potent Emperor John Basilides, Emperor of Russia and Moscovia, with rich Furs of Sables, Lucerns, &c. which did then, and in former times, bear a mighty Value with the English, both for their Ornament and Use. They made great Professions and Tenders of Friendship to the Queen and the Nation; as the Emperor had already done, on the occasion of some Particulars I shall here insert.

Whilst some Merchants of the City of London, the chief of which were Andrew Judd, George Barnes, William Gerard, and Anthony Hussey, were attempting a Passage thro' the North-Channel into Cathay, in the Year 1553. under the Conduct of Sir Hugh Willoughby, who was frozen to death; Rich. Chancellor, who was the next Adventurer, was so lucky as to discover one into Russia, till then unknown, by the Mouth of the River Dwina, lying in 64 Degrees of Northern Latitude; where stands a little Monastery dedicated to St. Nicholas. Hither the Emperor sent some English find a Passage into Muscovy.

Sleds to carry 'em upon the Ice to Moscovy, after the Custom of the Country. He receiv'd and dismiss'd 'em with extreme Courtesie, and promis'd the English vast Advantages, if they would open a Trade into his Country. Nor was he a little pleas'd to find that foreign Wares might be so easily imported by Sea into Russia; which the Russians had before brought to 'em, with a great deal of Difficulty, by the way of Nerva, and the Countries of Poland; which held no good Agreement with them.

As soon as Chancellor return'd, and gave this Account, and how high a Rate English Cloaths were sold at in those Parts, and what a cheap Price Flax and Hemp, Wax, and richer sorts of Furs, went at there; those Merchants procur'd the Queen's Patent to establish themselves into a Company, call'd The Muscovy-Company; who having many Privileges granted 'em by the Emperor, settl'd a vast Trade, and sent a Fleet thither once a Year. But that which rais'd their Advantage to the Height, was this, that Queen Elizabeth so well improv'd her Interest with Basilides, as to obtain a Grant, in the Year 1569, that none but the English Company should be allow'd to trade into the North of Russia, or have Liberty to disperse or vend their Commodities in any part of that spacious and large Empire; as shall be shewn in its place.

With these Russian Ambassadors return'd Anthony Jenkinson into England, who had taken a most accurate Map of Russia, and was the first Englishman who adventur'd thro the Caspian Sea, to the Country of the Baetrians. To him the Emperor gave some Instructions, which he did not take care to communicate to his Countrymen, viz. That he should earnestly press the Queen to settle a League offensive and defensive; and to supply Russia with Shipwrights, Sailors, and Ammunition; and to endeavour to get an Oath from her, that she would afford himself and Family a safe Retreat, should he happen to lose his Kingdom, by the Sword of foreign or domestick Enemies. So little secure was this Tyrant in his own Thoughts, who had endanger'd the Safety and Quiet of so many; Nor can we believe he took it well at the Queen's hands, that she gave so little Notice to these Remonstrances, notwithstanding he still ply'd the same Affair both by Letters and Embassies, sometimes requiring that the said Jenkinson should be sent home, as having been false to the weighty Trust reposed in him.

In the very first Month of this Year, died Nicolas Wotton, Doctor of the Common and Civil Law, Dean both of Canterbury and York, at the same time: A Person well descended, but far more valuable for his wise Conduct of Affairs, both at home and abroad. For he had been Privy-Counsellor, not only to King Henry VIII. Edward VI. Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; but was sent Nine several times Ambassador to the Emperor, the Kings of France, Spain, and other Princes: Thrice was he a Commissioner for settling Peace between the English, French, and Scots; and was chosen by King Henry VIII. One of the Sixteen Overseers of his last Will and Testament.

The same Year, died Elizabeth Lebourne, the third Wife of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, who had been Widow to the Lord Dacres, and marry'd to the Duke about a Year; but brought him never a Child. Her former Husband had by her George Lord Dacres, who died young, by the Misfortune of the great Horse's Falling upon him, as he was learning to vault; besides three Daughters, who were engaged by Contract to three of the Duke's Sons.

I have already given an Account, how, in the Year 1560, and 1562, Shan-Oneal, the lawful Son of Con-Oneal, nicknamed Basco, or the Lame, a Man

And of the Duke's of Norfolk.

Man of the first Interest in the North of Ireland, call'd Ulster, came into England, and begg'd the Queen's Pardon for having been in Rebellion. Upon his return, he bravely defended that Part of Ireland against the Insults of the Scots, from the Quarters of Cantire and the Hebrides, and slew their Leaders, James Mac-Conel, who was his Father-in-law, and his Brother Agne. Being flush'd with this Conquest, he began to lord and domineer it over the Petty Lords of Ulster, and burnt down Armagh, the Metropolis of Ireland, in pure hatred to the Primate. He stripp'd O-donell, whose Estate lay nearest to him, of his House and Land, took him Prisoner, and committed a Rape upon his Wife. He Robb'd Mac-Guise of his Paternal Estate, and Treated Mac-Genis and others much after the same rate. And when the English undertook the Redress of these Grievances, he set up his rebellious Colours against the Queen, but presently took them down again thro' the persuation of Sir Tho. Cusack Kt. and deliver'd his Son for a Pledge of his future Loyalty and Obedience. To keep him firm herein; the Queen resolv'd to cancel the Patent of King Henry VIII. wherein he declared Matthew (falsely supposed to be the Son of Con) his Father's Successor, and to confer the Honour of Earl of Tir-Oen, and Baron of Dungannon, upon this Shan, who was the undoubted Son and Heir. But he, being a Man of an unquiet and turbulent Spirit, when he found himself strong enough to raise 1000 Horse and 4000 Foot among his own Creatures and Followers, and had already a Guard of 700 Men about his Person, through a Pride and Savageness very natural to him, disdain'd these as petty and insignificant Titles, compared with the Name of O-neal, and gave himself the Title of King of Ulster, training up the Country-People to Martial Discipline, and offering the Government of Ireland to the Queen of Scots. And so inveterate an Hatred did he bear the English, that he named a Castle which he built in the Lake Eaugh, Feoghne-gall; i. e. The Hatred of the English: And so far was he transported therewith, as to strangle some of his Men for but feeding upon English Bread. And yet for all this, he never mention'd the Queen but with terms of Respect.

Sir Henry Sidney, the Lord-Deputy, receiv'd Orders to advance against this Rebel. And Edward Randolph, an excellent Commander, was sent by Sea, with a Cornet of Horse and Seven hundred Foot to the Coasts of Ulster, as far as Derry, a small Bishop's See, to charge him in the Rear, at the same time that the Lord-Deputy attack'd him in the Front. Shan, having got some Intelligence thereof, made a furious Assault upon Dundalk; but was beaten off by the Garison, and received a shameful Defeat both here and at Whites-Castle. After which, he was routed and put to Flight by a small Handful of English, and with a considerable loss on his side, just as he was going to destroy the Country of Louth with Fire and Sword. His next March was to Derry, where he Insulted the English Garison, and Ravag'd the Country round about: But the English having ranged themselves in order of Battel, soon made a shift to break through a Crowd of raw and undisciplin'd Fellows, and to defeat and disperse them. But a very dear Conquest it was, since it cost the Life of Randolph, the chief Commander, who was killed Fighting amongst the thickest of the Enemies. And certainly never did Man deserve a fairer and more honourable Remembrance, for the Authority he maintained, and the Love and Respect he deservedly shared among the Soldiers. His Commission was given to Edward Saint Lo, who proved a severe Scourge to the Rebels in those Parts, till by a sad and sudden Disaster the Town and Garison took Fire, and the Powder and Provisions, with a great many of his Men, were blown up and destroy'd. Upon this Accident, he put his Foot aboard some small Vessels he had, and he himself with the Troop of Horse, Commanded by George Harvey, broke through the midst of the Enemies Forces; and by a four Days March joined the Lord-Deputy, who was then in Mourning for Randolph, whose Bravery he had an high esteem for.

And now the Lord-Deputy marches into Ulster, and Shan retires into the Woods and Thickets, making now and then some faint Attacks on the Enemies Rear near Clogher and Salmon, a Castle belonging to Turlough Leinigh, who had a little before revolted from Shan: But as soon as the Lord-Deputy's Men were put into Garison, and O-donell put in Possession of his Estate, and was return'd in order to make up some Differences between the Earls of Ormond and Desmond, who were engag'd in a most fatal Quarrel; Shan takes Courage again, Pillages the Country all about, and lays a second Siege to Dundalk. But he was soon oblig'd to raise it, with equal Damage and Disgrace, and a vast Slaughter of his Men besides; whereupon the Savage Humour gain'd the ascendant, and put him upon the Exercise of extreme Barbarities to his own Men, which occasion'd the Revolt of a great many; so that when he found the poor and shatter'd Condition of his Troops, (there being, besides Deserters, 4000 slain) when he saw all the Avenues secur'd, and the Passes guarded by the English, he then took up a kind of Resolution to cast himself on the Lord-Deputy's Mercy, with an Halter about his Neck, and a Confession in his Mouth: But his Secretary dissuaded him, and advised him first to try the Friendship of the Highland Scots, who, during the brunt of the War, had retreated to Clande-boy, from whence they were driven out a little before, under the Conduct of Alexander Oge and Mac-Gillespich, whose two Brothers, Agne and James Mac-Conell, himself had slain in the Field. To these he at length betakes himself with O-donell's Wife, whom he had ravish'd, and to regain their good opinion, he sent before-hand their Brother Surly-Boy, or the Yellow, whom he had a long time detain'd a Prisoner. They, to revenge the death of their Brethren and Kinsmen slain by him, treated him with a kind of dissembling Courtesy; but having got him into their Tents, and falling in their Cups to hot Words, they fell upon him and murder'd him and most of his Associates, for some defamatory Expressions of his against their Mother.

Thus did Shan come to this bloody End about the middle of June, after he had robb'd his Father of his Government, and his Brother of his Life. A Man he was who had stained his Hands with Blood, and dealt in all the Pollutions of unchast Embraces; and so scandalous a Glutton and Drunkard was he beside, that he would often lie up to the Chin in Dirt to cool the feverish Heats of his intemperate Lust. The Children he left by his Wife were Henry and Shan, but he had several more by O-donell's Wife, and others of his Mistresses. His Goods and Chattels were forfeited by Act of Parliament; and Turlough Leineigh, a Man of the first Interest of his Family, and of a modest and peaceable Spirit, was by the Queen's pleasure chose and saluted by the People with the Character of O-neal. Nevertheless Hugh, commonly called Baron of Dungannon, Shan's Nephew by his Brother Matthew's side, a young Person of an indifferent Character, and who liv'd afterwards

Some Troubles in Munster.

Thus was Ulster resettled in a peaceable Condition; but Munster was in the mean time under as violent Commotions, occasioned by the unhappy Rivalry of two Kinsmen, the Earls of Ormond and Desmond, who could not agree about the Extent of their Jurisdiction; insomuch that the matter came to a Battel near Dromelin, and the Litigants were sent for into England to argue the matter before the Council-Board. Nevertheless the case being Intricate, they were refer'd to the Lord-Deputy in Ireland, where the Evidence and Witnesses were nearer at hand. But as they were upon the level as to Power and Interest, and had Spirits formed in the same Mould, so they resolv'd the matter should be decided not by the best Law, but by the longest Sword. The Lord-Deputy interpos'd his Authority and Forces; but Ormond, willing to set the better Face upon his Cause, procur'd the Deputy to be Impeach'd as a favourer of Desmond, and got Orders to seize on his Person. Whereupon he was soon after surprized at Kilmanock, together with his Uncle John Desmond, and sent into England, where they were both committed to Custody.

The Eleventh Year of her Reign.

Popish Priests grant Absolution.

Whilst Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders and T. P. (Clergymen who had withdrawn from England) were much taken up in exercising the Episcopal Authority they had lately received from the Bishop of Rome, of absolving the Consciences of such as returned to the Bosom of the Church, and dispensing with several Disorders, such only excepted as related to cases of wilful Murder, or fell under the cognizance of a Judicial Court; as likewise of granting Absolution in the case of Heresy, provided the Persons to be absolved abstain from the Service of the Altar for three Years: Coleman, Futton, Hallingham, Benson, and others, who professed a more pure and reformed Religion with more Zeal than Knowledge, whether it was that they would admit of nothing which could not be immediately proved from Scripture, or that they affected a purer Reformation, or were really addicted to Novelty and Divisions, these Persons openly opposed the receiv'd Discipline of the Church of England, disputing the Liturgy and the regular Ordination of Bishops, and condemning them as having a mixture of Popish Superstition; (which they thought to be highly impious and abominable) so that they used all possible Attempts to have the whole Service of the Church of England new form'd upon the Geneva-Model. And tho' the Queen commanded them to be put under Confinement, yet 'tis almost incredible how this Sect, called then by an invidious Name, the Puritans, gathered and encreased every where, through a selfish Obstinacy on their side, the Bishops Indiscretion, and the secret Countenance of certain Noblemen, who gaped after a Morfel of Church-Lands.

A second Civil War in France.

Not long before this time, the French, who had likewise attempted a Reformation of Religion, out of an apprehension that the Papists had formed the Holy League against them, applied themselves in an humble Address to his Majesty: From whence arose soon after a second Civil War; to compose which, the Queen commanded Norris, her Ambassador, to use his utmost Mediations; and there ensued a Peace thereon; but such an one as seemed to carry nothing but Treachery and ill Designs at the bottom. And now it was that the Queen-Mother of France began to treat the Ambassador and others of the English Nation, with a cajoling kind of Civility, and to drop some dark Hints and Innuendo's about a Marriage betwixt Queen Elizabeth and her Son Henry, Duke of Anjou, who was scarce Seventeen Years of Age. And this with no other design (as several were of opinion) than to keep her from sending any Succours to the French Protestants under a third Civil War, which she thought was very near breaking out. But Man, the English Ambassador in Spain, received but very coarse Entertainment; for having been taxed with dropping some disrespectful Expressions about the Pope, he was forbid the Court, and sent from Madrid to the Confinement of a Country Village, and his Servants forced in the mean time to be present at Mass, whilst the exercise of his own Religion was altogether forbid. Whether this was done in spite to the Queen, or her Persuasion, is not easily guess'd; but certain it is, that she treated Gusman, the Spanish Ambassador, after a manner of Civility quite contrary to this sort of Treatment, and allow'd him the free use of his own Religion. She could not therefore but regret this ill Usage of her Ambassador, as a dishonour done to herself, as she did likewise the Injury done by the Spaniards to Sir John Hawkins at the same time. This Gentleman had put in at St. John de Ullua, in the Bay of Mexico, with five Merchant Ships laden with Goods and Negroes, Commodities which were bought up in Africa by the Spaniards, and from them by the English, to make a better Market of in America. The very next Day the King of Spain's Royal Fleet arrived at the same Port; which tho' he could have prevented from coming into the Bay, yet he allow'd them safe Harbour, on Security given and certain Conditions made, that he might be no ways charged with a breach of the Treaty. The Spaniards being now got in, and scorning to be tied down to Terms within their own Dominions, watched their opportunity, set upon the English, slew a great many, and took and rifled three Ships. But this Victory was not by them without much Bloodshed obtain'd. This bred very ill Blood in the English Sailors and Soldiers, who now began to grow importunate for a War with Spain, and to exclaim against them as breakers of the Truce; inasmuch as 'twas made an Article in the Treaty between the Emperor Charles V. and King Henry VIII. That there should be free Commerce settled between the Subjects of both Princes, in all and each of their Kingdoms, Isles and Dominions, not excepting America, which did at that time belong to the Emperor. But the Queen took little notice of this, having enough to do with the Affairs of Scotland. For about this time, on the 2d of May, The Q. of the Captive Queen made her escape from her Confinement in Lough-Levin in Scotland, to Hamilton-Castle, by the assistance of George Douglas, Brother to the Person under whose Custody she was. Where, upon hearing the Affidavits of Robert Melvin and others, a Sentence Declaratory was pronounced by the unanimous Consent of a great Body of Noblemen there conven'd, signifying, That the Resignation extorted from the Queen under her Fears in Prison, was Ipso facto null and void, and that it was obtain'd by force, of which the Queen's Oath, who was then present, was a sufficient Confirmation. Hereupon, there gather'd to her in two or 3 Days time such a vast throng and confluence of People, as furnish'd her with an Army of 6000 fighting Men, who ray, as having engag'd with more Heat than either Courage or Conduct. The timorous Queen, quite disheartned with this bad Success, thought it best to fly, and secur'd herself by Riding that Day 60 Miles; and after this she travelled by Night to the House of Maxwell, Baron of Heris, and chose rather to trust to the Mercy of the Sea and Queen Elizabeth's Courtesy, than the Loyalty of her own Subjects. However, to prepare the way to her better Reception, she sent the Queen a Diamond by John Beton, (the very same she had received from her as a Pledge of mutual and lasting Friendship) and let her Majesty understand withal, that she designed to come into England and put herself under the Queen's Protection, if her Subjects continued their rebellious Hostilities against her. The Queen promised her all the Aid and Friendship

 she could expect from so near a Relation as a Sister. But before the Messenger's return, she had taken Boat with the Lords Heris and Fleming, and a few more, (contrary to the Persuasions of all her Friends) and on the 17th of May arrived at Wirkinton in Cumberland, near the Mouth of the Derwent; and the same Day wrote a Letter to Queen Elizabeth in French under her own Hand. The chief Contents of which I have thought fit to give you from the Original here set down, because it contains the History of her Sufferings in Scotland in a fuller way of Relation than I have yet offer'd. The Words are as follows.

Her Letter to
 Q. Eliz.
 "You cannot but be sensible (most dear Sister)
 "What Plots have been fram'd to imprison my"self and Husband, even by those Men whom
 "I have rais'd to an envied pitch of Greatness;
 "and likewise, how ready I was, at your Ma"jesty's Intercession, to receive them again in-
 "to Favour, after they had been forcibly driven "from my Kingdom; yet had these Men the "Confidence to break into my Chamber, to "murder my Servant in the most barbarous
 "manner before my Face, and to confine my "own Person when I was great with Child.
 "And when they had got a second Pardon from "me, they went so far as to charge me with a
 "new pretended Crime, and sign this Accusa"tion with their own Hands; and had, it "seems, an Army ready to oppose me. But I "was willing to spare the effusion of my Sub"jects Blood, and so put myself, under the "Guard of my own Innocence, into your "Hands. They immediately cast me into Pri"son, stript me of my Servants, all but a Maid
 "or two, my Cook, and my Physician, threat-
 "ned and terrify'd me into the Resignation of "my Kingdom, and refus'd an Hearing to my"self and Council in a Convention or Juncto
 "which they afterwards called. The next "thing was the seizing on my Goods, and de-
 "barring me the Privilege of any Conversa"tion. After this, it pleas'd God to favour my "escape from Prison. And being now guarded
 "by the very Flower of the Nobility, who "cheerfully gather'd to me from all Parts, I re"minded my rebellious Subjects of the Duty
 "and Allegiance they ow'd to me, I offer'd
 "them a free Pardon, and propos'd an Hearing
 "in Parliament of the Causes or Grievances on "both sides, that the Government might be no "longer embroil'd by Civil Dissentions: Two "Messengers I sent on this very Errand, and "they were both clapt up: Those that assist"ed me they proclaim'd Traytors, and comman"ded them by publick Order to desert my Per"son and Interest. I desir'd them to accept of "the Lord Boyd as an impartial Umpire between us, to settle and accommodate Matters on both sides: But this was refus'd. However,

 I hoped still that your Majesty's Mediation must have work'd them up to a dutiful Compliance. But when I saw 'twas come to that,
 that I must either be a Sacrifice or a Prisoner once more, I took up a Resolution to go to Dunbritton. They were as much resolv'd to stop my Journey, and in a following Skirmish, killed some of my Men, and put the rest to flight. I at last got safe to my Lord Heris, who has accompany'd me into your Kingdom; and I promise myself from your Friendship and Generosity, the Aid and Protection I want; and that you will influence others to Assist me, by your own Example.
 I therefore most earnestly request the Favour of a safe Conduct to your Majesty, for I am now under the most pressing Exigences, as I shall satisfy you more at large, if you shall think my Condition worth your Pity or Regard. God grant you a Life long and happy, and me Comfort and Patience; which I hope and pray that his Providence may make you the blessed Instrument of procuring to me.

Queen Elizabeth sent her the most obliging Letters by Sir Francis Knolls, and others; and promis'd her all the Protection which was due to the Justice of her Cause. However, she would not consent to admit her to her Presence, because she stood charg'd with many Mismanage-ments; and therefore order'd she should be con-vey'd to Carlisle, by Louder, Deputy-Warden of that City, and the Gentlemen of the County, as to a Place of more Security, should her Enemies make any Attempts against her. Upon the receipt of this Answer, and the Queen's refusing to see her, she renew'd her Request both by Letters, and by Maxwell Baron Heris: "That
 "she might have leave to remonstrate the "Wrongs which had been done, and clear her"self of the Crimes laid to her charge; insist"ing, how reasonable a thing it was, that the "Queen, her near Kinswoman, should afford
 "her a patient Hearing, support her Exile by "her Company and Presence, and restore her
 "to her Crown and Kingdom, in opposition to
 "those whom she had pardon'd and restor'd, af"ter their Rebellion had made them run their "Country, to her own absolute Ruin, unless "timely prevented. She intreated her therefore
 "either to admit her to her Presence, in order
 "to some redress of her Misfortunes; or else to "have leave to depart immediately out of the "Kingdom, to crave some Succours elsewhere;
 "and that she might no longer live like a Pri"soner in Carlisle Castle, since her coming into "England was a voluntary Act of her own, in "confidence of that Friendship the Queen had "made so many honourable professions and pro"mises of, by Letters, Messages, and other To"kens.

These Letters, join'd with Heris's Representations, had such an effect on Queen Elizabeth, that she seem'd at least touch'd (for who can dive into the Hearts of Princes, of which they who are Wise always keep the Key?) with an hearty and feeling Sense of her Kinswoman's Disasters;
 who was not only seiz'd and imprison'd by her own Subjects, but hunted almost to Death, condemn'd without Hearing, and robb'd of her Kingdom, contrary to all the Laws of Equity between Man and Man, and at last forc'd to fly into England in hope of the Queen's Aid and Protection. And the rather was the Queen inclin'd to hear her, because she had freely submitted her Cause to a fair and equal Debate, and engag'd to prove her Adversaries guilty of all the Miscarriages they had unjustly loaded her with. But whatever tender Resentments Queen Elizabeth might have of her case, the Council entred into close and serious Consultations, how to dispose of her. If she were still entertain'd in England, they were apprehensive she might, by the advantage of that Fluency and Eloquence she was so great a Mistress of, win many to her Interests, who already favour'd her Title to the Succession,

and this would serve to nourish her Ambition,
and perhaps encourage some Attempts to place the Crown upon her Head. And as foreign Embassadors would give an helping Hand to such a Project, so would the Scots themselves turn good Subjects again, when they were like to be such gainers by the Bargain. Besides,
'twas very possible Keepers might betray their Trust; and farther, should she die in England, tho' in the common way of a Disease, it might draw after it a great many ill Consequences, besides the Calumny and Censure it might occasion. Then again, should she be sent over into France, they were afraid the Guises, her Kinsmen, would again revive the Prosecution of her claim to England, out a notion of some great Feats she might be capable of doing in England, by the Influence she had on some, on a religious Account;
and the Interest she bore with others, as they stood affected to the Firmness of her Claim, or the Itch of Change and Novelty. Besides, 'twas a ready way to break the Union between England and Scotland, which was of much greater Consequence, and to revive the Treaty between the latter and France; which would have worse Effects now than heretofore, when Burgundy was upon terms of Peace with England, which had now no Friends but the Scots to trust. And should they send her back to Scotland, the fear was, that all those in the English Interest must lose their Places, and the French be advanc'd in their stead. That the young Prince would be expos'd, changes made in Religion, and the French and other Foreigners let into the Kingdom: In a word, That the Highland Scots would be more troublesome to Ireland, and the Queen herself be in more hazard of her Life from her Enemies at home. 'Twas therefore the Judgment of the far greater part of the Council, to have her detain'd as a Prisoner of War; and that she should not be surrender'd till she gave Satisfaction for usurping the Title to the Crown, and some Answer to the Point of her Husband
the Lord Darly's death, who was a Native and Subject of England. For the Lord Darly's Mother, the Countess of Lenox, had lately made very mournful Complaints to the Queen in her own and her Husband's name, and humbly beg'd
the Queen of Scots might be brought to her Trial for the Murder of her Son. But the Queen gave her both Comfort and Advice, telling her how careful she ought to be of fixing a Charge of that heinous nature upon so great a Princess and a Kinswoman of hers, when there was no certain Proof or Evidence of the Fact. And she said withal, That the Iniquity of the Times and the Partiality of the World was such, that a blind Malice would charge guilt upon the most Innocent Head, whereas Justice was more quicksighted, and God would not fail to make use of it in the punishment of lewd and wicked Actions.

Murray
calls a Parliament.

The Lord Heris intreated the Queen on the other hand, not to afford too ready an Ear or too hasty a Belief to any Untruths that might pass about a Queen, whose Cause had not yet been heard; nor to consent to Murray's hurrying on the Session of a Parliament in Scotland to the prejudice of the ejected Queen, and the consequent Ruin of her good Subjects. This the Queen of England press'd very home: But for all that, Murray, the Regent, call'd a Parliament in the King's Name, and seiz'd on the Goods and Chattels of several who adher'd to the Queen's Cause. Queen Elizabeth being much incens'd at this Proceeding, sent the Regent a sharp Message by Middlemore; letting him know,

That she took it very ill he should encourage a Precedent of such dangerous Consequence to Kingly Power, which would be sure to bring the Crown into contempt with the Subject, and submit it to the Lust and Faction of the Populace. But how far soever they might forget the Duty and Allegiance owing to their Prince, yet could not she neglect any Office of Piety or Humanity to the Queen, her Sister and Neighbour. That he ought either to come in Person, or send fitting Deputies to answer the Complaints the Queen made against him and his Party, and to give sufficient Reasons for deposing her. Otherwise she would directly order her Enlargement, and lend her what Assistance she could to recover her Crown and Kingdom. And she caution'd him withal, not to dispose of the Queen's Wardrobe and Jewels, tho' the Parliament should permit or connive at it.

Murray obey'd the Queen, but unwillingly,
and only as he was beholding to England to support his Regency. And whereas the Lords of the Kingdom who were pitched upon for Deputies, refus'd to act or appear in the matter; Murray came himself to York, (the Place assign'd for this Business) and brought with him seven of his Bosom-Friends, to act as Commissioners for the Infant-King, viz. James E. of Morton, Adam Bishop of Orkney, Robert Commendator of Dunfermelin, Patrick Baron of Lindsey, James Mac-Gilly, Henry Balnaw: And Lidington too came in the same company, Murray having made him round Promises, and being afraid, intruth, to leave him at home; as did also George Buchanan, another of Murray's most obsequious Creatures.
The same Day came thither Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Sussex, who was made some time before Lord-President of the North, and Sir Ralph Sadler Kt. one of the Privy-Council, Commissioners appointed to Hear and Examine the Cause of the Queen's being Deposed. On the Queen of Scots side appear'd John Lesley Bishop of Ross, William Baron of Levingston, Robert Baron of Boyd, Gavin Commendator of Kilwinin, John Gordon, and James Cockburn. And this the Queen of Scots resented as very hard Measure, That Queen Elizabeth would not allow her a Personal Hearing, and yet gave Orders, that the Allegations of her Subjects should be heard before her Commissioners, tho'
she, who was an Absolute Princess, could not be oblig'd to answer the Charge of her own Subjects but when and how she pleas'd.

When they were met, on the 7th of October, and had open'd their Commissions, and shewn their Authority, Lidington, who stood by, apply'd himself to his Countrymen with extraordinary Freedom, to this purpose: 'That foras-
'much as it appear'd by the Authority granted
'by Queen Elizabeth to her Commissioners, that
'she design'd nothing else but that the Deputies
'of Scotland should throw a Blemish on the Cre'dit of their King's Mother, and so the Case
'might fall within her own Sentence and Umpi-
'rage: They would therefore do well to consi'der carefully before-hand, what an Odium and 'Hazard they should draw upon themselves, not 'only from those of Scotland, who favour'd the
'Queen's Case; but likewise from other Chri-mal a way, before the English who were profess'd Enemies to the Scots. He likewise demanded what Account they should be able to give their new King hereafter of such a bold and insolent Charge, and one so prejudicial to the State of this Kingdom; when he, without all peradventure, as soon as he arriv'd at Man's Estate, wou'd consider it as a foul Reflection not only upon his own and his Mother's, but also upon his Country's Honour. He therefore, for his part, thought it the best Prudence to wave so scandalous an Impeachment, unless the Q. of England would enter into a League offensive and defensive, to bear them out in such a Procedure. These things, he said, he could not but give some hints of,

both as their Friend, and in regard to his Office,
as he was Secretary of Scotland. But this Motion produc'd no other Effects, than a profound Silence, and a general Consternation.

A Protestation
of the Q. of Scots Deputies.
The Queen of Scots Deputies, who had the preference at this Interview, before they were sworn, protested, That altho' the Queen of Scots was willing to have the Cause depending between herself and her disloyal Subjects, Tried before the English; yet did she not thereby submit herself to the sovereign Jurisdiction of any Person whatever, because she was a free Princess, and no way subject to the Authority of any other. The English Commissioners protested at the same time, That they did in no wise admit of that Protestation in prejudice to that Claim the Kings of England had long since made, of being superiour Lords of the Kingdom of Scotland. The next Day, the Queen of Scots Commissioners deliver'd a Declaration in Writing, setting forth,

A counter Protest from the English.
Declaration of the Scottish
Commissioners.
That James Earl of Morton, John Earl of Marr, Alexander Earl of Glencarn, Humes, Lindsey, Rethuen, Sempil, &c. had rais'd an Army in the Queen's Name, against her Person; and having seiz'd and wretchedly abus'd her, had likewise imprison'd her at Lough-Levin, broken open the Royal Mint, taken away the Stamps, with all the Gold and Silver, whether coin'd or not, and Crown'd her Infant-Son, whose Authority James Earl of Murray had usurp'd under the Title of Regent, and had seiz'd on all the Forts, Wealth and Revenues of the Kingdom. They farther set forth, How the Queen, since her escape after eleven Months Imprisonment, had publicly declar'd upon Oath, That whatever she had done in Prison, had been extorted from her by Force and Threats. Nevertheless, she had, in order to restore the publick Peace, authoriz'd and empower'd the Earls of Argile, Eglington, Cassills and Rothsay, amicably to compound these Matters with her Enemies; who notwithstanding, when she had design'd to cross the Country to Dunbriton, forcibly oppos'd her Passage, slew a great many of her good Subjects, and carry'd some to Prison, and others they forc'd from their Houses and Estates, and all this for no better reason, than their Fidelity to their Prince. These were the Injuries which had drove her into England for Sanctuary, and to crave Assistance
 at the Queen's hands, which had been so often promis'd and by the means of which she might recover her Crown and Country.

The answer of the Scots Commissioners
for the K.
A few Days after, Murray, the Regent, and the Commissioners for the young King, (as they stil'd themselves) put in their Answer to this purpose: That after the Lord Darly, the King's Father was made away, James Hepburn Earl of Bothwell (suppos'd to be the Regicide) had so far wrought himself into the Queen's Affections, as to carry her by a seeming Force, but really with her own Consent, away to Dunbar, and there marry her, after having put away his former Wife. That the Lords of Scotland were so mov'd at this Procedure, that they thought they could not do better, since the King's Murder was imputed to the Conspiracy of several Noblemen, than to punish Bothwell, release the Queen from those unlawful Bonds, and consult the young King's Safety, and the Nation's Security. That when the matter was just ready to be decided by the Sword, the Queen had sent away Bothwell, severely threatening the Lords, and thought of nothing but Revenge; insomuch that there seem'd to be a necessity to confine her Person, till Bothwell should be apprehended and brought to Justice. That she, bending as it were under the care and weight of a Crown, had voluntarily resign'd the Kingdom, transfer'd it to her Son, and constituted Murray Viceroy; and that hereupon her Son was anointed King, with the usual Ceremonies.

 That all these Steps were approv'd of, and sign'd by the Lords in Parliament; and the Government began to breath afresh under a more impartial Administration: Till some Men, who were no Friends to their Country's Peace, cunningly contriv'd the Queen's Escape; and,
 contrary to their Oaths and Fealty to the King, took up Arms against his Authority; and tho'
 it pleas'd God to give them a Defeat, yet are they not discourag'd, even at this very time, from carrying on their Hostilities against their King and Country. It appears therefore highly necessary, that the King's Authority be asserted against all the Attempts and Contrivances of such factious People.

To this the Queen of Scots Deputies, after having repeated the former Protest, made their Reply as follows.

Whereas Murray and the Conspirators affirm, that they took up Arms against the Queen, because Bothwell, who stands charg'd with the King's Murder, was so much in her Esteem;
 this pretence will by no means clear them of the imputation of unfaithful Subjects, foras-much as the Queen was altogether ignorant that he had any hand in the Murder; nay she knew very well that he was by his Peers acquitted of the Fact, and that his Acquittal was confirm'd by Act of Parliament, with and by the consent of those very Persons who are now his Accusers, and were then Instruments in persuading the Queen to accept him for her Husband, as the fittest Man, in their opinion, to sustain the weight of the Government: And so far they went, as to subscribe a Writing;
 wherein they promis'd him Fealty and Allegiance, and did not utter one Breath against the Match, till they had debauch'd to their Party the Captain of Edinborough-Castle, and the Provost of the City. Then did they in the dead time of the Night assault the Castle of Bothwick, where the Queen lay, and she happening to make her Escape under the favour of the Night, they immediately rais'd Forces under colour of defending the Queen, and then march'd with Colours flying to intercept her in the way to Edinborough, whether she intended to go. Grange they sent before to warn her not to protect Bothwell, till he had stood his Trial; which rather than occasion the shedding of any Blood, she readily consented to. But Grange gave Bothwell private notice to be gone, and engag'd his Word that he should not be pursu'd; so that 'tis plain he went away by their consent, and might have been taken afterwards with very great ease. But having se-cur'd the Queen, they matter'd not him, but were now for steering the Course their Ambition directed. And whereas they were Subjects to the Queen, and bound by Oaths of Allegiance,

puties.

1567. Ann. 10. Allegiance, and yet had treated her in a way unworthy of the Royal Character, 'twas no wonder if she used some Methods more rigorous than ordinary. When she was willing to refer her Cause to the Decision of a Parliament, and intimated as much by Lidington, her Secretary, they would not so much as give him the Hearing, but convey'd her by Night to Lough-Levin, and there confin'd her. And whereas they pretend, that the Troubles deriv'd on her from her Crown were the true Motives why she resign'd it, nothing can be more false: For she was neither made incapable by Age or Sickness, but had Vigour enough, both of Mind and Body, to manage the Affairs of her Throne. This cannot be deny'd, That the Earls of Arbol, Tullibardine and Lidington, (who were of her Council) advis'd her to sign the Instrument of Resignation, to avoid the certain Fate she had otherwise undergone. And they affirm'd moreover, that this could not prejudice herself or her Heirs, since 'twas done under Confinement, Forasmuch as being imprison'd implies a just Fear, and a Promise made by one in that Condition, is, in the opinion of the best Lawyers, of no force or validity. That Sir Nicholas Throckmorton had also given her the same Instructions under his own Hand, whom she had desir'd to make the Queen of England acquainted that she had resign'd only upon force and compulsion. They urged yet farther, That Lindsey, when he deliver'd her the Instrument to be subscrib'd, threatn'd her with Death, and whatever was most frightful, and made her sign it at a time when she could not read it for Tears; and that the Lord of Lough-Levin-Castle refus'd to set his Hand as a Witness, being convinc'd that what the Queen had done, was against her will. That it was therefore a most unjust and unreasonable Resignation, in the stead of which she had neither Maintenance, Liberty, nor Safety allow'd her; so that in the judgment of Persons indifferent, such an Abdication could not be suppos'd to place any Bar against her Right and Prerogative, when she revok'd it as unjust and extorted, as soon as she was at Liberty, and that by a publick Declaration before several Peers of the Realm. Nor ought the Queen to receive any prejudice from the pretended Acts of Parliament they so much boast of: For whereas about an hundred Earls, Bishops and Barons, have Votes in the Parliament of Scotland, there were not in this tumultuary Assembly rather than Parliament, above four Earls, one Bishop, one or two Abbots, and six Barons: And even of that small Number, some entred their Protest, That nothing ought to be transacted against the Queen or her Successors, now that she was a Prisoner. Nor could the English or French Embassadors obtain the liberty of Access to her, to learn the true state and manner of the Resignation, tho' they press'd very earnestly for it. And then for the state of the Kingdom, so far has it been from faring the better, since it came into the Hands of the present Usurper. That Impiety and Sacrilege were never more practis'd or less punish'd; there being nothing more common at present, than the pulling down of religious Houses, the ruin and subversion of the best Families, and the general Oppression of the poor Commons. They did therefore most earnestly request, that Queen Elizabeth would be pleas'd to Succour, Aid and Assist, by all means possible, the distress'd Condition of the Queen, her Kinswoman, who had receiv'd the most unworthy and injurious Treatment. This I have seen and copied from the original Papers of the Commissioners themselves.

When the English Deputies, upon hearing what had been alledg'd, demanded Murray to give the Reasons of so rugged a Procedure against an absolute Queen, and to produce more substantial Proofs than had hitherto been brought; (for there appear'd no Witnesses, nor any thing but a few forg'd, or at least suspected, Papers) and Lidington having, it seems, given them private notice, that he had more than once counterfeited the Queen's Hand, Murray had but this to say, That he was loth to impeach his Sister further before Strangers, unless the Queen of England would engage for the Protection of the young King, and to abandon the Cause and Interest of the Queen of Scots. But since their Commission did not warrant them to promise any such thing, one or two of the Agents on both sides were summon'd up to London. To whom Queen Elizabeth declared, 'That she was still of opinion the Subjects of Scotland were much to blame in respect of the Queen: But however, she would interpose with her on their behalf, and hear whether they had any farther or better Defence to make for themselves. Murray follow'd them up, but utterly refus'd to accuse his Sister, unless upon the same Terms insisted on at York.

And now were the Deputies recall'd, and their Commission expir'd, to the great Satisfaction of the Duke of Norfolk, who had always heartily espous'd the Queen of Scots Title to the Succession; and was of opinion, that all that was aim'd at in the late Debate, was to fix a lasting Mark of Infamy upon herself and her Son, and so to exclude them both, as unworthy to succeed to the Throne of England. And he thought moreover, That he was now happily rid of a double Danger: For he was afraid, had he given Sentence against her, he must have wrong'd his own Conscience, and utterly ruin'd her: And should he have determin'd in her favour, he must of course have incurr'd the Queen's high Displeasure, and drawn on himself the Odium of all that were ill-affected to the Queen of Scots, on the score of Religion, or any other account.

But there happening about this time some Tumults in Scotland, occasion'd by some of the Queen's Friends, and they requiring Murray's Presence, to compose and settle things, he drew up an Accusation before the Queen and the Lord-Keeper Bacon, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Suffex, Leicester, Clinton Lord-Admiral, Sir William Cecil and Sir Ralph Sadler, who were constituted by a new Patent the Examiners of this Matter. And before them, he produc'd some conjectural Proofs and Circumstances, some few Affidavits, and the Acts and Resolutions of the late Convention. But what he laid the greatest stress upon, were certain Love-Letters and Poems, wrote, as he affirm'd, with the Queen's own Hand; and this was to prove her guilty of her Husband's Murder: To back the Evidence, he gave them Buchanan's Book, entitul'd, The Detection, to peruse. But that found but very little credit with the greater part of them; for the Book was Partial, and the Author look'd on as a mercenary Writer. Then for the Letters and Verses, (there being no Name nor Date to them, and too many abroad who are very dexterous at Counterfeiting other Men's Hands and Subscriptions) they gain'd little belief with Queen Elizabeth, tho' she did not want a certain degree of Emulation so natural to the Sex: And it were enough for that, if the Queen of Scots Reputation were only something impair'd by this Impeachment.

Now

Now, as soon as the Commissioners for the Q. of Scots understood, how scandalous an Accusation Murray had bestow'd upon her; they were prepar'd and ready to answer the Charge: But she had already cancel'd and revok'd their Commission; being secretly inform'd by some Persons well skill'd in the Laws, that she might do so, forasmuch as Queen Elizabeth's Commission granted to the Duke and others, for adjudging the same Cause, was already recall'd. One or two of the New Deputies, whom she knew to be ill-affected to her Interest, she excepted against; unless the French and Spanish Ambassadors might be join'd with them, and she might be allow'd the Privilege of making a publick Defence, before the Queen and them, and Murray likewise might be stop't and brought upon his Trial, who, she said, might, with little Difficulty, be made to appear the Author of the Lord Darby's Death. All this appearing highly reasonable to Norfolk, Arundel, Suffex, Leicester, and Clinton, Q. Elizabeth, not over well pleas'd at the matter, said publickly, That the Queen of Scots would never want an Advocate, as long as Norfolk liv'd. And 'twas enough, as she thought, to convene her Privy-Council, and the Earls of Northumberland, Westmorland, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Huntington, and Warwick; and to communicate to them the Allegations made by Murray; having first engaged them, by an Oath of Secrecy, that neither Party might receive Prejudice. And whereas Murray was call'd home, and the Lord Boyd, as the Report went, attempted privately the Queen of Scots Escape; the Business was put off till another Opportunity; the Queen of England having profess'd an utter Abhorrence of the Scots Insolence in deposing their Queen.

The matter falls.

Debate touching the Government of Scotland.

Murray propounds a Marriage between Norfolk & the Queen of Scots.

About this time, Hamilton, Duke of Chastell-Herault, return'd from France, being sent by the Guises, to get the Question again debated, Whether Murray should continue to have the Regency of Scotland, in the King's Minority? He very resolutely maintain'd, before Queen Elizabeth, "That by the Laws and Customs of that Kingdom, he had the best Right to the Ministry; as being nearer akin to the King, than Murray who was illegitimate. Murray and the King's Commissioners made it out, to the contrary, "That the Regency was to be entrusted, not with the next of kin, but to such as the States should pitch on, as the fittest Persons: And, that it would be unreasonable indeed, to deliver the young King into his Hands, who aspir'd so high, on the score of his Alliance to the Crown, that it may be suspected, his Ambition would prompt him to catch at it, before his time: And, that there was more Reason to be jealous of the Hamiltons, than any other, on this account, Because they bore an inveterate Grudge to the King's Predecessors, the Earls of Lenox; and had barbarously murder'd the King's Great-grand father, by the Father's side; and drove Matthew, the King's distress'd Grand-father, out of Scotland. And this very Hamilton had been very troublesome and vexatious to Henry, the King's Father; and had put his Mother into the King of France's Hands, to get, with the more Ease, his own Foot upon the Throne. Queen Elizabeth, after she had heard this, told Hamilton, that he made a most unreasonable Demand; and order'd him withal, not to leave England, till Murray were return'd into Scotland.

Murray had, just before his Departure, made the Duke of Norfolk (as shall be shewn presently) a subtil kind of Proposal, relating to a Marriage with the Queen of Scots; and had likewise given her, by Melvin, some Shadow of a Hope, that she should be restor'd again to her Kingdom; tho' at the same time he endeavour'd to draw off Queen Elizabeth's Esteem, by spreading false Reports of her, that she had made over her Title to the Succession, to the Duke of Anjou; and that the Conveyance was confirm'd at Rome. He likewise produc'd Letters, whether true, or counterfeit, I do not determine, which the Queen of Scots had written to her Friends; wherein she charg'd Queen Elizabeth with a Breach of Promise, and brag'd of certain Aids she was to receive elsewhere. This indeed gave Q. Elizabeth some Uneasiness, as not being able to ghes on what Grounds this new Dependence was supported: For the Civil-War in France was now grown so flagrant, that the Bishop of Rhemes was sent from the King to Queen Elizabeth, to desire her not to interpose in the Affairs of France; and the Duke of Alva, who came into the Netherlands, the Year before, to extirpate the Protestant Religion, was capable of doing her no Service, his own Hands were so full already.

But it has been since discover'd, and left in Writing by Hieronimo Catena, Secretary to Cardinal Alexandrine, That Robert Ridolph, a Florentine, who had liv'd for a long time a Factor in London, was employ'd by Pope Pius V. (for he durst not, it seems, send a publick Nuntio) to animate the Papists in England, to an Insurrection; a Charge he was very diligent in the Performance of. There arose also some little Suspicion, on the account of some private Conferences, held between Lidington, the Bp. of Ross, and the Duke of Norfolk, at York: The last of which was importun'd by the other two, to use his best Endeavours, for the Preservation of the Queen, under her Afflictions; and an Offer was made him, to marry her, if he pleas'd: But this he modestly declin'd, as not over safe. Nevertheless, he promis'd his best Service to the distress'd Queen, as far as it consist'd with his Honour and Loyalty. This Jealousy was much increas'd, by the frequent Resort of Ligon, the Duke of Norfolk's Servant, and a rank Papist, to Bolton, (a Castle of the Lord Scroop's) where the Queen of Scots resided, in the Custody of Sir Francis Knolles, on pretence only, of paying the Compliment of a Visit to the Lord Scroop's Lady, who was the Duke of Norfolk's Sister. And tho' there could be nothing gather'd from all this, that amounted to a Certainty; yet it occasion'd the Removal of the Queen of Scots, from Bolton, which lay in a Popish Neighbourhood, to Tutbury, a more Inland Part of the Country; where she was committed to the Custody of George Earl of Shrewsbury.

Ann. 11.

Q. of Scots committed to the Earl of Shrewsbury.

'Twas now time for Queen Elizabeth to look well after the Safety of the Church, the State, and her own Person; and the rather, because both the Guises in France, and the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, had begun their Projects laid at Bayonne, for the Extirpation of the Protestant Religion. For in France, the Peace treated of in the Beginning of the Year, dwindled into nothing; and Edicts were publish'd, to prohibit the Exercise of the Reform'd Religion, to displace the Professors of it from any Offices of Trust, and to command the Protestant Clergy to leave the Kingdom, within such a time. And now did they suffer every where extreme Persecution, notwithstanding Queen Elizabeth had solicited very hard, by her Ambassador Norris, that a firm and hearty Peace might be establish'd; and had several times advis'd the King, not to incense 'em by trying odd and dangerous Experiments; but to have a Care of those, in the first place, who, by driving away his best Subjects, endeavour'd to weaken the Power of France, to such

The third Civil-War in France.

1568. Ann. 11. such a degree, as to leave it an easy and ready Prey to those who were inclin'd to disturb it. But when he was deaf to these Intreaties, and rais'd Money and Soldiers out of Italy, Germany, and Spain; the Queen likewise, that she might not baulk the Common-Cause, generously sent 100000 Angels to the Protestants, with Ammunition proportionable, (for they now made a solemn Protestation, that they did not take up Arms against the King, but purely in their own Defence) And she likewise gave a courteous Reception to such of the French, as were forc'd, on the score of Religion, to fly their Country: The same she did to the Netherlanders; who flock'd to England in vast Multitudes; as a Retreat, from the Storm of the Duke of Alva's Cruelties practis'd against 'em. She gave them the Liberty of Settling themselves at Norwich, Colchester, Sandwich, Maidston, and Southampton; which turn'd to the great Advantage of England; for they were the first that brought into the Nation the Art of making those slight Stuffs, call'd Bays and Sajs, and other Linnen and Woollen-Cloths, of the same kind.

Original of the Low-Country Wars. And here, it may not be altogether impertinent, to give a brief Account of the Rise and Causes of the War, which broke out, about this time, in the Netherlands; since 'tis so interwoven with the Affairs of England, that it will of course fall often in my way to mention it.

When the Spaniard could by no means be prevail'd on, to remit any Part of that Severity, which was practis'd in the Low-Countries, on a Religious Account; but tyranniz'd over Mens Consciences, by the Authority of the new-erected Court the Inquisition, and would not permit the States of the United Provinces to assemble and meet, (whereby they were hinder'd from consulting and taking Measures for the Security of their Affairs, the only Remedy they could have Recourse to, under their Calamities) but govern'd 'em by Laws and Statutes, fetch'd from Spain; and not by the Customs and Usages of their own Country: It happen'd, that a few of the Mob rais'd a Tumult, and pull'd down and broke the Images and Pictures in all the Churches. And tho' the Hurly-burly was soon appeas'd, yet the King of Spain, hearkning to those who were for putting a Yoke of Servitude on the Neck of a Free People, tax'd the whole Country with a publick Rebellion, for the private Mutiny a small Number of 'em were engag'd in: And, to let 'em see, their Liberty was now at the last Gasps, he sent Don Ferdinando Alvarez, Duke of Alva, a Person of noted Cruelty, to take upon him the Charge of the Government. This D. of Alva was not in the least Degree ally'd to the Royal Family; but got the supreme Command, contrary to all the Customs and Usages of the Country: Upon which, he stripp'd the Ordinary Provincial Synods of all Authority, erected new Courts of Justice, and condemn'd and executed the Noblemen by incompetent Judges, placing Spanish Garrisons in all the Cities and Towns, and building Forts to keep 'em in awe, and forcibly demanding the Twentieth Penny upon every Alienation of Lands, and the Tenth upon Goods and Moveables. And this ended in a long and dangerous War.

Money sent from Spain to the Netherlands. And defended from the French, by the English. About this time, the Genoa Merchants, and some of Italy, sent a vast Sum of Money out of Spain into the Netherlands, to raise a Bank. 'Twas brought in a great Ship of Biscay, and four lesser Vessels; which, after having been chased by Tury Chastellerie, a Frenchman, and brought off by William Winter, an Englishman, did, with much ado, escape into Plimouth, Falmouth, and Southampton, English Sea-ports. As soon as the Queen heard of it, she order'd the Officers belonging to those Places, to treat the Spaniards very civilly, and protect their Ships against the French. And Gerard de Speft, Knight of the Order of Calatrava, the King of Spain's Ambassador in England, apprehending some Danger from the French, solicited the Queen (who took his Word, that it was the King of Spain's Money) to issue out fresh Warrants, for securing of the Vessels from the French, who lay hard-by, ready to seize 'em. Having obtain'd this, he made a second Address, that the Money might be carry'd thro' England, and so sent, by a safer Passage by Sea, to Antwerp. This likewise the Queen granted, and promis'd them Security both by Sea and Land. In the mean time, the French were very near taking one of the Ships, had they not been beaten off by the English. Therefore to secure the Money, 'twas thought the wisest way to get it landed; but before 'twas all on shore, De Speft, being over-credulous on the wrong side, inform'd the Duke of Alva, that the Queen had seiz'd on the Money: And whilst he was advising with the Duke about the matter, Odet Cardinal of Chastillon, who had retir'd hither from the Troubles in France, gave the Queen Intelligence, that the Money did not belong to the King of Spain, but to certain Merchants of Genoa; and that the D. of Alva design'd to apply it, against their Will and Consent, to the Ruin of the Protestants. Hereupon, a Debate was held in Council, Whether the Money was to be seiz'd or not? Most were of opinion, that the best way would be to send it over into the Netherlands, lest the King of Spain, who was a very potent Prince, should by this means increase the Animosity, he at present bore to the English. But Queen Elizabeth, being certainly inform'd by one or two of the right Owners, who were mightily afraid, lest the Duke of Alva should seize upon it, that it really and solely belong'd to the Merchants, and not one Piece of it to the King of Spain; resolv'd to borrow it of the Merchants, and give 'em Security, as Princes usually do, in the case of Goods found in their Harbours; and as the King of Spain had done himself, not long since. And this she declared to the Spanish Ambassador, when he deliver'd the Duke of Alva's Letters, for sending the Money over; and solemnly promis'd to return the Money, as soon as the King of Spain made it appear, he had a Right to it. Upon the same day, which was the 29th. of December, the Duke of Alva, in a violent Disgust, arrested all the English Goods in the Low Countries, and kept the Owners Prisoners under a Guard; so that one might guess, from the very timing of the matter, that the Duke design'd to aw the English, let the Queen make what Satisfaction she pleas'd for the Money: But she was so far from being scared, that she commanded, by way of Reprisal, that the Netherlanders, their Ships and Goods, should be all seiz'd; which were found to be abundantly more, than the English Merchandize, which the Duke detain'd in the Low Countries; so that he now repented too late of his Proceedings, and that he had brought the Wound to a Gangrene, which at first might have been heal'd with all the Ease imaginable.

The last day but one of this Year, was the last that Roger Ascham liv'd. (The Memory of a valuable Person must excuse a short Digression) He was born in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge, and was one of the first of our Countrymen, that refin'd the Style of the Latin and Greek Tongues, and restor'd 'em to a Purity and Exactness, which deserv'd Commendation. He was for some time Tutor to Queen Elizabeth, and her Secretary for the Latin Tongue; but being too much much addicted to Dicing and Cock-matches, he liv'd and died a poor Man. He left behind him Two excellent Pieces, as Monuments of his Wit; both wrote in English, and entitl'd, the one Toxophilus, and the other Scholarcha. But to return to our History.

The Twelfth Year of her Reign.

Proclamation concerning the Engl. Goods stopp'd, &c.

Spanish Embassador's answer.

On the 6th. of January, came out at London, a Proclamation concerning the Commodities of the English, which the D. of Alva had arrested; wherein there was Mention made of most of those things already touch'd upon; and the Blame was laid upon De Speis, who publish'd another Paper, and signify'd therein, that the said Proclamation was not set forth by the Queen's Order, but in the Queen's Name only, by some, that had no Kindness for the King of Spain, and were dispos'd to favour the Netherland-Rebels. He bestow'd large Encomiums on the Queen, for her former Favours shewn to the Spaniards, was sorry to find her Affections so much warp'd, and took it ill, that his Character found no better Credit; especially when seconded by the Duke of Alva's Letters: He wonder'd that the Money should be detain'd; whereas, in his Judgment, it were more for the Queen's Advantage, to supply the King of Spain with Money, against his bad Subjects, than take any from him, at such a Juncture. In fine, he tax'd her Majesty as the first Aggressor, and excus'd the Proceedings of the Duke of Alva and himself. But this did not satisfy him; and so he dispers'd abroad an Heap of scandalous Libels, that contain'd grating Reflexions upon the Queen's Reputation, under the fictitious Name of Amadis Oriana. For this he receiv'd a Reprimand, and was, for a day or two, kept under a Guard; and the Queen did not fail to remonstrate to the K. of Spain this ill Treatment, tho' to no purpose.

Conspiracy against Cecil.

On the account of the Moneys being detain'd, certain Peers of England, and amongst others, the Marquess of Winchester, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Pembroke, Leicester, and others, began to clamour against Cecil; as they had done once or twice before, about the Supplies sent to the Protestants of France. But the real Cause was this, that they envy'd the Interest he had in the Queen, were jealous of his favouring the House of Suffolk, in the point of the Succession, and apprehended him as a main Bar to the Progress of their Designs. They therefore laid their Heads together, to get him thrown into the Tower, Throckmorton (another of those who could not bear his Greatness) having insinuated to them, that could they once get him clapt up, 'twould be no difficult thing to effect his Ruin. But the Queen had timely Intelligence of these Designs, by what means, I know not; and Cecil had the Happiness of finding the whole Project dash'd by the sole Bravery of his Royal Mistress, who surpriz'd them in the very Instant, and, by the Authority of her Royal Presence, aw'd 'em out of these base Measures. She likewise defeated another Plot of theirs, which was more closely laid; and that was, to proclaim the Queen of Scots undoubted Heir of the Crown, should Q. Elizabeth do otherwise than well: And this was in opposition to a Pamphlet, which was dispers'd, in favour of the Suffolk-Title.

The Spaniards demand the Money.

About this time comes D'Assonville, in the D. of Alva's Name, to require the Money which was seiz'd; but having no Letters of Demand from the Spaniard, he was refer'd, by the Queen, to her Council; to whom he refused, at first, to apply himself: But soon after, he changed his Mind, had an Hearing at the Board, and return'd home, without dispatching the Business he came about.

1569. Ann. 12.

The English Merchants were now setting up a new Factory at Hamburg, in Germany, since the Duke of Alva prohibited all Trade with the English, and appointed Searchers to hinder them from bringing in, or exporting any Goods from the Netherlands: An active and busie Man among these Commissioners, was John Story, an English Renegade-Lawyer, who had practis'd with one Bestall, a sort of Conjurer, against the Queen's Life; and had given the Duke of Alva Directions, how to invade his Native Country. But being kidnapp'd on board a Ship, which was reported to have brought over English Goods, and some heretical Books and Writings, they presently set Sail, and carry'd him to England, where he was afterwards executed; as we shall shew, in its proper Place.

The Duke of Alva, not satisfy'd with what had pass'd, order'd, that no Ships, but Men of War, should sail out of the Netherlands; and that they should attack the English, where-ever they met them. He procur'd the same Game to be play'd in Spain; where the English Merchants and Seamen were hook'd into the Inquisition, condemn'd to the Gallies, and their Goods put to Sale. And the King of Spain sent Letters of Command to the Count of Mont-Agund, Governor of Andaluzia, that no Oil, Allum, Sugar, Spices, or other Commodities of that sort, should be transported to England; supposing that the English, when depriv'd of these Conveniences, would not be long, before they rebell'd: And he dealt likewise with the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Ormond, underhand, to give the Q. what Trouble they could; the one at home, and the other in Ireland; and this they were so loyal and ingenuous as to discover themselves. But no sooner had the Sailors and Seamen an account of all this, but they put to Sea with incredible Chearfulness, on purpose to annoy and rife the Spaniards. So that the Queen was forc'd to restrain them by Proclamations, and to prohibit the buying of any Merchandizes from Privateers.

The D. of Alva enraged against the English.

At this time also was there a stop to the Russian Trade, as well as that with the Netherlands, occasioned partly by the unfaithfulness of the several Factors, and the unhappy Quarrels among themselves; and partly through the Odium they lay under with the Germans and Russians; the latter complaining of their fraudulent Arts in raising the Prices of their Goods; and the Germans and English, that belong'd not to the Russia Company, that they had engros'd the Trade, and set up a Monopoly. To heal these Differences, Sir Thomas Randolph was sent the Year before into Russia. And tho' he was not very welcome to the Emperor, because he not only mention'd the matter of Trade without taking the least notice of the Treaty, which I had occasion to mention in the Year 1567. yet at his request, and out of the profound respect he bore to the Queen and Kingdom of England, he granted the English-Russian Company an Exemption from all Customs, and leave to vend and dispose of their Manufactures where-ever they would through his whole Dominions; and to transport them into Persian and Media by the Caspian-Sea. (the Merchants of other Nations being not permitted to Trade beyond Moscow) He likewise gave them Rope-Houses for twisting their Cables for Shipping; and a woody piece of Ground of five Miles circumference to forge the Iron, and adopted the English for an Opprimey, i. e. for the Elect Seed of his People.

Trade in Russia stopp'd.

The English have new Privileges in Russia.

1569. And now did the English venture up farther in-
 Ann. 12. to those Countries, and transported their Goods
 Their Trade in those Parts along the River Dwina in Boats made of one entire Tree, which they towed and rowed up the Stream with Oars and Halfers, as far as Wo- logda. From thence they carried them seven Days Journey by Land to Yeraslaw; and then thirty Days and as many Nights down the River to Astracan, by the Volga, which is about a Mile over, and runs through a clayish Soil planted with Oaks and Birch-Trees. From Astracan, where they used to build their Ships, they ven-tur'd often (which was a very remarkable and memorable Attempt) to cross the Caspian-Sea, which is full of Flats and Shelves, and made their way through the vast Desarts of Hyrkania and Bactriana to Teverin and Casbin, Cities of Per- sia, in hopes at the long run to discover Cathay.
 But the War between the Turks and Persians encreasing to a great height, and the Robberies committed by the Barbarians being very frequent,
 the Londoners had not stomach to pursue this glorious Enterprize any farther. The Emperor dismiss'd Randolph with Presents, and with him An- dreas Gregorivitz Saviena, with a splendid Retinue, after the fashion of that Country; who found an honourable Entertainment from the City of London, and a courteous Reception at the Queen's Hands. He exhibited a certain Treaty written in Russian Characters, which he insist'd might be confirm'd (by private Letters) in the very same Words, in his Presence, and be translated into the Russian Tongue, and ratify'd by the Queen's Hand and Seal, and Oath; and that the Queen would likewise dispatch an Em-bassador into Russia, in order to receive private Letters from the Emperor to the same purpose, and sign'd with his Hand and Seal, and the Ceremony of Saluting the Cross being to be perform'd at the same time in his Presence. The Queen sign'd the Treaty with a Clause of Reserve. So far as she might lawfully do it without prejudice to any Contracts made with other Princes to support and aid one another against the common Enemy, and so far as might be no infringement of Law or Right.
 And should he be forc'd by any Misfortune of publick Wars or private Treachery to quit his Country, she promis'd him faithfully, on the Word of a Christian Princess, before his Embassador and the chief of her Privy-Council, and con-firm'd it with her Seal, That she would Receive and Entertain him, with his Wife and Children, in a manner becoming so great a Prince, and assign him a convenient Residence, grant him
 the free use of his Religion, and leave him at liberty to depart when he pleas'd: For this was the sum and substance of those private Letters.
 But so far was this from satisfying the wild Caprice of one whose Will was his Law, that he wrote a long Letter stuff'd with the repetition of what Civilities they had found at his Hands;
 upbraiding them as Ungrateful; and was very angry with the Queen for not sending an Em-bassador along with his, to receive his Oath.
 In a word, he taxed the Queen for having neglected his Affairs, and minded only those of her Merchants (matters beneath the Thoughts of a Prince). Then he began to treat the English too with Slights and Affronts, as a sort of People who regarded their own Purse more than their Prince's Honour. And having entertain'd a suspicion, that they might put some stop to his Designs, he threatn'd hard to revoke the Privileges
 he had before granted them. But this he forbore to do, the Queen having sent him a kind and pacifying Letter by Jenkinson, which had this effect, That he ever after consider'd and respected her as his Sister, press'd her at several times to a more solemn Ratification of the Treaty, and retain'd a greater value for the English than any other Nation whatever.

Now when Murray had procur'd himself a safe return into Scotland, by putting the Queen of Scots, the Duke of Norfolk and others, in hopes that he would get her restor'd to the Crown;
 on which account, she had, it seems, prevented the Design of some of her own Subjects, who had resolv'd to way-lay and murder him, he was no sooner got to Edinburgh, but he summon'd together those of the Nobility, who were of the Loyal side, in pretence of consulting with them about the Queen's Restoration. And Hamilton, Duke of Castle-Herault (who was nominated Viceroy by the Queen) and Harris happening to come before the rest, in compliance with the credulous Queen's Letters; Murray fearing the worst, circumvents and imprisons them, without staying for the rest; and then proceeds to harass the rest of the Queen's Friends with all the Calamities of a Civil War.

Hereupon several Reports were spread of Mur- ray over the whole Kingdom: That he had agreed with Queen Elizabeth to send the young King to be Educated in England; That the Castles of Edin- burgh and Sterling were to have English Garisons in them: That Dunbriton was to be put into the Hands of the English: That Murray was to be proclaimed the lawful Successor to the Crown of Scotland, should the King die without Issue: And that he was to hold the Kingdom by way of Grant from the Queen.
 This was so common and general a Report, and carry'd such a face of Probability, as to give the Nation a great deal of Trouble, and to make the Queen herself believe she was concern'd in respect to her own Reputation to clear off these Aspersions. To this end she put forth a Declaration, in which she protested, in the Word of a Queen, That these things were absolutely false, and contriv'd by some who were no well-wishers to either Kingdom: And that there had not been (to her knowledge) any manner of Contract made by Word or Writing between herself or her Ministers and Murray, since he came last into England. But the Earl of Lenox, Grandfather to the young King, requested the Queen, That if his Grandson could not be safe in Scotland from the designing Practices of ill Men, he might be sent into England. She declar'd moreover, That she looked on another Report that went about concerning a Contract between Murray and Her- ford, to be a mere Forgery, the purport of which was this, That they had oblig'd themselves to be mutually Assistant to one another, in seizing on the Crowns of both Kingdoms. To be short, she affirm'd, That it was no fault at all of hers that Things were not rightly concert'd between the Queen of Scots and her Son, and that it should be her business to adjust them. And most certainly the Queen was as good as her word, altho' it was not without some of those Pangs and Conflicts springing from the Jealousie and Emulation which never dies in the Breasts of Princes.
 And which were heighten'd very much by the compassionate Sense she had of the common Frailties of human Nature.

As this Sentiment was more and more increas'd from a view of the afflicted Queen's Circumstances; so did the Queen of England's Fears abate in proportion, when she had receiv'd several Letters from her full of an affectionate Respect, and wherein she promis'd, That in Gratitude for the Civil Treatment she had found,
 as well as in regard to the nearness of Alliance,
 she would be far from attempting any thing against Queen Elizabeth, or from borrowing any foreign Aid in order to her Restoration: Insomuch that the Queen of England used very pressing Mediations with Murray and other Scottish Noblemen, by Wood, Murray's Secretary, for Restoration of the Queen to her Regal Authority. However, that she might at least be permitted to share the Government with her Son; or, if this would not be granted, she might live amongst her own People as a private Person, without any Incroachments upon her Honour, Freedom, or Safety. But Murray was not to be won to any Terms, when he was now mounted to an absolute pitch of Sovereignty.

It was whisper'd about this time, among Persons of better Note, That the Duke of Norfolk was to marry the Queen of Scots. And this several Persons wish'd heartily, according as their Interests ran or their Affections were engag'd. The Papists, they hoped for the Advancement of their Religion by this means; and others promis'd themselves, that the Publick would be the better for it. Most certain it is, that a great many, who observ'd the Queen's averseness to Marriage, and that foreign Princes, who were Enemies to England, consider'd the Queen of Scots as the undoubted Heir of the Crown of England, believ'd it would tend more to the Settlement of Affairs, and the Fixing of the Queen of Scots to just Measures of Government, should she marry the Duke of Norfolk the first Nobleman in England, a Man of popular Interest, and bred up in the Protestant Religion; than should she admit of a foreign Prince, who might, by her help, embroil both Kingdoms, and at last inherit them; whereas 'twas the general wish to have them united in a Person of English Blood, should the young King of Scots do otherwise than well. Nor did they spare some private Endeavours to get him over into England; that since he was Heir to the Crown of it, he might be Educated in the National Religion, and so the more firmly engage the Love and Esteem of the English, be a means of removing all points of Scruple as to the Succession, and free Queen Elizabeth from any apprehensions of danger from the Duke or the Queen of Scots, when she had such a Pledge of Security in her own Hands.

Moreover, to prevent any Enterprize of the Duke's against him, and to excite in him a greater Affection for the young Prince, a Project was put on the Anvil, That the Duke's young and only Daughter should be contracted to him. Among these Projectors, were the Earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Sussex, Pembroke and Southampton, and a great many Barons; as also Leicester himself (but whether his engaging herein had any other aim than the Duke's Ruin, is not certain). However they all agreed in opinion, that the matter ought to be first communicated to the Queen, and pursued as should seem fitting to her Royal Pleasure and Consent, since she was to appoint the Measures for the Security of her Person, Religion and Government. But the substance of this entire Matter I shall give you from the written Confession of the Duke himself, which I have seen; and out of the Diary and Memoirs of the Bishop of Ross, who acted a considerable Part in this Transaction.

When the Commissioners met at York about a Year since, Lidington and the Bishop of Ross propos'd to the Duke, as they were Hawking, a Marriage with the Queen of Scots, the same that Murray did, not long after, at Hampton-Court. Murray, being in private Discourse with the Duke and a few more, made as if he desir'd nothing so much, as that matters might be well compos'd in Scotland, and his dear Sister, the Queen, restor'd to her just Authority, on condition she would pass a general Act of Amnesty for all Faults committed against her by her Subjects. He could not however dissemble his Apprehensions, That should the Queen marry out of France, Spain or Austria, she would be apt to revenge the Indignities she had suffer'd, alter the Religion Establish'd, and involve England in hazardous Circumstances. To prevent all which, he promis'd his utmost Endeavours, that after his Sister had married a mere Boy, and then a wild and improvident young Fellow, (to use his own Expression) she should now enjoy a good Husband and a wise Man in the Person of the Duke; a thing which could not but mightily promote the Tranquillity of both Kingdoms, the Security of the two Queens, and the firm Settlement of Religion itself. And as he, for his part, had an high value and veneration for the Queen of England; so he should make it his study to cultivate and improve a good Understanding between England and Scotland, and by that means reconcile with more ease the Queen of Scots to the Persuasion himself had embrac'd.

The same Thoughts did Murray impart, by Melvin, to the Queen of Scots, and tender'd her his best Offices for the bringing it about. But the Duke made answer, That he could resolve nothing as to a Proposal of that kind, before the Queen stood acquitted of the Crimes laid to her Charge. Yet the Bishop of Ross, after all this Indifference in the Duke, used all possible Essays to work him up to a Compliance. 'Twas not many Days after, that Sir Nicolas Throckmorton meeting the Duke at Whitehall, signify'd to him, after great professions of Respect and Civility, That he understood the Earl of Leicester design'd to transact with him about a Marriage between him and the Queen of Scots, which, Throckmorton said, was very strange to him, because 'twas not long ago that Leicester was carrying on the same Design for himself. But he beg'd leave to advise the Duke as a Friend, That whenever Leicester made such a Motion, he should offer him the advantage of it, as being the first Pretender: But should he insist upon it with any urgency, that then he should decline it, on the score of those heavy Impeachments the Q. lay under. 'Yet I could wish (contin'd Throckmorton) with all my Heart, that she were your own, both for the sake and benefit of the true Religion, and to bring the Queen of Scots to an entire Dependance on the Queen of England. Let me nevertheless leave this Caution with you, to take Leicester's Advice, if you make any farther steps in this matter; for you will hardly compass the Queen's consent without him.

Within a Day or two, Leicester propos'd the matter to the Duke, who made much such an Answer as Throckmorton had advis'd him; and when they came to touch upon the Point of the Queen's Impeachment, Leicester put the best face upon every thing, and made use of Candish his Name and Reputation, whom he recommended to the Duke's Service, tho' he had not the highest opinion of his Fidelity. After this, Leicester broke the matter to the Earl of Pembroke, and the Duke to Arundel; and both they and Throckmorton join in recommending him by several Letters to the Queen of Scots Bed. The Duke likewise sent her another full of amorous Respects, and the offers of his best Service: And from this very time, he made them privy to all the Letters he wrote to or received from her; and there were frequent Conferences held with the Bishop of Ross about the properest means to consummate the Marriage: And in May 1568, they offer'd to the Queen of Scots, by the Hand of Candish, the following Articles, written with Leicester's own Hand.

Secret Consultation upon the rumor of Norfolk's being to marry the Queen of Scots.

1569. Ann. 12.

The Duke's answer.

Leicester proposes the same Marriage.

He proposes the Match to Norfolk.

Murray's Proposal to the Duke of Norfolk.

1569. Ann. 12. 1. That she should attempt nothing to the Prejudice of the Queen of England, or her Heirs, as to the Succession.

Articles of Marriage propounded to the Queen of Scots. 2. That she should make a League Offensive and Defensive between the two Kingdoms.

3. That she should establish the Protestant Religion in Scotland.

4. That she should receive such of her Subjects into Favour as had appear'd against her.

5. That she should revoke her assignment of the Kingdom to the Duke of Anjou.

6. That she should marry some Nobleman of England, and particularly and expressly the Duke of Norfolk, the first Peer of the Realm.

If she would give her consent to these Articles, they engag'd to get the Queen of England's concurrence, and to effect in a little time her restoration to her Crown, and the confirmation of her Title as to that of England. These Terms she readily clos'd with, all but the business of the Treaty, which she could not comply with without consulting the French King. She protested there was no such thing as an Assignment made to the Duke of Anjou; but however, she would procure his Renunciation if requir'd. She advis'd them, in the first place, to secure the Queen's Consent, to keep off any Inconvenience that might arise to the Duke or herself, a thing she had already had a sad experience of in the instance of her Match with the Lord Darly, which was made up without the Queen's privity. However, they thought it best to sift the Inclinations of some more of the Nobility; who, most of them, gave their consents with this proviso, That the Queen were not against it. Neither did the Business meet with any opposition from the Kings of France or Spain; they were only jealous of Murray, that, altho' he had appear'd the most officious Promoter of it, he would at the long run prove the greatest Obstacle to the Design. 'Twas however the general Resolution, That Lidington, who was just then expected, should be employ'd to learn the Queen's Thoughts. The Duke, in the mean time, acquaints the Lord Lumly with all the Steps that had been taken; and with much ado prevail'd on Leicester to allow him the liberty of consulting some other Friends of his about the matter: And not long after he discover'd the business to Cecil, with the consent of the Earl of Pembroke.

A Contrivance on foot to get the Q. of Scots out of Custody. 'Twas about this time that Leonard Dacres was forming a Contrivance to get the Queen out of her Confinement at Whinfield in the County of Derby, in Custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury. Northumberland, who had a hand in the Plot, discover'd the matter to the Duke; but he put a stop to the execution, for fear they should contrive to marry her into Spain, and in hopes too that Queen Elizabeth would in a little time give her consent.

'Twas not long before the Queen had a very full and certain account of this intended Match, by the Intelligence of some Court-Ladies, who are excellent at the discovery of such Intrigues. But when the Duke came to understand this, he earnestly intreated Leicester, both himself and by his Friends Pembroke and Throckmorton, instantly to acquaint the Queen with the whole Proceeding. Leicester used a great many Traverses and Delays, as if he design'd to watch the fairest Opportunity. But Cecil observing a great uneasiness in the Duke, advis'd him to be his own Intelligencer, and remove all Scruples from his own and the Queen's Thoughts, by laying the whole matter before her. Leicester gives him the clean contrary Advice, and promises to break the business to the Queen in her Progress. But whilst he used these fair Words and long Delays, the Queen took the Duke to Dinner at Farnham, and pleasantly advis'd him to be very careful on what Pillow he laid his Head. At last Leicester falls sick at Titchfield, or feigns himself so at least, and the Queen coming to make him a Visit, found his Blood and Spirits withdrew as fast as she apply'd Expressions of Comfort to him. However, he so far recover'd his Fears, as to open to her the whole Business from the very beginning, and beg'd her Pardon with all possible appearance of concern.

After this, the Queen call'd the Duke to her into the Gallery, and roundly reprimanded him for attempting a Match with the Queen of Scots without her cognizance, and commanded him, on his Allegiance, to give over those Pretensions. The Duke made her a very hearty and cheerful Promise, that he would; and, as if he had a very slight regard for the Queen of Scots, was not shy to affirm, That his Estate in England was worth little less than the whole Kingdom of Scotland, in the ill state the Wars had now reduc'd it to; and that when he was at his own Tennis-Court in Norwich, he thought himself at least a Petty Prince. However, his Mettle was considerably abated after this Interview; and when he perceiv'd both in the Queen's Looks and Behaviour a greater Indifference to him than before, that Leicester had now laid aside the Friend, and many of the first Nobility shrinking by degrees from his Interest, and declining his Conversation, paying him now and then, as they happen'd to meet, a short Compliment, and away; he resolv'd to go for London without taking leave; and took up his Residence with the Earl of Pembroke, who gave him all the Hopes and Encouragements he was capable of. The very same Day, the Queen, in a great disgust, refus'd the Suit of the Spanish Ambassador, in reference to the Enlargement of the Queen of Scots; and advis'd her to bear her Condition with less Impatience, or otherwise she might chance to find some, on whom she had grounded her best hopes, the Head shorter in a very little time.

When the report of this Marriage was more and more blazed abroad, and the French Ambassador was mighty Importunate with the Queen to set at Liberty the Queen of Scots, which he did more by the Instigation of some English Gentlemen, than in obedience to the Orders of his Prince, as it afterwards appear'd; fresh Jealousies sprang up on both sides; and Cecil, who had always express'd a most pious concern for Religion and his Country, apply'd himself, with all possible Dexterity, to trace out the matter. To this purpose he wrote Letters to Suffex, Lord-President of the North, who was the Duke's great Familiar and Friend, to request him to let the Queen know the utmost of what related to the Duke's Marriage. What answer he gave, I cannot tell. But whereas it had been observed, that there pass'd several Interviews at Hampton-Court between the Duke and Murray, Regent of Scotland, Sir George Cary, the Lord Hunsdon's Son, was privately sent to Murray, to sift him, whether the Duke had acquainted him with any part of his Design in relation to the Marriage. The Duke in the mean time, terrify'd with a false Report of a Rebellion in the North; and hearing from Leicester, that he was most certainly to go to the Tower, he withdrew himself to Norfolk, designing to continue there till by the management of his Friends at Court the present Storm should blow over, or he could appease the Queen by submissive Letters at that distance. However, he had Spys set over him, who had their Directions to observe his very Looks and Gestures, as well as his general Conduct and Deportment: And 1569. And when he found there was little to be expected from his Friends, and that 'twas the Opinion and Advice of Heydon and Cornwallis, and others of the first Rank and Quality in those Parts, that if he knew himself Guilty, he ought to fling himself upon the Queen's Mercy, he was half-distracted with a throng of different Thoughts and Scruples. The Court, in the mean time, were not without Suspensions and Fears lest this should end in a Rebellion: And 'twas commonly rumour'd, that if it did so, the Queen of Scots was to be put to death. But the Duke, being easie within, and conscious of no ill Designs that might bring him under the charge of High-Treason, (for that Act of Henry VIII. That none should marry with the Children of the Sisters, Brothers, or Aunts of the King, without the King's knowledge, on pain of High-Treason, was, it seems, repeal'd by Edward VI.) and being apprehensive withal, that the Queen of Scots would find the harder Treatment on the score of these popular Surmises, he sent some more Letters to his Friends at Court, to assure and acquaint them, That he had retir'd to his Seat for fear of being imprison'd; desiring them withal, to remove, if possible, those pestilent Reports which had been spread at Court, whither he was now preparing to come, in order to receive the Queen's Pardon.

The Duke returns to Court.

When he was got on his Journey as far as St. Albans, Owen the Earl of Arundel's Man, being privately sent from Throckmorton and the Lord Lumly, (then in Custody) advis'd him, in their Names, to take the whole matter upon himself, without charging Leicester, or any Body else, for fear he should make his Friends his Enemies. At the same Place he was met and complimented by Edward Fitz-Gerard, Brother to the Earl of Kildare, Lieutenant of the Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners; by whom he was convey'd to Burnham, about 3 Miles from Windsor, where the Queen and Court were. Four Days after, the Abbot of Dunfermelin deliver'd Letters to the Queen from Murray makes a discovery of the whole Design.

Murray Regent of Scotland, intimating, That the Duke had been practising with him at Hampton-Court to favour and assist his Marriage with the Queen of Scots; and that he threatned him hard, if he did not comply: That he promis'd to him what Service he could, to prevent a design upon his Life, to be put in execution, upon his return, by one Norton. Whereupon the Duke engag'd for his safe Passage, and that he should not be Assaulted by Norton, or any other. That shortly after, the Duke sent him a Letter, written in private Characters, wherein he desir'd his Concurrence to the Match; and that he sent him Word likewise by Boyd, That he would never forsake the Queen of Scots. And more than all this, That the Ministers of the said Queen had almost possess'd him with a belief, that the Queen of England had consented to the Marriage, and given the Queen of Scots great Encouragement in the Point of Succession. Queen Elizabeth perceiv'd moreover, that she had made several broad signs to some Peers of England, to draw them to her Interest, pretending she had an Affair in hand which would secure the Queen, and promote the Advantage of both Kingdoms.

The Duke, who carry'd on a very cautious Correspondence with the Bishop of Ross, Leicester and Throckmorton, by Letters convey'd in certain Ale-Vessels, or Bottles, was about this time examin'd upon the business of his intended Marriage with the Queen of Scots, and his private Conferences with the Bishop of Ross; and upon confessing a great deal, he was sent to the Tower under the Custody of Sir Henry Nevil, after he had receiv'd a sharp Reprimand for withdrawing from Court without leave, and tax'd with a design to disturb the Tranquillity of the Nation. Two Days after, the Bishop of Ross receiv'd his Examination, and Robert Ridolph, (the Gentleman of Florence) that was so intimate with Ross, and the rest, was committed to Sir Francis Walsingham's custody. The Earl of Pembroke was confin'd to his own House, where he was privately Examin'd; but in respect to his great Age and Quality, he found the Favour of having his Confession not set down in Writing, it being his own Request, because he was not able to Write himself. Certain Noblemen, who were privy to the matter, ask'd the Queen's Pardon, and own'd they had given the Duke their Advice and Consent to the Match, which Murray himself was the first Propounder of, but with this restriction, that all the Parties concern'd stood engag'd to make the Queen acquainted with the Matters before it came to any conclusion. In like manner, the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, who had a share in the Plot, submitted themselves to the Earl of Sussex, Lord-President of the North, and beg'd the favour of his Mediation with the Queen on their behalf. There were likewise several Pamphlets printed against this Match, and in opposition to the Queen of Scots, and her Title to the Succession; but in so pert and sawcy a way, that Queen Elizabeth resolv'd to call them in by a Proclamation; and conniv'd at the Bishop of Ross's putting out an Answer to them. He immediately printed one under the Title of Morgan Philips; wherein he asserted the Honour of his Royal Mistress, defended her Title to the Crown of England, and wrote for the Lawfulness of a Female Reign; for that also was a Subject now in dispute: But he afterwards freely own'd, in his Commentaries, that the Arguments he had produc'd in defence of her Title, as Successor, were privately borrow'd from Sir Antony Brown, Lord-Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas; and Carell, two of the most eminent and judicious Lawyers in England.

About this time arriv'd Chapine Vitelli, Marquis of Cetona, with Letters of a very ancient Date from the Duke of Alva, under colour of composing the Differences about Trade: But in reality, his Errand was to watch the issues of a Rebellion just ready to break forth, and to take the Command of certain Forces which the Duke of Alva had promis'd under-hand to send out of the Netherlands. He had dispatch'd away La-Mot, Governor of Dunkirk, before (as he confess'd himself) in the Habit of a Sailor to sound the Ports: But it appearing that this Marquis had only the Duke of Alva's Commission for what he did, who was no more himself than a Deputy-Governor, there was some scruple made, whether he was to be admitted under the Character of Ambassador or not. Yet the Queen was pleas'd to signifie, that she would consider him as an Ambassador from Spain. But when he produc'd no other Orders than a bare Demand of the Money that had been stop'd, the Queen being much dispos'd to preserve a Peace, advis'd him to procure a more ample Authority for the Accommodation of Matters; which whilst he waited for, there was a current Report of a Rebellion just breaking out in the North of England. There went about a slight Rumour of such a Rising (to fetch the matter something higher) in the beginning of Autumn; but it soon dropt, as having little or no Foundation: But it spread very much in a little time after, by reason of the frequent Consultations of Northumberland, Westmorland, and others; insomuch that Sussex, the Lord-President, sent for them, and examin'd them about the said Report. They confess'd that they had heard such a Rumour, but flatly deny'd that they were the

 Ann. 12. most solemn Affeuerations, that they were ready to venture their Lives for the Queen, against all her Enemies whatsoever. Hereupon they were discharg'd, and commission'd to enquire after the Spreaders of this Report. However, it increas'd to that degree, that the Queen (tho' she was not forward to believe any thing to the Prejudice of Persons of their Quality) commanded, however, the Earl of Suffex to warn them up to London, to avoid Suspicion: But Suffex order'd 'em to meet him, to consult barely about the Affairs of that Province. (On what design is hard to guess at)
 They hereupon made use of dilatory Excuses at first, and soon after flatly refus'd to come; which made the Queen send 'em her peremptory Orders, to appear presently before her, (all Excuses and Pretences apart) to the end she might either awe them out of any rebellious Pursuits, or else drive 'em to that Extreme, before they had Forces and Materials ready for such a Design. For it appear'd not long after, that there were certain Supplies and Recruits from the Scottish Confederates, and from the Duke of Alva, appointed to be landed at Hartlepool, in the Bishoprick of Durham.

As soon as Northumberland had read the Letters, between the Softness of his Nature, and the Consciousness of his Guilt, the Bigottry of his Persuasion, and the Violence of his Resentment for a conceiv'd Wrong done to him, in relation to a rich Copper-Mine found upon his Estate; but which was Granted away from him, by Vertue of the Queen's Right to Royal Mines; yet not without some Reserve of Favour to be expected from the Queen: he seem'd to labour under a very great Suspense, whether 'twere best to apply to her Majesty, to seek his Safety by Flight, or fairly turn Rebel. His Friends and Servants, who were ripe for Mischief and Sedition, observing their Master's Cowardice and Irresolution, alarm'd him at Midnight with the surprising Cry, That Oswald, Ulthrop, and Vaughan, his Enemies, were ready, with Arms and Men, to take him Prisoner. They intreated him not to betray himself, his Friends, and the Faith of his Ancestors; and represented to him, that the Catholicks were ready, all England over, to assert the Romish Religion, and that the Bells were rung backwards almost in every Parish, to encourage the People to an Insurrection. At this the Earl in a Panick Fear got out of Bed, and withdrew to a Lodg in his own Park, near Topcliff; and the next Night he retir'd to Branspeth, a Seat belonging to the Earl of Westmoreland; where he found a great Number of People, who were no Strangers to the Secret.

Pretences
 of the Rebels.

The better to raise and amuse the Multitude,
 some were commanded to arm themselves, and join their Forces in the Queen's Defence: Others were possess'd, that all the Peers of England did now act in Conjunction with them, for the restoring of Popery: To others they pretended, that they were forc'd to take up Arms, to prevent the Encroachments of Upstarts, upon the ancient Nobility of England, and the Betraying thereof to a foreign Power. Under this colour, they broke out into an immediate Rebellion, and were the first that disturb'd the Tranquility of the Nation, which had now lasted Eleven Years without Interruption, under the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. Nicolas Morton, a Priest, was the great Incendiary, who had been sent from the Pope, to pronounce Queen Elizabeth an Heretick; and therefore to have no farther Right to her Crown and Kingdom. 'Twas not long before they publish'd a Manifesto, declaring, That they took up Arms with no other Design, than to restore the Religion of their Ancestors, to remove ill Counsellors from the Queen, to restore the Duke and other faithful Peers, who were depriv'd of their Title and Honour, to their Liberty and the Queen's Favour; and, that they attempted nothing against the Queen, to whom they vow'd a most constant Fidelity and Allegiance. They likewise sent Letters to the Papists all round the Kingdom; sent the and advis'd 'em to come in to their Assistance: But But so far were they from joining with them,

 that most of 'em sent the Letters they had re-ceiv'd, with the Bearers thereof, to the Queen:
 Every one strove who should be foremost in the Tenders of his Service, and the Offers of his Purse and Person, towards reducing the Rebels.
 Nor was Norfolk himself the last, upon this occasion; so that from hence the Queen had a fair Opportunity of discerning the good Affection of her Subjects towards her; and was not backward in acknowledging the abundant Goodness of God to her, upon that account.

The Rebels march'd first to Durham, a Bishop's See hard-by; where they abus'd and defac'd all the English Bibles and Books of Common-Prayer, which they found in the Churches. From thence they proceeded, by small Journeys, saying Mass in all Places they came to, and marching in their Ranks, with Colours flying (some of 'em bearing the Five Wounds of Christ, and others the Chalice) whilst Richard Norton, a Reverend old Gentleman, bore a Cross, with a Streamer, before them, as far as Clifford-Moor, not far from Wetherbey; where they made a Muster, the 12th day after the Insurrection commenc'd; and rekon'd not above 600 Horse, and 4000 Foot. Having learnt here, that the Queen of Scots, (upon whose Account they had undertaken this Rising) was remov'd from Tutbury to Covenry, a very strong City; and committed to the Custody of the Earls of Shrewsbury and Huntington;
 That Suffex was just by them, with a strong Party of new-raisd Forces; That Sir George Bowes was behind them, with a choice Detachment, and had fortify'd Bernard-Castle; And that the Lord Scroop and the Earl of Cumberland had strengthened Carlisle, and were then raising a Body of Men; they retir'd back almost the same way they came, and got to Raby, the chief Seat of the Earl of Westmoreland: From thence they made a Fetch, and besieg'd Bernard-Castle; which, for want of Provision, was soon oblig'd to surrender upon Terms; Sir George Bowes, with his Brother Robert, and the Soldiers of the Garrison, being permitted, by the Agreement, to march out with their Arms.

On the same day they were proclaim'd Traitors to their Country, and Suffex march'd against them with 7000 Men, attended with Edward Earl of Rutland, the Lord Hunsdon, the Lord Evers, and the Lord Willoughby of Parham. As soon as Suffex was come to Aukland, the Rebels fled in great Consternation, to Hexham; and soon after straggld in Companies, and by private Roads, to Naworth-Castle: Where, receiving Intelligence, that the Earl of Warwick, and Clinton Lord Admiral, pursu'd 'em closely with 12000 Men, from the South of England, the Two Earls, with a small Company besides, withdrew themselves, unknown to the rest, into the Neighbourhood of Scotland. Northumberland was forc'd to skulk in some of the poor Cottages at Hartlaw, among the Grahams, who were notorious Robbers, and,
 after some time, betray'd him into Murray's hands.
Westmoreland was conceal'd by Carr of Ferniburgh, and Buckluy; and at last made his Escape, with some few Englishmen, into the Netherlands; where he liv'd wretchedly poor to the last, under a slender Pension allow'd him by the King of Spain.
 The rest, being dispers'd several ways, made a shift

1569. shift to save themselves, some by Flight, and others by lying hid. Threescore and Six Petty-Ann. 12. Constables were hang'd up at Durham, for an Example; and among 'em the most noted Mutineer was one Plomtree, a Priest. At York were executed Simon Digby, J. Fultorpe, Thomas Bishop, Robert Peneman; and a few Months after, at London, Christopher and Thomas Norton; and some others in other places.

66 Petty-Constables executed.

After this, some of the first-rate Malecontents were convicted of High-Treason, and outlaw'd; viz. Charles Earl of Westmoreland, Thomas Earl of Northumberland, Anne Countess of Northumberland, Daughter to Henry Earl of Worcester, Edw. Dacres of Morton, John Nevel of Leversage, J. Swinborne, Thomas Markenfeld, Egremont Ratcliff, the Earl of Sussex's Brother, Christopher Nevil, Richard Norton of Norton-Coniers, Christopher, Marmaduke and Thomas of the Norton-Family, Robert and Michael Tempest, George Stafford, and about Forty more, of Noble Extraction. The Conviction and Outlawry of these Gentlemen, was confirm'd in the next ensuing Parliament; and the rest who had no Estates, and did not fly for't, receiv'd their Pardon.

A new Rebellion breaks out

Thus came this Rebellion to an happy End, Chapine Vitelli, who, as I before observ'd, was privy to this Design, seeming to stand in Admiration, before the Q. and several of the Lords, that so great a Flame was so suddenly extinguish'd; tho' it stung him to the quick, that his Errand into England was, by this means, so foully disappointed. But the Embers of this Rebellion were not so totally quench'd; for they afforded Sparks enough, to burst into a new Flame, at Naworth in Cumberland, near a Place call'd Valium Severi, or The Picts-Wall. The Bellows to this Blaze was Leonard Dacres, second Son to William Lord Dacres of Gilleland. It happen'd, that the Lord Dacres, the Nephew of this Gentleman, by his elder Brother, died young, as I before hinted; and it stuck very much in his Stomach, that so plentiful an Estate would, by the Law, descend to his Nieces, who were contracted, by the D. of Norfolk, their Father-in-law, to Two of his Sons: On which account he enter'd a Suit against 'em. But the Cause going against him, he fell to plotting, and siding with the traitorous Party; and attempted (tho' in vain) to rescue the Queen of Scots from her Confinement: But when he saw the Rebellion was in a greater Forwardness than he expected, and that the Rebels were proclaim'd Traitors; whilst he was at Court, as he was introduc'd to kiss the Queen's Hand, he offer'd her Majesty his best Service against the Rebels, and thereupon was sent home again: But, as it appear'd afterwards, he held Correspondence with them, by the way; sent 'em encouraging Messages, and Promises withal, of great Matters from the Ambassadors of foreign Princes; and among other things, that he would be sure to make use of the Forces he had rais'd in the Queen's Name, to cut off the Lord Scroop, Warden of the West-March, and the Bishop of Carlisle. Which not being able to do, he sent commendatory Letters after those Earls who were making for Scotland, seiz'd on the Castle of Greystock, and the other Seats belonging to the Dacres, and fortify'd Naworth-Castle, as his own, by Right of Inheritance: Then, under pretence of securing his own Estate, and resisting the Rebels, he got together a Gang of 3000 bordering Robbers, and others who had a Respect for the very Name of Dacres; as being by much the noblest Family in those Parts.

Against these the Lord Hunsdon march'd, with the Garrison-Troops of Berwick; and they not daring to trust to their Fortifications, came on to encounter them; and being flank'd with their Cavalry, and plac'd in a Triangle, prepar'd to receive them, at the little River Gelt. The Fight was hotly maintain'd on both sides, and Leonard (tho' he was crook-back'd, yet) perform'd every thing that could be expected from a brave Commander: But having lost a great many of his Men, he was forc'd to quit the Field to Hunsdon, (tho' it cost him dear) and retire, as well as he could, to the nearest Part of Scotland; from whence soon after he went over into Holland, and ended his Days at Louvain, in a poor Condition; insomuch that his Father, who on his Death-bed pray'd to God to afflict him plentifully, for his Disobedience, seem'd to have something in him of the true Prophet. The Lord Hunsdon retook the Castles, and deliver'd them to the Care of Norfolk's Servants; and the Q. publish'd an Act of Indemnity to all that had taken up Arms in the late Rebellion.

1569. Ann. 12.

Rebels are routed.

Altho' the Queen had her Hands full of these Disorders at home, yet was she not wanting either in Assistance or Commiseration to the poor distress'd Hugonots of France: For having press'd the several Princes of the same Persuasion, to lend their Hands to the Common-Cause; she supply'd the Queen of Navarre with Money, and took her Jewels as a Pledge; and also permitted Henry Champernoon (whose Cousin-German Gawin had marry'd the Earl of Montgomery's Daughter) to command a Regiment of Volunteers, consisting of 100 Gentlemen, all well mounted, into France; and with this Motto in his Colours, Finem det mihi Virtus, viz. Let Valour decide the Cause. In this List of Volunteers, were Philip Butshide, Francis Barkley, and Walter Raleigh, a very young Person, who now first began to be taken notice of. These things were no Secret to the French King, who, out of a Design to drain the Wealth of England, which flow'd away apace in the Relief of the French Protestants; or to divert it at least into some other Channel, resolv'd to raise a new Combustion in Scotland, by sending Supplies to those, who maintain'd the Castle of Dunbriton, for the Queen of Scots. To this purpose, he design'd to dispatch thither Sebastian Martignes, a Person eminent enough for Martial Exploits; but he happen'd to be shot at the Siege of S. John d'Angeli; and so this Stratagem fell to the Ground.

Q. Eliz. assists the Protestants in France.

Nor was Ireland at this time free from some Commotions: For Edmund and Peter Boteler, Brothers to the Earl of Ormond, after they had insulted their Neighbours in Munster, grew too big to be restrain'd within the Bounds of Law, and destroying the Queen's good Subjects with Fire and Sword, they enter'd into a Confederacy with James Fitz-Moris, of the House of Desmond, Mac-Artimore, Fitz-Edmund Steward of Imokelly, and others; to do all they could, in Conjunction with the Bishop of Rome and the Spaniards, to maintain Popery, and dispossess Queen Elizabeth of her Kingdom of Ireland. Hereupon, they were proclaim'd Traitors, and Sir Peter Carew the elder had several Skirmishes with them, but with various Success. Nevertheless, they at last got together a Gang of desperate Fellows, and besieg'd Kilkenny; commanding the Citizens to deliver Warham St. Legere's Wife, into their Hands. But being repuls'd by several Sallies from the Garrison, they made a miserable Waste of the Country all about: And to feed and pamper the Mutineers Humour to the Height, Juan Mendoza was sent privately from Spain, when at the same time came the Earl of Ormond out of England, to compose and direct it; and had the Good-luck to effect his Design, by prevailing on his Brothers to submit themselves, which they did; but were never-1569. nevertheless imprison'd, tho' the Earl prevail'd so effectually with the Queen on their behalf, that they were not brought to their Trial, as their Offences deserv'd: For he could not but be much concern'd, that they should prove the Instruments of bringing such a Slur on so noble a Family. That which went a great way to procure this Grace, was, the near Relation between them and the Queen, who us'd sometimes to triumph and please herself in the unsully'd Grandeur of this Family. But the Lord-Deputy briskly pursu'd the remaining Parties of the Rebels; and, by the Help of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, soon routed and dispers'd 'em.

In Ulster likewise they were up in Arms; for Furlough Leinigh was so wavering himself, and kept such restless Ministers about him; that War and Peace were a kind of alternate Diversion to him. But if the English Garrisons were not able to curb his Exorbitances, the High-landers knew how to keep him within Bounds, by quitting the lean Pastures of their own Islands, and making bold with the Forage of his fatter Country: But to prevent their Incursions on that side, there were several large Sums sent out of England, to fortify the Sea-Coast. But all to no purpose; by reason of an Inconvenience common to England, as well as Ireland; where for the most part such Men push forward, and are countenanc'd and employ'd, as are so wholly engag'd in their own, that they absolutely neglect the publick Interest.

ELIZABETH,

Anno 1570.

Queen of ENGLAND.

BOOK II.

The Thirteenth Year of her Reign.

THE Rebellion in England being now suppress'd, Murray, Regent of Scotland, did all he could to have the Queen of Scots in his Hands. To this end he offer'd Hostages, promis'd to deliver up the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, and by his means the Bishop of Ross, the suppos'd Author of the Rebellion, is committed to the Custody of the Bishop of London. Then, to ingratiate himself with Queen Elizabeth by some meritorious Exploit, in January he entred that Part of Scotland which borders upon England, at the Head of an Army, in search of the English Rebels: A few of them he took, but those of no Note; till at last he seiz'd upon the Earl of Northumberland, betray'd by his Host as he lurk'd among the Pillagers on the Frontiers. Him he sent Prisoner to Lough-Levin, and put the Borderers under severe Hardships.

He is slain.

But the same Month, when, after the Fatigues he had endur'd, he seem'd now secure, he was shot below the Navel by one in Ambuscade, as he was riding through the Streets of Limnuch, by the Scots call'd Lithquo. One Hamilton was the Assassin, who presently fled over to France, where he liv'd for several Years after, often declaring that he reveng'd himself thus privately of Murray, since his Patience could no longer away with the Injustice he had done him. For Murray, because of his Loyalty to the Queen, had proscrib'd him, clapt him up in Prison, and threatn'd often to hang him, till he had surrender'd up a Farm that fell to him by his Wife to a Creature of Murray's. Upon this the Woman fell distracted, and he himself in a rage broke out of Prison, and committed the Murder. Nor could he afterwards be persuaded in France, tho' look'd upon as a Man of a daring Spirit, to attempt the like against the Admiral Coligny; giving out, That he had indeed, to his Sorrow, reveng'd his own just Grievances, but that neither Reward nor Interest should draw him on to revenge another Man's Quarrel.

Various Opinions of him.

Hereupon all Britain was full of Discourse about the Regent's Murder, many making Wonders of Trifles; such as his Mother's Dream after her Night's Lodging by stealth with King James V. of a Lion and a Dragon fighting together in her Womb. But the more sober Persons pass'd their Judgments upon him, according to the Party they sided with. Some commended him for expelling the Romish Religion out of Scotland, for preserving the young King, for his impartial administration of Justice, and for his Bounty to learned Men, especially Buchanan. Others blam'd him, for making a Cloak of Religion, the better to enrich himself and his Creatures with the Spoils of the Church; for his most unaccountable Ingratitude to the Queen his Sister, to whom he was many ways obliged; and for his unmanly insulting over her Female Weakness. And these, by their Surmises and Conjectures, and from the bad Inclinations of several that are base-born, guessed, that he who had outed the Mother of her Kingdom, would hardly spare the Son. The Queen of Scots was troubled that he met with so sudden and violent a Death, before he had (as she said) repented seriously of his Offences to God, his Country and his Prince. But the English that favour'd Norfolk, accus'd him, as far as they durst, as a sly and cunning Dissembler.

The Night after the Regent's Murder, Thomas Carr of Fernihurst, and Walter Scot of Buckluy, two of the stoutest Men among the Scotch Borderers, great Loyalists to the Scottish Queen, and who for their adhering to her Interests were banish'd and outed of all they had, brake the Peace, made an Incurion into England at the Head of the Scots and some English Rebels, and laid waste the Frontiers with Fire and Sword. This they did to be reveng'd of the Queen of England, because for her sake the late Regent had used the Borderers so severely. Upon this Mr. Thomas Randolph was sent Express into Scotland, to represent before the Scottish Lords, in a publick Assembly, this so great an Injury; and to inform them, That if they (because of the Disorders now in Scotland) could not suppress the Violators of the Peace, the Queen would with her Forces chastise the Offenders, without hurting the Innocent. There was no Answer made to this, because they had not as yet appointed a Regent. Yet, to protect the English Borderers from Wrong, and to curb the Insolence of the Enemy, the Earl of Suffex receiv'd Orders to levy Forces, and march against Buckluy and Fernihurst; with Instructions only to fight those who had lately, with the English Rebels, invaded and ravaged England, or had or should countenance the English Rebels, contrary to the Confederacy. Nor could he be staid, tho' the Earls of Argyle and Huntley, who favour'd the Queen of Scots, sent Treboun to crave a Truce till they could inform Queen Elizabeth of the Scotch Affairs: But when they could not dissuade her from

1570. from prosecuting her Designs, they first fell to Threating, and then to Praying and Beseeching her, that certain Laws enacted and established in Scotland the last two Years, might be repealed.

The English revenge themselves

Nevertheless, in the middle of April, Sussex, with the Lord Hunsdon and Drury Marshal of Berwick, entred Scotland with an Army; and coming into Tividale, laid waste great part of the County, burning all the Towns and Villages belonging to Buckluy and the two Carrs, and plundering all their Estates; the two Castles of Fernibury and Crailing, belonging to Thomas Carr, were raised, and demolished: While, at the same time, Henry Lord Scroop entering the Western Borders of Scotland, laid waste the Estate and Possessions of Johnson in Anandale, and plunder'd some others, who, with him, had favour'd the English Rebels; and in these Expeditions three hundred Towns and Villages were burnt, and near fifty Castles demolished.

Within a few Days, Sussex, with the L. Hunsdon, makes a second Inroad into Scotland, and lay down before Humes Castle, whither the English Rebels used to fly: And after he had batter'd it with his Ordnance, it surrender'd upon Articles. There were not above two of the Rebels found therein, who were immediately hang'd, and a Garrison put in the Castle. After which Drury was sent to besiege Fest Castle, another Fort belonging to the Lord Humes, which was soon yielded up to him.

They aid the King's Party in Scotland.

When the English Rebels had now betaken themselves to the utmost Parts of Scotland, and joining with others of the same Stamp with themselves, threatned the Borderers in England, and the Royalists in Scotland, with Fire and Sword; Sussex, at Drury's return, sent him back again seven Days after into Scotland with 1200 Foot and 400 Horse; who at Coldingham receiv'd Hostages for the Earls of Angus, Morton, Murr and Glen-carne; and for the Barons of Reurven and Lindsey, who had with much ardency invited in the English. Afterwards Sussex himself, attended by Sir George Cary, Sir Thomas Mannours, Sir Robert Constable, (whom with Drury he had knighted) Hierom Bons William Knolls, Tho. Brickwell, Robert Games, Elvington, Carrit, and other Commanders, march'd to Edinburgh, and join'd his Forces with the said Earls, and with Lenox newly return'd from England; tho' at the same time they suspected he favour'd Norfolk and the Q. of Scots Party. They march'd by Lithquo to Glasgow, from whence Hamilton D. of Chastel-Herauld had withdrawn himself. From thence they drew off to Hamilton-Castle, which after the great Guns had play'd against, was soon surrender'd, and half demolished. They likewise fired a goodly Town of the Hamiltons, laid waste their Territories all over Chisdall, and in their return did the same to Hamilton's Palace at Lithquod.

They take Hamilton Castle.

Lenox made Regent of Scotland.

Now the Lords of Scotland that were of the King's Party having removed the Hamiltons, and the rest which had stood for the deposed Q. met together about choosing a new Regent, and sent for Queen Elizabeth's Counsel. Her Answer was, That she would not concern herself in the creating a Regent, lest she might seem to act in prejudice to the Queen of Scots, whose Cause was not yet decided. But they created Matthew Earl of Lenox, the Queen's Grandfather, first of all Interrex, and soon after Regent, Queen Elizabeth not opposing it. For she knew he would out of natural Affection be most tender of his young Grandson, and most affectionate to the English for the Civilities he had receiv'd; and doubred not but he would be at her devotion, since she had his Wife in her power.

Whilst Queen Elizabeth thus favour'd the Royalists in Scotland, the Spaniard was not wanting to the Captive Queen; but by the contrivance of Hamilton, Rector of the Church of Dunbar, sent privately out of the Netherlands great store of Arms and Powder, seven great Guns, and some Money, to Huntley, the Queen's Lieutenant in Scotland. In the mean time Huntley, the Duke of Chastel-Herauld and Argyle, the Queen's Lieutenants, agreed, by the Queen's consent, to dispatch George Lord Seaton in Quality of Ambassador to the Duke d'Alva; who having Audience, deliver'd himself in these Terms. 'That he was sent from a Kingdom depriv'd of its publick Peace, and of a most excellent Prince, thro' the Treachery of disloyal Subjects. That the sum of his Embassy was this: They desir'd that Supplies might be sent over to redeem the Q. from a wretched Captivity in a strange Land, and the Realm from the Oppression of Foreigners. That the Scotch Rebels might be prohibited from Trafficking in the Spanish Dominions; and that the Ten thousand Ducats promised to the Queen of Scots, might be paid. That the Queen had thrown herself under the Spaniards Protection, as one whose sole regard was to Honour, Justice and Piety, (Objects most worthy of a Catholick Prince). That she made use of the Duke d'Alva as a Mediator, on whose Endeavours did depend the performance of those laudable Intentions of his Catholick Majesty. That he could propose no Advantage to the Spaniard hereby, that being a thing unworthy of so great a Monarch: But that he offer'd him the eternal Alliance of a most renowned Queen, and of a very valiant Nation, and their assur'd Submission with thankful Hearts. That the Glory of his Father Charles I. was spread over all the World, by restoring the Duke of Florence and the Mahometan Prince to their former Dignity. But should he restore a Christian Queen, a constant Favourer of the Christian Religion, an absolute Princess, ally'd both by Blood and Confederacy to the greatest Princes in Christendom, and the most undoubted Heir of two most flourishing Kingdoms; how glorious a Thing would that be, and how incomparable an Argument of his Piety? That hereby he might not only oblige France, Denmark, Lorain, the Guises, his Holiness, and the whole Catholick Church in general; but likewise, by following his Father's Example, in relieving and restoring deposed Princes, he might equal, yea and far transcend his Father's Glory. That it highly concern'd him to revenge this dangerous Example of deposing Hereditary Kings, since he was the greatest Monarch of Europe, and his own Dominions being so far asunder, might very easily be expos'd to the like Insolency. Neither could there be offer'd him a more signal or advantageous Mark of Justice. For by restoring her, he would entirely bring over to his Alliance and Confederacy, a Queen-Dowager of France, an Absolute Queen of Scotland, the undoubted Heir of England, and the whole Scottish Nation, whose unshaken Fidelity in observing the League with France ever since the Reign of Charles the Great, is very well known to the whole World. Besides, (had he a Mind worthy of himself) by this means he had an opportunity of revenging the Wrongs offer'd him by the Queen of England, who favours his Rebels in the Netherlands, had intercepted his Money, abus'd his Ambassador, and seiz'd upon his Subjects Goods. That to lie still till Scotland should have submitted to the Queen of England, would argue him to be supinely Careless and Slothful. That this Woman,

1570. Ann. 13. man having made such an addition to her Empire, and secur'd all at Home, would be a Terror to her Neighbours; and her Masculine Spirit, join'd with the Humour of her Sex, that is always ambitious of Command, would soon find out Methods of involving Spain in a long War. But were her Designs prevented, she might soon be curb'd with the fearful apprehension of her own Condition; since the Captive Queen had but few Enemies in Scotland; most of the Nobility, and generally all the Catholicks of both Kingdoms on her side, and all the Ports of Scotland in her power: And for carrying on so Holy a War as this, his Majesty would not spare the very Revenues of the Church. The only thing now wanting is, That his Catholick Majesty would do his utmost in so just, so pious, and so blessed a Cause. From him alone all the Catholicks of Britain do now expect either their Happiness, or their final Ruin.

The Duke d'Alva's answer.

The Duke d'Alva reply'd, That he would freely and readily do his utmost to promote this Business with the King of Spain; but that he could not prohibit the Commerce of the Scotch Rebels, since it was contrary to the Privileges of the Netherlands: But as for the Money, he promis'd it should be forthwith paid. In the mean time Seaton, the better to oblige the Spaniard and the Duke d'Alva, went in Disguise to the Confederate Netherlands, and by smooth Words, Feastings, and other insinuating Artifices, drew the Scots that serv'd under them to revolt; and when he was to be Tortur'd for it, he narrowly escap'd with his Life to the Duke d'Alva, who promis'd him six Months Pay for Ten thousand Men. But it came to nothing, since by reason of the great Disorders in the Netherlands, he could send no Men into Scotland.

In the mean time the Bishop of Ross, (who had industriously solicited the Queen of Scots Affairs in England, and had been committed to the Custody of the Bishop of London, as the private fomenter of the late Rebellion) being now set at Liberty, procur'd the French King, by his Ambassador and Montluc, to be Earnest with Queen Elizabeth for the Delivery of the Queen of Scots: They complain'd of her close Confinement, and that under the Earl of Huntington, her most bitter Adversary and Competitor, for that he made as open Pretensions to the Kingdom of England as the did. The same thing, by the procurement of Ross, was very strongly urg'd by the Spanish Ambassador in his Mistress's Name. But the Queen, after she had reckon'd up the many fly Stratagems some had used to set the Queen of Scots at Liberty, (whom she obscurely tax'd as accessory to the late Rebellion) answer'd, 'That it would be a piece of inconsiderate and most dangerous Folly to set her at Liberty, who by unlawful Artifices so openly aspir'd to the Kingdom of England: That necessity had forc'd her to confine her more closely, to cut off some of her superfluous Train, and to join the Earl of Huntington (whom she acknowledg'd indeed to be her Kinsman, but yet had no Right to the Crown) with the Earl of Shrewsbury, her former Keeper, who lately began to suspect the Trustiness of his own Servants, many of whom he had perceiv'd were daily drawn in to favour the Queen of Scots. That notwithstanding this, the Earl of Huntington had been remov'd from her some time ago. She likewise promised, That she would do all she could to compose Matters between the Queen of Scots and her Subjects. And withal protested, she would not revenge the Injuries she had receiv'd. But yet she hoped, the French King, the Spaniard, and the Queen of Scots, would give her leave to provide for her own and her Peoples Security and Quiet, according as Nature, Reason, and her Princely Reputation or Honour justly require. If any of them could devise a more likely Expedient to ward off the Danger, she would very willingly hearken to it and embrace it.

After this, there were frequent Debates at Court, whether the Queen of Scots should be sent Home, or kept still in England? And how the Safety of the Kingdom, the Queen, and Religion, might be best secur'd?

At this juncture, William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, the Son of Richard, Son of William Herbert Senior Earl of Pembroke, presaging some Disaster to himself, departed this Life in his Climacterical Year; leaving behind him three Children, Henry, Edward, and Ann; and, after a stately Funeral, was laid under a sumptuous Monument in St. Paul's Church. An extraordinary Man, who was in some sort the raiser of his own Fortune. With Henry VIII. he got into great Favour, and was made his Chamberlain. By his wife Conduct he encreas'd his Wealth, especially after the King had married Katharine Parr, his Wife's Sister. Under Edward VI. whilst the Court was distracted with Factions, he was made Knight of the Garter, Master of the Horse, Baron Herbert of Caerdiff, and Earl of Pembroke. Under Queen Mary, he commanded her Forces against Wiat, was General of the English Army at St. Quintin's, Lord-President of Wales, and twice Governor of Calais. Under Queen Elizabeth he was made Great Master of the Household; whose Favour he lost for a time, because he was the chief Promoter of Norfolk's Marriage with the Queen of Scots, tho' he had no ill Design in it. After he was dead, they were ready to proscribe him upon some Discoveries made, and some strong Presumptions against him.

Pius V. Bishop of Rome, who had hitherto carried on his Designs privately against Queen Elizabeth; and the last Year, by his Declaratory Bull, without any previous Admonition or Citation, had pass'd a private Sentence of Excommunication, and rais'd rebellions against her, now caus'd the same to be publish'd and fix'd upon the Bishop of London's Palace Gates, in these Words.

A Declaratory Sentence of Pope Pius V. against Elizabeth the pretended Queen of England, and the Hereticks her Adherents. Wherein likewise all her Subjects are declar'd absolv'd from their Oath of Allegiance, and any other Duty they owe unto her: And whoever shall henceforward obey her, are included in the same Curse.

A Bull publish'd against the Queen.

Pope PIUS, the Servant of God's Servants, for a standing Memorial of the matter.

'He that Reigneth on high, to whom is ascrib'd all Power both in Heaven and Earth, hath committed the Absolute Government of his One, Holy, Catholick and Apostolick Church (out of which there is no Salvation) to only One upon Earth, namely, to Peter, the chief of the Apostles, and to Peter's Successor, the Bishop of Rome. Him alone has he made Prince over all Nations and Kingdoms, to pluck up, destroy, scatter, consume, plant, and build; that he may preserve the Faithful (knit together with one common Band of Charity) in the Unity of the Spirit, and present them safe and sound to their Saviour. In the discharge of which Function, We, who are by the divine Favour call'd to the Government of 1570. Ann. 13. the said Church, spare no Labour; but strive earnestly, that Unity and the Catholick Religion (which, for the Trial of the faithful, and our Amendment, hath, by its Author's Permission, been expos'd to so many Troubles) might be preserv'd entire. But the ungodly are grown so numerous and powerful, that now there is no Place in the Universe, but what they have endeavour'd to taint with their most pernicious Doctrines: To which, among others, Elizabeth, the pretended Queen of England, abandon'd to all Wickedness, is an Abettor; under whose Protection the most profligate Persons have found a Retreat. Which very Woman, having seiz'd on the Kingdom, and wickedly usurp'd to herself the Supremacy over the whole Church of England, and the chief Authority and Jurisdiction thereof; has reduc'd that Kingdom to a miserable Apostacy; which had been so lately reclaim'd to the Catholick Faith, and a thriving Condition.

For having strictly prohibited the Exercise of the true Religion, (which Mary, the lawful Queen, of famous Memory, had, by the Assistance of this See, restor'd; after it had been lately suppress'd by Henry VIII. an Apostate therefrom) and following and embracing the Errors of Hereticks; she has dissolv'd the Privy-Council, consisting of the English Nobility, and fill'd it up with Hereticks of an obscure Descent; suppress'd the Embracers of the Catholick Faith, and set up, in their stead, wicked Preachers, and Ministers of Impiety; abolish'd the Sacrifice of the Mass, Prayers, Fastings, the Choice of Meats, Celibacy, and the Rites of the Catholick Church; and commanded Books containing in them downright Heresie, to be publish'd throughout the whole Realm; and order'd impious Rites and Ceremonies (which she herself entertain'd and observ'd, according to Calvin's Institution) to be likewise observ'd by her Subjects; presum'd to eject Bishops, Rectors, and other Catholick Priests, out of their Churches and Benefices; and to bestow them, and other Church-Livings, on Hereticks; and to determine Ecclesiastical Causes; prohibited the Prelates, Clergy, and Laity, from acknowledging the Church of Rome, or obeying its Injunctions, and Canonical Sanctions; compell'd most of 'em, by Oath, to submit to her wicked Laws, to abjure the Authority and Obedience of the Pope, and to acknowledge her the sole Head over Temporal and Spiritual Matters; impos'd Penalties and Punishments upon those who obey'd not her Commands, and executed 'em upon those who continu'd in the Unity of the Faith, and their former Obedience; cast the Catholick Prelates and Rectors of Churches into Prison, where many of 'em, worn out with continual Afflictions and Grief, have died miserably. All which things are so manifest and notorious to the whole World, and confirm'd by the serious Testimony of so very many; that no Excuse, Defence, or Evasion can be made. We therefore, seeing that Impiety and Wickedness receives daily Growth, and that the faithful are persecuted, and Religion abus'd, every day more than other, by the Instigation and Endeavours of the said Elizabeth: And since we perceive her Heart so harden'd and obdurate, that she has not only condemn'd the solemn Intreaties and Admonitions of Catholick Princes, for her Safety and Conversion; but has also deny'd the Nuncios of this See, to cross the Seas into England, for that purpose: We, I say, are constrain'd, at last, to make use of the Arms of Justice, against her; and cannot but lament, that we are forc'd to punish One, whose Ancestors have been signally serviceable to the whole State of Christendom. 1570. Ann. 13. We therefore, supported by his Authority, whose Pleasure it was to place us (tho' too weak for so weighty a Burden) on the Supreme Throne of Justice, do, by Vertue of our Apostolick Power, declare the said Elizabeth an Heretick, and a Favourer of Hereticks, and her Adherents in the Crimes aforesaid, to have incur'd the Sentence of Excommunication, and to be cut off from the Unity of the Body of Christ. Moreover, We declare her to be deprived of her pretended Title to the said Kingdom, and of all Dominion, Dignity, and Privilege whatsoever. And the Nobility, Subjects, and People of the said Kingdom, and all others who have taken an Oath to her, to be for ever absolv'd from any such Oath, and all other Duty, Allegiance, and Obedience: We do likewise, by Authority of these Presents, absolve them, and deprive the said Elizabeth of her pretended Title to the Kingdom, and all other things before-mention'd. And We charge and command all and every the Noblemen, Subjects, People, and others aforesaid, That they presume not to obey her, or her Orders, Mandates, and Laws: And those who shall do otherwise, are subject to the like Excommunication. But because it cannot be expected, that these Presents should be publish'd in all places, where they are needful; Our Will is, that the Copies of 'em, under a Publick Notary's Hand, and the Seal of an Ecclesiastical Prelate, or his Court; be of the same Force with all Men, judicially and extrajudicially, as these Presents should be, if they were exhibited and shewn. Given at Rome, at S. Peter's, in the Year of the Incarnation of our Lord, 1569, March 28. and the Fifth Year of Our Papacy. Ca. Glorierius.

Hereupon new Surmises arose, that something extraordinary was to be expected. And truly, another Rebellion was like to break out in Norfolk; but was crush'd in its very Birth. Several Norfolk Gentlemen, willing to set the Duke at liberty, (for whom all of them had a singular Respect) laid a Plot, that at Harlestone-Fair, they would gather the Mob together, by the Sound of a Trumpet, under pretence of driving the Netherlanders out of England; who, to avoid the Duke of Alva's Tyranny, had many of 'em fled over to that County. Some of these Gentlemen were brought to a Trial, and found guilty of High-Treason: Three only were executed (So merciful was the Queen) The most noted of them was John Throckmorton; who at his Trial confess'd nothing, but at the Gallows, to excuse the rest, own'd himself the principal Author and Promoter of the Fact.

John Felton, who set up the Pope's Bull on the Bishop of London's Palace-Gates, was now taken, (for fly he would not) arraign'd, and boldly confess'd the Fact, (which yet he would not allow to be a Fault) for which he was hang'd near the Place where he had set it up; getting thereby the empty Repure of a glorious Martyrdom. But most of the moderate Papists secretly disliked the Bull; because there had been no previous Admonition, as Justice required; and withal foresaw the Storms that hung over their Heads, who before securely exercis'd their Religion within their own private Houses, or had made no Scruple of frequenting the Service of God, as now receiv'd in the English Church. And from that time, many of 'em continu'd firm in their Allegiance; especially when they saw the neighbouring Princes, and the Catholick Countries, keep up their usual Correspondence with

with the Queen, and the Bull to be slighted, as 1570. an empty Noise of Words.

Ann. 13. The day Felton was arraign'd, the D. of Norfolk (having confess'd, that through Imprudence he had done amiss, and having so far repented of what he had done, that his Mind was averse from thinking on, and his Ears from hearing any Mention of the Match; and having bound himself in a Bond, not to concern himself any farther in the Marriage with the Queen of Scots, without Queen Elizabeth's Knowledge) was discharged from the Tower of London, wherein the Plague was then hot; and remitted, to the Satisfaction of all Men, to his own House, where he liv'd under the easie Confinement of Sir Henry Nevil. Neither could he be proceeded against by the Statute of the 25 Edward III. concerning High-Treason, as Cecil intimated; who, favouring the Duke, did all he could to work him over, to marry any other Woman; whereby he would afterwards be free from Suspicion, and the State be out of Fear. Notwithstanding there were some, who thought he was now set at liberty on purpose, that he might be brought into some greater Danger. This is certain; that more things came to light afterwards, than he was aware of; and the Fidelity of those, who were his greatest Confidants, either by Hope or Bribery, began to fail him.

Cecil persuaded him to some other Marriage. Many imprisoned. These Times were very subject to Suspicions and Conspiracies. For a Plot was laid, to free the Queen of Scots out of Prison, by Thomas and Edward Stanley, the Earl of Derby's younger Sons, (which he had by the Daughter of Thomas Duke of Norfolk) and by Thomas Gerard, Rolston, Hall, and others, in the County of Derby: But Rolston's Son, one of the Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners, discover'd the Plot; and they were all imprison'd, except Hall, who fled to the Isle of Man; from thence was sent over to Dunbriton, by the Bishop of Ross's Recommendations, afterwards, upon taking the Castle, was seiz'd, and executed at London. And the Bishop of Ross himself, lately set at liberty, was now again confin'd to the Bishop of London's Palace, for holding secret Conferences with the Earl of Southampton, a violent Catholick.

An Expedition into Scotland. In the mean time, Sussex and the Lord Scroop, with some light arm'd Soldiers, made another Incurfion into Scotland; fir'd the Villages all over Anandale, demolish'd Anand a Fort of Herri's, and Caer-Laveroc a Fort of Maxwell's; because these two had made Inroads into England, and plunder'd it: And he press'd so hard on those who stood firm to the Queen of Scots, that the Duke of Chastel-Herauld, Huntley, and Argyle, sent him a Bond, under their Hands and Seals, whereby they oblig'd themselves to forbear all Acts of Hostility, and withdraw themselves from the English Rebels. Sussex, upon his Return, knighted Edward Hastings, Francis Russel, Valentine Brown, William Hilton, Robert Stapleton, Henry Curwen, and Simon Musgrave; for their Valour: And himself was afterwards, for his approv'd Prudence and Virtue, made one of the Queen's Privy-Council.

Treaty with the Q. of Scots. Queen Elizabeth (being full of Jealousies about the Bull, and the Norfolk-Conspiracy) sent Cecil and Walter Mildmay, to the Queen of Scots, then at Chattefworth, in the County of Derby; to consult with her, how the Difference in Scotland might be best compos'd; she restor'd to her former Dignity; and the Security of Queen Elizabeth, and the Safety of the young Prince, be best provided for. When they came thither in October, after a dangerous Journey, occasion'd by the Overflowing of the Waters; she did nothing but bemoan her forlorn Condition, complain of the treacherous Artifices of Murray, excuse Norfolk, and repose all her Confidence in Queen Elizabeth's Goodness; on whose Power she understood all the Affairs of Scotland, as well as England, wholly depended. They propos'd, That for making a lasting Peace between both Kingdoms, the Treaty of Edinburgh should be ratify'd: That she should renounce her Title and Claim to the Crown of England, during the Survival of Queen Elizabeth, and her Heirs lawfully begotten: That she should not renew or maintain Confederacy with any against England: That she should not permit any forein Forces to come into Scotland: That she should not hold any Correspondence with the English or Irish, without the Queen's Knowledge: That she should deliver up the English Fugitives and Rebels: That she should requite the Damages suffer'd in the English Frontiers: That she should enquire, according to Law, as well into the Murder of her Husband the Lord Darly, as of Murray: That she should send her Son into England, as an Hostage: That she should not marry any Englishman, without the Queen of England's Knowledge; nor any other, without the Consent of the States of Scotland: That the Scots should not cross into Ireland, without the Queen of England's Leave: That for the Ratification of these things, the Queen and the Delegates to be appointed should give it under their Hands and Seals: That six Hostages, of the Queen of England's naming, should be sent into England: That if the Queen of Scots, by herself or Agents, attempt any thing against Queen Elizabeth, she should ipso facto forfeit all the Right she claims to the Crown of England: That Humes-Castle and Fast-Castle be three Years in possession of the English: That some other Fort in Galloway or Cantyr be put into the English hands, to hinder the Scotch-Irish from infesting Ireland: Lastly, That the States of Scotland ratify the Premises, by Act of Parliament.

To these things she presently made a prudent and wary Reply; but refer'd them, for a fuller Answer, to the Bishop of Ross, her Ambassador in England, to Alexander Gordon Bishop of Galloway, the Earl of Huntley's Uncle, and to William Baron of Lewingstone; Delegates from her Lieutenants in Scotland: Who afterwards accepted some of these Articles, and others they rejected. Their Answer was this: That the Edinburgh-Treaty should be confirm'd: That the Title should be renounc'd, during the Life of Queen Elizabeth: That the ancient League with the French was to be consider'd of; which if they did not observe, the Queen would lose her Dowry, and the Scotch Nation be endamag'd, of whom 100 Cuirassiers, and 124 Archers were maintain'd for a Guard: That the Merchants, Students, and many who had purchas'd Estates in France, and were in Church-Livings, would be turn'd out, and depriv'd of very great Pensions and Privileges which they enjoy'd; and Scotland would be robb'd of the Alliance and Assistance of a most potent Nation: That unless the English would fully make amends for these things, they could by no means renounce the French Confederacy: That they would not admit of any forein Forces, unless such a Rebellion should break out, as could not be suppress'd by their own Arms at home: That the Queen of Scots should hold no Correspondence with the Subjects of England, to the Damage of England; provided the Queen of England likewise would hold none with the Scotch Subjects, to the Prejudice of Scotland: That if there 1570. Ann. 13. there were any English Fugitives and Rebels in Scotland, they were among the Scotch Rebels, and to be demanded of them: That the Injuries which were done should be examin'd by Delegates: That they would enquire into the Murder of the Lord Darby and Murray, according to the Laws of Scotland: That they could not deliver the King for Hostage, since he was in their Hands, who, under his Name, rebell'd against the Queen: That it was a new and an unheard of thing, that an absolute Princess should marry none but whom a foreign Prince, and her own Subjects should prescribe: That the Scots should not go over to Ireland, to the Prejudice of the Queen of England, without her Leave; if, on the other hand, in the same Article, the Irish be prohibited from coming over into Scotland: That for the ratifying the Premises, they were willing to give Hostages, any the Queen of England should name; except the Duke of Chastel-Herauld, Huntley, Argyle, and Arbol. Besides, they agreed, That the Queen of Scots should forfeit her Title to the Crown of England, if ever she attempted any thing against the Queen of England's Title; provided the Queen of England would oblige herself, under the like Penalty, if she should attempt any thing against the Queen of Scots: As for Humes-Castle and Fast-Castle, they desire that they be restor'd to the Lord Humes, the proper Owner of them; and no longer held by the English: That to deliver up a Fort in Galloway or Cantyr, into a Foreigner's Hands, would be nothing else but adding fresh Fuel to the Flames.

They cannot agree.

When they could not agree upon these Terms, nor any Delegates arriv'd from the Regent of Scotland; and because there went Reports about, that the Pope, the French King, and the Duke of Alva, were solicited to send Succours, for the Delivery of the Queen of Scots; and the English Rebels, Westmoreland, the Countess of Northumberland, and the rest, were withdrawn from Scotland, (to whom the Pope had remitted 12000 Crowns, by the Hands of the Bishop of Ross) this Treaty came to nothing: Only Queen Elizabeth (who sat Mistress and Umpire, at the Helm of all Britain) order'd, by her Authority, the States of Scotland to be prorogu'd, and a Treaty to be frequently debated; since the Heads of both Parties were a very great Annoyance to all Scotland.

Ross craves aid for the delivery of Q. of Scots, but in vain.

The Heads of this Treaty were sent by the Bishop of Ross, to the Pope, the French King, and the Spaniard; and he gave them to understand, that the Queen of Scots would be forc'd to consent to them, unless they sent her timely Aid and Advice; which he very earnestly desir'd, tho' to no purpose. For they had their Hands full of other Business; and the Spaniard was wholly taken up in his Preparations for a Marriage with Anne of Austria, the Emperor Maximilian's, and his own Sister's Daughter, who at this time set sail out of Zealand, towards Spain; for whose Convoy over the British Seas to Spain, Queen Elizabeth dispatch'd Charles Howard, with a Fleet of Men of War, and several Noblemen; in testimony of the Love and Esteem that she bore to the House of Austria.

Queen Elizabeth's Respects to the House of Austria.

The Twelfth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign being now happily expir'd (wherein the credulous Romanists expected, according to the Prediction of Conjurers, to see their Golden-Day, as they call'd it) all true-hearted Englishmen were full of Joy, and with Thanksgivings, Sermons, repeated Prayers, Turnaments, melodious Ringing of Bells, and other such like Expressions of Joy, began to solemnize the 17th. of November, being the Anniversary of the Beginning of her Reign; which was continu'd as a Testimony of the Good-Will and Esteem they bore her, all her Life long.

About this time died Henry Clifford, the Second Earl of Cumberland of that Name; the Son of Henry Clifford, whom Henry VIII. had rais'd to that Honour, in the Year 1525. but descended of an ancient and noble Family; very famous for their Marriages with the Heirs of the Vescii, and Viponts, or de veteri ponte; who were formerly Hereditary Viscounts of Westmoreland. He had by his first Wife Eleanor, one of the Daughters of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Mary, King Henry VIII's Sister) one Daughter, namely, Margaret, who marry'd with great Hopes and Splendor, to Henry, the Earl of Derby's Son, as being sole Heiress to the Family of the Cliffords. But these Hopes were cut off, when, by a Second Wife, Anne Dacres, he had Two Sons, who succeeded each other in their Father's Honour.

At the same time died Nicolas Throckmorton, whom we have often mention'd; the fourth Son of Sir Geo. Throckmorton, by Katharine the Daughter of Nicolas Lord Vaux: A Man of a large Experience, piercing Judgment, and singular Prudence; who being very busy in Queen Mary's days, had very near lost his Life, for all his extraordinary Prudence: And under Queen Elizabeth, tho' he discharg'd several Embassies, with a great deal of Diligence, and much to his Praise, yet could he not be Master of much Wealth, nor rise higher than to those small Dignities (tho' glorious in Title) of Chief Cup-bearer of England, and Chamberlain of the Exchequer; and this, because he acted in Favour of Leicester, against Cecil; whose Greatness he envy'd. It was in Cecil's House, where, as he was feeding heartily at Supper, upon a Sallad; he was seiz'd, as some say, with an Inflammation of the Lungs; as others, with a Catarrh, not without Suspicion of Poison; and died very luckily for himself and Family, his Life and Estate being in great Danger, by reason of his turbulent Spirit.

In Ireland, Connogher O-Brian, Earl of Twomund, not being able to bear with Edward Fitton, Governour of Connaugh, (who began to be very strict in his Government, and to cut off all the Hopes the Irish Lords had, of living on the Spoils of their Subjects) had laid a private Plot with several to raise a Rebellion; which very fortunately was crush'd in its very Birth. For, the day before they design'd to rise, Fitton, a perfect Stranger to the whole Intrigue, very civilly told Twomund, that he and some of his Friends would come and dine with him, on the morrow. Twomund, his Conscience flying in his Face, and seiz'd with Fear, (the worst Ghesper in such a doubtful Case) presently thought his Plot was discover'd, and that he must expect an Enemy, not a Guest, of the Governour: Whereupon he forthwith cross'd over to France, all Men wondering what was become of him; and the Conspirators, fearing he was gone into England, to discover the Business, remain'd quiet. When he came to understand how Cases stood, he repented seriously of what he had done, made an ingenuous Confession of the whole Matter, to Norris, the Ambassador in France; and, by his Intercession, was re-admitted into Q. Elizabeth's Favour, and restor'd to his Estate.

But Thomas Stukely, an Englishman, a lewd, profuse, and vaunting Rascal, (who, after spending his Estate, had fled into Ireland) being disappointed of the Hopes he had, of being Steward of Wexford; having vented many base and scurrilous

Where, by the cunning Arts of Insinuation, he wheedl'd himself into an incredible degree of Credit and Reputation with the Pope, who then desir'd nothing so much as the utter Ruin of Queen Elizabeth. For he promis'd, and boldly bragg'd, that with 3000 Italians, he would drive the English out of Ireland, and burn the English Fleet. Which afterwards he, like a Villain, attempted to do; but fell in the Enterprize, as we shall shew hereafter.

The Fourteenth Year of her Reign.

1571. In the very first Month of this Year, Queen Elizabeth enter'd London, in great State; where she visited that sumptuous Burse, which Sir Thomas Gresham, Citizen of London, and her Majesty's Merchant, had erected for the Use of Merchants; and by Sound of Trumpet, after the Manner of a Dedication, her Herald nam'd it, The Royal-Exchange.

A few days after, she who had been so sparing in dispensing of Honours, that for Twelve whole Years, she had advanced but Four to the Dignity of Barons; by her Royal Letters Patents, solemnly created William Cecil, her Secretary, being invest'd in Barons Robes, Baron Burleigh, in this Form: In consideration not only of the continual Services, in the time of our Predecessors, Kings of England; but also of the faithful and acceptable Duty he hath, from the very Beginning of our Reign, always perform'd, and continues still to perform; not only in the great and weighty Affairs of the Council-Board, but in the general Administration of the State: And for his Circumspection, Courage, Prudence, Dexterity, Probity of Life, Providence, Care, and Faithfulness; We, out of Our special Grace, mov'd thereto by certain Experience, have created, advanced, and prefer'd him, to the State, Degree, Dignity and Honour of Baron of Burleigh; and have impos'd, given, and bestow'd upon him, the Name, Stile, and Title of Baron of Burleigh, to have and to hold, to him and his Heirs-Male, begotten of his Body, for ever, &c. I have the more willingly mention'd, and shall mention him and others, whom she rais'd to the Dignity of Barons; because 'tis one of the highest Degrees of Honour. For the Parliamentary Barons of England are Peers, Nobles and Counsellors of the Realm, by Birth; who enjoy a great many Immunities and Privileges, which 'tis not proper to mention here; especially, since some of them I have already taken notice of elsewhere.

Just before this, Ridolpho, the Florentine we already mention'd, who had, for fifteen Years together, been a Merchant in London; privately convey'd the Pope's Letters to the Queen of Scots: Wherein he promis'd a great deal of Zeal, Aid, and Assistance, for advancing the Catholick Religion, and her Interest; desiring she would favour and trust Ridolpho with all her Secrets, and let his Holiness know by him (who then design'd for Italy) by what means the Catholick Religion, and the common Grievances of Britain might be redress'd. Ridolpho likewise, by his own private Letters, begg'd the Queen to communicate these things, and recommend him to the Duke of Norfolk, and the rest of her Friends. But she wav'd answering it, (tho' the French King, the Spaniard, and the Duke d'Alva had written to her upon the same account) till she saw, what the Treaty on foot would come to.

For, there came to England, in the King's Name, the Earl of Morton, Petcarn Abbot of Dun-fermelin, and James Mac-Gilly, about the Affairs of Scotland; who being commanded by Queen Elizabeth, to give her a more clear Account of their Causes for deposing the Queen, and to prove them to be lawful; gave in a large Remonstrance in Writing: Wherein, by an insolent sort of Freedom, and with Boldness of Expressions, they endeavour'd to prove, by an ancient Law of Scotland, by some antiquated Instances, and other new ones gather'd up, no one knows where: That the People of Scotland are superior to the King: And that upon Calvin's Authority, Popular Magistrates are every where constituted, to curb in the Ambition of Kings: And that 'tis lawful for them to imprison and depose bad Kings. But they bragg'd much of their Clemency towards the depos'd Queen; in that they had given her leave to substitute her Son in her Room, and to appoint him Tutors: That it was by the Peoples Favour, not her Innocence, that she liv'd; with many other such like things, which turbulent Spirits insolently invent, against the Majesty of Princes. Queen Elizabeth perus'd the Paper, but not without Displeasure; and privately condemn'd it, as design'd for the weakning of Regal Authority. But to the Delegates she answer'd, That she could not yet see any just Cause for being so severe upon the Queen; therefore she order'd them to consult immediately, about Methods for healing the Differences in Scotland.

Hereupon, it was propos'd at the Lord-Keeper Bacon's House, to the Bishop of Ross, the Bishop of Galloway, and the Baron of Levingstone, the Queen of Scots Delegates; That for the Security of the Kingdom and Queen of England, and of such Nobles in Scotland, as were of the King's Party; before the Queen of Scots should be set at liberty, the Duke of Chastel-Herauld, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, the Lord Humes, the Lord Herries, and another of the Barons, should be given for Hostages: And that the Forts of Dunbritton and Humes, should be in the Possession of the English, for 3 Years. They answer'd, That no doubt but the Queen of Scots, who had freely thrown herself under the Queen of England's Protection, would be willing to satisfy her, as far as conveniently she might: But to deliver up so great Men, and so strong Forts, would wholly rob the miserable Queen, of the Strength of all her truest Friends, and safest Garrisons; and so expose her an easie Prey to her Enemies. However, they offer'd two Earls, whereof one should be one of the three abovemention'd, and two Barons, in Hostage, for two Years. But as for the Castles, they could not by the League be put into the Hands of the English; unless as many were deliver'd up to the French. But (said Bacon) all Scotland, your Prince, Nobles, and Castles, are too little to secure the Queen and the most flourishing Kingdom of England: therefore the Queen of Scots was not to be set at liberty, upon any Security the Scots thought fit to propose.

Upon this, they presently concluded, and gave out publicly, that they were at last sensible, that the English were fully design'd and resolv'd, to keep the Queen a Prisoner for ever in England; and withal, to break off the Treaty; since they so stiffly insist'd upon such Security, as Scotland was never able to give. However, the rest of the English Council declar'd, that they heartily desir'd the Queen of Scots might be set at liberty, provided sufficient Security were given. And for this purpose, they confer'd with Morton and his Collegues, about these Matters, and sending the King into England: who answer'd flatly, That they had no Commission to consult;

either about receiving the Queen into Scotland, or delivering the King. But the Queen of Scots Delegates rejected this, as an idle Come-off; Since they who were the Authors of the Queen's dealing, were sufficiently empower'd to consult about setting her at liberty. Nor was there any Reason, why they should require a Commission from the rest of the Conspirators, since their Crime had made them all Equals.

As for the Prince, being scarce five Years old, he could give them no Authority; and as for the Regent, he had refer'd all to Q. Elizabeth's Disposal. They therefore desired, that either the Commissioners might be compell'd to a Conference, or else that Matters might be reasonably adjusted without them. But Queen Elizabeth perceiving, nothing could be done for her own, the King's, and Queen's Security, unless both Factions would agree; thought it reasonable, that the States of Scotland, now ready to convene, should choose certain Men, who should use their utmost Endeavours for making up the Breach.

Hereupon the Bishop of Ross and his Collegues openly complain'd, that some of the English Council had abus'd the Queen of England's Prudence, and the Queen of Scots Patience; impos'd sily upon the forein Princes, and fed up the Scots with vain Hopes. And the Queen of Scots herself, full of Resentments and Complaints, and weary of such Delays, recall'd the Bishop of Galloway, and Levingstone. But the Bishop of Ross, whom Queen Elizabeth had commanded to depart from London, she order'd to stay at London, by the Privilege of an Ambassador; which thing several look'd upon with an ill Eye. Her own Party in Scotland she order'd to rise up in Arms, and rely no longer on those prejudicial Truces and Conferences.

For whilst these Transactions pass'd in England, the Queen of Scots Party were severely used, many of them were executed, several slain, Dunbritton seated upon the Marsh of Glotta, or Cluid, one of the strongest Castles in Scotland taken, and J. Hamilton Archbishop of St. Andrews, the Duke of Chastle-Herauld's Brother, hang'd on a Gibbet, as guilty of the King's Murder; tho' he was not try'd according to the Laws of the Land, but only accus'd of it by a Priest, who declar'd he had heard it formerly of the Regicides in Confession.

When the Captive Queen was now out of all Hopes, but full of Sorrow; all her Retinue, besides ten Servants and a Mass Priest being cut off, and when she saw herself debarr'd of all the Means of procuring her Safety and Liberty, which even Nature allow'd to be reasonable, she could not then but disclose that which she had kept so long within her own Breast. She therefore secretly sends a long Draught of her Designs, which she had before drawn up, and several Love-Letters to the Duke of Norfolk, written in Cyphers known only to them two; and other Letters to be convey'd by Ridolpho to the Pope and the Spanish King; which Ridolpho she commended as a Man very loyal and true to her Interests, and very necessary for her turn. Higford, the Duke's Secretary, who transcrib'd those Papers in an usual Character, being order'd to burn them, hid them under a Mat in the Duke's Bed-Chamber, and, as it seems, on purpose too. This Ridolpho, once himself in the Duke's Presence, and often by Barker, argu'd thus.

That he had taken notice of a great many, as well of the Nobility as Commonalty in England, who wish'd for a Revolution in the State; and that these were of three sorts. Some who in Queen Mary's Days had been in Authority and Favour, and now made little or no Figures: Others, who were addicted to the Popish Religion, and took it ill that they could not have the free Exercise of it: And Others, who, cherishing new Hopes, were very uneasy under their present Condition. That these Men wanted nothing to put them upon any Design, but a Leader of noble Extract, Money, and a foreign Aid. That none could be pitch'd upon for a Leader of more noble Blood, nor a fitter Person, than the Duke, a Man so very much esteem'd by all sorts of People. That it was but just to revenge the Injuries he had receiv'd, who had been so long a Prisoner contrary to the Laws of his Nation, and now, to his Disgrace, was not call'd to the Parliament-House, wherein he had a Place and Vote, as being the Chief among the Peers, and Earl-Marshal of England. To prevail upon him the more effectually, he produc'd a Catalogue of the Gentlemen, who had devoted themselves and Estates to the Duke's Service, if he would undertake the Business. As for a foreign Aid, he declar'd, That the Pope (provided the Catholic Religion might be encourag'd) would bear the Charge of the whole War; who the last Year, when the Bull was publish'd, had laid down an Hundred thousand Crowns, whereof Twelve thousand Ridolpho himself had distributed among the English Fugitives. That the Spaniard, incens'd with the Wrongs offer'd him by the English, would supply him with Auxiliaries, of 4000 Horse, and 6000 Foot, which might be transported to Harwich, a Sea-Port-Town in Essex, (near which Place the Duke had many powerful Adherents) and that most Commodiously and without the least Suspicion, in the beginning of the Summer, when the D. of Medina Cali was just coming into the Netherlands with a strong Fleet. Lastly he concluded, That such Caution might be used, that the Duke might be clear of all Suspicion of aiming at the Crown, and the Queen of England's Safety might be secur'd, provided she either embrac'd or tolerated the Romish Religion, and consented to the Q. of Scots Marriage with the Duke.

These things the Duke listned to, as having some shew of Probability, but refus'd to subscribe to the Letters of Credit (as they call them) which Ridolpho, upon his departure, presented to him. Nor would he hearken to the Plot which Ross, with great Industry, had contriv'd, and imparted to him by Parker, viz. That the Duke, with a select Company of Gentlemen, should suddenly seize upon the Queen, and give a Disturbance to the Parliament; which (he intimat'd) might be easily done at this Juncture, when so many Gentlemen devoted to the Duke, who at another time could not easily meet together without suspicion, would now very readily put these things in Execution. That he had just Reasons for it; because the Duke had been a long time Prisoner, contrary to the Laws of his Country, and not admitted to sit in Parliament; and because severe Laws were devised against the Catholics. Nor did he want Examples: For Castrutio in Italy, and others elsewhere, had come off with success in very daring Designs, by giving a sudden Blow. That five Gentlemen in Scotland had very lately disturb'd the Parliament wherein Murray was to be Proscrib'd, and seiz'd the Queen: And that by the same means, and with as much ease (if they clos'd with the Opportunity) Queen Elizabeth might be seiz'd, the Marriage with the Queen of Scots be concluded, and the Popish Religion in England secur'd without much stir or a foreign Aid.

This

1571. This Design the Duke (who was naturally averse to any base Action) detested from his Heart, as villainous and full of danger. But at the same time Henry Percy offer'd his Service to Ross towards the setting the Queen of Scots at Liberty, provided Grange and Carr of Ferniburst would receive her at the Frontiers of Scotland, and his Brother the Earl of Northumberland should be deliver'd out of Scotland. But because he was somewhat suspected by reason of his intimate Acquaintance with Burghley, and because he put off the thing from time to time, this Plot came to nothing; as likewise did that of Powel of Sandford, one of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners, and of Owen, a Retainer of Arundels; who were both ready to have undertaken the same, had not Ross forbid them, as Men unfit for so great an Enterprize, being Persons of little or no Note. What was else transacted more closely in this Business, we shall omit at present, till time shall give a farther Discovery.

An Earthquake in Herefordshire. Whilst things were carry'd on thus secretly at London, there happen'd a terrible Earthquake at Kinnaston, a small Village in the East of Herefordshire. For on the 17th of February, at six in the Evening, the Earth sunk, and a Hill with a Rock of Stones at the Foot of it rais'd itself up (as if it had risen from a long sleep) with so great a roaring and noise at first as was heard at a great distance; then it mounted higher, leaving a great Pit behind it, and carrying along with it whole Trees as they grew, Sheep-cotes, and Flocks of Sheep. Some of the Trees were thrown down and cover'd with Earth; others stuck so firm in the Hill as it rose, as if they had taken root there at first. In the place whence it departed, it left a Pit forty five Foot wide, and an hundred Yards long. The Ground in all was about twenty Acres, which in going threw down a Chappel that stood in the way. It remov'd a Yew-Tree which stood in the Church-yard, from the West to the East. With the same violence it forc'd forward the High-ways, with Sheep-cotes, Hedges and Trees. Of Arable Ground it made Pasture, and of Pasture Arable Ground. The rising Ground which lay in its way roll'd before it, and being crush'd together with great violence, became a higher Hill, like a Mount cast up. Thus when it had walked from Saturday Evening till Monday Noon; weary as it were of the Journey, and tired with its own Weight, it stood still.

Chr. IX. A little before this, in France a Marriage was solemniz'd with great and royal Pomp, at Maes on the River Maes, between Charles IX. King of France and Elizabeth of Austria, the Emperor Maximilian's Daughter. Queen Elizabeth, for the Affection she bore the Emperor, whom she honour'd as a Father, for her Love to the French King, her Neighbour and Ally, and for her own Honour, sent over Thomas Sackvill, Baron of Buckhurst, into France, to congratulate their Marriage, who was there honourably received, according to his Prince's Merit and his own. In his company was Guido Cavalcanti, a Gentleman of Florence, a Man of great Experience, with whom the Queen-Mother of France, herself a Florentine, designing her own and her Children's Welfare, transacted publicly about a Marriage between Queen Elizabeth and her Son Henry Duke of Anjou. Some of the Articles she sent by him immediately to Queen Elizabeth: And afterwards the King of France solicited his Brother's Cause very vigorously by Marvesier his Embassador, and by La-Mott Fenellon, and Foix, who jointly and separately urg'd Q. Elizabeth upon it for almost a whole Year.

There were some hopes this Marriage would succeed, because the Duke (being Young, and brought up under Carvalette, no Enemy to the Protestant Religion) was not as yet a stiff Catholic, and might by degrees be brought over to Protestantism. Which, if brought about, would be of great Advantage (as they guess'd) to the Protestant Religion: Since he, being one of a Warlike Disposition, might with the joint Forces of the Germans and English subdue the Papists, establish a lasting Peace between England and France, frustrate the Designs of the Scottish Queen, the Pope, and the Irish Rebels; and add to the Crown of England the rich Dukedoms of Anjou, Bourbon and Auvergne, and in probability much greater Matters. In a word, were this Match neglected, never would a more Honourable one be propos'd.

After various Debates, the French propos'd three Articles, concerning the Duke's Coronation, the joint Administration of the Kingdom, and the Toleration of his Religion. To which, at length, this Answer was made: That the Queen could not grant, without the assent of the Parliament, that he should be crown'd after the Marriage; but in regard of the Marriage, she would willingly agree, that he should wear the Matrimonial Crown, (as she phras'd it) provided it were not to the Prejudice of her Majesty, her Heir, or Successor, if the Parliament so pleas'd; and she would pay him all the Respect that was due to a Husband. As for the joint Government, she thought it not unreasonable that he, whom she honour'd with the Title of King and Husband, should be likewise admitted her Consort and Partner in the Government. But for tolerating his Religion, she could not as yet, for several weighty Reasons, assent to. Which Reasons (as I had them from Queen Elizabeth's Letters) were these: That altho' the external Exercise of the Christian Religion with different Rites and Ceremonies might be tolerated among the Subjects of one and the same Kingdom; yet a different, yea a quite contrary Exercise of the Queen, who is the Head of her People, from her Husband, would seem not only dangerous, but very absurd.

She desires the French King and the Queen-Mother to consider as well her Danger, as the Duke of Anjou's Honour. By tolerating his Religion she should break the established Laws, give offence to her best Subjects, and encouragement to her worst; which things were certainly more considerable than the Duke of Anjou's Honour. But the French reply'd, 'That it was no ways becoming the Duke to live without the exercise of his Religion; for this would seem altogether irreligious: Neither would it be for Queen Elizabeth's Honour, to have him branded for an Atheist. On the other hand, Queen Elizabeth urg'd, That if the Duke would plentifully water the Seeds of the reformed Religion already sown, and suffer more to be sown, he would soon see this would redound to his greatest Honour.

At last the matter came to this issue; 'That if the Duke would be present with the Queen at Divine Service, and would not refuse to hear and learn the Principles of the Protestant Religion, she would agree that neither the Duke nor his Family should be compell'd to use the Ceremonies of the Church of England, nor be disturb'd in the use of other Divine Rites that were not manifestly repugnant to God's Word; provided it were done in a certain and private Place, so as the English might have no opportunity thereby to violate the establish'd Laws. Foix stuck at that Phrase, the Word of God: For whose satisfaction Queen Elizabeth order'd, instead of God's Word, to insert God's Church. Which when he liked worse, and would have had instead of it, the Catholic Church, Q. Elizabeth declar'd clar'd against it: And hereupon the Business by 1571. degrees grew cold.

Ann. 14. Some thought the French King and his Mother were never serious in the business, but that their design was, by a mention of a Marriage with a Protestant Princess, to assure the Protestants of the sincere Love they had for them; and so put a stop to a secret Treaty of Marriage which they suspected was carrying on between Queen Elizabeth and the King of Navarre, whom the French King would have to marry his Sister. Neither was it believ'd in England, that Queen Elizabeth gave any serious heed to it; but only with a design that the King, his Mother, and his Brethren might be more favourable to the French Protestants; the Queen of Scots Hopes might be frustrated, the Designs of the Spaniard and the Irish against England, excited thereto by the Cardinal of Lorain, might be disappointed; and the Pope's Fulminations, procur'd by the French King, be blown over. For at that time Leicester (who knew more of the Queen's secret Intentions than any Man) wrote to Walsingham, then Ambassador in France, That the Queen had some inclination to marry, but a very cold one; and that she had persuaded herself to agree to it rather as it was convenient she should marry, than that she had any desire of herself to it. Besides, That if the Duke should not insist on that Point in the Treaty concerning Toleration of Religion, yet the Queen would bind him by such a Caution, that he should never afterwards care for the Marriage.

Q. of Scots Marriage hastned. The French were not more forward in making up this Marriage, than some in England were in hastening another Marriage betwixt the Queen of Scots and the Duke of Norfolk, whom by their wicked Counsels they had so far prevail'd upon, that, contrary to his Promise, he began again to think of marrying her; which was at first thus discover'd.

By what means discover'd Ridolpho the Florentine, who was sent (as we said) to solicit the Queen of Scots Affairs Beyond-Sea, had communicated to Charles Bayliff a Netherlander, the Queen of Scots Servant, all his Transactions with the Duke d'Alva; and had given him Letters written in Cyphers, for her, the Spanish Ambassador, the D. of Norfolk, Rofs, and the Baron of Lumley, made up in one Packet; which Bayliff brought over himself, tho' Rofs had order'd him to leave them with the Governor of Calais to be convey'd over.

But as soon as Bayliff was arriv'd at Dover, he was apprehended and imprison'd, and the Packet sent to the L. Cobham, Governor of the Cinque-Ports. Rofs was the first that had notice of it, who manag'd his Business so industriously and cunningly with the Lord Cobham, that the Packet was deliver'd to him, and another Packet made up of other obsolete Letters deliver'd to the Council; and this Bayliff was acquainted with. But however, being put to the Rack, he confess'd some things, and amongst the rest, that a Packet of Letters was come to Rofs's Hands. Nor was Rofs ignorant of this, who presently sent away Cuthbert his Secretary, and left his Cyphers and what else might do him any Prejudice, among his Friends: So that when Suffex, Burleigh, Mildmay and Sadler made a careful Search in his House, they found nothing, nor could they get any thing out of him by Questions, who stiffly maintained, that an Ambassador was not to be accountable to any but his Prince. However, the third Day after he was committed to the Custody of the Bishop of Ely, and a while after convey'd to the Isle of Ely. Sir Tho. Stanley likewise, and Sir Tho. Gerard Knights, and Rolston (all three mentioned formerly) were cast into the Tower of London. And Henry Howard, who Rofs committed to Custody.

and others

had aspir'd to the Archbishoprick of York, was upon Suspicion committed to the Custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

About this time the Queen of Scots had sent a certain Sum of Money to the French Ambassador, to be by him convey'd to her Party in Scotland. He delivered it to Barker and Higford, who giving the Duke an Item of it, delivered it to Brown a Citizen of Shrewsbury, one of the Duke's Retainers, in order to be convey'd by Banister and Lowder into Scotland, to the Lord Heris. Brown, being one of a suspicious Nature, and perceiving by the Weight that Gold Coin was delivered him for Silver, put the same with the Letters into the Hands of the Privy-Council.

By this the wiser sort observed that the Duke hereby first became guilty of High-Treason, in that he would have relieved Heris and the Scots, who were proclaimed Enemies, and had ravaged the Frontiers of England. Upon this Higford was cast into Prison, who presently of his own accord confessed the whole matter about the Money, and withal discovered where he had hid the Letters, and Cyphers, and the Q. of Scots Draught before-mentioned, viz. under the Mat and Tiles.

In this Draught she discours'd at large of the following Particulars. 'That the French approved of the Conference begun with the Scots, and yet propos'd a Marriage between the Duke of Anjou and Queen Elizabeth, upon no other design, but that they might more speciously deny the Aid they had promised for her Restoration. That they privately oppos'd her Marriage with Don John of Austria, and were mightily for that with Norfolk, only in hatred to the Spaniards. That the Duke d'Alva was so averse to the Design of sending back the Queen of Scots into Scotland, that he thought it would tend to the utter Ruin of the Queen, and the Catholick Religion in Britain: Because when the Queen was once returned into Scotland, she must of necessity either undergo the danger of a Siege, or hazard a Battel with the Rebels, who with the English Supplies would soon get her into their power, before any foreign Forces could come to her Assistance. Since then she could not be safe in Scotland, nor expect any thing from France now embroil'd with intestine Wars: He thought it her best way to have recourse to the Spaniards Assistance, who had propos'd her Marriage with Don John of Austria; (which yet she was ready to refuse, upon an assurance that the Duke of Norfolk would restore the Popish Religion in Britain) and withal, that her Son should forthwith be convey'd out of Scotland, and sent into Spain; where he might be safely kept, brought up from his Childhood in the Romish Religion, and deprive the Scots of all their Pretences, who cloak'd their Rebellion under his Name. For the management of this Business, and the procuring foreign Aid; Ridolpho was to be sent away presently, with this Advice, that by all means he should keep these things from the knowledge of the French.

When the Council had receiv'd this Draught, the Letters above-mention'd, and others sent by the Pope; and when Barker, being apprehended, had confess'd every Particular, Sir Ralph Sadler was ordered to keep a strong Guard upon the Duke's House at London (formerly a Seat of the Carthusian Friars). The third Day after, the Duke himself was examin'd, and (not knowing what his Servants had confess'd, but supposing the Draught with the Letters were burnt) he stiffly denied all which they had confess'd. Hereupon, within a Day or two, namely the 7th of September;

September, he was, to the great Grief of the People, carried back to the Tower of London (from whence the Year before he was released) by Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Henry Nevill, and Doctor Wilson. Afterwards Banister, the Duke's Counsellor at Law; the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham, and Thomas his Brother, Henry Percy, Lowder, Powel, Goodier, and others, were clapt in Prison, who every one of them, in hopes of Pardon, confess'd what they knew.

As soon as the Council produc'd these Mens Confessions, the Queen of Scots and Rofs's Letters, with the Draught, to the Duke's Face, he was strangely daunted: But upon sight of the Draught and the Letters, which he had fondly suppos'd to have been burnt, he was amaz'd, and at last brake forth into these Words; I am betray'd and undone by my Confidants, not knowing how to distrust them, tho' Diffidence is the very Essence of Wisdom. However, he humbly pray'd the Council to intercede for him to the Queen, promising to conceal nothing which he knew, and solemnly protesting, that he had never consented to any thing which might prejudice the Queen or injure the Realm; but had declar'd heartily against the Plots they laid for surprizing the Queen, for seizing upon the Tower of London, and setting the Queen of Scots at Liberty: And that he never thought of calling over foreign Forces into Britain, but only to suppress the Queen of Scots rebellious Subjects. The same Day he was examin'd upon Fifty Articles or thereabouts, and conceal'd nothing. Afterwards the whole Proceeding was reported in the Star-Chamber, in a full Assembly of the Nobility, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London being present; and after that to all the Citizens at the Guild-Hall, by William Fleetwood their Recorder.

But since by the Confession of all, even of the Duke himself, the Bishop of Rofs was charg'd as principal Contriver of the Business, they entred into a serious Consultation what should be done with him, being an Ambassador. For whilst he (after the manner of other Ambassadors) thought he might lawfully promote the Interest of his Prince by any Methods, and that by the sacred and inviolable Privilege of Ambassadors, he was not to be accountable to another's Jurisdiction; he had already committed many Irregularities, by raising Rebellion, and holding Nocturnal Cabals with the Earl of Southampton and others; and now lately with the English Fugitives in the Netherlands, the Duke d'Alva, the Spaniard, and the Pope, for Invading of England. It was therefore propos'd to Daniel Lewis, Valentine Dale, William Drury, William Aubrey, and Henry Jones, learned Civilians.

First, Whether an Ambassador that raises Rebellion against the Prince to whom he is sent, should enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador, and not rather be liable to Punishment as an Enemy?

They answer'd, That such an Ambassador, by the Law of Nations, and the Civil Law of the Romans, has forfeited the Privileges of an Ambassador, and is liable to Punishment.

Secondly, Whether the Minister or Agent of a Prince depos'd from his publick Authority, and in whose stead another is substituted, may enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador?

They answer'd, If such a Prince be lawfully depos'd, his Agent cannot challenge the Privileges of an Ambassador, since none but Absolute Princes, and such as enjoy a Royal Prerogative, can constitute Ambassadors.

Thirdly, Whether a Prince, which comes into another Prince's Kingdom, and is there kept Prisoner, can have his Agent; and whether that Agent may be reputed an Ambassador?

They answer'd, If such a Prince have not forfeited his Principality, he may have an Agent: But whether that Agent may be reputed an Ambassador, depended upon the Authority of his Commission.

Fourthly, Whether if a Prince declare to such an Agent, and his Prince in Custody, that he shall be no longer reputed an Ambassador, that Agent may by Law challenge the Privileges of an Ambassador?

They answer'd, That the Prince may forbid the Ambassador entrance into his Kingdom, and may command him to leave the Kingdom, if he keep not himself within the Bounds prescribed to an Ambassador: Yet in the meantime he may enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador according to the Authority deputed to him.

According to these Answers of the Civilians, Rofs being call'd up from the Isle of Ely, and receiving a sharp Reprimand, it was declar'd by the Council, that he should be no longer reputed an Ambassador, but be severely punished according to his Demerits.

He answer'd, That he was the Ambassador of an absolute Queen that was unjustly depos'd, and had, according to his Duty, carefully endeavour'd the Delivery of his Princess, and the Safety of both Kingdoms: That he came into England with the full Authority of an Ambassador under publick Warrantise, which he had produc'd; and that the sacred Privileges of Ambassadors are by no means to be infrin'd. Burghley most gravely inform'd him, That neither the Privileges of an Embassy, nor Letters of publick Warrantise, could protect Ambassadors that offend against the publick Majesty of a Prince, but that they are liable to be punished for the same, else wicked Ambassadors might plot against the Life of Princes without any Punishment.

On the other hand, he stilly maintained, That the Privileges of Ambassadors had never been violated (to use his own Words) via Juris, but via Facti: And he pleasantly wish'd them not to shew him fouler play than the English Ambassadors, Throckmorton in France, and Randolph and Tamworth in Scotland had found; who had raised Rebellions, and openly fomented them; and yet suffered no greater Punishment, than the being commanded to depart within such a time. When they began to urge him with Testimonies of Englishmen, he gently desired them not to do it, since by a common received Custom, which (as he said) was grown into a Law, The Testimony of an Englishman against a Scotchman, or of a Scotchman against an Englishman, was not to be allow'd of.

After some Debates whether this would hold good, unless betwixt the Borderers of both Kingdoms, and that in cases relating to the Frontiers; and whether the English Ambassadors had raised Rebellions; Rofs was committed to the Tower of London; where being kept close Prisoner, within a while he answer'd to all Questions, with this Proviso, That his Answers should not be prejudicial to any. He excus'd the Queen of Scots, for that she being a Prisoner in the Flower of her Age, could not but use her utmost Endeavours to regain her Freedom, since Q. Elizabeth deny'd her access to her Presence, debar'd her from all hope of her Liberty, and openly reliev'd her Enemies. The Duke he excus'd, in that he had done nothing as to the Marriage with the Queen of Scots, but with the Consent of many of the Queen's Council; nor could he forsake her, tho' he had promis'd to do so under his Hand and Seal, since there was before a mutual Engagement of Marriage betwixt 'em.

Lastly, he excus'd himself, For that since he was an Ambassador and a Servant, he could 1571-

Ann. 14. not without a Sin depart from his Duty, and abandon his Princess in her Distress. But that he propos'd the Design of seizing on the Queen, with no other intent, than to try whether the Duke had Courage to undertake such an Attempt. The Crimes of the other Conspirators he cunningly extenuated, but could by no means be brought to tell the Names of the Gentlemen who had devoted their Service to the Duke in seizing the Queen. But he confess'd, that, by the Queen of Scots Orders, he had, by Servants employ'd betwixt them, treated with the Duke, Arundel, Lumley and Throckmorton, and with the Lord Viscount Montacute by Lumley, about putting the Castles in Scotland, the Hostages, and the King of Scots, into Englishmens Hands, about renouncing the Title, and giving up the English Rebels. Thus far of these Transactions for this Year, extracted wholly out of the Duke's Confession, and Rofs's own Account under his own Hand to the Queen of Scots.

At this very time Matthew Earl of Lenox, Regent of Scotland, and the King's Grandfather, summon'd in the King's Name a Convention of the States at Sterling, where (whilst he liv'd in Security) he was suddenly surpriz'd by the Nobility of the adverse Faction, who held a Parliament in the Queen's Name at Edinburgh. And after he had surrender'd himself to David Spense of Wormstone, (who did all he could to protect him) he was slain, together with Spense, by Bell and Caulder, after he had for about 14 Months carefully govern'd the Kingdom for the King his Grandson: Whilst on the one side, the French King supported the Queen's Party; and on the other side, Queen Elizabeth the King's; not so much that their Friends might overcome, as that themselves might not be overcome. Queen Elizabeth, in hopes that the young King might be deliver'd into her Hands; the French King, that Dunbarton and Edinburgh might be surrender'd to him, who grievously oppress'd the Scotch Merchants, prohibiting them Commerce with France, and drew many daily to the Queen of Scots Party, in hopes they might enjoy their Trading. In Lenox's room, by the unanimous Consent of the King's Party, John Areskine, Earl of Marre, was elected Regent; who being a Man of a very mild Nature, and very affectionate to his Country, when he had struggled no less under the turbulent Counsels of his own Party, than the Insolencies of his Adversaries, died for very Grief, after he had Govern'd 12 Months.

Laws against turbulent and seditious Persons.

The Iniquity of these Times, and the Love which the Parliament of England (now met at Westminster) bare to their Prince and Country, was the occasion of a Law for preventing the Practices of seditious Persons, whereby, according to the Tenour of former Laws, it was provided; That if any Man should attempt the Death or personal Hurt of the Queen, or raise War, or excite others to War, against her: If any one should give out, that she is not the lawful Queen of this Realm, but that any other can claim a juster Title thereto: Or should pronounce her to be an Heretick, Schismatick or Infidel; Or should usurp the Right and Title of the Kingdom during her Life; or should affirm, that any other has a Right to the Crown; or that the Laws and Statutes cannot limit and determine the Right of the Crown and the Successor thereof; every such Person should be guilty of High-Treason. That if any one, during the Queen's Life, should by any Book, written or printed, expressly maintain, that any Person is or ought to be the Queen's Heir and Successor, except the Natural Issue of her Body; or should publish, print or disperse any Books or Writings to that effect; he and his Abettors should for the first Offence be imprison'd for a whole Year, and forfeit the one half of his Goods: If any should offend a second time, he should incur the Penalty of a Premunire, that is, loss of all his Goods, and perpetual Imprisonment.

Some look'd upon this as too severe, who thought it would tend to the establishing the Quiet of the Nation, if an Heir-apparent were declar'd. But it is incredible what Jestts those that lewdly catch at Words made upon that Clause, except the Natural Issue of her Body; since the Lawyers term those Children Natural which are gotten out of Wedlock, whom Nature alone, without the intervention of honest Matrimony, hath begotten; and those they call lawful, according to the Tenour of the Common Law of England, who are in lawful Matrimony begotten of such a one's Body. So that I myself, being then a young Man, have often heard People say, that this Word was inserted into the Act by Leicester, with a design, that one time or other he might impose some Bastard Son of his upon the English for the Queen's natural Issue.

It was also Enacted, "That whosoever by Bulls or other Rescripts of the Pope, should reconcile any Man to the Church of Rome, and those who should be so reconcil'd, should be guilty of High-Treason. That whosoever should relieve such as did so reconcile Men, or should bring into England any Agnus Dei's, Grains, Crucifixes, or other Things consecrated by the Pope, should incur the Penalty of a Premunire. That whosoever should not discover such Reconcilers, should be guilty of concealing Treason, (commonly call'd Misprision of Treason).

Besides, the Conviction and Proscription of the Rebels in the North was confirm'd, and their Goods and Possessions, within the Bishoprick of Durham, adjudg'd to the Queen and her Successors. (Against James Pilkington the Bishop, who laid Claim to the Royalities between the Rivers of Tese and Tine) This was done, in regard of the vast Charge the Queen was at, in freeing the Bishop and his Diocese, from the Rebels; yet with Proviso, that this should not prejudice the Right of the Church of Durham, for the future. Against the Insolence likewise of such, as being devoted to the Pope, and contemning the Authority of the Laws, and their Allegiance to their Prince, had daily withdrawn themselves in great Numbers, without the Queen's leave, to foreign Countries, to contrive Innovations in the State; It was provided, that under forfeiture of their Estates, they should, within such a time, return and submit themselves, and that the fraudulent Conveyances, which they had made, should be void. So much against the Papists.

On the other side also was restrain'd, by wholesome Laws, as well the Covetousness of certain Church-Men, who (as if born for themselves alone) did, to the notorious defrauding of their Successors, waste the Church-Revenues, and let out Leases for many Years: As also the Insolence of others, who, desirous of Innovation, oppos'd the Articles concluded upon in a Synod at London, in the Year 1562. for abolishing of Schisms. It was likewise propos'd, that, if the Queen of Scots should again offend against the Laws of England, she should be proceeded against by Law, as if she were the Wife of an English Peer. But the Queen by interposing her Authority, prevented the Enacting thereof.

As soon as the Parliament broke up, in the beginning of June, a Consultation was held, about John Story, Doctor of Law; one of the D. d'Alva's Searchers (of whom Mention was made before, in the Year 1569.) Wherein it was debated, Whether he, being an Englishman born, who in Brabant had consulted with a foreign Prince, 1571. Prince, about invading his own Country; and had inform'd him how it might be invaded; were not guilty of High-Treason. The ablest Lawyers said he was. Whereupon being arraign'd, and charg'd with High-Treason, for having consulted with one Prestal, a great Magician, against his Prince's Life, for having conspir'd the Death of her and the King of Scots, curs'd her daily in his Grace at Meats, and inform'd the Duke d'Alva's Secretary, how to invade England, raise a Rebellion in Ireland, and at the same time fend the Scots into England. He refus'd to submit himself to Trial, and to the Laws of England; affirming that the Judges had no Power over him, since he was not a sworn Subject to the Queen of England, but to the King of Spain. However he was condemn'd according to the ordinary Form of Nihil dicit, (because no Man can relinquish his Country where he was born, nor abjure his native Soil, or his Prince, at his Pleasure) and suffer'd the Death of a Traitor.

Difference between the English and Portuguese compounded. Now there had been Differences for some Years depending, between the Portugal and the English Merchants; whilst the English had from the Year 1552. exercis'd a gainful Trade for Gold with the Negroes, on that part of Africa which they call Guinea; and the Portuguese, as the first Discoverers of those Coasts, did all they could, by Force of Arms, to prevent them: So that sometimes they had some Skirmishes by Sea, and seiz'd one anothers Ships. But Sebastian, King of Portugal, now out of his Minority, that he might procure a Peace, sent Francis Gerard into England; who made a League with the Queen, upon some such Conditions as these: 'That there should be a perfect Amity and free Commerce on both sides: That neither of them should attempt any thing to the Prejudice of the other, nor assist the Enemies, Rebels or Traitors of the other: That all Merchandize, Money, and Ships that were arrested should be restor'd: And that, to gratify the King of Portugal, Queen Elizabeth should prohibit the English from making any Voyages upon the Seas and Lands of the Portugal-Conquest; which Prohibition if they did not observe, let it be at their Peril, if they should be depriv'd of their Lives and Goods by the Portuguese. The Kingdoms of Portugal and Algarbe were excepted; and the Isles of Azores, Madera, and the Coast of Barbary; where they were allow'd to have free trading.

Death of Marquess of Northampton. This Year William Parr Marquess of Northampton, sweetly ended his Life: A Man very well vers'd in the softer Studies of Musick, Amours, and other courtly Diversions. He was advanc'd by King Henry VIII. first to the Dignity of Baron Parr of Kendall, then to the Marriage of Anne Bourchier, sole Heiress to the Earl of Essex; and withal to the Title of the Earl of Essex, upon the King's marrying his Sister. By King Edward VI. he was promoted to the Style and Honour of Marquess of Northampton. Under Q. Mary, he was condemn'd for High-Treason, having taken up Arms for the pretended Queen Jane Grey: yet was he soon after pardon'd by her, and restor'd to his Estate; and afterwards by Queen Elizabeth re-instated in his Honours. He had no Children, but left for his Heir Henry Herbert Earl of Pembroke, his Nephew by one of his Sisters.

And of Bp. Jewel. About this time also died John Jewel, scarce Fifty Years of Age: A Man of an excellent Genius, deep Knowledge in Divinity, and singular Piety. He was born of honest Parentage in Devonshire, prov'd a most excellent Student in Corpus-Christi-College in Oxford; in Queen Mary's Days liv'd an Exile in Germany, and by Queen

Elizabeth was promoted to the Bishoprick of Salisbury. In the Year 1562. he publish'd An Apology for the Church of England; and in two English Volumes he very learnedly maintain'd the Protestant Doctrine against Thomas Harding, an Apostate from the same: Which Volumes are now extant in a Latin Version.

Ireland was at this time pretty quiet; for Sir John Perott, Governour of Munster, so harass'd James Fitz-Morris, who had rifl'd Kilmallock, that he was oblig'd to hide himself in Lurking-holes near Ardagh; and at last (as we shall shew in its proper Place) brought him to that pass, that he humbly begg'd Pardon. Sidney the Lord-Deputy return'd into England, and Sir William Fitz-Williams, who had marry'd his Sister, was substituted in his Room.

The Fifteenth Year of her Reign.

The Beginning of the New-year presented the Londoners with a new and sorrowful Spectacle in Westminster-Hall. For a wooden Scaffold was erected in the midst of the Hall, reaching from the Gate to the upper End; where there was a Tribunal built, with Seats on both sides; such a Sight as they had not seen in full Eighteen Years. On the 16th. day of January, was Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, brought before this Tribunal, between Sir Owen Hopton Lieutenant of the Tower, and Sir Peter Carew, Knights; the fatal Ax being carry'd before him, with the Edge turn'd from him. Upon the Bench or Tribunal sat George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, constituted Lord High-Steward of England, for that day. On each side of him sat these Noblemen, who were appointed to be his Triers, whom we call Peers; namely,

Duke of Norfolk arraign'd.

Reginald Grey Earl of Kent.
Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Sussex.
Henry Hastings Earl of Huntington.
Francis Russel Earl of Bedford.
Henry Herbert Earl of Pembroke.
Edward Seymour, or of Saint Maur, Earl of Hereford.
Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick.
Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester.
Walter D'Evereux Viscount Hereford.
Edward Lord Clinton, Lord-Admiral.
William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord-Chamberlain.
William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Secretary.
Arthur Lord Grey of Wilton.
James Blount Lord Mountjoy.
William Lord Sands.
Thomas Lord Wentworth.
William Lord Burroughs.
Lewis Lord Mordant.
John Powlett Lord Saint John of Basing.
Robert Lord Rich.
Roger Lord North.
Edmund Bruges Lord Chandois.
Oliver Lord Saint John of Blenesho.
Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst. And William West Lord De la Ware.

His Peers.

After Silence was proclaim'd, the Commission Form of the Arraignment was read; wherein the Authority granted to the Lord-Steward was contain'd: Then Garret-King-at-Arms put a white Rod into his Hands, which the Lord-Steward presently deliver'd to his Gentleman-Usher, who standing by him held it upright all the time of the Trial. Then were the Earls and Barons call'd over, and every one answer'd to his Name. Silence being again proclaim'd, the Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to return his Writ, and to bring the Duke 1572. Duke to the Bar. The Duke was presently brought: On the one side of him was the Lieutenant of the Tower, on the other Sir Peter Carew, and next him stood the Ax-bearer, with the Edge turn'd from the Duke. After Silence was proclaim'd again, the Clerk of the Crown spake to the Duke in these Words: Thomas Duke of Norfolk, late of Kenninghale in the County of Norfolk, hold up thy Hand. When he had held up his Hand, the Clerk read, with a loud Voice, the Crimes he stood arraign'd for; namely,

Heads of his Accusation.

'That in the Eleventh Year of Queen Elizabeth, and afterwards, he had enter'd into a treasonable Conspiracy, about deposing her from her Throne, and taking away her Life, and invading the Kingdom, by raising War, and bringing in a foreign Power.

'That tho' he knew for certain, that Mary late Queen of Scots had usurp'd the Crown of England, with the Title and Arms thereof; yet he had treated about a Marriage with her, (without acquainting the Queen) and had lent her a great Sum of Money, contrary to what he had promis'd under his Hand.

'That tho' he was sure, that the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, Markenfield and others, had raised a Rebellion against the Queen, and were driven into Scotland, yet he had supply'd 'em with Money.

'That in the thirteenth Year of the Queen's Reign, he had by his Letters craved Auxiliary Forces of Pope Pius V. the Queen's professed Enemy, of the Spaniard, and the Duke d'Alva, to set the Queen of Scots at Liberty, and restore the Popish Religion in England.

Lastly, 'That he had reliev'd Heris the Scot, and other the Queen's Enemies in Scotland.

These Articles being read, the Clerk ask'd the Duke, whether he were Guilty, or not Guilty?

He desires Counsel, which is deny'd him.

The Duke crav'd, that if the Law would allow it, he might have Counsel assign'd him to defend his Cause. Lord-Chief-Justice Cateline answer'd, 'That the Law could not allow it. It is fit (said the Duke) I should submit myself to the Opinion of the Judges; but in this Case there are many nice Points; nor had I notice till within these fourteen Hours, that I should be brought to my Tryal. I have been also unprovided of Books. I see now I must fight for myself without Weapons. However, I have heard that in the Reign of King Henry VII. Sir Henry Stafford had Counsel allow'd him in a case of High-Treason. Dier, Lord-Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, answer'd, 'That Stafford had Counsel assign'd him about the Privilege of Sanctuary, from whence he was violently drawn: But in the case of High-Treason, he pleaded his own Cause without Council. To Day then (said the Duke) I must Plead for my Life, my Estate, my Children, and (which is above all) my Honesty, (as for my Honour, let it go). If I die innocent, God will be sure to avenge my Cause. Yet let me ask this one Question; Whether that Enumeration of my Crimes be to be taken for true in every Part, and to which Part I must answer? Cateline said, 'Since the Causes are true, that Enumeration is also to be taken for true. I desire (said the Duke) to be inform'd whether every Particular therein be High-Treason; for I have heard say that in a Case of the Lord Scroop's, in the Reign of Henry IV. — As he was going on, the Clerk interrupted him, crying; 'Thomas Duke of Norfolk, art thou guilty of those Crimes, or no? He answer'd, 'Not guilty. The Clerk ask'd him again, 'How wilt thou be try'd? He answer'd, 'To God and these Peers I commend my Cause.

He accepts the Trial.

The Heinousness of these Crimes daunts me, but the Royal Goodness of the Queen refreshes me, from whom I could expect no better. But of you, my Lord-Steward, I earnestly desire, that I may have a fair Trial, and that my Memory, which is very weak, may not be overcharg'd with any Variety of Matter. That I have such as you for my Peers and Judges, I acknowledge my self happy; to most of whose Integrities I would willingly and readily commit my Life. I trusted to my Innocence, and so have not shifted for myself by Flight. Yet I must ingenuously confess, I have fail'd in my Duty towards the Queen; but not so as to amount to High-Treason. I beseech you, that these lighter Crimes may not promiscuously be reckon'd among Crimes of High-Treason.

Then said Barham the Queen's Serjeant at Law; 'The Crimes of High-Treason, where- with you stand charg'd, are these. You have conspir'd to depose the Queen, and take away her Life: You design'd to marry the Queen of Scots: You invited foreign Forces into the Kingdom: You reliev'd the Rebels; and you assisted the Scots the Queen's Enemies. Barham, (said the Duke) pray do not aggravate the Matter with Words, by objecting the Marriage, and other things which amount not to High-Treason. Barham turning to the Peers, pleaded to this Effect: 'That whosoever is willing to marry that Woman, which lays a Claim to the Kingdom, the same Man affects the Kingdom. But this the Duke went about to do, when he was one of the Commissioners at York, for hearing the Queen of Scots Cause; at which time he was bound by Oath, to consider impartially the Accusations and Defences on both sides. That Case (said the Duke) has several Particulars in it, which amount not to High-Treason. The Lord-Steward of England commanded the Duke not to stray from the Matter in hand, by his Digressions; who, when Barham clamorously insisted upon it, acknowledged that the Queen of Scots had indeed laid Claim to the Kingdom of England, but had long ago desisted from that Claim. Barham shew'd to the contrary, that she had not relinquish'd it, because she would not yet renounce the Title which she pretended; and he sharply accus'd the Duke, of instructing the Queen of Scots Delegates, what they should answer; and this was prov'd out of the Bishop of Ross's Confession. The Duke confess'd that Lidington had mention'd the Marriage to him, but that he refus'd it, and gave no Instructions to the Commissioners; and withal desir'd, that Ross might be brought Face to Face against him.

Then Barham press'd at large many things (already mention'd) concerning the Marriage, to prove that the Duke had affected the Crown; and was often urging and repeating this Question, 'What else could the Duke propose to himself, whilst he resolv'd, without the Queen's Knowledge, to marry the Queen of Scots; a Woman without a Fortune, without a Kingdom, (her Son being now establish'd on the Scottish Throne) but that he might, by means of her, enjoy the Kingdom of England, and consequently deprive the Queen of her Crown and Life. These things (said the Duke) are far fetcht, to prove I ever intended the Deposing and Death of the Queen.

Well then, (said Barham) to come a little nearer; 'tis very well known, that you enter'd into a Design of seizing the Tower of London, which is certainly the greatest Strength of the Kingdom of England: So that it thence follows, that you then attempted the Destruction of the Queen; since no Kingdom can away

with 1572. The Duke did not deny, but that one Hopton had mention'd to him the Design of seizing the Tower; but that he rejected the Motion. 'What made you then (said Barham) to consult with the Earl of Pembroke about it, who dissuaded you from it?

Barham went on, and urg'd, That when the Queen demanded to have the young King of Scotland, certain Castles, and the English Rebels in Scotland, deliver'd into her Hands; the Duke privately advis'd the Scots not to assent to it. He likewise accus'd him of attempting to set the Queen of Scots at liberty; and that after he had solemnly given it under his Hand, that he would have nothing more to do with her.

Now was Candish produc'd as a Witness, That the Duke had fully resolv'd upon the Marriage, and had ask'd him, Whether, if Queen Elizabeth should die, he would draw his Unkle over to his Party. These things the Duke utterly deny'd, and rejected his Testimony, as a Man in Poverty, and a beggarly Witness. Besides it was prov'd, That the Duke had privately sent his Servant to the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, to advise 'em not to break out into open Rebellion, since it would be very dangerous. There were likewise produc'd, the Queen of Scots Letters to the Duke; wherein she was concern'd, that Northumberland was taken, before he had arm'd himself for the Rebellion. (For so it had been reported to her; whether designedly or no, I cannot tell)

To these things the Duke answer'd, 'That it could not, from these Arguments be prov'd, he had any Design upon the Queen's Life; and that nothing as yet alledg'd was of any Force against him, but only the Bishop of Ross's Testimony: And that since he was a Foreigner, his Testimony (by the Authority of Bracton, a Man well vers'd in our Common-Laws) was not to be admitted. That he had never such an Esteem for the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, as to repose his Life in their Hands. That his own Innocence had been such a Surety to him, that he never so much as thought of flying.

'It is sufficiently evident, (said Gerard, the Queen's Attorney) that the Duke did resolve upon a Marriage with the Queen of Scots, upon no other Design, than to destroy the Q. That he likewise seriously consulted about invading the Kingdom, is manifest by his Letters to the Pope, the Spaniard, and the Duke d'Alva. What he transacted with Ridolpho, is now apparent from those obscure Notes in Cyphers hid under the Tiles in Howard's House; and from the Letters (which he had order'd to be burnt) found under the Mat, in the Entrance of his Bed-Chamber. All which things might be easily prov'd, by the Examinations of those Men, who were neither terrify'd by Torture, nor convicted of Treason. To these things the Duke answer'd, 'I was neither the Author nor the Favourer of those Consultations with the Pope and the Spaniard; but I always dislik'd them. Let them who have committed the Offence, bear the Blame; and not lay it at my Door, to excuse themselves.

Gerard farther accus'd the Duke, that he had treated with Ridolpho, about transporting 10000 Men out of Flanders, to be landed at Harwich, a Sea-port in Essex; and this he prov'd out of Barker's Examination: That Letters were likewise sent by Ridolpho to the Spaniard and the Duke d'Alva, to which tho' the Duke would not set his Hand; yet by Ross's Advice, he sent Barker, his Secretary, to the Spanish Ambassador, to assure him, that the Letters were his.

'My Memory (said the Duke) fails me, nor can it attend to so great a Variety of Matter. You Lawyers have your short Notes, but I must answer extempore. Certainly, 'tis very unlikely, that I, who have been always avers to the Romish Religion, should have any thing to do with the Pope. I had rather be drawn in pieces with Horses, than revolt from the Religion which I profess. The very Situation of Harwich is enough to clear me of this Accusation. Who is not sensible, how hard a Matter it is, to lead an Army through that Country; which is full of Hedges, and very inconvenient, by reason of the narrow Ways? Had I intend'd a War against my Prince, I should certainly have furnish'd myself with Arms; but these full ten Years I have bought me no more than eight Breast-Pieces, and no Powder at all. Such Letters I should never have committed to Barker's Trust, but rather to Banister's, who was to me worth a great many Barkers.

Now were produc'd the Bishop of Ross's Letters to the Queen of Scots, from the Tower; which being intercepted confirm'd the things that have been alledg'd. The Duke desired to see the Letters, for he seem'd to suspect they were counterfeit. You need not question the Letters, (said the Lord High-Steward) they are Ross's own Hand-Writing. There was also produc'd another short Letter, written with Oker by the Duke, to his Servant, ordering him to burn a Packet of Letters hid in such a Place, and to lay the Blame upon Ross; who, by the Privilege of an Ambassador, would easily elude the Law. To this the Duke answer'd, 'Being inform'd that it was nois'd about, that I accus'd many; I answer'd it in that short Letter; and when I saw every thing was narrowly pry'd into, I order'd that Packet to be burnt, to save some from Danger.

Bromley the Queen's Solicitor, or Second Attorney, produc'd Ridolpho's Letters; wherein he intimated, that the Duke d'Alva approv'd of the Plot; as also the Pope's Letters to the Duke, dated the 4th. of May. Then Wilbraham made an eloquent Speech, concerning the Validity of the Testimonies of the Bishop of Ross and the Duke's Servants. The Duke reply'd, 'Tis not in my Power, to refute such a set and so polish'd an Orator. But yet that Orator (said he) let him be never so well skill'd, has omitted to shew, how great the Power of Fear is, which oftentimes removes a resolute Mind from its Place and Station. And here again he urg'd and commended Bracton against the Validity of foreign Witnesses. Cateline the Lord Chief-Justice answer'd, That in such Cases as this, the Testimonies of Foreigners were valid; and that it was at the Peers Pleasure, to credit or discredit such Testimonies.

Now it came to be prov'd, That the Duke had reliev'd the Rebels that were fled: Which appear'd from the Countess of Northumberland's Letters, wherein she thank'd the Duke for the Money he had supply'd her Husband and her with.

That which was last of all objected, concerning relieving the Scots the Queen's Enemies, was prov'd from the Duke's Letters to Banister, from Banister's own Confession, and from the Money deliver'd to Brown of Shrewsbury.

Here the Duke ask'd the Judges, 'Whether the Subjects of another Prince in Confederacy with the Queen, were to be reputed the Queen's Enemies? Cateline answer'd, They were: and that the Queen of England might wage War with any Duke of France, and yet at the same time be at Peace with the French King.

When

When it now grew late, the Lord-Steward asked the Duke, if he had any thing more to say for himself. He answer'd, I confide in the Equity of the Laws. The Lord-Steward commanded the Lieutenant of the Tower to take the Duke from the Bar: And after Silence proclaim'd, turning to the Peers, he said: 'You have heard how Thomas Duke of Norfolk, being charged with High-Treason, and not confessing himself guilty, hath submitted his Cause to God and you. It is for you therefore to consider with yourselves, whether he be to be held guilty, and to give in your Verdict upon your Conscience and Honour. And withal he ordered them to withdraw and advise together.

After a short space they return'd to their Seats. Then the Lord-Steward beginning with the last, said, My Lord Delaware, is Thomas Duke of Norfolk guilty of that High-Treason charged against him, or no? He rising up, and laying his Hand on his Breast, answer'd, Guilty. So answer'd the rest, being ask'd in their order.

Then was the Duke brought again to the Bar, to whom the Lord-Steward spake in this manner. Thomas Duke of Norfolk, thou hast been arraign'd upon divers Crimes of High-Treason, and hast submitted thyself to God and these Peers, who have all found thee Guilty. Hast thou any thing to say why Sentence should not be pass'd upon thee? The Duke answer'd, God's Will be done, who will judge between me and my false Accusers.

Silence being now kept, the edge of the Ax was turn'd towards him. Upon this Barham requir'd the Lord-Steward in the Queen's Name to pass Sentence; which he with Tears in his Eyes pronounc'd according to the usual Form, in these Words. 'Forasmuch as thou Thomas Duke of Norfolk hast been charged with High-Treason, hast pleaded not Guilty, and submitted thyself to the Judgment of thy Peers: This Court adjudgeth thee to be carried back from hence to the Tower, then to be laid upon an Hurdle, and drawn through the City to the Gallows, there to be hang'd, and being half dead, to be cut down, thy Bowels taken out, and after thy Head is cut off, to be quartered: Thy Head and Body to be disposed of according to the Queen's pleasure; and God have mercy upon thy Soul.

The Duke having heard this Sentence, with a presence of Mind answer'd: 'Sentence is pass'd upon me as upon a Traytor: I have none to trust to but God and the Queen: I am excluded from your Society, but hope shortly to enjoy the heavenly. I will fit myself to die. Only this one thing I crave, That the Queen would be kind to my Children and Servants, and take care that my Debts be paid.

These things, which I heard myself, I have the more exactly penn'd down, since in such weighty Matters it may be of some use to Posterity to have the very least Particulars recorded.

Some few Days after, Barney and Mather were Executed, for having conspir'd with one Herle, a wicked Accomplice of theirs, the Death of certain Privy-Counsellors, and the freeing the Duke out of the Tower. But Herle soon discover'd the Plot; and being produc'd as a Witness against them, Herle, (said Barney smiling) thou art one Hour before-hand with me, else I had stood in thy place as thine Accuser, and thou in mine, as guilty, and to be hang'd.

This Plot, and several others that were laid to deliver the Prisoners, hastned the calling of a Parliament. Against which the Queen promoted Walter D'Evereux, Viscount Hereford, to the Honour of Earl of Essex, because by the Great Grandmother's side he descended from the Bourchiers, Earls of Essex: And Edward Lord Clinton, a Man of a plentiful Estate in Lincolnshire, to the Dignity of Earl of Lincoln. Besides, she summon'd four new Barons to this Parliament, viz. John Powlet of Basing, the Marquis of Winchester's Son; Henry Compton, Henry Cheney, and Henry Norris.

At which time it was Enacted by the Authority of Parliament, 'That whosoever should seize upon, demolish, or burn any of the Queen's Forts, should be guilty of Felony: That who-ever should hold them by force against the Queen, burn her Ships, or block up her Havens, should be guilty of High-Treason. And likewise, 'That if any Person should go about to deliver any Man imprison'd upon the Queen's Writ, for Treason, or suspicion of Treason before his Arraignment, the said Person should forfeit his Estate during Life, and be imprison'd during the Queen's pleasure: If Arraign'd, he should incur the Penalty of Death; if Condemn'd, the Penalty of High-Treason.

As the Severity of these Laws was only necessary for the Time; so the Parliament thought fit it should be only Temporary; namely, during the Queen's Life. But so many Designs of this nature were set on foot, as hastned the Duke's Execution; which however was put off for about four Months. Nor till then could the Commons in Parliament, the Counsellors at Court, nor the Importunity of Preachers, by suggesting the greatness of the Danger she was in, overcome the Queen's Clemency.

But on the 2d of June, at Eight in the Morning, the Duke was brought to a Scaffold erected upon Tower-Hill; whereon he was no sooner mounted, and Alexander Nowel Dean of St. Pauls, who was there as his ghostly Comforter, desired the Multitude that stood round to keep Silence; but he said; 'Tis no new thing for Men to suffer Death in this Place; tho' since the beginning of our most gracious Queen's Reign, I am the first, and God grant I may be the last. At this the People cry'd, Amen. Then (to give you an Abstract of what I heard at large) he went on: 'I acknowledge my Peers have justly sentenced me worthy of Death; nor have I any design to excuse myself. I freely confess, that I treated with the Q. of Scots in Things of great moment, without my Sovereign's Knowledge, which I ought not to have done; whereupon I was cast into the Tower. But I was afterwards set at Liberty, having made an humble Submission, and promised upon Honour to have nothing more to do with her; yet I confess I acted contrary, and this in truth disturbs my Conscience. But I neither promised nor swore it at the Lord's Table, as is commonly reported. I once confer'd with Ridolpho, but not to the Queen's Destruction. For there are several which know I had to do with him about Money-matters, upon Bills and Bonds. I found him to be one that envied the Peace of England, and forward to contrive any Villany.

Two Letters from the Pope I saw, but by no means approv'd of them, nor of the Rebellion in the North. I have not been Popishly inclin'd ever since I had any Taste of Religion; but was always averse to the Popish Doctrine, and embraced the true Religion of Jesus Christ, and put my whole Trust in the Blood of Christ my blessed Redeemer and Saviour. Yet I must own that some of my Servants and Acquaintance were addicted to the Romish Religion. If in this I have offended either God, the Church, or the Protestants, I pray God and them to forgive me. Then after the reading a Psalm

After this, he embraced Sir Henry Leigh, whisper'd something to him, and Dean Nowel, who turning to the People, said, 'The Duke desires you would all of you pray to God to have mercy on him, and withal keep silence, that his Mind may not be disturbed. The Executioner ask'd him Forgiveness, and had it granted. One offering him a Handkerchief to cover his Eyes; he refus'd it, saying, I am not in the least afraid of Death. Then falling on his Knees, he lay prostrate with his Mind fix'd upon God, and Dean Nowel pray'd with him. Presently after, he stretched his Neck upon the Block, and his Head was immediately cut off at one blow, and shew'd by the Executioner as a doleful sight to the sorrowful and weeping Multitude.

It is incredible how dearly the People loved him; whose Good-will he had gain'd by a Munificence and extraordinary Affability, suitable to so great a Prince. The wiser sort of Men were variously affected: Some were terrified at the greatness of the Danger, which during his Life seem'd to threaten the State from him and his Faction. Others were mov'd with Pity towards him, as one very nobly Descended, of an extraordinary good Nature, comely Personage, and manly Presence; who might have been both a Support and Ornament to his Country, had not the crafty Wiles of the Envious, and his own false Hopes, led on with a shew of doing the Publick Service, diverted him from his first course of Life. They call'd likewise to mind his Father's untimely End, who tho' a Man of extraordinary Learning, and famous in War, was yet beheaded in the same Place five and twenty Years before, and that upon very slight Grounds, viz. for Quartering the Arms of Edward the Confessor with his own; which yet we read that the Mowbrays, Dukes of Norfolk, from whom he Descended, had born by Permission of King Richard II.

Here it will be worth our while to add briefly what Hieronymo Catena hath published concerning this business in the Life of Pius V. Bishop of Rome; an Author for his Integrity made Free of the City of Rome, and Secretary to Cardinal Alexandrino, Pius V.'s Nephew; that so we may see whence the whole Business proceeded, and by whom this Plot was contriv'd. 'Pius V. (says he) being very zealous to restore the Romish Religion in England, and at the same time to remove Queen Elizabeth out of the Throne; since he could not have an Apostolical Nuncio, or any other publick Minister, to carry on his Designs, procured one Robert Ridolpho, a Gentleman of Florence, (who lived in England under pretence of being a Merchant) to stir up the People to contrive the Destruction of Q. Elizabeth. He manag'd the Business carefully, not only with the Catholics, but also with some Protestants, who entred into the Conspiracy, some out of a private grudge to those who aspir'd to the Crown, and others in love with Innovations. Whilst these Things were carry'd on privately, there happen'd a Difference betwixt the Spaniard and Queen Elizabeth, about some Money that was intercepted. The Pope laying hold on this Occasion, persuaded the Spaniard to assist the Conspirators in England against Q. Elizabeth, by which means he might the more securely carry on his Designs in Flanders, and the Romish Religion might be restored in Britain. He likewise persuades the French King to do the like, as oblig'd to it upon the account of his Kinswoman the Queen of Scots; and by the good Service of the Scots, who had by their Incurfions diverted the English Forces from aiding the Protestants of France; and lastly, by the merit of these noble Conspirators in England, who by their Artifices had hindred the Queen of England from openly assisting the French Protestants. Upon which account the French King had promised them his Aid for Delivery of the Queen of Scots, but fail'd them. In the meantime, Ridolpho brought it about, that the Conspirators drew the Duke of Norfolk into the Association, made him their Head, and promis'd him Marriage with the Queen of Scots, she also consenting thereto. The Pope, to forward the business, published a Bull, deposed the Queen, absolved her Subjects from all their Oaths and Allegiance, and sent printed Copies thereof to Ridolpho to be dispersed all over England. Upon this the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland took up Arms against their Prince; who soon after, for want of Money, withdrew into Scotland. Norfolk and others were cast into Prison, amongst whom was Ridolpho, whom the Pope had ordered to furnish the Conspirators with an hundred and fifty thousand Crowns, which, he being in Prison, could not do.

But forasmuch as the Queen could not discover the bottom of this Plot, he with the rest were discharged, and then distributed the Money among the Conspirators, who sent him to the Pope to certify him, that every thing was prepared and in a readiness at home against Queen Elizabeth, and to intreat the Spaniard, that the Supply out of Flanders might forthwith join them. The Pope commended the Design; (tho' the Duke d'Alva, to whom Ridolpho in his Journey communicated the business, lik'd it not, as being too full of Danger.) This Ridolpho he sent to the Spaniard upon another Pretence, and to the King of Portugal with Instructions, and at the same time by Letters he promis'd Aid to Norfolk.

He urges the Spaniard to assist the Conspirators; and the more effectually to persuade him, promises to go himself to their Assistance, and, if need were, to mortgage all the Goods of the Apostolick See, Chalices, Crosses, and holy Vestments. That there was no Difficulty in it, if he would send Chapini Vitelli out of Flanders with an Army into England. Which the Spaniard ordered to be done with all expedition, and the Pope himself provided Money in the Netherlands.

But the Duke d'Alva was not pleas'd with these Projects, who both envy'd Vitelli the Glory of this Action, and would have had his Son prefer'd before him; and at the same time feared some Hostile Attempt from France. Withal he propos'd to their Consideration, Whether if England were conquer'd it would fall to the Spaniard? Whether the French King would not oppose it? And whether the Pope could give them a Supply sufficient for such an Undertaking? However, the Spaniard expressly commanded him to invade England, sending Ridolpho back with Money into Flanders. But by God's permission the whole Design was discovered to Queen Elizabeth by a certain Foreiner, and Norfolk was taken and put to death. The Pope was concerned at it, and the Spaniard sorry for it, who said in the presence of Cardinal Alexandrino, the Pope's Nephew, That never any Plot was laid more advis'dly, or concealed with greater Consent and Constancy, which in so long a time was never discover'd by any of the Conspirators: And that in 24 Hour's time Forces might have been transported easily from the Netherlands, which might have suddenly seiz'd upon the Queen and the City of London, restor'd restor'd Religion, and settled the Q. of Scots upon the Throne; especially since Tho. Stukeley, an English Defenter, had taken upon him at the same time with 3000 Spaniards to reduce all Ireland under the Subjection of the Spaniard, and with one or two Spy-boats to fire the English Fleet.

Thus far Hieronymo Catena; some of which things were unknown to the English till he published them in his Book printed at Rome, with the Privilege of Sixtus V. in the Year 1588. Now to the purpose, if this be beside it.

Scarce ten Days after the Duke's Execution, William Lord De-la-Ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Thomas Wilson Doctor of Law, and Thomas Bromley the Queen's Solicitor, were sent to the Q. of Scots, now overcome with Grief and Mourning, to expostulate with her by way of Accusation: That she had usurp'd the Title and Arms of the Crown of England, and had not renounced the same, as was agreed upon in the Treaty of Edinburgh: That for the full possessing herself thereof, she had treated of a Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk; without acquainting the Queen therewith; for the consummation whereof, and for freeing the Duke out of the Tower by force of Arms, she had used all Methods possible by her Ministers. That she had raised a Rebellion in the North, reliev'd notorious Rebels in Scotland and Flanders; petition'd for a foreign Aid from the Pope, the Spaniard and others, by Ridolpho an Italian, in order to invade England, and conspired with certain of the English, who should free her out of Prison, and declare her Queen of England. That she had received Letters from the Pope, wherein he promised to cherish her as a Hen does her Chickens, and to esteem them true Sons of the Church, who should stand for her. Lastly, That she had procur'd the Pope's Bull against the Queen, and permitted her Party in foreign Parts to stile her publicly Queen of England.

Her ans^w. First of all she declared to them, That she was an absolute Sovereign, and dependent on none. Then she answer'd the Things objected against her with a settled Mind and Countenance. That she herself had not usurp'd the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, but the French King, her Husband, had impos'd them upon her whilst young and under a Husband's Power, and therefore she was in no fault. That she had neither born them since her Husband's Death, nor would challenge them as long as Queen Elizabeth or her Children liv'd.

As for the Marriage with the D. of Norfolk, she never intended it to the Queen's Prejudice; for she was of the opinion it would be for the Good of the Common-wealth: But she had not renounc'd it, being contracted to him. That she did advise the Duke to free himself out of Prison and Danger, as she was oblig'd to do by the love of a Wife.

That she had rais'd no Rebellion, nor was necessary to any, but was always most ready to discover any Designs form'd against the Queen, if she would but vouchsafe to give her Audience in her Royal Presence. That she never reliev'd the English Rebels, only by Letters recommended the Countess of Northumberland to the Duke of Alva. Ridolpho, whom she knew to be in the Pope's Favour, she made use of in Money-concerns; but had receiv'd no Letters from him.

That she had excited none to set her at Liberty. That she had indeed lent a willing Ear to such as offer'd her their Service herein, and to this purpose had communicated to Rolston and Hall a private Cypher.

That she had indeed now and then received Letters from the Pope, very full of Piety and Consolation, but no such forms of Speech as is said were in them.

That she was not the procurer of the Bull, only she had seen a printed Copy thereof, which when she had read, she cast into the Fire. If any in foreign Parts write or stile her otherwise than they ought, let them bear the blame. That she had never by Letters desir'd Aid of the Pope, or the Spaniard, for the invading of England; but had indeed implor'd their Assistance to resettle her in her Kingdom, and that with the Queen's knowledge.

That if any Scruple remain about those Letters, or about consummating the Marriage by force of Arms, she prays that (since she is born of the Blood-Royal of England) she may give in her personal Answer at the next Session of the English Parliament.

Scotland in the mean time was most miserably harass'd with intestine Divisions; whilst on the one side those of the Queen's Party, presuming on the Favour of the French; and on the other side those of the King's Party, relying on the Assistance of the English; prosecuted one another with mortal Hatred and deadly Wars. Yet the English and French seem'd very desirous of composing the Difference, sending their Embassadors into Scotland.

The French, supposing this to be the most proper Method, propos'd, That some good and equitable Persons should be chosen to govern the Kingdom of Scotland for a time in neither the King's nor Queen's Name. For they would not acknowledge the K. of Scots for King, since he had no other Right to the Crown than from his Mother, and the Mother they thought could not be deposed by her own Subjects: That she therefore was to be acknowledg'd as Queen, and the ancient League between her and the French King to be observ'd.

On the contrary the English, by weighty Arguments, maintain'd, That such an Administration of Government would be downright Anarchy: That the Common-wealth could not be govern'd by so many: That the Scots, who had always been under the Government of a King, would never consent to the Election of such Governors: That the Estates of the Kingdom had deposed the Queen, and had duly constituted and inaugurated the King; and that that ancient League was not contracted between twixt Persons, but the Kingdoms of France and Scotland: And that the most Christian King was by the very tenour of the League oblig'd to defend the King of Scots. For it was provided in express Words, That the Kings of France, if at any time the Succession of the Crown of Scotland should be controverted, should defend him, to whom the Estates of Scotland adjudg'd the Kingdom. As for the Causes of deposing the Queen, the Scots who had done it were to be consulted in the case.

However the French King openly favour'd the Queen of Scots Party, and was very importunate with Queen Elizabeth for her Delivery, lest (as his Embassadors ingenuously declar'd) he should seem to neglect her that had been Wife to the King his Brother, and was now Dowager of France; to break the ancient League between the French and Scots; to slight the Family of the Guises, now so very Powerful in France; or to approve of that pernicious Example of deposing Kings: And (which was the main Argument) lest she, being abandon'd by the French King in her Distress, should close with the Spaniard, and at length the most Potent Kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland, by her Means should be joined in a League with Spain to the endangering of France.

To these Things Queen Elizabeth gently reply'd: 'Let the French King have a care what Esteem he puts upon the Queen of Scots; tho' she has been Queen, and be now Dowager of France, yet she privately consulted with the Spaniard about breaking off the Match with the Duke of Anjou. Let him consider whether he does not violate that ancient League, if he defend not the young King. Let him consider how much France is oblig'd to the Family of the Guises; by whose Counsels France itself has been involv'd in a deadly War, Scotland alienated from the French, and the Q. of Scots herself brought under these sad Circumstances. The example of deposing Kings is certainly very dangerous, and to be condemn'd to the Pit of Hell; but let the Scots be responsible for that. I here unwillingly mention what I utterly dislike. Yet whether the French formerly mislik'd it, I know not, when Pepin depos'd Childerick, and Hugh Capet Charles of Lorain, from their Ancestor's Kingdoms; translating the Crown to other Families: And when Philip le Bon the Burgundian turn'd Jaquetta out of Hainault and Holland; or the Danes when they banish'd Christian II. and his Daughters out of the Kingdom; or the Spaniards when they excluded Queen Uraca from her Kingdom and imprison'd her. That Sons should be admitted to the Government upon their Mother's Exclusion, is no new thing. Thus Henry II. King of England; Alphonsus the young Son of Uraca King of Castile; and within our memory Charles V. King of Spain and Sicily, mounted the Throne during their Mother's lives. That Queens have been imprison'd, every Age furnishes us with Instances; and France may sufficiently testify it; which has seen the Wives of three Kings successively (viz. of Lewis Hutin, Philip le long, and Charles the Fair) imprison'd, not to say worse. To speak the truth, I detain the Queen of Scots in honourable Custody for England's and my own Security. This Policy the French taught me; who (to provide for their own Safety) clapt Childerick into a Monastery, Charles of Lorain into a deep Dungeon, and Lewis Sforza Duke of Milan into an Iron Cage. Other things of this nature she repeated out of the Spanish History, as one that was very well acquainted with the Histories of all Nations. Lastly; She concluded, 'That such great Examples had always something of Injustice in them: But she desir'd the French King to defend the young King of Scots, who was lawfully enthron'd, according as he was oblig'd by the League. For this would tend more to the French Nation's Glory, than did the unfortunate Expeditions which they made in behalf of that infamous Creature Joan of Naples.

But when it was known for certain, that the Queen of Scots at that very time carry'd on a private Confederacy with the Spaniard, by her Minister the Lord Seaton; who arriving in Essex, had return'd through England into Scotland in a Seaman's Habit, and had promis'd the Scots who were of the Queen's Party Supplies from the Duke d'Alva; both she was confin'd closer, and the French King's Affection by degrees grew cold towards her. And certainly the Duke d'Alva omitted nothing which might serve towards the venting that secret Grudge which he bare towards Q. Elizabeth; and she was no less diligent to ward off the Blow and defeat his Designs. In the beginning therefore of this Year, when he made his Complaint by the Spanish Embassador in England, that the Rebels of the Netherlands furnish'd themselves with Warlike Provisions out of England, and were harbour'd in the English Sea-Ports. The Queen immediately issued forth a strict Proclamation, commanding the Netherlands that were suspected of Rebellion to depart the Land, and an Embargo to be laid on their Ships of War. This was of very ill Consequence to the Duke d'Alva. For William Van-der-Marb Lord of Lumey, and other Netherlands, being either terrified by this Proclamation, or privately forewarned, withdrew themselves out of England as it were forc'd by Despair, seiz'd upon the Briel at the mouth of the Maes, soon after drew Flushing and other Towns to revolt, driving out the Spaniards just as they were going to build Fortresses to be the Fetters of their Freedom; and in a short time excluded the Duke d'Alva from almost all Command of the Sea. By this advantage of the Sea they disturb'd and harass'd the Spaniard with so long a War, not without a notable oversight in the Duke, (as Martial Men have thought) and unbecoming so great a General, who for full four Years had grossly neglected the Sea-Coasts of the Netherlands.

Now after a famous Muster of the Londoners, Englishmen and an Exercise performed before the Queen at Greenwich, the Martial Men, who rusted with Idleness at Home, began to flock into Flanders out of England: Some (according to the Parties they affected) to the Duke d'Alva; Others, and those the far greater Number, to the Prince of Orange, who, for Religion and Liberty's sake, oppos'd the Duke d'Alva.

First of all Thomas Morgan carry'd over Three hundred Men to Flushing: The report of whose arrival is thought to have kept off the Duke d'Alva, who was preparing to attempt the recovery of Flushing. Afterwards, through the Procurement of Morgan, nine Companies of the English arriv'd there under the Command of Sir Humphry Gilbert, who, joining with the French, first made an attempt upon Schuis and Bruges, and then upon Ter-goes in South-Beverlandt. But their Ladders being too short, the French and English disagreeing, and Mondragon coming to the relief of the Belieged, they retir'd to Flushing, not without loss of Men. This Place the French and English cunningly endeavour'd to be Masters of; but being divided by Animosities, fomented by the cunning Artifices of the Prince of Orange, they could not effect their Design.

In France the Protestants had at this time a flattering Calm; and King Charles was wholly intent upon the Low-Country War, being (as he pretended) the only Remedy to prevent a Civil War at Home: And under this colour, he pretended a willingness to enter into a Confederacy with the German Princes and Queen Elizabeth as a Testimony of his Good-will towards the Protestants, whom yet he had secretly mark'd out for Destruction. This Confederacy was concluded at Blois the 11th of April, between him (who was afraid of the French Protestants and the Spaniard) and Queen Elizabeth, (who was no less afraid of intestine Broils and the Plots of the Duke d'Alva.) Commissioners for the French King were Francis Duke of Montmorency, Renat Brirague, Sebastian L'aubespine, the Bishop of Limoges, and Paul Foix: For the Queen, Sir Thomas Smith and Sir Francis Walsingham.

The Articles briefly extracted out of the Original, were as follow.

'The Articles in this Treaty shall not recede from the former Treaties made between the said Princes and their Predecessors, unless they are inconsistent with this present League.

1572. Ann. 15. This League shall be a Confederacy, Bond and Union, betwixt the said Princes, for a mutual Defence, against all Persons, of what Degree soever; who shall, under any Pretence or Cause, none excepted, invade, or go about to invade, their Persons, or the Territories by them possess'd.

This League shall remain in full Force, not only between the said Princes, but also between their Successors; if such Successor shall within a Year, by his Ambassadors and Letters, signify to the surviving Prince, that he accepts of the same Conditions: Otherwise the Survivor shall be understood to be free from all Observance of this League.

This League shall be of Force against all, even against those who shall be in Alliance with either King or Princes; and against all Leagues contracted, or to be contracted.

The Queen of England shall be bound, upon Request made by Letters, sign'd with the French King's Hand, requiring her Assistance; to send into France, within two Months, 6000 arm'd Foot, or 500 Horse, at his Choice, to be enter'd into his Pay, as soon as they shall arrive in France.

For a Defence by Sea, the Queen of England shall send Eight Ships of a reasonable Burden, with 1200 Soldiers, and all other Necessaries on board them.

The Seamen and Soldiers shall be only Englishmen; but they shall be under his Pay, and he shall find them all Necessaries, and provide them Victuals, from the time they enter into his Service: Nevertheless they shall obey the Admiral of France. The Queen of England shall victual her Ships for two Months; for which the French King shall pay her, within two Months.

The French King, upon Notice given him, by Letters sign'd by the Queen of England's Hand, that she is assaulted by War; shall be bound to send over into England or Ireland, within two Months, 6000 Foot; or, if she had rather, 500 Cuirassiers, which with others shall make up 1500 Horse; and about 3000 Foot, with serviceable Horses and Arms, after the French Fashion; to be enter'd into her Pay, as soon as they shall arrive upon her Dominions.

For Sea-Service, he shall equip Eight Ships, mann'd with 1200 Soldiers, in manner as is aforesaid.

They shall serve as long as the invaded Prince shall think fit to retain them.

The Form of the Succours and Pay shall be contain'd in a Schedule hereunto annex'd.

The one shall be bound to sell to the other (when invaded) both Arms and other Necessaries.

They shall make no Innovations in Scotland, but defend it against Foreigners; not suffering Strangers to enter, or foment the Factions in Scotland: but it shall be lawful for the Queen of England to chastise by Arms, those Scots who shall countenance or harbour the English Rebels now in Scotland.

This League shall have only that Construction, which the bare Force and Propriety of the Words will allow of.

Both Princes shall ratify every particular Article, by their Letters-Patents; and shall bonâ fide, really and effectually deliver them interchangeably, to the Ambassadors on both sides, within three Months.

For the ratifying this League by the French King, Edward Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, Lord-Admiral of the Sea, was sent into France, with a great Train of Noblemen; among whom were the Lord Dacres, the Lord Rich, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Sands, and others. In like manner the French King sent into England the Duke of Montmorency and Paul Foix, in great Splendor; that the Queen might likewise ratify it, by Oath, before them, and Bertrand Salignac Mota Fenelon, his ordinary Ambassador. This was done at Westminster, the 16th. of May. The next day, Queen Elizabeth, by the French King's leave, chose Montmorency to be a Knight of the Garter, as a grateful Acknowledgment of the Kindness she had receiv'd from his Father Annas, High-Constable of France. Which Honour King Henry VIII. had conferr'd upon Annas himself, as a Pledge of the Love he bore to that Family; which has the Title of First Christian of France, and is esteem'd the most noble Family in all France.

Montmorency, during his Stay in France, made these short Proposals, in the French King's Name: That as much Favour, as could in Safety, might be shewn to the Queen of Scots: That there might be a Cessation of Arms in Scotland, and an Agreement confirm'd there by the Parliament: But if a Parliament could not be holden conveniently, that then certain Men chosen for both Parties, by the Scots, might meet at London, for composing the Differences; together with the French King's, and the Queen of England's Commissioners. But it was answer'd, That greater Favour had been shewn, and would, for the French King's sake, be still shewn to the Queen of Scots, than she deserv'd; tho' the Estates of the Realm now assembled in Parliament, were of opinion, that the Queen could never be secure without some Severity shew'd towards her. As for an Agreement and Cessation of Arms, the Queen has done what she could towards it; and for that purpose had very lately sent Drury, Marshal of Berwick, into Scotland, with Croc, the French Ambassador: But they could by no Arguments induce Grange and the Garrison in the Castle of Edinburgh, to hearken to Peace; being fondly in hopes of Succours from France and the Netherlands; tho' Huntley and Hamilton of Arbroth had, for the Duke his Father, given it under their Hands in Writing, to Queen Elizabeth; That they were ready to entertain a Peace; and the rest of the Queen's Party had promis'd as much.

Then Montmorency earnestly solicited again the Marriage with the Duke of Anjou; but when they could not agree about the Exercise of Religion, he return'd into France, leaving the Matter desperate; whilst a Marriage was preparing, with great Solemnity, between Henry of Navarre, and Margaret, the French King's Sister. To this Marriage the Queen of Navarre, and the choicest of the Protestants, were allur'd, by flattering Promises, and a credulous Hope of a lasting Peace, and the Renewal of Friendship; but not without a notable Piece of Dissimulation. There were likewise invited out of England, under pretence of doing 'em Honour, Leicester and Burleigh; and out of Germany, the Elector Palatine's Sons; that being allur'd into the Toils, both they, and with 'em the Evangelical Religion, might, at one Blow, be either butcher'd, or at least receive a mortal Wound. For no sooner was the Marriage solemniz'd, but of a sudden a black Tempest eclips'd their so much hop'd-for Sun-shine; even that horrid Massacre of Paris, and the bloody Butcherings of the Protestants, which, with an unheard of Wickedness, were committed throughout the Cities of France, upon Men of all Qualities. Yet they pretended Justice, even and Piety too; and by Edicts fought a specious Cloak 1572. Ann. 15. Cloak to cover that impious Fraud; as if the Protestants had enter'd into a wicked Conspiracy against the King, the Queen-Mother, the King's Brethren, the King of Navarre, and the Princes of the Blood. For there were Medals coin'd in Memory of the Fact; in the Fore-part whereof, with the King's Picture, was this Motto, Virtus in Rebelles, Virtue against Rebels; on the other side, Pietas excitavit Justitiam, Piety has excited Justice.

A little before this, the Queen-Mother of France (who always pretended great Kindness to the Protestants, a Woman very inquisitive into Futurity, and prone to believe the Predictions of Astrologers; who, by the Position of the fix'd Regal Stars at their Nativities, had foretold that every one of her Sons would mount a Throne) commanded Mota-Fenellon to propose to Queen Elizabeth, a Marriage with her youngest Son Francis Duke of Alençon; that if possible she might procure him the Title of King; or at least, by this Office of Kindness, hinder Queen Elizabeth from assisting the Protestants in France. Mota-Fenellon propos'd this Marriage at Kenelworth, two days before the Massacre at Paris. But Queen Elizabeth modestly excus'd herself, upon the account of their Difference of Religion, and Inequality of Age: for he was scarce Seventeen Years old, and she was now above Eight and thirty. However, she promis'd to consider of it; nor did Alençon cease to press the Business home, by the Mediation of Flerie.

The same Month, Thomas Percy Earl of Northumberland, who upon his Rebellion had fled into Scotland, was, for a Sum of Money agreed upon, deliver'd to the Lord Hunsdon, Governour of Berwick, by Morton; who had been extremely beholden to the Earl, whilst himself liv'd an Exile in England. (But who has ever prov'd grateful to Men in Adversity?) He was shortly after beheaded at York.

As Norfolk and Northumberland were cut off this Year, by the Stroke of the fatal Ax, in the Flower of their Age; so a peaceable Death took away two others of the chief of the Nobility, both of the Privy-Council, in their old Age; namely, William Powlet, Lord High-Treasurer of England, Marquess of Winchester, Earl of Wiltshire, and Baron St. John of Basing: A Man that had pass'd through very great Honours. He died in the Ninety seventh Year of his Age; after he had seen One hundred and three Persons that were descended from him. In his Office of High-Treasurer was constituted William Cecil Lord Burleigh. The other was Edward Earl of Derby, Lord Stanley and Strange of Knocking; with whom the Glory of Hospitality seem'd to fall asleep.

This Year likewise died Sir William Peter Knt. one of the Privy-Council, Secretary to Henry VIII. Edward VI. Queen Mary, and Q. Elizabeth; and Chancellor of the Order of the Garter: having perform'd many Embassies with Approbation: Who being descended of honest Parentage at Exeter, after he had, by his Wisdom and Learning, gain'd a plentiful Estate, did, for the Encouragement of Learning, by Q. Mary's Grant, very bountifully enlarge the Revenues of Exeter-College in Oxford; wherein he had been educated.

The Queen also herself, who had hitherto been very healthy, (never eating without an Appetite, nor drinking Wine without some Allay) fell sick of the Small-Pox at Hampton-Court. But she recover'd before there was any News of her being sick; and falling to the Care of the Government, order'd Portsmouth to be strengthen'd with new Fortifications, her Navy to be increas'd with more Men of War, Musters to be observ'd in every County at set times, and the Youth to be train'd up to War; and this, when she enjoy'd a profound Peace. The Money which she had borrow'd of her Subjects she repaid with Thanks. For this her People were no less in love with her, than they were for two seasonable Proclamations, publish'd in the Beginning of the Year. By one of which she commanded, that such of the Nobility should be proceeded against according to the ancient Laws, as kept a greater Retinue than they ought. For their Men, being thus entertain'd, exempted themselves from the publick Offices of the State, maintain'd Factions, and offended many ways against the Laws; presuming upon the Power of the Noblemen to whom they belong'd. By the other she restrain'd a most ravenous sort of Men, call'd Concealers; by revoking their Commission, and forcing them to restore what they had taken away. For they, being appointed to discover, whether any Lands belonging to the Crown were conceal'd by private Men; had begun, by a sacrilegious kind of Avarice, to seize upon Lands given by our pious Forefathers, to Parish-Churches and Hospitals; as also upon Bells and the leaden Roofs of Churches. But these Grievances, tho' they have been now and then suppress'd, yet they have as often sprung up again.

In Ireland some Commotions arose, thro' the severe Government of Sir Edward Fitton, Governour of Connaught: Which Severity when the Sons of Richard Earl of Clan-Richard, whom he had by divers Wives, (being Men who always us'd to do what they pleas'd) could not away with; they rais'd a Rebellion, and passing the Shannon, committed insolent Robberies upon the Inhabitants all over West-Meath. Their Father, descended from an ancient English Stock, nam'd de Burgo, a Man with a reverend grey Head, and of a moderate Disposition, went to the Lord-Deputy, clear'd himself from the Crime of Rebellion, and consulted with the Council of Ireland, by what means he might restrain his dissolute Children. But the Queen, for the better Security of the publick Peace, thought fit by degrees to remove Fitton from Connaught, and made him Treasurer of Ireland. And a while after, the Earl's Sons, being pursued by the Soldiers in Garrison, humbly submitted themselves to the Lord-Deputy.

In Lemster also the O-Moors, a seditious sort of Men, rais'd an Insurrection; who being presently proclaim'd Rebels, return'd to their Duty, by the Persuasion of the Earl of Kildare. At this time Sir Thomas Smith, the Queen's Secretary, a discreet and learned Man, taking pity of the forlorn Condition of Ireland, obtain'd of the Q. that a Colony should be transported into a Peninsula of Ireland, call'd Ardes, on the Eastern Part of Ulster, under his base Son, the only Son he had; that so those half-barbarous People might be taught some Civility. His Hope was, that the Place might be easily defended by Garrisons plac'd in that strait Isthmus, by which it is join'd to the rest of the Island. He granted to every Footman an Hundred and twenty Acres, and to every Horseman an Hundred and forty; which are as much as Five hundred English Acres: for which they were to pay yearly a Penny for every Acre. But it fail'd of the wish'd Success: For his Son Thomas, when he had transported the Colony, was intercepted and slain, by the Treachery of Neal Brian Artbo. But Malbey an Englishman, Governour of Lecale, a Place hard by, supposing no unjust Death could be inflicted upon a treacherous Villain, soon after kill'd Neal, leaving him to be devour'd by Wolves.

star.

I know not whether it be worth while to mention that which all Historiographers of our Time have recorded, viz. That in November, a new Star, or, as some stile it, a Phænomenon appear'd in Cassiopea's Chair; which (as my self observ'd) in Brightness exceeded Jupiter in the Perigee of his Excentrick and Epicycle. It continu'd in the same place, full Sixteen Months, being carry'd about with the diurnal Motion of the Heaven. Thomas Digsey and John Dey, two famous Mathematicians amongst us, have learnedly prov'd, by the Doctrine of Parallaxes, that it was in the Celestial, not in the Elementary Region; and were of opinion, that it disappear'd by little and little, by ascending. 'Tis certain, that after Eight Months, all Men perceiv'd it to grow less and less. Theodore Beza wittily apply'd it to the Star, which appear'd at the Birth of CHRIST, and the Slaughter of the Infants under Herod; and admonish'd Charles IX. King of France, who had acknowledg'd himself Author of the Massacre of Paris, to beware, in this Verse,

Beza's Prophecy.

*Tu vero, Herodes, sanguinolente, time, i.e.
And look thou, bloody Herod, to thy self.*

Nor was he out, in his Conjecture: For in the fifth Month after the disappearing of this Star, after long and horrible Pains, he died of excessive Bleeding.

The Spanish Affairs in the Netherlands being very much disturb'd, Flushing lost, the Towns of Holland falling off, and the Spanish Fleet (with which the Duke of Medina Celi was commanded, with Vitelli Chapini, to aid the Papists in England) routed by the Zealanders; the Duke d'Alva, tho' unwillingly, began to be more favourably inclin'd towards the English. Therefore in January, the Commerce, which had been prohibited, between the Netherlanders and the English, in the same Month of the Year 1568, was now at last permitted for two Years; and the Articles agreed upon at Bristol, upon that account, were ratify'd by the Spaniard in June. Amongst which was this Clause: 'And if this mutual Correspondence and strict Amity shall for a time be overshadow'd; yet it shall in no wise be understood to be broken and dissolv'd. And if the Business cannot be adjusted by Commissioners, within a Time prescrib'd; the said Intercourse, at the end of the said two Years, shall cease. And cease it did, by degrees, before the two Years were expir'd; by reason of the Troubles that increas'd all over the Netherlands; and a new Intercourse was begun with the Confederate States.

But Queen Elizabeth (to her vast Honour) fully repair'd the Damages of the English Merchants, out of the Netherlanders Goods, which were stopt; return'd the Overplus to the Duke d'Alva; and wholly agreed with the Merchants of Genoa, about the Money that was intercepted; which had been the first Occasion of the Breach: Whereas the Duke d'Alva did not so much as restore one Farthing to the Netherlanders, out of the Englishmens Goods. And (which was yet more glorious, and to her Subjects much more pleasing) she discharg'd England of the Debts, which her Father and Brother had contracted with Foreigners; which had been very much increas'd by the Interest. Now she restor'd likewise the Charters of the City of London, (which had been so often renew'd) to the great Joy of the Citizens.

Yet was both the Queen and the Ecclesiastical State very much disturb'd by some of their own Profession; who, pretending to be very zealous, and breathing nothing but Evangelical Purity, not only defam'd the Ecclesiastical Polity, (as stain'd with Romish Dregs) both by publick and private Preaching, and by publishing Books, entitl'd, An Admonition to the Parliament, and An Apology for the Admonition; but also refus'd to frequent the Divine Service, as it was establish'd; framing and usurping to themselves other Rites in Divine Worship. So that the Queen, disliking them as Men of a turbulent Spirit, greedy of Novelty, and very forward to root up what was well establish'd; to prevent a Schism, commanded the Rigour of the Law, concerning Uniformity of publick Prayers, to be every where put in Execution: and the Books to be deliver'd into the Hands of the Bishops, or some of her Council, upon pain of Imprisonment; though John Whitgift, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, had solidly confuted them.

There was likewise publish'd, by the English Fugitives and Rebels, an infamous Book, entitl'd, A Treatise of Treason; wherein they accus'd Bacon Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, and Cecil Lord Burleigh Lord-Treasurer of England, of Treason against their Country; thereby to bring those Persons under the Odium of the Prince and People; who, by their Prudence and Vigilance, had prevented or broken their villainous Designs and wicked Hopes. But the Queen was so far from crediting these Accusations, that by a publick Proclamation she declar'd them to be improbable, false, and meer Slanders, maliciously invented by the profess'd Enemies of the true Religion, and their Country; upon no other End, than by their secret Artifices to deprive the Kingdom of its most faithful Counsellors. Wherefore she charged all Men to give no Credit to these Libels, but to slight and burn them; unless they had rather undergo the Penalty to be inflict'd upon the Encouragers of Sedition. However these Books (such is the natural Curiosity of Mankind) because prohibited, were very much read, till (as it often happens) being contemn'd, they grew out of Request.

The last Year, in November, was born to Charles King of France, a Daughter, to whom the King requested Queen Elizabeth to be God-Mother; both to engage her the more firmly to him, by all Offices of Kindness; and to cut off all Hopes of Assistance out of England, from the French Protestants. For these Ends, and to borrow Money, he sent into England an eloquent Courtier, one Albert Gondy, (commonly call'd Count de Gondy's Rhetz.) He in a set Speech endeavour'd to persuade the Queen, that the Massacre of Paris (which some term'd a Villainy, but he a Remedy) was executed, not out of Hatred to the Protestant Religion, but to break the Neck of a Conspiracy, plotted by the Admiral Coligni and others: notwithstanding which, the King would most religiously observe the Edicts of Religion. He pray'd the Queen, not to hearken to such Men as were clamorous and timorous without Cause; but religiously to observe the League lately enter'd into, and advise them to be obedient to their King, whom they should find very merciful.

She promis'd to be mindful of the League, and that the King should find nothing wanting on her Part, which might become a most loving Confederate. But for the Money to be borrow'd, she desir'd to be excus'd. Nor did he mention the Money, but only in Policy; namely, that she should not supply the Protestants, if they desir'd it, with the Money, which she deny'd ny'd the King. And truly, she took this Occasion of denying them Money; remembering how basely they had serv'd her, about Money-Matters, in the first Civil-War. In this Embassy, Rhetz prevail'd so far, that the Protestants, from that time, met with less Favour and Assistance from her Hands, for a while.

A little after, William Somerset Earl of Worcester, was sent into France, with a Font of pure Gold; to be present as Surety, in the Queen's Name, with the Deputies of the Empress Mary, and of the Duke of Savoy; at the Baptizing of the French King's Daughter. Which when the Protestant Pirates, both French and Netherlanders, understood, (suspecting him to be a Papist) it mis'd but little, but they had intercepted him in his Passage over. However, they ris'd one or two Ships of his Company, killing some of the Passengers.

At this the Queen was so displeas'd, that she sent out William Holstock, Comptroller of her Navy, with some few Men of War; who scour'd the Seas, either taking or scattering the Pirates, and retaking some Merchant-Ships out of their Hands. But whereas many of 'em had promis'd their Service to Montgomery, (now in England) for the Relief of Rochelle, he happen'd to set sail out of England too late; and with so small a Fleet, that he did them no good at all.

Hereupon, some French Protestant Refugees in England, being very much incens'd, out of Hatred to the contrary Religion, offer'd Injuries to some other Frenchmen that were come over; drawing their Swords upon them, and among the rest, upon the Servants of Flerie, who was come privately into England, from Alençon, about the Marriage: Yea the Vidam of Chartres, ignorant of Flerie's Negotiation, accus'd him, to the Queen's Council, as if he came with a Design to take away Montgomery's Life.

On the other hand, the French Ambassador complain'd to the Q. that Montgomery had, with the Assistance of the English, contrary to the League, undertaken a Voyage to Rochelle; and that the English Merchants had supply'd the besieg'd Rochellers with Victuals. She answer'd, 'That she did and would religiously observe her Faith given in the league. 'That those Auxiliaries were Pirates, and being outlaw'd, had put to Sea without her Commission, and carry'd counterfeit Flags; and for her part, she heartily wish'd they might be punish'd. Moreover, that the English Merchants, having been basely us'd at Bourdeaux, had traded to Rochelle, without her Leave: That they are Men which always mind their own private Gain: And withal she desir'd, that some more commodious Port in France might be assign'd them, to trade in, instead of Rochelle.

The French King was very well pleas'd with these Answers; That the Queen of England would stand to her Promise; and that now she was so far drawn off from minding the French Protestants, that they could look for no Assistance from her. Hereupon, the French King and his Mother were more and more in Love with her, when they perceiv'd her sincere in observing the Amity betwixt them; and she receiv'd several Love-Letters sent by Alençon, from the Camp before Rochelle; and all this Year the French King and his Mother earnestly solicited the Marriage, by Mota-Fenelon their Ordinary Ambassador, and by Chasteau-Neuf, sent extraordinarily for that purpose. Certainly Queen Elizabeth now began seriously to think of Marrying, upon a double Fear she was in, for lack of Children: On one hand, she fear'd Contempt at home; and on the other, she fear'd Attempts from abroad: Against both she was perswaded, and would often say as much to others, That an Husband and Children were the surest Bulwarks.

On the contrary, it was argu'd by some selfish Courtiers, 'That Religion and Equiry were 'the strongest Bulwarks of a State, against all 'Attempts: Nor had she any Reason to fear the 'Contempt of her own People; whose Hopes 'and Fortunes depended on her alone; whose 'Hearts were devoted to her, as they had been 'to a long Series of her Ancestors; and whose 'Eyes were every day refresh'd with the Lustre 'of her Vertues. With other such like Expressions, familiar amongst Courtiers. And when she often said, That most Men neglect the Setting-Sun: These fawning Flatterers would as often tell her, Who will neglect the wholesome Beams of the clear Sun-shine, to behold the faint and confus'd Glimmering of the lesser Stars rising together? For so they call'd the Competitors.

In the mean time, the Queen-Mother used frequent Intreaties, that her Son the Duke of Alençon might have leave to come into England, to see her; who, being weary'd with so many Letters, at last assented to it; provided he would not think it a Prejudice or a Disgrace to him, if he return'd without Success. But as soon as Queen Elizabeth had Intelligence, that his Brother Henry, the Duke of Anjou, was elected King of Poland, and that the French King was sick; she advis'd Alençon, by Sir Edward Horsey, Governor of the Isle of Wight, not to be too hasty in coming over to England: And she gave these Reasons for it: 'That upon the account of the 'Massacre so barbarously committed upon the 'Protestants throughout France, for their Religion, even in the midst of Nuptial Solemnities, 'when he himself first sued for a Marriage with 'her; the Protestants in England suspected, that 'this Marriage would prove as fatal. And they 'were the more inclined to think so, because Alençon himself, immediately after, went to the 'Siege of Rochelle, breathing nothing but Hatred 'against the Protestants; and had wrote, in several Letters thence, that he would visit the Q. 'after he should see Rochelle won: So that his 'Rage towards the Protestant Religion seem'd 'hotter than his Love towards her. Whereupon 'very many in England suspected, that he intended to come into England, to prosecute his 'Courtship, with a Sword dy'd in the Blood of 'those, who profess'd the same Religion as the 'English did. Wherefore she friendly and lovingly advis'd him, to be the Means of a Peace 'in France; and first to give some notable Testimony of his Affection to the Protestants: 'that so England might receive him, as a more 'welcome Guest and Suitor.

A Peace being afterwards concluded in France, and the Protestants allow'd the Exercise of their Religion, in certain Places; the French King and the Queen-Mother were again very solicitous for consummating of the Marriage; (For they were desirous of removing Alençon out of France, being a Person of a crabbed Temper, and prone to raise Commotions) and withal they intreated Queen Elizabeth, that if the D of Anjou should take his Journey by Sea into Poland, he might have her Royal Word, for his safe Passage through the British Seas. She was not only very willing to grant this, but also offer'd her Fleet for his Convoy. In the mean time, Alençon fell sick of the Measles, which the Queen-Mother signify'd to Queen Elizabeth, by Gondy Count de Rhetz, and excus'd his not coming into England, because of his Sicknefs. Gondy found Queen Elizabeth at Canterbury, where she entertain'd him honourably. At this time Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, solemniz'd the Queen's Birth-day, viz. the 7th. of September, in a large Palace

In Scotland, James Douglas Earl of Morton was, by the special Instance of Queen Elizabeth, constituted Regent of Scotland, in the room of the Earl of Marre; who, being established in his Authority in a Convention of the States, enacted wholesome Laws in the King's Name for the maintaining of Religion against Papists and Heretics. But the charge of the King's Person (because the Earl of Marre, to whom by peculiar Right the charge of the Kings of Scotland in their Minority belongs, was under Age) he settled upon Alexander Breshkin upon these Conditions:

- That the Papists and factious Persons should be deny'd all access to him: That an Earl should be admitted with two Servants, a Baron with only one, all others alone, and every one of them without Weapons.

In the mean time the French King, having sent thither Monsieur Vivian, used his utmost Endeavours to supplant the Regent before his Authority was settled, setting up against him Arbol, Huntley, and others, to whom he promis'd great Rewards. Queen Elizabeth, endeavouring all she could to the contrary, inform'd the Scots by Sir Henry Killegrew, That the bloody Massacre of Paris was executed by the joint Contrivance of the Pope, the French King, and the Spaniard, for the utter extirpation of the Protestants. Therefore she advis'd them not to be corrupted with the French Pensions, nor disunited by Factions, so as to open a way for those foreign Forces which Strozzi was suspected to be bringing over; but manfully and unanimously to endeavour the Defence of their Religion, which was the only Band of Concord betwixt the Scots and English; and to take timely Care of the King; or send him into England, that he might not be convey'd into France. However, some of the Nobility, sworn to the Captive Queen's Party, absolutely declar'd against the King's or the Regent's Authority; till Queen Elizabeth, interposing her Authority, by Killegrew's means, prevail'd upon James Hamilton the Duke of Chastel-Herauld, and George Gourdon Earl of Huntley, (who were chief of them) to accept of these reasonable Conditions, viz. That they should allow the Religion establish'd in Scotland, submit themselves to the King, and to the Government of Morton and his Successors in the Regency. That they should abjure the Authority of all others. That those who should attempt any thing against Religion, the King, or the Regent, should be declar'd Traytors by an Act of Parliament. That the Sentences pronounced against the Hamiltons and the Gourdons should be repeal'd, excepting such as concerned the Murder of the late Regents Murray and Lenox, which should be left to Queen Elizabeth's Decision. (But this she refer'd to the King, and thought it fit to be defer'd till the King were of Age to take upon him the Government according to the Laws of England). And, That all Offences committed since the 15th of June 1567, (except the Murder of Lenox) should be remitted to those who should sue for a Pardon. However, for the Security of the King and the Regent, lest the one should be in danger of being murder'd, and the other convey'd into France, it was thought fit that the Q. of England, by a publick Instrument, should pass her Royal Word, That neither the Hamiltons, nor any other, should be call'd in Question, or Fined for the Murder of the Regents without her consent. And this for the securing the publick Peace in so turbulent a Time, was confirm'd in a Convention of the States.

But William Kircald of Grange, (whom Murray the Regent had made Governor of Edinburgh Castle, taking an Oath of him in the King's Name) the Lord Humes, Lidington, the Bishop of Dunkeld, and others, who thought the Queen of Scots was too severely dealt withal; would by no means accept of these Conditions: But being obstinate, and contemning the Authority of the King and the Regent, held and fortified that Castle in the Queen's Name. Lidington was their Counsellor; and they trusted much to the unapproachable strength of the Place, to the warlike Ammunition that was in it, (for there all the King's Magazine was kept) and to the Succours promised by the Duke of Alva and the French King, which last had sent them some Money, (the greatest part whereof was intercepted at Blacknes) and more he would have sent, had he not been prevented by the tedious Siege of Rochelle. When neither the Regent by offering Rewards, nor Queen Elizabeth by Persuasion or Threatning could induce these Men to accept of any Conditions of Peace, but they still maintain'd the Castle against the Regent, every day annoying Edinburgh the Seat of Justice with their Shot and Incursions, and invited over Auxiliary Forces from France: Then Queen Elizabeth, who could not endure the French should have the least Footing in Scotland, was at last prevail'd upon by the Regent, and promis'd him Men, Ordnance and Ammunition for the reducing of the Castle, upon these Conditions.

• The Regent shall not Compound with the Besieged without the English Generals knowledge, nor he on the other side without acquainting the Regent and the King's Council. If the English take the Castle, it shall be delivered up to the King within ten Days, with all the Ammunition, Utensils, Rolls and Records of the King and Realm; but the rest shall be a Prey to the Assailants. The English shall fortify no Place in Scotland, but with the consent of the Regent and the Nobility. The Regent shall supply the English with all the Assistance and Provision he can. The Besieged, after the taking the Castle, shall be retain'd to be proceed'd against according to Law, the Q. of England being first acquainted therewith. If any of the English should be kill'd, their Wives and Children should be paid Stipends out of the Rebels Estates. If any wounded, they likewise shall receive Stipends till they be cured. If any of the English Ordnance receive Damage, and the Powder and Ball that shall be spent, shall be made good out of the King's Store in the Castle, or out of the Rebels Estates. And ten Hostages shall be sent into England to secure the sending back the Forces and Ordnance, unless they are cut off by the common Misfortunes of War.

Upon these Conditions Sir William Drury, Marshal of the Garison of Berwick, entred Scotland with several great Pieces of Cannon and Fifteen hundred Men; among whom were several Gentlemen as Volunteers, viz. George Cary, Henry Cary, Thomas Cecil, Henry Leigh, William Knolles, Sutton, Cotton, Kelway, William Killigrew, and others. Having join'd the Scotch Auxiliaries, he beleaguerr'd the Castle, after he had to no purpose summon'd them twice in the King's Name to surrender. At first they play'd upon the Castle with their Mortars for four Days together from five Batteries, and especially upon David's Tower, which after some Days was batter'd to the Ground. Afterwards giving the Assault,

Spurr-

1573. Ann. 16. Spurr-Fort was taken, while those who at the same time assaulted the Castle on the other side, were beat back not without some loss of Men. The next Day the Belieged hung out a Flag, and desir'd to parley with Drury. Kircald himself and Robert Melvin were let down by a Rope from the Castle, and Henry Leigh with Fleck a Scot were likewise taken into the Castle as Hostages. They demanded, That they might freely enjoy their Lives and Estates: That Humes and Lidington might upon the account of the private Animosities of some Persons withdraw into England: That Kircald might stay in Scotland, or at least have leave to depart. When they would not grant these Things, but only allow the Soldiery to depart unarm'd with their Baggage; the third Day after, the Garison being very thin, at variance among themselves, wounded, and spent with Watchings and Toil, without the least hopes of Succour, and pinch'd for want of Water, (for one of their Wells was stop't up with the Ruin of a Stone-Wall, and the other lay open to the Enemies great Shot) they yielded themselves and all they had the thirty third Day of the Siege, to Queen Elizabeth and Drury. Upon the receipt of Letters from England, Drury re-deliver'd the Castle with all the Prisoners to the Regent, for the King's use. Of these Prisoners, Kircald, his Brother James, Mosman and Coky, two Goldsmiths who had adulterated the Money in the Castle, were hang'd; tho' for the sparing Kircald's Life, an hundred of the Family of the Kircalds offer'd to be for ever Vassals to the Regent, to pay a yearly Pension of 3000 Marks, and 2000 Pound of Scottish Money in hand; and to give good Security that he should for the future continue a faithful Subject to the King. Humes and others who were dispers'd into several Castles, were spared at the intercession of Queen Elizabeth, not without commendations of her Clemency. Lidington was sent to Leith, where he died of a violent Distemper, yet not without suspicion of being poison'd: A Man of very great Experience among the Scots, and of an excellent Wit, had it been less wavering. Upon which account George Buchanan, who envy'd him, in a Writing of his call'd the Chameleon, represents him in his Life-time as one more mutable than the Chameleon, and sharply taxes him as a party-colour'd Enemy to the King's Grandmother, his Mother, Murray, the King himself, and his Country. From this time Scotland took breath after the Civil War; and as well the Heads of the Parties, as the Soldiers, going over to Swedeland, France and the Netherlands, gain'd great Commendations for their Martial Valour.

1573. Ann. 16. Bo. of Ros banish'd out of England. And that England might be the better secur'd from all domestick Attempts upon the Queen of Scots account, John Lesley Bishop of Ros (who had serv'd his Queen with an approved Loyalty, tho' to the Ruin of some, and the Danger of more) was dismiss'd from the Tower, and commanded to depart England. He accordingly withdrew into France, being deadly afraid of the E. of Southampton, (whose Life he brought into danger by the Discovery he made) and of Henry Howard the D. of Norfolk's Brother, for the appeasing of whose Displeasure, he wrote an Apology for himself. He was scarce gone, but H. Cokin, his private Letter-Carrier, was apprehended, and by his confession Morgan discover'd; who, being a forward Man to promote any secret Designs for the Queen of Scots Interest, and very eager to put them in execution, presently fled. Also, the principal Physician among the Papists; and Good, both of'em Doctors of Physick; and Francis Bertie, were kept in Prison for some Months, for holding a private Correspondence with her by Letters; and upon the same account were Hen- ry Goodyer and Richard Lowder had in Suspicion.

In the mean time the Bishop of Ros was not wanting in the Duty of a most faithful Subject to the Queen of Scots, but solicited the Emperor, the Pope, the French King, and the Catholick Princes of Germany, who held him in hopes, but perform'd just nothing. But herein he complain'd that it happen'd very unluckily, that the Duke d'Alva (on whom he had cheifly relied) was just upon leaving the Low-Countries, having obtained a fair dismissal from his Government, under pretence of recovering his Health. But really the Spaniard called him Home, as he was cruelly pursuing an entire Conquest, having already reduced almost all Holland under his Power. He was perswaded by Cardinal Granvell and Roderigo Gomez de Sylva, that the Duke's Power grew too great, that his Name founded higher than his Prince's, and that through the Rigor of his violent Government the Netherlanders were driven to a Revolt; nay more, to Desperation. However, some Bloody-minded Persons were of opinion, that no fitter Men could be found in all Spain to make an end of that War, and reduce the Netherlands into the form of a Province. Those hot-headed Men seem'd to pity the King, if he ever hoped by Mildness to bring under his Obedience the Prince of Orange and the Confederates, who were obstinately bent and resolv'd to retain their Liberty, abounded in Riches, and were so secured by the situation of the Places they maintained. Don Lewis Zuniga de Requesens, great Commendator of Castile, was appointed the Duke d'Alva's Successor, a Man of a milder Disposition; who, desiring to obtain Queen Elizabeth's Favour by all good Offices, and minding his own Concerns, would not meddle either with the Scottish or the English Affairs.

I know not whether I should here mention the frantick Opinion of Peter Burchett, who was perswaded that it was lawful to kill such as opposed the Truth of the Gospel. So far had the Error of this Opinion transported the Man, that he drew his Dagger upon Hawkins, that famous Sea-Captain, and wounded him, taking him for Hatton, who was then in great Favour with the Queen, and of her Privy-Council, whom he had heard to be an Enemy to the Innovators. The Q. was so extraordinarily incensed at this Fact, that she commanded that the Man should be presently punished by Martial or Camp-Law, till she was informed, by some prudent Persons, that Martial-Law was not to be used but in Camps, or in turbulent Times; but that at Home, and in Times of Peace, the Proceeding must be carry'd on in the way of a judiciary Process. Being therefore brought to his Tryal, he maintained, That what he had done was consonant to the holy Scriptures, and therefore lawful. Whereupon being just about to be condemn'd for Heresie, he promis'd to renounce his Opinion; yet he still shifted it off, and would not. Upon this he was thrown into the Tower of London, where he slew one of the Keepers, knocking him on the Head with a Billet which he snatcht up out of the Chimney: He was condemn'd of Murder, had his right Hand cut off, and nail'd to the Gallows, and then he was hang'd discovering a silent reluctancy.

In the beginning of this Year died William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord-Privy-Seal, Son of Thomas Howard, that Martial Duke of Norfolk, by his second Wife Agnes Tilney. He was a Man of most approved Fidelity and unshaken Courage; who being first of all Governor of Calais, was by Queen Mary prefer'd to be a Baron, and made Lord-High-Admiral of England. He was afterwards her Lord-Chamberlain, as he was also Queen Elizabeth's; till, being broken with Age, he resign'd it a few Months before his death to Suffex, being made Lord-Privy-Seal, which (as I formerly hinted) is the fourth degree of Honour in England. His Son Charles succeeded him in the Barony, and a while after was made Lord-Chamberlain to the Queen, as also Lord-High-Admiral of England.

Not long after died also Reginald Grey Earl of Kent, whom the Queen, a Year before, had raised from a private Man to the Dignity of Earl of Kent, after that this Title had lain dormant for fifty Years, from the death of Richard Grey Earl of Kent, who had squander'd away his Patrimony, and was elder Brother to this Man's Grandfather. His Brother Henry succeeded him in his Honour.

Neither must we pass over in silence John Caius, a famous Physician, born at Norwich, and bred up at the Universities of Cambridge and Padua, who died about this time, having spent his whole Life in Physick, translated a great deal of Galen and Celsus into Latin, and Commented upon more, and at last bestow'd all his Wealth to the advancing of Learning, joining a new College to old Gonvil-Hall in Cambridge, and giving a perpetual Allowance for 23 Students. Whereupon they grew into one Name of Gonvil and Caius College, where he lies intomb'd with this Inscription, FUI CAIUS.

In Ireland the O-Conors and O-Moors, two restless Families, having raised several Troops of Rovers, made a cruel Assault upon Athlon upon the River Shannon, and then sack'd and burn'd it. But Sir John Perott, President of Munster, hinder'd them from joining their Forces with the Rebels of Munster; for with continual IncurSIONS he so harass'd and prosecuted James-Fitz-Moris, Fitz-Edmunds Steward of Imokelly, and the rest of the Rebels, killing many, and forcing the Castle of Mayn with a French Garrison in it, that he made them glad to ask Pardon with all Submission in the Church of Kilmalock, that is S. Malachie's Cell. And at the same time the Earl of Desmond with his Brother John, who were the Authors of that Rebellion, were by Sir Edmund Fitton brought back out of England into Ireland, and thrown into Prison at Dublin, whence notwithstanding they shortly after made their escape.

In Ulster, Brian Mac-Phelim, who had seiz'd a great part of the Country of Clandeboy, burnt the Town of Knock-fergus, that is Fergus's Rock; and others in those Parts began to raise Tumults. Against these Walter D'Evereux (whom Queen Elizabeth had lately created Earl of Essex) craved leave to undertake an Expedition, following therein the Counsel of those who desir'd above all things to have him farther off, and to plunge him into Dangers, under pretence of procuring him Honour. Which he knew well enough: But being a stirring Man, and one not unacquainted with Warlike Discipline from his very Youth, he held on his Resolution, and made an Agreement with the Queen, that upon certain Conditions the one half of Clandeboy, if he drove out the Rebels, should be granted to him and his Soldiers: For the Defence whereof he should maintain at his own charge 200 Horsemen and 400 Foot. And to furnish himself for the War, he borrow'd of the Queen Ten thousand Pounds of English Money, mortgaging his Lands in Essex for the same.

Sir William Fitz-Williams, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, fearing lest the Name of so great an Earl should eclipse his Glory in Ireland, advis'd the Queen, that he might not be sent, feigning I know not what general Revolt of all Ulster. But Essex for all that was sent; and, that the Lord-Deputy's Honour and Authority might stand un-eclips'd, he was commanded to receive his Patent from him, whereby to be made Governor of Ulster; which he was long in procuring, and that not without very importunate Solicitation.

After he had been tossed with a sad Tempest at Sea, he arriv'd towards the end of August at Knock-fergus, with the Lord Darcy, and the Lord Rich, Henry Knolls, and four of his Brethren, Michael and John Cary, Henry, William and John Norris, and a Band of Soldiers which had been hastily collected. Before his arrival, Brian Mac-Phelim had driven away his Cattel, which were all his Wealth, into the inner Parts of the Country, (for besides Sheep and Hogs, he had Thirty thousand Cows). After his arrival, he congratulated him, and most frankly profer'd him all Kindness; as also did Mac-Gilespie, Mac-Guilly, Hugh Baron of Dunganon, and other great Lords round about. The Earl promised to pardon Mac-Phelim's Rebellion, and endeavour'd to oblige him to him by his Civility. But he shortly after revolted, and withdrew himself with all his Friends to Turlough-Leinigh; upon which follow'd daily Skirmishes with the English. The Lord Rich, being call'd away by his private Occasions, return'd after a Month into England; Henry Knolls also, by reason of Sickness, and many others, alledging some one Cause and some another, withdrew themselves daily by degrees out of that rude and barbarous Country. Essex made grievous Complaints to the Queen and his Friends by Letters, 'That his noble Comrades began to flag and languish: That the Expedition was undertaken some what too late; Victuals too long before they came to 'em, and those tainted: That the common Soldiers were inconsiderately chosen at first, and many of them had miscarry'd: That Mac-Phelim was revolted, and that by the Cunning or rather Treachery of Pierce an English Captain, who had formerly born some Sway amongst the Irish in those Parts. For his part, he was unable to bear the Charges of the War: Neither had the Lord-Deputy as yet sent him his Patent; so as he could exercise no Authority over the bordering People. He therefore prayeth the Queen to carry on the Service in her own Name, and by her own Command, tho' he bare the one half of the Charge. Afterwards he besought Suffex, Leicester and Burghley, to persuade the Queen to allow Pay for 100 Horse and 600 Foot, and to grant him Mayo, a Peninsula, or almost Island. And when the Queen had now determin'd to call home Essex out of Ulster, Tumults arising in Munster, Leicester and others overcame her so by their Persuasions, that he was not sent for. And the Lord-Deputy commanded, that whilst he himself march'd against Desmond, who was escap'd out of Prison contrary to his Word given, Essex should march to the Borders of Ulster. Which tho' it somewhat troubled him, who was now wholly busied in making Fortifications in Clandeboy, yet he obey'd; and, marching on in Munster with Kildare, he persuaded Desmond to lay down Arms, who not long after submitted himself.

Now Essex, having receiv'd his Patent, undertook a long March against Turlough Leinigh, O-Donell joining with him. But from Con O-Donell, Turlough's Son-in-law, who would not Serve under him, he took the Castle of Liffer, and gave it to Hugh O-Donell; Turlough in the mean while spinning out the time with Parlies, till that Essex was of necessity to return: Who as he had tired out his Body with Labours and Cares all the Summer; so now, Winter approaching, he consider'd seriously with himself, 1573. Ann. 16. himself, by what means Ulster, which had been so long neglected, that it was grown wild and savage, might be reduc'd to Civility. And upon mature Deliberation of the Matter, he shewed, That if three Towns were built at the Queen's Charge, and ten Forts by the common Purse of the Soldiers, in such convenient Places as he had design'd, above Seven thousand Pounds of English Money might be gather'd yearly from those People; and after two Years, the Queen should not need to maintain any more Garisons there.

He is in danger by Mac-Phelim. Mac-Phelim taken Prisoner. Chaterton's Enterprize overthrowen. Whilst he was wholly taken up about these Projects, and other commendable Endeavours for providing of Victuals, he escap'd narrowly from being slain by the Irish. For Brian Mac-Phelim, who had of late treacherously slain one Moore an English Captain, had conspir'd with Turlough and the Hebridian Scots to cut him off. Which as soon as he understood, he thought it best not to expect their coming, but to set upon them. And set upon them he did so resolutely, that, with the slaughter of 200 Irish, he took Brian and Rory Oge his half Brother, and Brian's Wife. With these Actions was the Year well-nigh spent in Ireland, to no Man's Advantage, but to Essex's great Damage; and also to the great Loss of Chaterton, an English Gentleman, who upon certain Conditions with the Queen, had unfortunately undertaken to carry over English Colonies into Fues and the Territory of O-Hanlan adjoining.

The Seventeenth Year of her Reign.

1574. Alenxon maketh means to see the Q. She granteth it. He is suspected at home. Committed to Custody. In the first Month of the Year, Francis Duke of Alenxon did by Letters full fraught with Love, and by Maveisier the French Embassador, endeavour more earnestly than before, that he might come into England upon safe Conduct, and salute Queen Elizabeth in Person, for whom being absent he had so singular a Love and Respect. She, being overcome with his Importunities, yielded to it, (tho' she under-hand advised him otherwise) and gave him her Royal Word, that he might come when he pleas'd before the 20th of May; liberally promising, that he should fail of no Kindness which might be expected at the hands of a most loving Princess. Certainly she now loved and respected him more heartily, after she understood for certain that he bare a mortal Hatred to the Guises, her sworn Enemies. But before this Answer was brought to Alenxon, Valentine Dale, Doctor of Law, Embassador in France, (in the room of Walsingham, now made Secretary) gave Queen Elizabeth notice, that Alenxon and Navarre were suspected to endeavour a change of Affairs. For the Queen-Mother, being a Woman of an high Spirit, began to suspect, that he practis'd secretly with Navarre, Montmorency, and others, to remove her from the Government, if any thing should befall the King other than well. And this her Suspicion the Guises increased, suggesting to her, that her Son Alenxon had not long before held intimate Familiarity with Coligny, the Ringleader of the Protestants in France. Alenxon being question'd about it, amongst other things voluntarily confess'd, that he had for a good while been a Suitor for Marriage with Queen Elizabeth of England; wherein, believing that Coligny's Friendship would be of good use unto him, he had now and then had discourse with him thereof, and of the Low-Country War. Notwithstanding, both he and Navarre had Keepers set over them. But Thomas Wilks, Dale's Secretary, came privately to them both, and comforted them in the Queen of England's name; promising, that she would omit no Opportunity to help and relieve them. Whereof that subtil old Woman soon got knowledge, and so prosecuted Wilks, that he was fain to withdraw himself into England; where she also follow'd him with Letters of Complaint, in so much that he was sent back into France, and there humbly crav'd Pardon. Navarre, not unmindful of the Consolation he gave him, when he came to be King of France, and saw him in Normandy twenty five Years after, Knighted him. Afterwards Queen Elizabeth sent Thomas Randolph into France to the Queen-Mother, if it were possible, to restore Alenxon and Navarre to their former Grace and Favour. But before he arriv'd in France, King Charles was dead; for whom a solemn funeral Obsequy was kept with great Magnificence in St. Paul's Church in London.

As soon as Henry III. of that Name, King of France, was return'd out of Poland into France to take the Crown, Roger Lord North was sent over into France, to Congratulate the new King both about the Kingdom and his Return; to Condole the rending of France in pieces by Civil Wars; to Persuade him to Peace and the observation of the late Edicts; to restore Alenxon into Favour; to pacify the Displeasure conceiv'd against Montmorency and the Marshal of Cosse; and to procure Favour towards the Lady Charlota of Bourbon, the Duke of Montpensier's Daughter, who had withdrawn herself into Germany for Religion. But he effected nothing; For now France, as it were, thrust forward by Destiny, ran desperately headlong into a cruel War. Nevertheless the King and his Mother sent La Garde into England, with Letters from them both, to prosecute the business of Marriage for her Son Alenxon. For he now stomaching it very much that he was so unworthily led about by his Mother like a Prisoner, and holding secret Correspondence with the Politicians in France, they purpos'd to rid him away into England in hopes of Marriage, thereby to divert the young Man's Mind from War and Faction at home.

Nevertheless in the mean time they left no Stone unturn'd in Scotland, by secret Contrivances, to procure that the young King might be sent over into France, and Morton the Regent laid aside; sending privily to this purpose certain Scots of the French Guard into Scotland. And this the Queen of Scots much desir'd, being persuaded that if her Son was once in France out of Danger, she and the Catholics in England should be more mildly dealt withal. For hereby the thought it would come to pass, that the English Faction in Scotland, which was hitherto supported by the Authority of the King's Name, would presently fall to the Ground; and the English, as he grew more and more ripe in Years, would stand in fear of him, both from France and from Scotland. And no less did the French wish the same, fearing lest the Regent of Scotland, being most devoted to the English, would dissolve that ancient League betwixt the French and the Scots. Notwithstanding, when the Regent earnestly intreated that there might be a League of mutual Defence concluded betwixt England and Scotland against Foreigners, he was not heard nor minded; perhaps because at the same time he sued that a yearly Pension might be assign'd him and some other Scots. But those were hearkned unto, who upon a light Suspicion charg'd the Queen of Scots, the Countess of Shrewsbury, and the Earl of Shrewsbury also himself, as if they had made up a Match between Charles the King of Scots Uncle (to whom the King had lately in a Parliament confirm'd the Earldom of Lenox) and Elizabeth Catlish, the Countess of Shrewsbury's Daughter of this Council.

Whilst now there arose sundry Suspicions, whether this Marriage should tend, Henry Earl of Huntington was made President of the Council in the North, and furnish'd with new and secret Instructions in this matter. This Presidentship, which is now a Place of great Honor, did, from a mean Beginning, grow up in a short time to this high Estimation. For, (to relate to Posterity what I have heard, by a free and brief Digression) when in the Reign of Henry VIII. the Rebellion of the Northern People about the suppressing of Abbies was quell'd, and the Duke of Norfolk staying in those Parts, many Complaints were brought to him of several Wrongs, done in the Rebellion; some of 'em he made up himself, and others he committed to Men of Discretion, under his Seal, to be by them compounded and accorded. Which when the King undertood, he sent him a peculiar Seal to use in these cases: And the same Seal he committed, after the Duke was recall'd, to Tunstall Bishop of Durham, and appointed him Assistants, with Authority to hear and determine the Complaints of the Poor. He was then first named President, and the Authority of his Successors has ever since increas'd very much.

Excess of Apparel
restrain'd.

In these days, a wondrous Excess in Apparel had spread itself all over England; and the Habit of our own Country, thro' a peculiar Vice incident to our Nation, of imitating foreign Fashions, grew into such Contempt, that Men, by their new-fashion'd Garments, and too gaudy Apparel, discover'd a certain Deformity and Arrogance of Mind; whilst they jetted up and down in their Silks glittering with Gold and Silver, either embroider'd or laced. The Queen observing that to maintain this Excess, a great quantity of Money was carry'd yearly out of the Land, to buy Silks, and other outlandish Wares, to the impoverishing of the Commonwealth; and that many of the Nobility, who might be of great Service to the Commonwealth, and others that they might seem of noble Extraction, did, to their own undoing, not only waste their Estates, but also run so far in Debt, that of necessity they came within Danger of the Law thereby; and attempted to raise Troubles and Commotions, when they had wasted their own Patrimonies; although she might have proceeded against them, by the Laws of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary, and thereby have fin'd them in great Sums of Money; yet she chose rather to deal with them by way of Command. She commanded therefore, by Proclamation, that every Man should, within fourteen days, conform himself, for Apparel, to a certain prescribed Fashion, lest they otherwise incur'd the Severity of the Laws: and she began the Conformity herself in her own Court. But, thro' the Untowardness of the Times, both this Proclamation, and the Laws also gave way, by little and little, to this Excess of Pride, which grew daily more and more unreasonable: And with it crept in riotous Banqueting, and prodigal Bravery in Building. For now there began more Noblemen and private Mens Houses to be built here and there thro' England; and those neat, large and sumptuous Edifices; than in any other Age before: and verily to the great Ornament of the Kingdom, but to as great Decay of the glorious Hospitality of the Nation.

England
beautify'd with Buildings.

Of the Englishmen who serv'd in Holland, under Edward Chester, and Gainsford, some this Year

wanted Valour, and some good Success. For, those that lay in Garrison at Valkenbourg quitted their Post, and after yielded themselves to the Enemy: who notwithstanding were pardon'd, lest Queen Elizabeth should deny Harbour to the Spanish Fleet, that was now passing through the British Sea, to the Low-Countries. Others of 'em at the Sluce of Gouda, after they had endur'd a smart Skirmish with the Spaniards, and had beaten them back, were surprized unawares, by the Enemy swimming the River, and forced from their Hold; 200 of them being slain, and three Colours taken.

I know not whether it be worth while to mention such small Matters as these; to wit, the devout Credulity of certain London-Ministers, deluded this Year by a Maid, who counterfeited herself to be possess'd by the Devil: a monstrous Whale left on the dry Shoar, upon the Coast of the Isle of Thanet; whose Length was measured to be twenty of our Ells, the Breadth from the Belly to the Back-bone thirteen Foot, and the space between the Eyes eleven Foot: that the Thames ebb'd and flow'd twice in an hour: that the Clouds flam'd with Fire in the Month of November, streaming from the North towards the South; and the next Night the Heaven seem'd to burn, the Flames arising from the Horizon round about, and meeting in the Vertical Point. Blame me not for mentioning these things in a short Digression, considering that the gravest Historians have recorded such like Matters more at large.

The Eighteenth Year of her Reign.

Henry III. King of France, being return'd out of Poland, and inaugurated at Rheims, made it his first and chiefest Care to confirm by his Oath and Subscription, the Confederacy of Blois, enter'd into in the Year 1572. betwixt his Brother Charles and Queen Elizabeth, and to deliver the same to Valentine Dale, her Ordinary Ambassador: which she in like manner ratify'd, at Saint James's near Westminster. Howbeit, within a while after, he mov'd this Question by a Letter, Whether or no the mutual Defence against all Men, mention'd in the said League, did comprehend the Cause of Religion? Whereunto when she had answer'd plainly, that it did, and that she would be ready for a mutual Defence against all Men, even in the Cause of Religion, if it were required, according to the Condition of the League; he prepared himself to war against the Protestants: and Alençon being engaged to the adverse Party, there follow'd thereupon a deep and long Silence concerning his Marriage. Nevertheless, for Alençon's sake, Queen Elizabeth furnish'd a great Sum of Money to Casimir, for the bringing of certain German Horsemen into France, against the Disturbers of the publick Peace.

While her Mind was taken up with these French matters, in the mean time the Netherlandish Affairs stood thus. Don Lewis Zuniga de Requesens, who succeeded the Duke of Alva, bent himself wholly to recover (if it were possible) the Sea-Coasts, which the Duke of Alva had, by a notable Oversight in so great a Captain, neglected; whereby the Low-Country-War was so many Years prolong'd. But in regard he was unprovided of Shipping, (for the Spanish Ships, which, by the Help of the English, were brought into Flanders a little before, for that purpose, had miscarry'd, being miserably torn and weather-beaten) he sent Boischoet into England, to levy, with the Queen's Consent, Ships and Seamen, against the Hollanders and Zealanders. But he 1575. Ann. 18. Other Re-quests deny'd him. he prevail'd not: for the Queen would not hazard her Ships and Seamen in another Man's Quarrel; and she publickly commanded, that no Man should set out Ships of War, without Licence first obtain'd from her; and that no English Seamen should serve under other Princes. Boisshot therefore desired, that she would not be offended, if the English Exiles in the Netherlands serv'd at Sea, under the Spaniard, against the Hollanders; and that they might have free Access to the Ports of England, and buy Victuals for their Money. She in no wise allow'd, that those English Rebels (for so she call'd those, whom he term'd Exiles) should serve under the Spaniard; nay, she hoped Requesens would not shew them any Countenance, and pray'd him not to do it; particularly naming Thomas Copley, (whom the Spaniards purpos'd to set out to Sea, to make Prize both of the English and Netherlanders, having dignify'd him with the Titles of Great Master of the Maese, Lord of Gatten and Roughy) And to give Liberty of her Ports to Rebels and sworn Enemies, were nothing else but the Height of Madness. Boisshot, that he might obtain something reasonable of her, required, in the King of Spain's Name, that the Netherland Rebels against the Spaniard might be expell'd out of England. She deny'd it, forasmuch as those whom he call'd Rebels were Men of no Note, poor and silly Wretches, who had attempted no Disturbances, but had fled into England, for fear of the War, despoil'd of their Country and Inheritance, whom to deliver into the Tormenter's Hands, were a piece of Inhumanity, and against the Laws of Hospitality. And she put him in mind how prejudicial it had been to the Spanish Affairs in the Netherlands, when at the Duke of Alva's Request, she commanded the Netherlanders to depart out of England, in the Year 1572. For the Count Van-der-Mark and others, being commanded to be gone out of England, thereupon took the Briel, and gave Beginning to that War. But yet, that she might not seem to forget or neglect the ancient League with the House of Burgundy, (which notwithstanding the Spaniard had refus'd to confirm with her) she commanded by publick Proclamation, that the Netherlanders Ships of War should not stir out of the Havens of England, and that those Netherlanders who had taken up Arms against the Spaniard, should not be admitted into the Havens of England; and by Name, the Prince of Orange, and those of his House, the Earls of Culenbourg, Berg, Van-der-Mark, and fifty others, the most remarkable Men of that Faction. And this she did the more willingly, because Requesens had, at the Intercession of William the English Ambassador, remov'd the Earl of Westmoreland and other Englishmen, out of the Netherland Provinces of the Spaniard, and had dissolv'd the English Seminary at Doway. Instead whereof, the Guises, by the Procurement of Pope Gregory XIII. erected another at Rheims.

Q. forbids the Confederate Netherlanders Entrance into her Ports. The Prince of Orange, finding himself too weak to withstand the Force of the Spaniard, and hoping for no Good out of England, enter'd into Consultation with his Friends, to whose Protection they might best betake themselves. And when Queen Elizabeth understood that he cast his Eyes and Mind upon the French King, she first sent Daniel Rogers to dissuade him: which when Rogers could not do, (for he had dealt before, concerning the matter, with Coligny Admiral of France, and the French King) she sent Henry Cobham, the Lord Cobham's Brother, to the Spaniard, to inform him, of how dangerous Consequence it would be, if Holland and Zealand should revolt from him to the French King; and to persuade him, by the best Reasons he could, to change War for Peace: who seem'd to listen to the Motion. And withal, she signify'd the same things to Requesens, by Robert Corbet. Neither ceas'd she to divert the Prince of Orange from his purpose, by J. Hastings: but by means of the Opposition of Vilers, a French Preacher, he effected nothing. This Vilers (I speak it upon my own Knowledge) came formerly into England, a poor needy Fellow, in a thread-bare Cloak; and grew rich, by a common Collection made him for reading a Divinity-Lecture. He, fearing lest the Prince of Orange should look towards the English, amongst other things, affirm'd, that Queen Elizabeth had never a Martial Man, to whose Valour and Fidelity she could entrust an Army, but Suffex; and he not much favouring the Protestant Religion. He also buzz'd abroad, what he had heard of Coligny, that the English, if they once set Footing in the Netherlands, would resume their ancient Hatred against the French.

But the Civil-Wars among the French cut off from the Prince of Orange, and the Netherlanders, all Hope of Aid out of France. Whereupon, they enter'd into a new Consultation, whom they should fly to, for Succour and Protection. The Princes of Germany, they knew, were already averse enough, in their Hearts, from the Spaniards; but they did not unite their Counsels together, for the Common Good; they were sparing of laying out Money; they agreed not in all Points, with the Netherlanders, in Religion; and the Emperor, being ally'd in Blood to the Spaniard, would cast Rubs in their Way. The French (they saw) were embroil'd with Civil-War at home, in such sort as they could not tell when it would have an End. Besides, there were inveterate Grudges and Heart-burnings betwixt the Netherlanders and the French; and those of Brabant and Flanders, and the People bordering upon the French, would oppose them all they could. The Government of the French was no less rigid than that of the Spaniards: the Ports of France not very commodious for the Netherlanders Navigation. But as for the English, they were (as being under the same Parallel) of the same Temper and Disposition with them; their Religion the very same, their Language not much differing, their Country near at hand, full of Havens commodious for Navigation, and abounding with Merchandize: the Queen was very powerful both by Sea and Land, courteous, bountiful, one that would maintain their Privileges; her Government would be gentle, and not burdensome by Exactions. Thus they argu'd.

Into England therefore are sent Philip of Marnix Sieur of Saint Aldegonde, Janus Douza of Nordwick, William of Nirville, Paul Buys, Advocate for the States of Holland, and Dr. Melsen, a Lawyer; who, by an honourable Embassy, and in an eloquent Oration, offer to the Queen, either the Possession or Protection of Holland and Zealand, she being a Princess descended from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa Wife to Edward III. and Daughter to William III. of Bavaria, Earl of Hainault and Holland; by whose other Sister the hereditary Title of those Provinces was descended to the Spaniard.

These things the Queen gave a ready and attentive Ear to. And first she weigh'd in her Mind seriously, the Cause which they maintain'd against their King and Lord; the Enmity of the Spaniard against her; the Jealousies of the French King; and the great Expences and doubtful Chances of War; and also how great Offence the Novelty of such an Example might give. Then she question'd, whether she had any just Title to Holland and Zealand, by the House of Bavaria,

Ann. 18. Barbarian, and whether she might lawfully enter into Covenant with another Prince's Subjects to protect them; as also whether they might lawfully do it without the Emperor's consent, who was Supreme Lord of the Fee. Next, she gave no Credit to what some would make her believe, that those Countries came to the Spaniards Ancestors by Election of the Subjects, not by Right of Inheritance. Finally, upon mature Deliberation of the Matter, after she had thanked the Prince of Orange and them for their apparent Good-will towards her, she answer'd, That she esteem'd nothing more glorious, than to deal with Faith and Honour, and as becometh a Prince. That she was not yet satisfy'd how she might with her Honour and a safe Conscience take those Provinces upon their Proffer into her Protection, much less Possession. But she would deal seriously with the Spaniard, to procure them an happy Peace.

Campaign At the same time came John Perenott, Lord of Champigny, the Cardinal of Granvill's Brother, from Requesens to Queen Elizabeth; who modestly put her in mind of observing the League betwixt England and Burgundy, and besought her, that she would not intermeddle in the Affairs of the Netherlands. She, tho' the Spaniard had refus'd to confirm the said League, yet promis'd to observe it. Nevertheless she would provide (she said) for her own Honour and Safety, in case the ancient Form of the Burgundian Government were chang'd, and foreign Soldiers receiv'd daily in so great Numbers into the Neighbouring Province to her.

Death of Before such time as Champigny was return'd home, Requesens was dead, and presently the Affairs of the Netherlands were in a confus'd Condition, the Soldiers harassing all places with Fire and Sword, and the Estates of Brabant, Flanders, &c. reassuming their former Authority in governing the State: Which the Spaniard also was forced to confirm unto them till the coming of Don John of Austria, whom he had appointed to be their Governor. To these Estates Queen Elizabeth sent William Davison, to exhort them effectually to bend their Minds to Peace, being very careful that the Spaniard might receive no Damage, and to preserve unto him, as far as lay in her power, the Netherland Provinces whole and safe. But the Spanish Soldiers mutinying and growing outrageous, nothing was effected.

The Q. In England there was all this Year a quiet Calm, saving that in the Middle-March towards Scotland there happen'd a sudden Bickering in the Month of July betwixt the Borderers, upon this Occasion. Sir John Forster Kt. Warden of the Middle-March, and at this time Governor also of Berwick, had condescended beneath his Quality to a Parley at Red-Square-Hill with J. Carmichell, Warden of Liddesdale in Scotland. For Governors were not wont to meet but with Governors, and Wardens with Wardens, as Equals in Dignity. Both of them, besides certain Gentlemen attending them, were accompany'd with an armed Rabble of Thieves and Malefactors belonging to both Borders, most of them bearing an inveterate and deadly Fend one against the other. These, after their wonted manner, turning their Horses to grazing in the next Fields, encompassed the Governor and the Warden on all sides: Whom when they heard, fall to hot Words about delivering up of Raparees, and mistrusted that themselves (who had no Livelihood but by their Weapons) were the Men that should be deliver'd up, every one of them having a guilty Conscience, they began to quarrel about a Spur that was taken up, and presently betook themselves to their Weapons, every Man falling upon his particular Enemy whom he hated, or else to the taking of Horses as Booty. Whether the Scots or the English began first is uncertain. At the first Shock the English beat back the Scots, and took Carmichell Prisoner: But when they fell carelessly to Pillaging, and to rising of certain Pedlars, a Company of Scots came upon them from Fedburgh, by means whereof Carmichell escap'd, the English were put to flight, and Sir George Heron Kt. Warden of Tindale and Rhodesdale, and others, were slain. Forster himself the Governor, Francis Russel the Earl of Bedford's Son, and Son-in-law to Forster, Cuthbert Collingwood, James Ogilvie, Henry Fenwick, and many others were taken Prisoners, and carry'd into Scotland as far as Dalkeith, where the Regent lay; who entertain'd them with all Civility, but detain'd them a little while, fearing lest, if they were presently dismissed, while their Blood was hot for the loss of their Friends, they might attempt a Revenge, and raise Combuitions and War betwixt the two Kingdoms. Neither did he at last let them go, but upon Faith given under their Hands to appear in Scotland at a set Day.

As soon as Queen Elizabeth had intelligence hereof, now if ever she was filled with Anger and Indignation, taking it in high scorn, that the Scots, who (as she said) did owe their Liberty and Tranquillity to her and the English, had broken the Peace, invaded the English in England, slain some of them, taken Prisoner the Warden of the Middle-March, who was also Governor of Berwick, with divers others, carried them away captive into Scotland, and not dismiss'd them till they had given Assurance under their Hands for their Return. All these Things she took as done wrongfully and injuriously, in Disgrace of the English Nation, and of her own Honour. And the rather, because the Regent had appointed the Hearing of this Matter to be within the Limits of Scotland; and had also propounded whether or no the Commissioners should meet armed. For this latter seem'd a point of Hostility; that other of Ambition, namely, that the Regent of Scotland should now prescribe a Place of Meeting to the Queen of England, whereas she not long before had appointed Murray the Regent his Place of Meeting at York. Neither could the Regent, now terrify'd at her Threats, satisfy her, till such time as he came unarm'd to Bondevood, on the Borders of both Kingdoms; and there met the Earl of Huntingdon, the English Commissioner, and with complimentary Words, promis'd to close this Wound by the best Offices he could, and (to repair the Honour of the English Nation) sent Carmichell, his intimate Friend, into England, who was kept a while at York a Prisoner at large, but afterwards sent back with Honour and certain Presents. For it was found that the Fault lay in Forster, whilst he too obstinately took the Part of a notorious Malefactor. Thus was Amity renew'd betwixt the Queen and the Regent. And after that time he never fail'd to shew himself her constant Friend, restraining the Raparees of the Borders, to his own great Commendations, and to the general Good of both Kingdoms.

There died this Year no Man of any great Note in England, but in Scotland a most noble Person, namely James Hamilton, Duke of Chastel-Herauld, and Earl of Arran; who, being Great Grandson to James II. King of Scots by his Daughter, was appointed Tutor to Mary Queen of Scots, and Governor and Heir-apparent of the Kingdom during her Minority. After, when he had deliver'd her to the French, he was made Duke of Chastel-Herauld in France; and was after that constituted by Queen Mary (being then a Prisoner) the first of the three Lieutenants of Scotland. Whose Cause 1575. Cause whilst he most constantly maintain'd, being an open-hearted Man, and of a mild Disposition, he was perpetually tossed and turmoiled by the vexatious Contrivances of turbulent Persons.

1576. In Ireland the Earl of Essex being laid in wait for by Turlough and the Baron of Dungannon, and wrestling with many Difficulties out of England, hearing now that there was a Consultation about his calling home, bewail'd himself for the Miseries into which he was wrongfully fallen, complain'd of the undoing of himself and his Friends, lamented the Condition of Ireland, which he persuaded himself might be brought into Order with Two thousand Men; and very earnestly intreated that he might compound Matters with Turlough, to his Honour. And when he had now resign'd up his Command in Ulster to the Lord-Deputy, because he was not able with that small Power of Men which the Lord-Deputy had assign'd him to prosecute his Enterprize, he was commanded to take it again. But scarce had he taken it and march'd against Turlough, when Letters came, that he should absolutely desist from War, and make as honourable a Peace as he could. Which being soon made, he march'd against the Hebridian Scots, who had seiz'd upon Clondeboy, drove them into the Lurking-places, and by the Conduct of Norris attempted the Isle of Rathlin, put Four hundred of the Islanders to the Sword, forced the Castle, and put a Garison therein. And now, in the midst of his course of Victory, he was again, beyond his expectation, commanded to resign his Authority; and as an ordinary Captain had the Command of 300 Men given him; and through Leicester's cunning Dealing nothing was omitted, whereby to break his mild Spirit with continual Crosses one in the neck of another.

Sidney the third time made Deputy of Ireland. Diverse Rebels submit themselves. Now was Sir Henry Sidney sent the third time Lord-Deputy into Ireland, whenas the Pestilence consum'd the People of the Isle far and near. He notwithstanding goeth into Ulster, and many came in to him, falling upon their Knees, and craving his Protection, namely Mac-Mahon, Mac-Guire, Turlough Leinigh, and others. In Leinster in like manner did the O-Conors and O-Moors, two rebellious Families, who by Force and Arms had seiz'd upon their ancient Inheritances in Leife and Ophalie, out of which they had been thrown by the Law. Being come into Munster, he assist-ed as a close Mourner to honour the Funeral of Sir Peter Carew, a very noble Knight, and of approved Valour; who being Heir to Fitz-Stephen and Raymund the Gros, the first Conquerors of Ireland, and to the Barony of Ydrone, had recover'd a part of his Inheritance which had been lost a long time. The Earl of Desmond coming to see him at Cork, offer'd him his best Service, and Obedience with all Submission. From thence going into Connaught, he receiv'd into his Protection the Earl of Clan-Richard's Son, who had rebell'd, but now most submissively crav'd Pardon in the Church of Galway: And he govern'd the Country with great Commendation.

The Nineteenth Year of her Reign.

French propound a Marriage to Q. Eliz. In the beginning of the new Year those two Marriage-Brokers, Mota Fenellon and Porte, began again to tickle Queen Elizabeth's Ears with Love-Stories about her Marriage with Alenzon. To whom answer was made, That that Business was now out of season, for Alenzon could not come over, France being embroil'd with Civil Wars, and Alenzon deeply engag'd therein. Yet were there one or two Messengers sent into France, to renew Brotherly-love betwixt the King and Alen-zon, and to dissuade them from meddling with the Affairs of the Netherlands, lest the Spaniard should endeavour to raise new Combustions in France. And the more to deter the French King from it, she put him in mind how easie a matter it would be for the Spaniard, who was now thoroughly furnish'd with all Provision for War in Italy, either to seize upon Saluzes, or to land his Forces in Provence, and make himself Master of the Coast of the Mediterranean-Sea, France being so exhausted of its Wealth: And other like matters she put him in mind of.

For the Prince of Orange, for his own private Ends, and in hopes to retain the Principality of Orange, which is situate in France, ceased not to invite the French into the Netherlands, and permitted the Zelanders and Hollanders (who infested the Seas round about with their Privateers, being Men as it were born in the Sea) to rob the English Merchants Ships, whom they accus'd to carry Victuals to their Enemies the Dunkirkers, and to transport the Merchandize of the Antwerp and others into Spain, under counterfeit Names, which they were wont themselves to export formerly to their own Advantage, but now durst not, as being conscious to themselves of their revolt. For restraining of these, Hol-flock, being sent forth again with Men of War, took above 200 Pirates, and put 'em in Prisons all along the Sea-coast. But to demand Restitution of the Goods they had taken, there were sent into Zeland Sir William Winter Kt. and Robert Beal Clerk of the Council, to consider of the Value of the Things in controversie, and agree about Restitution, upon certain Conditions. But by reason of the Avarice of the English Merchants, and the Insolency of the Zelanders, the Quarrel broke out again, which was shortly after compounded with loss to both Nations.

All things were now in the utmost Confusion in the Netherlands, whilst the Spaniards without any Authority, thrust certain Counsellors of the Estates into Prison, and committed such Outrages in the Country, rifling their Goods, and doing them all kinds of Injuries, that the Estates were driven of necessity to take up Arms. And forthwith they dispatch'd their Messengers into all Countries; and by Obigny signified to Queen Elizabeth how they were abus'd, and the Causes of their taking up Arms. The Queen by Dr. Wilson earnestly exhorteth both the States and the Spaniards to lay down Arms, and enquireth diligently for what reason the States Counsellors were committed. In the mean time the most beautiful City of Antwerp, which hardly yielded to any the most flourishing Mart-Towns of all Europe, was miserably sack'd by the Spaniards, the Houses of the English Merchants plunder'd and rifl'd, and they themselves (tho' free from all Blame) constrain'd to pay the Soldiers a great sum of Gold for their Ransom. Obigny, laying hold on this Opportunity, importunately desir'd to borrow a great sum of Money of Q. Elizabeth, in the Name of the States, to restrain this Insolency of the Spaniards. The Queen, having receiv'd certain Intelligence that they had before desir'd Money of the French King, denied them, but promis'd to make earnest Intercession with the Spaniard for a Peace. And to that purpose she sent into Spain Sir John Smith, Cousin-German to King Edward VI. a Man of Spanish Comportment, and very well known to the Spaniard; who was most graciously Entertain'd by the King, and retorted with such Discretion the disgraceful Injuries of Gaspar Quiroga Archbishop of Toledo against the Queen in hatred of her Religion, and of the Inquisitors of Sevil, who would not allow the Attribute of Defender of the Faith in the Queen's Title, 1576. Title, that the King gave him Thanks for it, and was displeased with the Archbishop, desiring the Ambassador to conceal the Matter from the Queen, and expressly commanded the said Title to be allow'd her. For he knew the Queen's Advice was expedient for this Affair, tho' he follow'd it not, the Fate of the Netherlands (if I may so say) inforcing him to take another Course.

Don John of Austria came into the Netherlands with Supreme Power to Govern the same, who was the base or natural Son of the Emperor Charles V. To whom the Queen likewise sent Sir Edward Horsey, Governor of the Isle of Wight, to congratulate his Entrance, and to offer him Assistance in case the States should call in the French to the Netherlands. But Svevingham making most importunate suit in behalf of the States, she sent them over Twenty thousand Pounds of English Money, upon condition they should never change their Religion nor their Prince, nor receive the French into the Netherlands, nor refuse a Peace, if Don John of Austria would condescend to reasonable Conditions: And that if he did come to a Peace, the Spanish Soldiers should be satisfy'd with the said Money, who now mutiny'd for lack of Pay. So careful was she to retain the wavering Provinces in their Fidelity and Obedience to the Spaniard, that she omitted no Opportunity of deserving well of him, and preserving Peace.

In England there was at this time a pleasant Calm and Quiet, and the Trade betwixt the English and the Portugals was open'd again, which by the private Avarice of certain Persons had of late been obstructed: For the English were now permitted to Trade in Portugal, Algarbia, Isles of Madera and the Azores, and the Portugals in England and Ireland, for the space of three years; in which time the Differences about detaining of Merchandizes was to be debated. And this was publish'd by a Proclamation.

At this time some studious Heads, moved with a commendable Desire to discover the more remote Regions of the World, and the Secrets of the Ocean, put forward some well-mony'd Men, no less desirous to reap Profit by it, to discover whether there were any Strait in the North-part of America, through which Men might sail to the rich Country of Cathay, and so the Wealth of the East and West might be conjoin'd by a mutual Commerce. These learned Men argu'd, that probably there was some Strait open'd a Way in that Part; taking it for granted, that the nearer the Shore a Man cometh, the shallower the Waters are. But they who sail from the Western-Coast of Island find by experience the Sea to be deeper: So as it may probably seem to join with that Sea which the Mariners call Mare del Sur, on the other side of America. Then they argu'd, That whereas the Ocean is carried with the daily motion of the Primum Mobile, or the uppermost Heaven, being beaten back by the Opposition of America, it runneth Northward to Cabo Fredo, that is, the Cold Cape or Promontory, about which place it should be emptied thro' some Strait into the Sea del Sur; otherwise it would be beaten back with the like violence upon Lapland and Finmark, as it is in the South Part of the World beaten back from the Strait of Magellan (a Strait full of Isles, and by reason of the narrowness of the Strait, being so full of Isles, incapable of so great a quantity of Waters) along the Eastern-Coast of America to Cabo Fredo. For Testimony they bring Ant. Jenkinson an Englishman, than whom no Man had more perfect knowledge of the North Part of the World; who hath demonstrated, that an huge quantity of Waters must needs be poured forth out of the Cronian or Frozen Sea into the Sea del Sur: Also Bernard le Torr, a Spaniard, who affirmeth, That returning from the Isles of the Molucca's into America, he was driven back again to the Molucca's by force of Waters rushing against his Ship from the North, when he was above the Equator Northwards: And other things they alledg'd for proof hereof. Herewith these money'd Men being persuaded, they sent Martin Frobisher with three Pinnaces to discover this Strait; who setting out from Harwich the 18th of June, enter'd, on the 9th of August, into a Bay or Strait, under the Latitude of 63 Degrees; where he found Men with black Hair, broad Faces, flat Noses, swarthy Colour'd, Apparell'd in Sealves Skins; the Women painted about the Eyes and Balls of the Cheeks with a blue Colour, like the ancient Britains. But all being so frozen up with Ice in the Month of August that he could not hold on his Voyage, he return'd, and arriv'd in England the 24th of September, having lost five Seamen, whom the Barbarians had intercepted. Nevertheless the two Years next following he failed to the same Coasts to perfect his Enterprize; but being encounter'd every where with heaps of Ice like Mountains, he was kept from entering any farther into the Bay. Being therefore tossed up and down with foul Weather, Snows, and unconstant Winds, he gather'd a great quantity of Stones, which he thought to be Minerals, and so return'd Homewards. Which Stones, when neither Gold nor Silver, nor any other Metal could be extracted from them, we have seen cast forth to mend the High-Ways. But these matters are publish'd at large, and every where to be sold.

About this time died Maximilian the Emperor, a Prince both prudent, just, profitable and advantageous to the Empire, and one that had well deserv'd of Queen Elizabeth and the English. As soon as Queen Elizabeth heard the Certainty of his Death, she was very much troubled at it, and sent Sir Philip Sidney, as her Ambassador to Rodolph King of the Romans, officiously to signify both her Grief for his Father's Death, and her Joy for his Succession: and also in his way, to condole with the Elector Palatine's Sons, the Death of their Father Frederick III. as likewise, to put Count Casimir in mind, by the by, of the Money she had disburs'd in the French War. For by that War was Peace restor'd to France, Alençon had settl'd upon him, in Apenmage, as they term it, the Dukedoms of Anjou, Tours, and Berry; Casimir was promis'd Eleven Millions of Franks, for Pay for his German Horsemen, and some of the French Queen's Jewels were pawn'd for three hundred thousand Crowns. But nothing at all was paid back again to Queen Elizabeth, who notwithstanding held herself fully satisfy'd, that it was well bestow'd in a good Cause. Casimir answer'd ingenuously, and in his German Sincerity, that the French King had not kept his Word, and that 'twas not long of him, that the Money was not repaid.

As in Germany, the Loss of the Emperor Maximilian, and the Elector Palatine, Princes of Christian Vertue, was very great, in regard of their singular Moderation: so in England and Ireland, was that as great of Walter D'Evereux Earl of Essex; tho' he were in degree far inferior to them. A very excellent Man certainly he was, in whom Honesty of Carriage vy'd with Nobility of Birth: both which notwithstanding could not prevail against Envy. For after he was constrain'd to give over his laudable Enterprize in Ireland, he return'd into England, having much wasted his Estate; where openly threatening Leicester, whom he suspected to have done him Injuries, juries, he was by his cunning Court-tricks, who stood in fear of him, and by a peculiar Court-Mystery of wounding and overthrowing Men by Honours, sent back again into Ireland, with the insignificant Title of Earl-Marshal of Ireland. Where pining away with Grief and Sorrow, he piously rendred his Soul to Christ, dying of a Bloody-flux, in the midst of grievous Torments; after he had desir'd the Standers-by, to admonish his Son, who was then scarce ten Years old, to have always before his Eyes the six and thirtieth Year of his Age, as the utmost Term of his Life, which neither he nor his Father had pass'd: and which this Son never attain'd to, as we will shew in its proper place. The Death of this Nobleman carry'd with it a Suspicion of Poison among the vulgar sort, (who always suspect them to be poison'd, whom they esteem and love) altho' Sidney Lord-Deputy of Ireland, after diligent Inquisition made, wrote to the Council in England, that the Earl, upon his first taking his Bed, said many times, that this was a thing usual and ordinary with him, that whensoever he was troubled and perplex'd in mind, he fell into the Bloody-flux; and that he suspected nothing at all of Poison; and that his Body retain'd the same Colour in his Sickness, which it had in his perfect Health, no Spot, no Infection, no Shedding of the Hair or Nails, and being embowell'd no Sign at all of Poison appear'd; that tho' the Physicians differ'd in their Judgments, yet they apply'd nothing against the force of Poison; and that his Cup-bearer was falsely accus'd of infusing something in Water, and mixing it with his Wine. Yet have we seen the same Man openly pointed at for a Poisoner. The Suspicion was increas'd by Leicester's presently putting away Douglasse Sheffield with Money and fair Promises, (whether his Mistress, or his Wife, I cannot say) on whom he had begotten a Son, and now more openly making Love to Lettice, Essex's Widow, to whom afterwards he join'd himself in a double Matrimony. For tho' it were reported, that he had already privately marry'd her; yet Sir Francis Knolles, Father to Lettice, who was acquainted with Leicester's Rambling and Inconstancy in his Love, would not believe it, (fearing lest he should put a Trick upon his Daughter) unless he might see the Marriage perform'd in his own Presence, with some Witnesses by, and a publick Notary. But these things were done a Year or two after.

Death of Walter D'Evereux Earl of Essex.

At this time ended his Life in England Sir Anthony Cook Knight, a Man of seventy Years of Age, of severe Gravity, and great Learning; having been School-Master to King Edward VI. in his Childhood; a Man happy in his Daughters, whom having brought up in Learning, both Greek and Latin, above their Sex, he marry'd to Men of good Account; namely, to Sir William Cecil, who was Treasurer of England, Sir Nicolas Bacon, Lord-Keeper, and Sir Thomas Hoby, who died Ambassador in France, Sir Ralph Roulet, and Sir Henry Killegrew.

Before Essex's Death, (to return a little back) the Earl of Clan-Richard's Sons, who scarce two Months before had obtain'd of the Lord-Deputy a Pardon for their Rebellion, gather'd together again a Rabble of lewd Fellows, and outrageously practis'd their Robberies and Depredations all over Connaught. The Town of Askenry, which the Inhabitants were now repairing, they burnt, and put the Workmen to the Sword, out of a barbarous hatred against the Inhabitants, because they begun to conform themselves to the Laws, and live civilly. But upon the Lord-Deputy's coming, their thieving Troops were dispers'd, and fled, after their wonted manner, into their Lurking-holes; and their Father the Earl of Clan-Richard himself was cast into Prison at Dublin, as accessary to their Crimes. The Lord-Deputy being return'd back, they crept out of their Holes again, and in vain besieged Balla-Reagh-Castle, with Loss of Men, being their Father's chief Seat, wherein a Garrison had been put, under the Command of Thomas Strange. The Lands of Mac-William Eughter, that is, the younger, they wait'd; joining to them the Island-Scotts. But at the coming of the Lord-Deputy, they vanish'd again, hiding themselves in their Holes, as before.

Sir W. Drury, who was lately Marshal of Berwick, being now newly made President of Munster, by his Wisdom and Valour, brought the whole Country into Subjection, and Obedience to the Laws; except the Peninsula and Country-Palatine of Kerry; whether, as into a Sink, many Malefactors, Thieves, Men in Debt, and suspected of capital Crimes, had resorted, and grew insolent, as presuming upon a kind of Impunity; by reason of the Privilege of the Place. For, King Edward III. had granted to the Earl of Desmond, all the Royalties which the Kings of England had in that County, except Firing, Rapes, Forestalling and Treasure-trove. The President notwithstanding, judging that those Royalties were granted for the Preservation of Justice, and not for Impunity to Offenders, enter'd into it, valiantly put to Flight the choicest Companies of those Rogues, whom Desmond had plac'd in Ambush, and hunted out the Malefactors all over Kerry, and severely punish'd many of them; while Desmond fretted, and made a most heavy Complaint to the Lord-Deputy against Drury, both of this, and about the Payment which they call Ceas. This Payment is an Exaction of Victuals, at a certain Rate or Price, (such as Canon Glebe was among the Ancients; that is, a Custom of paying Corn yearly) for the Maintenance of the Lord-Deputy's Household, and the Garrison-Soldiers. Hereof, not only he, but also in Leinster, the more civilized part of Ireland, the Lord Viscount Baltinglass, the Barons Delvin, Hotb, and Trimleston, and all the better sort of the Nobility and Gentry, complain'd; refusing to pay it, as not to be demanded but by Authority of Parliament. Those which were sent, in this behalf, by them, into England, were first heard by the Council, and then committed to Prison; as in like manner were those in Ireland, which sent them, till they submitted themselves: forasmuch as it appear'd, by the Records of the Kingdom, that it had been an ancient Institution, and that it was a Privilege of the Crown, (otherwise call'd a Royal Prerogative) which is not subject to the Laws, and yet is not repugnant to the Laws, as the learned in the Laws have judg'd. But the Queen commanded the Lord-Deputy to use a Moderation in such Exactions, saying, according to the old Proverb, that she would have her Subjects, whilst they were poll'd, not to be slay'd. And 'tis reported, that she should say, "Ah! how do I fear, lest it be objected to us, concerning the Irish, which was objected in old time to Tiberius, by Cato, concerning the Dalmatian Commotions; You, you it is that are in Fault, who have committed your Flocks, not to Shepherds, but to Wolves."

sent Gastelle to Queen Elizabeth, to thank her for the Assistance offer'd him against the French, and to profess to her his ready Inclination to Peace. She, by Sir Edward Horsey, who was now sent thither the second time, commends his Inclination to Peace; and withal, treats with him about restoring the Englishmens Goods, which were seiz'd at Antwerp.

Don John projects to

Queen of Scots.

A slow Answer was return'd hereto, in regard he was much hinder'd (as he pretended) by other Cares, being wholly taken up about a perpetual Edict of Peace, (as he call'd it) which notwithstanding scarce lasted a Year. Q. Elizabeth being seriously desirous of a Peace, sent Sir Tho. Leighton to the Prince of Orange, to persuade him to attempt nothing in an hostile Way, till Sir Thomas Smith's Return, who was sent to the Spaniard, to procure a Peace. The Prince of Orange, condemning from his Heart that perpetual Edict, had opportunely learn'd, that Don John was projecting to marry with the Queen of Scots: which he gladly laid hold on, and by Favonius presently acquainted Queen Elizabeth therewith, to divert her Mind from the Peace. Yet she, as if she understood nothing of it, congratulated Don John, by Daniel Rogers, about the perpetual Edict of Peace, tho' she were now ascertain'd, that Don John, thro' the Persuasion of the Earl of Westmoreland, and the English Fugitives, and being much forwarded and favour'd therein, by the Bishop of Rome and the Guises, had already swallow'd the said Marriage in hope, and withal the Kingdoms of England and Scotland; and had now determin'd to seize upon the Isle of Man in the Irish Sea, as commodious for invading England, from Ireland, and the Western Coast of Scotland, where the Queen of Scots had very many devoted to her; as also in the opposite part of England; namely, North-Wales, and the Counties of Cumberland, Lancashire and Cheshire; where the generality of the People were very much addicted to the Popish Religion.

Copley
made a Baron by the Fr. K.

And certainly Don John, (as we have learn'd from Perez, who was Secretary to the Spaniard) having been formerly transported with Ambition, when he found himself disappointed of his Hope of the Kingdom of Tunis, had privately dealt with the Pope, about deposing Queen Elizabeth, marrying the Queen of Scots, and conquering of England; and had so far prevail'd, without once acquainting King Philip; that the Pope, as it were out of a Desire of the publick Good, excited King Philip to War against England: and Don John himself, being ready to depart from the Netherlands, prosecuted the same himself in Spain; and afterwards made Suit by Escovedo, whom he sent out of the Netherlands, that some Port-Town might be granted him in Biscay, from whence he might invade England with a Fleet. But King Philip, disliking these Projects, began to neglect the Man as too ambitious. And these things Queen Elizabeth never perfectly understood, till (as I said) the Prince of Orange inform'd her thereof.

There arose also a new Suspicion from Tho. Copley (one of the prime Men among the English Fugitives) his being recommended to the French King by Vaux, Don John's Secretary, and receiving from him the Dignity of Knighthood, and Title of Baron. Yet Copley labour'd to clear himself of all Suspicion, protesting his Obedience towards his Princess, and that he had accepted that Title, with no other intent, but that the greater Honour might come to his Wife, the Companion of his Exile, and the larger Pension to himself, from the Spaniard; forasmuch as Noblemen, that are dignify'd with Titles, are in better Esteem among the Spaniards: and the Title of Baron he thought did belong to him of Right, whose Grand-mother was eldest Daughter to the Lord Hoo, and his Great-grand-mother eldest of the Heirs of the Lord Wills.

Don John, in the mean time, secretly prosecuted the said Marriage; and withal, to blind the Queen's Eyes, sent the Viscount of Gaunt on an Embassy to Queen Elizabeth, to acquaint her with the Conditions of the Peace, and to request a longer time for the Payment of the Money which the States had borrow'd. To this latter she willingly agreed, and dealt with him again by Wilson, about Recompence for the Damages done to the English Merchants, at the Sacking of Antwerp. But he only deluded her, and while he seem'd to be intent upon the perpetual Edict of Peace, brake forth into War, surprized Towns and Castles by Craft, and wrote to the Spaniard, that the best Course was to fall upon the Islands of Zealand, before he set upon the inner Provinces: and feeding his own Hopes, he endeavour'd to persuade him by Escovedo, his Secretary, that England might easilier be won, than Zealand.

Hereupon, when all things in the Netherlands now tended to War, the States sent the Marquis of Haurée and Adolph Metkerk, Ambassadors to Queen Elizabeth, to borrow of her one hundred thousand Pound Sterling, for eight Months. To which she answer'd, 'That if they could borrow it any where else, she and the City of London would very willingly give Security for it, upon Condition, that certain Towns in the Netherlands, which she should name, would become bound to repay the Money within a Year. A League also was contracted with the States, of mutual Aid by Sea and Land, upon these Conditions.

'The Queen shall assist the States with 1000 Horse, and 5000 Foot, whose Pay and Charges the States shall defray at London, the third Month after they take Shipping: and after the War ended, they shall send them back at their Charges into England. The General or Commander of this Army, being by Nation an Englishman, shall be admitted into the Council of the States. Nothing shall be determin'd concerning War or Peace, without acquainting the Queen or him therewith. They shall enter into no League with any whosoever, without her Approbation: and in the same, if she will, she shall be comprehended. If any Prince do attempt Hostility against the Queen or Kingdom, under any Pretence whatsoever, the States shall to their Power oppose him, and shall send the Queen the same number of Succours; and upon the same Conditions. If any Discord arise among the States, it shall be referr'd to the Queen's Arbitration. If any Fleet be to be rigg'd and prepar'd, by the Queen against her Enemies, the States shall furnish out 40 Ships of reasonable Burden, with Seamen and all Necessaries, which shall be under the Command of the Admiral of England, and shall serve under the Queen's Pay. The States shall by no means receive into the Netherlands such Englishmen as the Queen shall proclaim Rebels. If they make Peace with the Spaniard, they shall procure the Confirmation of these Articles, either jointly, or apart by themselves, at the Queen's Choice.

Presently after this League was made, the Queen lest she should be slander'd, as a Supporter of the Rebellion in the Netherlands, sent Thomas Wilks to the Spaniard, to inform him as follows: 'That forasmuch as there were not lacking some ill-disposed Persons, who sought, by cunning Artifices, to break off Amities between Princes, and 1577. Ann. 20. and by their unjust Backbitings, to stain her Reputation, as if she blew the Fire of the Netherlandish Combustions: First, she prays the King, and the Governors of the Netherlands, to call to mind, how often and how earnestly she had long since friendly forewarn'd them of the Mischiefs hanging over the Netherlands: And then when they first design'd to revolt, how carefully she endeavour'd, by frequent Messages to the Prince of Orange and the States, to keep them within their Duty and Obedience to the King; yea, when those rich and wealthy Provinces were offer'd her for Possession, how sincerely she would not so much as take them into her Protection: And lastly, when all things were in a most desperate and deplorable State, how largely she supply'd Money, that the States might not be, for want thereof, necessitated to subject themselves under another Prince, and break the Design for Peace lately set on foot. And when she heard that the Prince of Orange refus'd to embrace the Peace that was made, she not only advis'd him to embrace it, but also (as she religiously protests) did by Threats, in a manner command him. Whether these be things unbecoming a Christian Princess, that is affected to Peace, and most desirous to deserve well of her Confederate the Spaniard, let the Spaniard himself, and all Christian Princes, judg. And now, that the Wars may cease, and he may have the Netherlands at his Devotion, she advises him to receive his afflicted People into former Grace and Favour, to restore their Privileges, to observe the Conditions of the last Peace, and to appoint them another Governor, of his own Family. Which things could not (as she signify'd) be effected, unless Don John were remov'd; whom the States distrust- ed, and hated with a deadly and implacable Hatred; and whom she herself knew for certain, by his secret Practices with the Queen of Scots, to be her most mortal Enemy; in- so-much as she could expect nothing from the Netherlands, but assur'd Danger, as long as he was Governor there. But now, when she saw what great Forces Don John had rais'd, and how many Auxiliary-Companies of French were in a Readiness, she professes, that to pre- serve the Netherlands to the Spaniard, and to di- vert the Danger from England, she had prom- is'd Assistance to the States; who had reci- procally promis'd, that they would continue in the King's Obedience, and alter nothing in Religion. But if she perceiv'd that the King would not accept of these Proposals, but re- solv'd to break asunder the Bars of their Pri- vileges and Rights, and to bring these miserable Provinces into Slavery, as taken by Right of War; she could not neglect, both to defend her Neighbours, and to provide for her own Security. But if the States should shake off their Allegiance towards their King, and at- tempt any thing contrary to what they have promis'd, she would forthwith turn her Forces against them.

Spaniard hears 'em patiently.

These things he was not very willing to hear. But yet, because he knew that Queen Elizabeth was able to do much, either to compose or dis- turb the Affairs of the Netherlands, and under- stood also for certain, that there was a Plot laid by Don John against her, he dissembled the mat- ter, and withal pray'd her to continue her En- deavours for making a Peace, and not rashly to credit every false Rumour spread abroad; or be- lieve that he attempted any thing unbecoming a Prince in Amity with her.

1577. Ann. 20. Whilst Wilkes manag'd these Affairs in Spain, Don John of Austria lends Gastelle to Queen Elizabeth, (whom he both fear'd, and whose Con- fusion he wish'd) heavily accusing the States, laying foul Crimes and Accusations to their Charge; and withal, declaring the Causes at large, why he arm'd his Men again. Thus far she as an heroical Princess and Umpire betwixt the Spaniards, the French, and the States; so as she might well have us'd that Saying of her Fa- ther, Cui adhæreo, præest, that is, The Party to which I adhere, gets the upper hand. And true it was, which one has written, That France and England Spain are, as it were, the Scales, in the Balance of Europe, and England the Tongue, or Holder of the Balance.

About this time, while the Judges of Assizes sat at Oxford, and one Rowland Fenkes, a sawcy foul-mouth'd Bookseller, was indicted for scan- dalous Words against his Princess; the greatest part of those who were there present, whether through a poisonous and pestilent Vapour, or the Stink of the Prisoners, or Damp of the Ground, were taken in such a manner, that they died almost every one of them, within forty days or thereabouts, except the Women and Children; and none else were touch'd with the Contagion. Amongst those that died, were Robert Bell, Lord-Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, a sage and grave Man, and famous for his Knowledge in the Law, Sir Robert D'Oiley and Sir William Babington Knights, D'Oiley Sheriff of Oxfordshire, Harcourt, Weneman, Fettiplace, Men of great Note in those parts, Barham an excellent Lawyer, almost all the Jury, (as they call 'em) and others to the Number of 300, or there- abouts.

Hitherto fair and calm Weather shone upon the Papiists in England, who by a merciful Con- nivance enjoy'd their own Service of God, in their private Houses, in a manner, without any Pu- nishment; although it were prohibited by the Law, by which a pecuniary Mulct was to be in- flicted on them: neither did the Queen think fit that Violence should be offer'd to their Consci- ences. But after that Thunderbolt of Excom- munication was shot from Rome against the Q. this fair Weather turn'd by little and little into Clouds and Tempests, and caus'd a Law in the Year 1571. against those who should bring into the Realm any such Bulls, Agnus Dei's, or conse- crated Grains, as private Tokens of Papal Obe- dience, or should reconcile any Man to the Church of Rome. Yet was there no Man, in six Years time, proceeded against upon that Law, tho' some were apprehended, who had offended against it. The first that was convicted by this Law, was one Cuthbert Maine a Priest, who be- ing an obstinate Maintainer of the Pope's Power against his Prince, was put to death at St. Ste- phen's Lane (commonly call'd Launston) in Corn- wal; and Trugion, a Gentleman that had har- bour'd him, had his Estate confiscated, and was himself condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment. But these and such like Ecclesiastical Matters, I will touch but lightly; because others are in hand with the Ecclesiastical History of these Times, and, I hope, with sincere Faithfulness; a thing yet scarce to be hop'd for, whilst Mens Minds are so full of Rancour and Prejudice, up- on the account of Difference in Religion.

Secretary
Smith
dies.

Sir Thomas Smith also, one of the Queen's Secretaries, died this Year (being his Climacterical Year) of a Consumption: A Man worthy to be remember'd for his great Learning, and his Wisdom shew'd in many Embassies. He was born of honest Parentage at Saffron-Walden in Essex, brought up in Queen Margaret's College in Cambridge, and at riper Years made choice of to be sent into Italy, at the Queen's Charges. (For even till our days, certain young Men of promising Hopes, out of both Universities, have been maintain'd in foreign Countries, at the King's Charge, for the more complete polishing of their Parts and Studies.) From thence he return'd with the Title of Doctor of the Civil-Law, and found such Favour with the D. of Somerset, Protector to King Edward VI. that he was made one of the King's Secretaries, (Cecil being the other) Steward of the Stannaries, Dean of Carlisle, and Provost of Eton-College, whereof he had very well merited. Queen Mary deprived him of these Dignities, assigning him 100 l. a Year Pension during Life, howbeit on Condition that he should not depart the Realm. As soon as Queen Elizabeth came to the Crown, he was call'd again to the Service of the Commonwealth, and was present with the Divines, at the correcting of the English Liturgy; and afterwards, with great Commendations, perform'd those Embassies which I have mention'd in their proper places. In the Year 1571. being made one of the Queen's Secretaries, he sent his base Son, which was all the Sons he had, to carry over a Colony into Ardes, a Peninsula in Ireland, who died there unfortunately, as I have before said. He was very beneficial to the Commonwealth of Learning in England, by procuring the Law concerning Corn for the Colleges of Students: and indeed more beneficial than by his Writings, although he left behind him a Work unfinish'd, concerning the Commonwealth of England, a special Book of the Orthography of the English Tongue, another of the Pronunciation of the Greek, and an exact Commentary concerning Money, (or, De re Nummaria) very well worth the publishing. In the Place of Secretary to the Queen, he was succeeded by Thomas Wilson Doctor of Law, Master of St. Katharine's near London, who departed this Life within four Years.

Rebellion
in Ireland.

Rory Oge.

In Ireland the O-Moors and O-Conors, and others whose Ancestors Sussex, Lord-Deputy, had, in the Reign of Queen Mary, depriv'd of their Patrimonies in Leife and Ophalie, for their Misdemeanors, and had assign'd 'em no other place to live in; brake forth into Rebellion, Rory Oge, that is, Roderick the younger, being their Ring-leader: the Town of Naas they hir'd; Lachlin they assaulted, but being repuls'd by the Valour of George Carew the Governor, they treacherously intercepted Henry Harrington and Alexander Cosbey at a Parley; whom when Harpoole, a Captain of a Company, undertook to rescue, and to that end assaulted the Cottage in the Night, wherein Rory was, and those Gentlemen bound to a Post; Rory, awakening with the Uproar, wounded Harrington and Cosbey, with several Blows, in the dark; and made a desperate Escape, by the favour of the Night, through the midst of the Soldiers, which had beset him. But a few days after, laying a Trap for the Baron of the upper Ossory, he was intercepted himself, and cut in pieces; freeing thereby the Neighbouring People from farther Fears.

The One and twentieth Year of her Reign.

Although the Spaniards were not very well pleas'd, to hear those things which Wilks propounded, and dissembled the matter, (as I said a little before) yet Queen Elizabeth seriously pitying the Netherlanders, whose Provinces, by the great Commodiousness of their Situation and mutual Friendship, had adhered to England for many Ages, as if they had been conjoin'd with it in a Matrimonial Knot; and therefore not enduring that the French, by undertaking their Protection, should get them into his Possession; sent the same Wilks, at his Return out of Spain, to Don John of Austria, to give him secret Notice, that the Duke of Anjou (for so he was now call'd, who before was Duke of Alençon) was invited by the States, with an Army of French; and therefore it was his safest course to yield to a Truce; lest he expos'd the Provinces to present Hazard. But he, being a Man of a fiery and martial Spirit, and puff'd up with Pride, at his Success in a Battle fought against the Estates at Gemblours, answer'd in one Word, That he neither intended a Truce, nor fear'd the French. Nevertheless Queen Elizabeth, respecting her own Good, and the Good of the Netherlands, sent Sir Edward Stafford into France, to learn whether there were any Preparations on the Frontiers of France, toward the Netherlands, and what Levies of Men they were making.

Out of England had now transported themselves John North, the L. North's eldest Son; John Norris, the L. Norris's second Son; Henry Cavendish and Tho. Morgan, Colonels; with many Volunteers, to learn the Rudiments of Military Discipline. Casimire also, the Elector-Palatine's Son, brought down an Army of German Horse and Foot into the Netherlands, to the great Charge of Queen Elizabeth. Don John, having a great desire to assault the States Camp at Rimenant, or to provoke them to Battel, before all their Succours were come together out of France and Germany, posted thither sooner than was expected; and the Horsemen that stood Centinel presently retreating, he pursu'd 'em with an hot and furious Charge, as if he were sure of the Victory. But they taking fresh Courage, soon repuls'd Don John's Men. Who wheeling off, endeavour'd to break through certain Hedges and Covers where the English and Scottish Volunteers were disposed, but could not, meeting a warm Reception from the English and the Scots; who, throwing off their Cloaths by reason of the hot Weather, fought in their Shirts tied up between their Thighs. Norris, the General of the English, fighting stoutly, had three Horses slain under him, and got great Commendations in this Battel for his Martial Valour; as did also Stuart a Scottishman, Bingham Lieutenant to Cavendish, and William Markham.

To comfort and relieve these Netherland Provinces embroil'd with Civil War, there came from the Emperor the Count of Swartzenberg from the French King Monsieur Pompon de Belieure, and from Queen Elizabeth the Lord Cobham and Sir Francis Walsingham, to find out some way for making a Peace. But they all return'd without effecting any thing, since Don John would by no means admit of the reform'd Religion, and the Prince of Orange flatly refus'd to return into Holland.

About this time Egremont Ratcliffe, Son to Henry Earl of Sussex by his second Wife, a Man of a turbulent Spirit, and one of the Chief in the Northern Rebellion, who serv'd under Don John, was accus'd by the English Fugitives, as if he had been been sent over underhand to murder Don John, 1578. and was taken in the Camp at Namur with one Ann. 21. Grey an Englishman, as accessory to the Plot, and they were both of 'em executed. The Spaniards give out, that Ratcliffe at his Death confess'd voluntarily, that he was set at Liberty out of the Tower of London purposely, and encourag'd by Walsingham with great Promises to commit the Fact. The English that were there present deny that he made any such Confession, tho' it's true the Fugitives did what they could to extort such a Confession from him. But Persons whose Minds differ in Religion do too-too much, obscure the Light of Honesty and Truth on both sides: And who knoweth not that Fugitives do devise many things out of meer Hatred, and a desire to slander and backbite others?

At that very instant Don John, in the flower of his Age, laid aside his fond Ambition, together with his Life, by the Pestilence; or, as some say, out of very Grief, because he found himself neglected by the King his Brother, after he had gaped first after the Kingdom of Tunis, whereby Guleta or Golotta in Africa was lost, and then after the Kingdom of England; and had secretly enter'd into a Confederacy with the Guises, without the privity of the French King and the Spaniard, for the defence of both Crowns.

The Duke of Anjou in the mean time, tho' his Mind were set upon the Netherland War, yet, to shew that he could attend both Military and Love matters at once, prosecuted his Marriage with Queen Elizabeth, which he had begun to sue for whilst he was Duke of Alençon. And first Bachelville, being sent for this purpose, came to the Queen (in her Progress) at Melford, Cordall's House, in Suffolk. Shortly after came Rambolette from the French King. And lastly, after a Month more, came Simier from Anjou, a Man of Wit and Parts, and one thoroughly versed in Love-fancies, pleasant Conceits and other Gallantries, accompany'd with many of the Nobility of France: Whom the Queen entertain'd at Richmond so kindly, that Leicester rag'd, being now quite frustrate of his long hoped-for Marriage. And indeed, a little before, when Astley, one of the Queen's Bed-chamber, covertly commended Leicester unto her for an Husband, she answer'd in a Passion: Dost thou think me so unlike myself, and so unmindful of my Royal Majesty, that I would prefer my Servant, whom I myself have rais'd, before the greatest Princes of Christendom, in my choosing of an Husband?

Much about this time Margaret Douglass, Countess of Lenox, Niece to King Henry VIII. by his eldest Sister, Widow of Matthew Earl of Lenox, and Grandmother to James King of Great Britain, having survived eight Children which she had been Mother of, pass'd to her heavenly Country in her Climacterical Year, and was bury'd at Westminster with a stately Funeral at the Queen's Charges. She was a Matron of singular Piety, Patience and Modesty; who was thrice cast into the Tower, (as I have heard her say herself) not for any crime of Treason, but for Love-matters. First, when Thomas Howard, Son of Thomas Howard the first Duke of Norfolk of that Name, falling in love with her, died in the Tower of London: Then for the love of Henry Lord Darly, her Son, to Mary Queen of Scots: And lastly, for the love of Charles her younger Son, to Elizabeth Candish, Mother to the Lady Arbella, with whom the Queen of Scots was accus'd to have made up the Match, as I have said before.

Now to give a touch of Scottish Matters. About the beginning of this Year, Thomas Randolph was sent by Queen Elizabeth into Scotland to learn in what Condition the Affairs of Scotland stood; to congratulate the King concerning his Proficiency in Learning, (which, by reason of his singular Towardness and most excellent Memory, was certainly very great, even above his Age) and to knit his Mind firmly unto the English, by recounting the Queen's Kindnesses towards him, and the motherly Affection she bare him; to deal with Argyle, that the Hebridian or Wild Scots might not assist the Rebels in Ireland; as also to persuade Morton the Regent to lay aside with all speed his Enmity to Argyle, Athol, and others, lest he got himself the Hatred of the Nobility, and quite alienated the Queen's Mind from him. He was now privately accus'd to have stain'd the Reputation of his former Wisdom and Prowess by his Covetousness and Avarice; and in short time grew into such a general Hatred, that by joint consent of the States, the Government was translated from him to the King, tho' in respect of his Age not so capable thereof, (for he was then scarce twelve Years old) and twelve of the chief of the Nobility named to be assistant to the King with their Counsel, every three Months three of them by turns: Amongst which was Morton himself, that they might seem to lead him down, not to throw him down from his former Dignity.

The King having taken upon him the Government, forthwith by Dunfermelin made a grateful acknowledgment of the Civilities of Queen Elizabeth towards him, as proceeding not so much from nearness of Blood, as from their common Profession of the true Religion. The Confederacy of Edinburgh made between both Kingdoms in the Year 1559, he dur'd might be ratified, the better to restrain the Robberies of the Borderers, and prevent the Designs of the Adversaries of the true Religion; that Justice might be administer'd indifferently between the People of both Kingdoms; that full Restitution might be made of all Goods taken by Piracy; and that his ancient Patrimony in England (that is, the Lands and Possessions granted to Matthew and Margaret his Grandfather and Grandmother) might be put into his Hands as next Heir, for now (the Revenues of the Kingdom of Scotland being much diminish'd) he wanted Money to provide for his Household, and to maintain a Guard answerable to his Royal Dignity.

The first Request the Queen readily granted: But for that concerning his Patrimony, she was not so easily intreated. And yet she would not give ear to those who affirm'd, that the Lady Arbella, Daughter to Charles the King's Uncle, and born in England, was next Heir to the Lands in England: Neither yet would she hear the Ambassador, who shew'd out of former Histories, that the Kings of Scotland, born in Scotland, had in ancient Times succeeded, without any Controversy, by Hereditary Right, to Lands in England in the County of Huntingdon; and earnestly besought her, that she would not deny a Prince, her nearest Kinsman, the Privilege of Citizens, which she had often granted to Foreigners and Strangers. But she commanded the Rents of those Lands to be sequester'd by the Lord Burghly, Master of the Wards; and signify'd to the Ambassador, that the King should satisfy his Grandmother's Creditors out of the Earl of Lenox his Lands in Scotland. For she took it not well that the King, after the death of Charles his Uncle, had revok'd the Infeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox made to his Uncle and his Heirs, and that to the Prejudice (as was suggested) of the Lady Arbella; tho', by the Privilege of the Scots, it was

was still lawful for them to revoke all such Grants and Donations as were Prejudicial to the Realm, and made in their Minority.

The Council of England were of opinion, that the Confederacy of Edinburgh needed no Confirmation, as that which was already firm and in full force. They requir'd the Ambassador to propound somewhat which might at least in part recompense the Queen's Courtesies towards the King, (who had not spared her Englishmens Blood in his Defence) and might confirm the Amity betwixt 'em. Hereupon, according to his Instructions, he propounded that a League might be made, not of Offence, but of Defence, and mutual Assistance against the Bishop of Rome and his Confederates, upon certain Conditions, and against the Invaders of both Kingdoms, and the Rebels thereof upon account of Religion. Over and above this, the English thought it reason, that seeing the Queen neither had omitted nor would omit any thing for the King's Preservation, and for that reason had incur'd the great Displeasure of many, the Estates of the Realm of Scotland should give her Security, that the King should not, during his Minority, make or renew any Confederacy with any other whomsoever, contract Marriage, or be sent any where out of Scotland, without the knowledge of the Queen. But these things, as being Matters of great Importance, were by the Scots put off to another Time, to be exactly and deliberately consider'd of.

Morton resumeth the Government.

The Nobility rise against him.

The death of the Earl of Arbol.

A design of the Pope and Spaniard to invade England.

In the mean while Morton, presuming upon his own Wit, (which certainly was very quick and sharp) and upon his long Experience, and the Number of his Adherents, while he thought nothing to be well done which he did not himself, and could not endure not to be the Man he was, resum'd unto himself the Government, neglecting his Collegues, and slighting the prescrib'd Form of Government. The King he kept in his own power within the Castle of Sterlin, and at his own pleasure either excluded or admitted whom he list'd. Whereupon the Nobility being incens'd, chose the Earl of Arbol for their Head, and made Proclamation in the King's Name, That all that were above Fourteen Years of Age, and under Threescore, should meet together with Weapons, and Victuals for fifteen Days, to set the King at Liberty. And meet they did in great Numbers, and marched with Banners display'd to Fawcirk, where Morton with his Forces appear'd against them. But Sir Robert Poyntz, the English Ambassador, by his Mediation, and proposing of reasonable Conditions, stay'd them from Fighting. And Morton soon after, as if he were weary of publick Employments, withdrew himself to his own House: Not long after which died the Earl of Arbol, not without suspicion of Poison. Which some Men incens'd against Morton laid hold on; amongst other things, as a Means to bring him into Hatred, and ceased not to prosecute him (as we shall shew) till they had quite overthrown him.

In Ireland there happen'd this Year no memorable Matter. But for invading of Ireland and England both at once, and deposing of Queen Elizabeth, who was the strongest Bulwark of the reform'd Religion, both the Spaniard, and Gregory the thirteenth Bishop of Rome, had their secret Consultations and Designs, carrying on their own private Ends under the pretence of restoring Religion. The Pope, that he might get the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Boncompagni, whom he had made Marquis of Vineola: The Spaniard, that he might privately and underhand relieve the Irish Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth had succour'd the Netherlanders; whilst Amity in Words was in the mean while maintain'd on both sides: As also, that he might (if it were possible) by the Pope's Authority possess himself of the Kingdom of England, and thereby the easier reduce the Netherland Confederates into Order; whereof he had no hopes, unless he were Master of the Sea; and this he saw could not be, unless he was first Master of England. And there is no doubt but as he oweth the Kingdoms of Naples, Sicily and Navarre, to the Bounty of the Popes; so would he also very gladly have holden England of him as an Homager.

These two, who knew that the greatest Strength of England consisted in the Navy-Royal and the Merchants Ships, which were both built and furnish'd for Sea-service, thought it good that the Italian and Low-Country Merchants should upon some Pretence or other, hire the greatest part of these Merchants Ships for long Voyages, and while they were abroad, the Navy-Royal should be surpriz'd and overpower'd by a greater Fleet; and that at the same time, Thomas Stukely, an English Fugitive, of whom I have spoken before in the Year 1570, should with a Body of Men join with the Rebels in Ireland. He, like a subtil old Fox, had by his vapouring Brags of himself, and by promising the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope's base Son, wrought himself into such Favour with that ambitious old Man, that he honour'd him with the Titles of Marquis of Lemster, Earl of Wexford and Caterlaugh, Viscount Morough, and Baron of Ros, (which are places of good Note in Ireland) and gave him the command of 800 Italians, levied at the Spaniard's Charge and Pay for the Irish War. With these putting to Sea from Civita Vecchia, he arriv'd at length in Portugal, at the Mouth of the River Tagus or Teyo; where, by the operation of the Divine Providence, these Designs against England and Ireland were disappointed.

For Sebastian King of Portugal, who was to have the principal Command and Managing of this Expedition into England, (since being puff'd up with youthful Heat and Ambition, he had not long before promis'd his utmost Help and Assistance to the Bishop of Rome against the Mahometans and the Protestants) was with great Promises drawn to the War of Africa by Mahomet the Son of Abdalla King of Fez, and dealt with Stukely to accompany him first with those Italians into Mauritania. Stukely was easily perswaded, (and the Spaniard disdaining that the Pope's Son was design'd King of Ireland, was not unwilling to it) and went with Don Sebastian into Mauritania; and in that memorable Battel, wherein three Kings, Sebastian aforesaid, Mahomet and Abdal Melech, were slain, he finish'd the Interlude of a loose Life with an honest Catastrophe or Conclusion.

Had not this fatal End of Don Sebastian diverted the Spaniards Mind from the Invasion of England, to the hopes of the Kingdom of Portugal, a great Storm of War (if any Credit may be given to the English Fugitives) had fallen upon England. For they write, That those vast Forces which the Spaniard had begun to levy in Italy, and were to be poured into England, were employ'd for the Conquest of Portugal. Neither could he be perswaded (being wholly bent upon the Conquest of that Kingdom) so much as once to think of England, tho' the English Fugitives with great importunity urged him thereunto, and the Bishop of Rome promis'd him a consecrated Banner or Cross for this, as for an Holy War. But when certain Intelligence came, that Stukely and his Italians were slain in Mauritania, and that the Spaniard set his Mind upon nothing but Portugal, the English Fleet which waited for 1578. Stukely upon the Coast of Ireland was called home: And Sir William Drury President of Munster, when he had now at several times been Lord-Deputy about eleven Years; and when he was ready to take Ship, he bade Ireland farewell, with that Verse out of the Psalms, When Israel departed out of Egypt, and the House of Jacob from amongst a barbarous People. A singular Man he was, and one of the most commendable Deputies of Ireland, to whose Wisdom and Valour Ireland cannot but acknowledge itself very much indebted, tho' for the most part it uses to complain of its Deputies.

Stukely

1579. The Two and Twentieth Year of her Reign.

John Casimire, Son to Frederick the third Elector-Palatine, who had the last Year (tho' somewhat too late) brought a strong Army of Germans into the Netherlands, at a vast Charge to the States and Queen Elizabeth, and had done no Service with them, being now drawn by the mutinous Inhabitants of Gaunt to take their part, came into England in the Month of January, in a sharp and snowy Winter, to excuse himself about the Miscarriage of his Expedition, laying the whole blame upon the French. He was most honourably received, and conducted with great Pomp into London, with Torches lighted, by the Lord-Mayor, the Aldermen and Citizens, and to the Court by the chief of the Nobility; where he was entertain'd with Tilting, Barriers, and costly Banquets, and honour'd with the Order of St. George, the Queen herself buckling on the Garter about his Leg: And after the settling of a yearly Pension on him, and many rich Presents made him, he return'd in the middle of February into the Netherlands, being transported in one of the Queen's Ships; where he found that mercenary Army disbanded. For when Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, who was by the Spaniards made Governor of the Netherlands, was ready to fall upon the Germans, and they wanted their Pay, after a small Skirmish, and loss of some Men, they demanded Money of him to depart out of the Netherlands. He on the contrary demanding (imperiously, but pleasantly) Money of them, that they might depart safely with their Lives, they were content with his Passport, and made haste Home, not without Dishonour to themselves, and greater Damage to the States. Queen Elizabeth notwithstanding failed not the States, but furnish'd 'em with a great Sum of Money: For which William Davison (who was sent a little before to quiet the Distempers of those of Gaunt, which were violent against Churches and Churchmen) brought into England the ancient Jewels and rich Plate of the House of Burgundy, mortgaged by Matthias of Austria and the States.

In the mean while, Simier ceased not amorously to woo Queen Elizabeth in Anjou's behalf. And altho' she stilly excus'd herself a long time, yet he brought her to that pass, that Leicester, (who from his Heart was against the Marriage) and others, spread Rumours abroad, that by Love-Potions and unlawful Arts he had insinuated into the Queen's Affection, and induc'd her to the love of Anjou. Simier, on the other side, left no Means unessay'd to remove Leicester out of his Place and Favour with the Queen; revealing to her his Marriage with Essex's Widow: Whereat the Queen grew into such a Passion, that she commanded Leicester not to stir out of the Castle of Greenwich, and intended to have committed him to the Tower of London, which his Enemies much desir'd. But Suffex, tho' his greatest and deadliest Adversary, and one that earnestly en-deavour'd to promote the Marriage with Anjou, dissuaded her, whilst out of a solid Judgment, and the innate Generosity of his noble Mind, he was of opinion that no Man was to be troubled for lawful Marriage, which amongst all Men hath ever been had in Honour and Esteem. Yet glad he was that by this Marriage he was now put beside all hope of marrying with the Queen. Nevertheless Leicester was so incens'd hereat, that he bent himself to revenge the Wrong he had receiv'd. And there wanted not some who accus'd him, as if he had suborned one Teuder of the Queen's Guard, a Bravo, to take away Simier's Life. Certainly the Queen commanded by publick Proclamation, that no Man should offer any Affront to Simier, his Attendants or Servants, either by Word or Deed. About this time it happen'd, that while the Queen for her Pleasure was rowed in her Barge upon the Thames near Greenwich, attended by Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hatton her Vice-Chamberlain, a young Man discharged a Piece out of a Boat, and shot one of the Barge-men in the Queen's Barge through both his Arms; who was presently apprehended, and led to the Gallows for a terror to him: But he solemnly protesting that he did it unwittingly, and thought no harm, was soon discharg'd. Neither would the Queen believe what some buzzed in her Ears, that he was purposely set on, to mischief either her or Simier. So far was she from giving way to any Suspicion against her People, that she was many times wont to say, That she could believe nothing of her People which Parents would not believe of their Children.

Some few Days after, the Duke of Anjou himself arriv'd privately in England with one or two only in his company; and came to the Queen unexpectedly at her Court at Greenwich; where they had some private Discourse together, all By-standers being remov'd, which I list not to search into, (for the Secrets of Princes are an inextricable Labyrinth): Which done, he return'd, having been seen but by very few. But after a Month or two, she commanded that Burghley Lord-Treasurer, Suffex, Leicester, Hatton and Walsingham, after serious Consideration of the Dangers and Advantages which might arise from her Marriage with him, should consult with Simier about the Writings and Contract of the Marriage. The Dangers seem'd to be: Left he should attempt any thing against the receiv'd Religion: Left he should either endeavour to get the Possession of the Kingdom for himself by the Pope's Donation, or betray it into the Hands of the Queen of Scots, and marry her after the Queen's death; or else after his Brother's death return into France, and appoint a Viceroy over England, which the English would by no means endure. Moreover; lest he should engage the English in foreign Quarrels: Left the Scots, presuming upon their ancient League with the French, should take greater heart and courage against the English: Left the Spaniards should engage himself against so great and united a Power. And lastly, Left the People, being burden'd with Payments for the Maintenance of his Greatness and State, should break out into Rebellion. The Advantages seem'd to be these: That a firm Agreement would be establish'd with the French: That the Rebellions of the Papists (if any should be) would be the easier suppress'd: That all hopes would be cut off from the Queen of Scots, and from those who fought to her for Marriage, or who any way favour'd her: That the Spaniards would be brought to compound Matters in the Netherlands, and confirm the League of Burgundy: And that England might at length enjoy a sound 1579. a sound and joyful Security, by means of the Queen's Children, a thing so often wish'd for. But if this Marriage should be neglected, they fear'd lest the French would be incens'd, and the Scots alienated: that Anjou would contract a Marriage with the Spaniard's Daughter, with whom he might receive the Netherland Provinces in Dowry: that the French King and the Spaniard would aid the Queen of Scots, draw the King of Scots to their Party, provide him a Wife for their own turn, and utterly abolish the Re-form'd Religion: and that the English, when they saw no Hopes of Children by the Queen, would adore the Rising-Sun. Which things could not but be a great Torment and Anguish to her Mind.

In these days, as some English fear'd an Alteration of Religion by means of the Duke of Anjou; so also did the Scots by means of another Frenchman, viz. Amate or Esme Stuart D'Aubigny, who came about this time into Scotland, to visit the King his Cousin. (For he was Son to John Stuart, Brother to Matthew Earl of Lenox, the King's Grandfather; and was surnam'd D'Aubigny of Aubigny in Berry, which Charles VII. King of France gave in times past, to John Stuart of the House of Lenox; who, being Constable or General of an Army of Scots in France, defeated the English at Beauge, and was afterward slain by them in the Battle of Havrans; and ever since this Title has belong'd to the younger Brothers of that House.) This D'Aubigny the King embrac'd with singular Kindness, gave him very fair Lands and Possessions, admitted him to his inwardest Counsels, made him Chamberlain of Scotland, Captain of the Castle of Dunbriton, and (having first in an Assembly of the Estates formally revoked the Letters-Patents, whereby he had in his Minority created Robert, Bishop of Cathness, his Grandfather's third Brother, Earl of Lenox, and recompens'd the said Robert with the Earldom of March) created him first Earl, then Duke, of Lenox. This extraordinary Favour of his with the King, procur'd him Envy from many, who secretly mutter'd, that he, being a Man most devoted to the Guises and the Romish Religion, was sent into Scotland, to subvert the true Religion. This increas'd the Suspicion, because he apply'd himself to Morton's Adversaries, and made Intercession for calling home Thomas Carre of Ferniburgh, a Man of all others most in the Interest of the Queen of Scots, while Morton in vain oppos'd the same, whose Power now manifestly declined, (tho' he seem'd to have highly merited, as having defeated the Hamiltons, and taken the Castle of Hamilton, and Duffrane.) Some there were who at this time wrought the Hamiltons into great Disfavour with the King; making use of their Name as a Scare-Crow to him, and molesting them in such sort, that for their own necessary Defence, they held those Castles against the King: but they were forced to surrender them, and being convict, by Parliament, of the Murder of the Regents, as well Murray as Lenox, they were proscribed. Of these Hamiltons, some fled into England, for whom Queen Elizabeth earnestly interceded by Erington, as well in point of Honour as of Justice, forasmuch as she in the Year 1573. for establishing Peace, had engaged, that they should not be call'd in question for those Matters, but with her Consent.

Original of the Turkey-Company.

About this time also, through her Intercession, in another part of the World, the Grand Signior Amurath Cham, upon Treaty berwixt William Harbourn an Englishman, and Mustapha Beg a Turkish Bassa, granted that the English Merchants might freely traffick throughout his whole Empire, in like manner as the French, the Venetians, the Polonians, the King of the Germans, and other neighbouring Nations did. Whereupon, they, by the Queen's Authority and Privilege, grew into a Society or Company; which, being call'd the Turkey-Company, have ever since found a very gainful Trade to Constantinople, Angori, Scio, Petraxzo, Alexandria, Egypt, Cyprus, and elsewhere in Asia, for Spices, Cottons, raw Silk, Tapestries, Indian Dye, Grapes of Corinth, or Currants; Soap, &c.

The execrable Impiety of Matthew Hamont, Famous for about this time he openly, at Norwich, pour'd out, against God and his Christ, and is (I hope) extinct with his burning alive, is rather to be bury'd in Oblivion, than to be remember'd. And for my part, I am not of their mind, who think it expedient for the publick Good, that all manner of Villanies, Poisonings, and Impieties, should be made known and publish'd: for he that relates such things, does as good as teach them.

This was the last Year of Sir Nicolas Bacon, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, under which Title he exercis'd and enjoy'd, by an Ordinance of Parliament, the Honour and Authority of Chancellor of England. A Man exceeding gross-body'd, sharp-witted, of singular Wisdom, rare Eloquence, excellent Memory, and the Life, as it were, of the Privy-Council. In whose Room succeeded Thomas Bromley, with the Title of Lord-Chancellor of England.

After Bacon, follow'd Sir Thomas Gresham, Knt. Citizen of London, the Queen's Merchant, Son of Sir Richard Gresham, Knight; who, for an Ornament to his Country, and the Use of Merchants, built a very fair Walking-place in London, which Queen Elizabeth nam'd The Royal-Exchange; and gave a large and spacious House he had in the City, to the Promotion of Learning; founding therein Lectures of Divinity, Civil-Law, Physick, Astronomy, Geometry, Rhetorick, and Musick, with competent Stipends.

In Munster, a Province of Ireland, James Fitz-Morris rais'd a new Rebellion; the same James, who a while before, falling upon his Knees before Perott, President of Munster, had with great Lamentations and humble Intreaties, begg'd his Pardon, and most religiously vow'd his Fidelity and Obedience to the Queen. This Man, I say, (who was never well but in Troubles) had withdrawn himself into France, promising the King, that if he would assist him, he would unite all Ireland to the Scepter of France, and restore the Romish Religion in that Isle. But being weary'd out with Delays, and in the end laugh'd at, he went from France into Spain, and made the same Promises to the Catholick King. The King sent him over to the Pope; from whom having (at the earnest Solicitation of Sanders an English Priest, and Allen an Irish one, both of 'em Doctors in Divinity) gotten a little Money, the Authority of a Legate granted to Sanders, a consecrated Banner, and Letters of Recommendation to the Spaniard, he return'd into Spain, and from thence arriv'd, about the first day of July, with those two Divines, three Ships, and a small Party of Men, at St. Mary Wick (which the Irish contractedly call Smerwick) in Kerry, a Peninsula of Ireland; where, in a place solemnly consecrated by the Priests, he erected a Fort, and drew up his Ships close under it: which Ships Thomas Courtney an English Gentleman, who lay by chance at Anchor with a Man of War, in a Road hard-by, soon after set upon, took and carry'd away, and depriv'd the Spaniards of the Benefit of the Sea. John and James, Brothers to the Earl of Desmond, gathering together a few Irish Irish, join themselves forthwith with their Cousins Fitz-Morris: But the Earl himself, who wish'd well to their Design, gather'd his Friends together, as if he meant to oppose them, having cunningly shifted off the Earl of Clancarty, who was coming to him with a select Body of Men, to assist him against the Enemies and Rebels.

As soon as the Lord-Deputy had certain Intelligence, that the Enemies were landed, he commanded the Earl of Desmond and his Brothers jointly, by Henry Davill, an English Gentleman, and a stout Soldier, and very familiar with the Desmonds, that they should forthwith assault the Fort: Which when they shifted off, and refus'd to do, as a thing full of Danger, Davill departed, and John Desmond follow'd after him. At Trally, a small Town, he overtook him at his Inn, and in the dead of the Night, having corrupted his Host, broke into his Chamber with certain Cut-throats having their Swords drawn, where Davill slept securely with Arthur Carter, Lieutenant to the Marshal of Munster, a stout old Soldier: but being awaken'd with the Noise, when he saw John Desmond in the Chamber with his Sword drawn, he rais'd himself up, saying, What is the matter, my Son? (for so he was wont familiarly to call him) I will be no longer thy Son, (said he) nor shalt thou be my Father: Thou shalt die. And with that they slew both him and Carter that lay with him, stabbing them in many places, after that Davill's Lacquey, by interposing his naked Body, had done the best he could, for a while, to defend his Master, and had receiv'd some Wounds. Then he slew all Davill's Servants, one after another, who were lodg'd here and there in several Chambers; and so returning all begoat'd with Blood, he boasted among the Spaniards, of the Murder: And let this (said he) be a Pledge to you, of my Faithfulness towards you, and the Cause you are engaged in. This Fact Sanders commended, as a sweet Sacrifice in the Sight of God. James Fitz-Morris disliked the Manner of the Murder; and wish'd rather it had been done upon the Way, than in his Bed. The Earl, when he heard it, condemn'd the Fact, detesting it with all his heart.

The Spaniards, when they saw so small a Number of Irish join with them, and those unarm'd and pitiful Fellows, contrary to what Fitz-Morris had promis'd them; began to despair of themselves, and to cry out they were undone, and to bewail their Condition; for they saw no Way to escape either by Sea or Land. Fitz-Morris exhorts them to wait patiently, assuring them that there were great Forces coming to their Aid, and feignedly takes a Journey to St. Croix in Tipperary, under pretence of performing a Vow he had made in Spain; but indeed to gather together seditious Fellows out of Connaught and Ulster.

Whilst he, with a few Horsemen and twelve Footmen, took his Journey through the Lands of William a Burgh his Kinsman, (who in the former Rebellion was engaged with him) his Horses tiring, he took some out of the Plough near the High-way: the Plough-men, making an Out-cry, call together the Neighbourhood, to recover their Horses; amongst whom the Sons of William a Burgh, being courageous young Men, took Horse, and pursu'd him so hard, that they overtook him. Fitz-Morris seeing Theobald a Burgh and his Brethren, who not long since had been Rebels with him, spake to them friendly in this manner, Cousins, (says he) let us not fall out for a Jade or two. I doubt not but, when ye understand the Cause of my Returning into Ireland, ye will join your Party with me. Theobald answer'd, Of our former Rebellion, both myself, my Father and my Friends do greatly repent us: Our Fidelity and Obedience we have sworn to our most gracious Princess, who has pardon'd us our Lives; and to her we will keep our Allegiance. Therefore restore us our Horses, or I will make you restore them. And withal, charging him with his Lance, he ran at him. They fought a while, and Theobald and one of his Brothers, with some of his Party, were slain: and withal, Fitz-Morris himself fell down dead, being run through with a Lance, and shot in the Head with a leaden Bullet; and most of his Men were slain. His Head was cut from his Body, his Body quarter'd, his Quarters set upon Poles at the Gates of Kilmallock, where he had formerly (as I said before) with solemn Protestations, sworn Allegiance to his Prince, in the Church, before Perrott. The Queen, by her Letters mixt with Grief and Love, comforted William a Burgh for the Loss of his Sons, honour'd him with the Title of Baron of Castle-Conell, and gave him a yearly Pension: whereat the old Man being fill'd and overcome with sudden Joy, died shortly after.

Now was Drury Lord-Deputy come near to Kilmallock, and sent for the Earl of Desmond, who appear'd before him, promis'd his Fidelity and Obedience to his Princess, and bound himself by Oath, that both himself in person and his would serve her against the Rebels. Whereupon he was dismiss'd, to gather his Men together, and return to the Lord-Deputy. John Desmond, the Earl's Brother, who was put in Fitz-Morris's Room among the Rebels, by an Ambush surpriz'd and slew Herbert and Prise, two English Captains, with their Companies; and was hurt himself in the Face. But the Companies were made up again, with six hundred Men out of Devonshire: and Perrott was sent out of England with six Men of War, to defend the Coast.

At which time the Lord-Deputy, being daily more and more afflicted with Sicknefs, was fain to retire to Waterford, for Recovery of his Health, and committed both the Managing of the War, and the Presidentship of Munster, to Nicolas Malbey Governor of Connaught, an experienced old Soldier. As he was departing, Desmond's Wife fell upon her Knees, and offer'd him her only Son and Heir in Hostage for his Father. For after he was departed from Kilmallock, he appear'd no more: tho' Malbey now and then by Letters put him in mind of his Duty and Promise. Malbey, supposing it not good to delay any time, marches into Conilo, a wild and woody Country, against the Rebels; where John Desmond encounter'd him in a pitch'd Field, with the Pope's hallow'd Banner display'd: and they fought smartly on both sides. At length, Fortune favouring the Valour of the English, John first betook himself to Flight, and left his Men to the Slaughter; amongst whom was found that Allen the Divine, who had encouraged them to the Engagement, promising them assured Victory.

That Night the Earl of Desmond, who had stood a Spectator from an Hill hard-by, dissimblingly by Letters congratulated the President concerning his Victory, and under pretence of Friendship, advis'd him to remove his Camp from thence. Malbey sent back the Messenger, and by his Letter commanded the Earl to come and join his Forces with his: whom when he had in vain expected the space of Four days, he march'd forward to Rekel, a small Town of Desmond. Now Desmond, who had in Shew and Words, so long and so egregiously play'd the Dissembler, ceases longer to act that Part, and openly discovers his rebellious Spirit. The same Night the Rebels charged Malbey's Camp, in the dark; which notwithstanding they found so strongly fortify'd, that they retired without effect.

 thing any thing. The President, in regard the Place seem'd commodious to divide the Rebels Forces, put a Garrison into it, and march'd from thence towards Asketten, a Castle of the Earl's, upon a Rock, compass'd about with the River Asketten, and kept by a Party of Soldiers. Yet before he would assault the same, he wrote again to Desmond, and exhorted him not to incur the Stain of Rebellion, but to return to his Duty; laying before him, the Queen's Clemency, the ancient Dignity of the House of Desmond, the Glory of his Ancestors, and his own Infamy with Posterity. He on the contrary both continu'd obstinate in his Resolution, and strengthen'd his Camp all the Ways he could, both with the lately-arriv'd Spaniards, and with Irish. At this time, in the beginning of October, Drury the Lord-Deputy died at Waterford; a Man certainly of approv'd Vertue, and bred up in the Wars, from his very Youth, in France, Scotland, and Ireland.

The Lord-Deputy being dead, Malbey's Authority in Munster died also; therefore, putting his Soldiers into Garrison-towns, he retired into Connaught, his own Government. By the Lord-Deputy's death the Rebels take Courage, and consult how to free themselves from their Subjection to the English. The best Course (they thought) was, to block up the Garrisons round on all sides, and so to famish them. James Desmond therefore besieged Adar, where William Stanley and George Carew had their Quarters: but the Garrison fearing Hunger, the worst of all Evils, weary'd the Besiegers with such frequent Sallies, that they broke up the Siege, and left the Besieged at liberty to fetch in Booty out of the Country adjoining; which they valorously and stoutly perform'd, wounding James himself.

In the mean time, the Council of Ireland chose Sir William Pelham for Justicer of Ireland, with the Authority of Lord-Deputy, till a Lord-Deputy should be created; and the Earl of Ormond they made President of Munster, who sent the Earl of Desmond's Son, whom he had in Hostage, to Dublin, to be there kept. Pelham Lord-Justicer went into Munster, and sent for the Earl of Desmond: but he, by Letters sent by his Wife excus'd himself. Ormond therefore was sent to command him to deliver up Sanders the Divine, the foreign Soldiers, and the Castles of Carigo-Foyle and Asketten, into the Lord-Justicer's hands, to submit himself absolutely, and use his Forces against his Brothers and the rest of the Rebels: which if he did, he might obtain Pardon of his Rebellion; otherwise he should be proclaim'd a Traitor and Enemy to his Country. When he still shifted and avoided to do it, he was, in the beginning of November, proclaim'd Traitor and guilty of High-Treason, for having dealt with foreign Princes, for the Conquest and Destruction of his Native Country, reliev'd Sanders and James Fitz-Morris Rebels, harbour'd the Spaniards who escaped out of the Fort at Smerwick, hang'd up divers faithful Subjects, display'd the Pope's Banner against the Q. and brought Foreigners into the Realm. This being proclaim'd, the Lord-Justicer committed the Prosecution of the War to Ormond. Desmond turn'd himself against another part of Munster, surpriz'd and sack'd Youghall, a Port-town strongly fortify'd, where he found no Resistance. Ormond lays all waste far and near, quite through Conilo, the Rebels only Refuge, drives away their Cattle, and gives them for Booty to his Men. The Mayor of Youghall he commanded to be hang'd before his own Door, for refusing to receive in an English Garrison; and puts a Garrison into the Town. Then he prepares to besiege the Spaniards in Sranganicallia: but they had before withdrawn themselves out of Danger; yet the English pursuing them, put them every Man to the Sword, and miserably harass'd the Rebels all over Munster. But Desmond and his Brethren, tho' lurking and hiding their Heads, signify'd to the Lord-Justicer, in a long Letter, that they had undertaken the Protection of the Catholick Faith in Ireland, and that by Authority from the Pope, and Direction of the Catholick King: and therefore they kindly advise him to join with them in so pious and meritorious a Cause, for the Salvation of his own Soul.

The Three and twentieth Year of her Reign.

The Lord-Justicer smiling and jesting hereat, return'd into Munster, assembled the Gentlemen, and wisely kept them with him, not suffering them to depart, but upon Hostages given, and Promise made to do their best Service with him and Ormond against the Rebels: who soon after, dividing their Forces, hunt after the Rebels. The Baron of Lixnaw they force to yield himself; then besiege the Castle of Carigo-Foyle, which Julio an Italian with a few Spaniards defended: and having made a Breach in the Walls, by means of their great Ordnance, they enter'd it by force, and put the Garrison either to the Sword or the Gallows, and with them Julio himself. Then was the Castle of Ballilough fir'd and abandon'd by the Garrison, as soon as they saw the English come on; as was also Asketten, the Keeping whereof was committed to Sir Peter Carew and George his Brother, with a new Garrison of Englishmen. The Territory of Mac-Auley was harass'd: and from thence the Lord-Justicer enter'd into Kerry, over the boggy Hill of Slewlongher, drove away a great Number of Cattle, and slew very many of the Rebels. James Desmond, the Earl's Brother, having spoil'd the little Country of Muskeroy, belonging to Cormac Mac-Teg, (whom the Lord-Justicer had dismiss'd, upon condition he should do his Country good Service against the Rebels) happen'd upon Donell, Cormac's Brother, who put many of his Men to the Sword, recover'd the Booty, took James, who was mortally wounded, and deliver'd him to Warham St. Desmond Leiger, Marshal of Munster, and to Walter Raleigh (who then first had any Command of Forces.) They brought him to his Trial, and, having found him guilty of High-Treason, put him to the usual Death of Traitors, setting up his Head for a Spectacle upon Cork-Gate. Desmond himself being distress'd with all kind of Miseries, and no where safe, shifted from place to place, sent his Wife to the L. Justicer to beg his Pardon, and by his Friends earnestly dealt with Winter, (who then waited for the Spaniards, upon that Coast, with a well-order'd Fleet) that he might be convey'd over into England, to beg the Queen's Mercy.

The Lord-Justicer being now advertis'd, that Arthur Lord Grey, appointed to be Lord-Deputy of Ireland, was arrived in Ireland, committed the Care of the Army in Munster to George Bourchier, Son to John the second Earl of Bath, and return'd himself, by easie Journeys, to Dublin, to deliver up his Charge to his Successor. No sooner was the Lord Grey arriv'd, but, before he had receiv'd the Sword and Ensigns of his Command, hearing that certain Rebels, under the Leading of Fitz-Eustace, and Pheog Mac-Hugh, the Head of the powerful Family of the O-brines, did commit Thefts and Robberies, and had their Refuge in Glandilough, 25 Miles from Dublin Southward, that he might both gain to himself a Reputation, and by a severe Beginning strike a Terror into them, he order'd the Captains and Commanders, which came from all places to salute him, to gather their Forces together, and to march with him him against the Rebels; who presently retired to Glandilough. This Glandilough is a grassy Valley, fit for fatning of Cattle, and a great part of it somewhat wet, beset round about with craggy Rocks and a steep Downfall, and with Trees and Thickets of Wood, the Paths and Cross-ways whereof are scarce known to the Dwellers thereabouts. When they were come to the place, Cosbey, Captain of the Irish light Footmen, (whom they call Kerns) who knew the places perfectly well, acquainted the rest, how dangerous it was to enter into that Valley, being so commodious for Ambushes: yet he persuaded them to venture courageously, and himself, being above threescore Years of Age, led the way before 'em, and the rest follow'd after. As soon as they were descended into the Valley, they were charg'd from the Hedges with small Shot, as it were with a Storm of Hail, by the Rebels from all parts round about, whom yet they could not see. The greatest part of 'em by far were slain; the rest with much ado climbing up the Rocks, through cumberfom and difficult Ways, escaped to the Lord-Deputy, who upon a Hill attended the Success with the Earl of Kildare, and James Wingfield Master of the Ordnance; who, not ignorant of the Danger, stay'd George Carew (one of his Nephews) with him against his Will, being reserv'd for greater Honour. There were slain Peter Carew the younger, George Moore, Audley, and Cosbey himself, Men of great Repute for Martial Affairs.

Within a short time after, arrived at Smerwick in Kerry, about 700 Italians and Spaniards, under the Command of San-Josepho an Italian, sent from the Pope and the Spaniard, under pretence of restoring the Romish Religion, but indeed to distract Queen Elizabeth's Forces, and to divert her Mind from the Affairs of the Low-Countries. They landed without Resistance: for Winter, who had waited for 'em a good while, upon that Coast, with several Men of War, was return'd into England, the Autumnal Equinox being now past. The Enemy strengthen'd the Place with Fortifications, and nam'd it the Fort del Or. But as soon as News was brought 'em, that Ormond, President of Munster, approach'd, they abandon'd the Fort by the Persuasion of the Irish, and withdrew themselves into the Valley of Glaningelly, environ'd with steep Hills and Woods. Some of 'em the President took, who being examin'd of their Number and Intent, confess'd, That they came but 700 strong, but brought Arms sufficient for 5000, and that they expected more Men daily out of Spain. That the Pope and the Spaniard had resolv'd to drive the English out of Ireland, and had sent a great Sum of Money to that purpose, which they had deliver'd into the Hands of Sanders the Pope's Nuntio, the Earl of Desmond, and John his Brother. The same Night the Italians and Spaniards, not knowing which way to turn themselves, (for they were not used to lurking in Holes) return'd in the dark to the Fort; and hard-by 'em encamp'd the Earl of Ormond. But being unprovided of Ordnance and other Necessaries for an Assault, he stay'd for the Lord-Deputy's Coming; who came shortly after, accompany'd by Zouch, Raleigh, Deny, Mackworth, Achin, and other Commanders. At the same time also was Winter return'd out of England, with the Men of War; not without a Check for his departing.

The Lord-Deputy sent a Trumpet to the Fort, to demand who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, who sent them, and why they had built a Fort in Queen Elizabeth's Kingdom, and withal, to command 'em to depart with all speed. They answer'd, they were sent, some from the most Holy Father the Pope, and some from the Catholick King of Spain, to whom the Pope had given Ireland, since Queen Elizabeth had justly forfeited her Title to it, for Heresie. They would therefore hold what they had gotten, and get more also, if they could. When the Lord-Deputy and Winter had consulted together, about the managing of the Siege, the Seamen, in the dead of the Night, brought certain Culverins out of the Ships, and having rais'd a Battery near the Shoar, drew them up the next way, and planted them. The Soldiers in like manner on the other side levell'd their great Pieces for Battery, and both of 'em at once play'd for four days together against the Fort. The Spaniards made one or two Sallies, but to their own Loss. Of the English not one Man was slain, but John Cheek, a comely and courageous young Gentleman, Son to Sir John Cheek, a very learned Knight.

San-Josepho, who had the Command of the Fort, being a faint-hearted Man, and terrify'd with the continual playing of the Ordnance, began presently to think of yielding the Place: and when Hercules Pisannus and other Commanders earnestly dissuaded him from it, as a thing dishonorable to a Soldier, and urged him to prepare for a vigorous Defence, lest they should by their Cowardice discourage the Irish, who were now ready to relieve them; he by his Agents, such was his cowardly Spirit, tamper'd with the common Soldiers, and wrought them to consent to a Surrender, seditiously offering Violence to their Leaders. Hereupon, when they saw no Relief come, either out of Spain, or from Desmond, they hung out a white Flag the Fifth Day, and beat a Parley. Which was deny'd 'em, because they had join'd themselves with the Rebels, with whom it was not lawful to have any Parley. Then they crav'd that they might depart with Bag and Baggage: but neither was this granted. Afterwards it was desired that this might be granted to their General and certain principal Men amongst them: neither would this be allow'd 'em, tho' they sued very earnestly for it. And the Lord-Deputy (inveighing very bitterly against the Pope) commanded them to yield themselves upon Discretion. When they could obtain no other Terms, they set up their white Flag again, and cry'd Misericordia, misericordia, and absolutely submitted themselves to the Lord-Deputy's Mercy: who presently advis'd with his Officers, what should be done with them. But in regard those who yielded, equall'd the English in Number, and some Danger threatned from the Rebels, who were above 1500 strong, hard-by; and the English were so destitute of Victuals and Apparel, that they were like to mutiny, unless they were reliev'd out of the Fort, by the Spoil of the Enemy, and Shipping was wanting to carry the Enemies away; it was concluded, (against the Mind of the Lord-Deputy, who shed Tears at the Determination) that the Commanders should be saved, and the rest promiscuously put to the Sword for a Terror; and that the Irish should be hang'd up: which was presently put in Execution. Yet the Queen wish'd it had not been done, detesting from her Heart such Cruelty, tho' seemingly then necessary, against these Persons who had yielded themselves; and hardly did she allow of the Reasons for the Slaughter committed. Thus much of Matters in Ireland, which I have mention'd all together, that the Series of the Story might not be interrupted, tho' other things fell out in the meanwhile, which in respect of their time should have been mention'd first.

In England, in the beginning of this Year, the Neck-attire, which we call Ruffs, being unreasonably large, and with huge wide Plaits,

Swords also were reduc'd to the length of three Foot, Daggers to twelve Inches besides the Handle, and the Pikes in the Bosse of Bucklers to two Inches. In like manner, in regard that great multitudes of People resorted from all Parts to London, whereby the City and Suburbs were now much enlarg'd with Buildings, (while the rest of the Cities and Towns of England ran to Decay) that unless it were timely prevented, neither the ordinary Magistrates would suffice to govern the Multitude, nor the Countries round about to feed them, and the Contagion of Pestilence, if any should happen, would spread itself farther and more dangerously by means of the Houses standing so thick together, and being pester'd with numbers of Inhabitants; the Q. by Proclamation prohibited any new Dwelling-houses to be built within three Miles of the Gates of the City, upon pain of Imprisonment, and loss of the Materials provided for the Building: And order'd that no more than one Family should dwell in one House.

Mechlin taken. In the Netherlands, Sir John Norris, General of the English Forces, and Oliver Temple, with some Companies of Netherlanders, scaled the Walls of Mechlin, a rich City of Brabant, early one Morning, and, with great slaughter of the Townsmen and religious People, took it; with some Commendation indeed for their Valour, had not they stain'd it with the odious Blur of their Rapine and Sacrilege: For they not only plunder'd the Citizens Goods with all Insolency imaginable, but exercis'd their Rage also against the very Churches, sacred Things and Monuments, offering Violence to the Dead. For we saw (which I am ashamed to speak) several Tomb-stones sent over from thence into England, and openly set to sale, that there might not want Proofs of their Impiety.

Earth-quakes in England. Let it not seem beside the purpose to mention the Earthquakes which happen'd in these Days, seeing they are Things that happen very rarely in England; and those that do, are rather to be call'd Tremblings of the Earth, than violent Shakings. The 6th Day of April, at six of the Clock in the Evening, the Air being clear and calm, England on this side York, and the Netherlands almost as high as Cologne, in a moment as it were, fell a trembling in such a manner, that in some places Stones fell down from Buildings, the Bells in Steeples struck against the Clappers, and the very Sea, which then was very calm, was vehemently toss'd and mov'd to and fro. The Night following the Ground in Kent trembled two or three times; and the like again on the 1st of May, in the dead-time of the Night. Whether this happen'd by means of Winds gotten into the hollow places of the Earth, or of Waters flowing under the Earth, or from any other Cause, let the Natural Philosophers determine: But immediately upon it there ensu'd some Trouble to the Papists in England; yet none but what was caus'd by themselves, upon the following Occasions.

The beginning of the Papists Troubles. The English Priests which had fled into the Netherlands assembl'd themselves at Doway in the Year 1568, by the procurement of William Allen an Oxford-man, the most Learned amongst them, and fram'd themselves a common Discipline after the manner of a College; to whom the Bishop of Rome assign'd a yearly Pension. When afterwards the Troubles in the Netherlands encreas'd, and the English Fugitives were banish'd thence by command of Don Lewis de Requesens, another Seminary was erected at Rheims by the Guises, the Queen of Scots Kinsmen, and another at Rome by Gregory XIII. which as Time consum'd the Popish Priests in England, might still supply new, to sow the Seeds of the Romish Religion in England. Whereupon they were call'd Seminaries; and those that were there bred up in them were commonly call'd Seminary-Priests.

In these Colleges, or Seminaries, (whilst among other things Disputations were held concerning the Ecclesiastical and Temporal Power) Zeal to the Pope their Founder, Hatred against the Queen, and Hope of restoring the Romish Religion by the Queen of Scots, carried some of them so far, that they really perswaded themselves, and so maintain'd, that the Bishop of Rome hath by divine Right full power over the whole World, as well in Ecclesiastical as Temporal Causes; and that he, according to that absolute Power, may excommunicate Kings, and having so done, dethrone 'em, and absolve their Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance. Hereupon was that Bull declaratory of Pius V. publish'd in the Year 1569; and upon that Bull brake forth the Rebellion in the North Parts of England, and this also in Ireland whereof I spake a little before; and many withdrew themselves from the establish'd Worship of God, which before they had frequented without any scruple. Hanse, Nelson and Maine, Priests, and Sherwood, peremptorily taught the Queen was a Schismatick and an Heretick, and therefore to be deposed; for which they were put to death.

Out of these Seminaries were sent forth into divers Parts of England and Ireland at first a few young Men, and afterwards more, as they grew up, who were entred over-hastily into Holy Orders, and instructed in the above-mention'd Principles. They pretended only to administer the Sacraments of the Romish Religion, and to preach to Papists: But the Queen and her Council soon found that they were sent underhand to seduce the Subjects from their Allegiance and Obedience due to their Prince, to oblige them by Reconciliation to perform the Pope's Commands, to stir up intestine Rebellions under the Seal of Confession, and indeed to execute the Sentence of Pius V. against the Queen, to the end that way might be made for the Pope and the Spaniard, who had of late design'd the Conquest of England.

To these Seminaries were sent daily out of England by the Papists, in contempt and despite of the Laws, great numbers of Boys and young Men of all sorts, and admitted into the same, making a Vow to return into England: Others also crept secretly from thence into the Land, and more were daily expected with the Jesuits, who at this time first came into England. Hereupon there came forth a Proclamation in the Month of June, "That whosoever had any Children, Wards, Kinsmen, or other Relations in the Parts beyond the Seas, should after ten Days give in their Names to the Ordinary, and within four Months call them home again; and when they were return'd, should forthwith give notice of the same to the said Ordinary. That they should not directly or indirectly supply such as refus'd to return with any Money. That no Man should entertain in his House, or harbour any Priests sent forth out of the aforesaid Seminaries, or Jesuits, or cherish and relieve them. And that whosoever did to the contrary, should be accounted a favourer of Rebels and seditious Persons, and be proceeded against according to the Laws of the Land."

Before such time as this was proclaim'd the Papists pretended that they were sensible too late of the Inconveniences by the said Bull, and that they

they were ill pleased that ever it came forth. A Defence of the same, written by Nicolas Sanders, they cunningly (as the Event shew'd) suppress'd; and prohibited the Question concerning the Power of the Bishop of Rome in excommunicating and deposing of Princes to be publickly disputed; which notwithstanding (such is the Nature of Man, to be still prone and forward to whatever is forbidden) brake forth every Day hotter and hotter amongst them. Robert Parsons also, and Edmund Campian, Englishmen, and of the Society of Jesuits, being now ready to come over to advance the Romish Affairs in England, obtain'd Power from Gregory the thirteenth Bishop of Rome, for moderating the said Bull, and that in these Words: Let there be humbly prayed of our most holy Lord an Explanation of the Bull declaratory set forth by Pius V. against Elizabeth and her Adherents. Which Bull the Catholics do desire may be understood in this manner: That it may always bind her and the Hereticks, but in no way the Catholics, as matters now stand; but only hereafter, when publick execution of the said Bull may be had. These Graces aforesaid the chief Bishop hath granted to Father Robert Parsons and Edmund Campian, who are now to take their Journey into England the 14th Day of April 1580, in the presence of Father Oliver Manarco, Assistant.

This Parsons was of Somersetshire, a violent fierce-natur'd Man, and of a rough Behaviour. Campian was a Londoner, of a sweet Disposition, and a well-bred Man. Both of 'em were by Education Oxford-men, whom I myself knew, being of their standing in the University. Campian, being of St. John's College, bare the Office of Proctor of the University in the Year 1568; and being made Deacon, made a shew of the Protestant Religion, till he withdrew himself out of England. Parsons was of Balliol College, wherein he openly profess'd the Protestant Religion, until he was for his loose Carriage expell'd with Disgrace, and went over to the Papists. These two coming privately into England, travell'd up and down through the Country, and to Popish Gentlemens Houses, covertly and in the disguised Habits sometimes of Soldiers, sometimes of Gentlemen, sometimes of Ministers of the Word, and sometimes of Apparitors, diligently performing what they had in charge, both by Word and Writing. Parsons, who was constituted Superior, being a Man of a seditious and turbulent Spirit, and armed with a confident Boldness, tamper'd so far with the Papists about deposing the Queen, that some of 'em (I speak upon their own Credit) thought to have deliver'd him into the Magistrate's Hands. Campian, tho' more modest, yet by a written Paper challeng'd the Ministers of the English Church to a Disputation, and publish'd a neat well-penn'd Book in Latin, call'd, Ten Reasons in Defence of the Doctrine of the Church of Rome: And Parsons put out another virulent Book in English against Chark, who had soberly written against Campian's Challenge. But to Campian's Reasons, Whitaker gave a solid Answer. Campian himself was taken a Year after, and put to the Rack; and afterwards being brought forth to dispute, he scarcely answer'd the expectation rais'd of him.

Neither wanted there others also of the Popish Faction (for Religion was grown into Faction) who labour'd Tooth and Nail at Rome, and elsewhere in Princes Courts, to raise War against their own Country: Yea, they publish'd also in print, That the Bishop of Rome and the Spaniard had conspir'd together to conquer England, and expose it for a Spoil and Prey: And this they did of purpose to give Courage to their own Party, and to terrifie others from their Allegiance to their Prince and Country. The Queen being now openly thus assail'd, both by the Arms and cunning Practices of the Bishop of Rome and the Spaniard, set forth a Manifesto, wherein (after acknowledgment of the Goodness of God towards her) she declar'd, That she had attempted nothing against any Prince, but for preservation of her own Kingdom; nor had she invaded the Provinces of any other, tho' she had sundry times been thereunto both provoked by Injuries, and invited by Opportunities. If any Prince go about to attempt ought against her, she doubteth not but to be able (by the blessing of God) to defend her People; and to that purpose, she had muster'd her Forces both by Sea and Land, and had 'em now in readiness against any hostile Invasion. Her faithful Subjects she exhorteth to continue immovable in their Allegiance and Duty towards God, and their Prince the Minister of God. The rest, who had shaken off their Love to their Country, and their Obedience to their Prince, she commandeth to carry themselves modestly and peaceably, and not provoke the severity of Justice against themselves; for she would no longer be so imprudent, as by sparing the bad to prove cruel to herself and her good Subjects.

And not only these perfidious Subjects, but also Foreigners out of Holland, (a Country fruitful of Hereticks) began at this time to trouble the Peace of the Church and Commonwealth of England, who under a shew of singular Integrity and Sanctity, intimated themselves into the Affections of the ignorant common People, and then instill'd into their Minds several damnable Heresies manifestly repugnant to the Christian Faith, using uncouth and strange kind of Expressions, contrary to the Christian Profession, which Men might rather admire than understand. These named themselves of the Family of Love, or House of Charity. They persuaded their Followers, "That those only were elected, and should be saved, who were admitted into that Family, and all the rest Reprobates, and to be damn'd: And that it was lawful for them to deny upon their Oath before a Magistrate whatsoever they pleased, or before any other who was not of their Family. Of this fanatical Vanity they disperfed Books amongst their Followers, translated out of the Dutch Tongue into English, which they entitl'd, The Gospel of the Kingdom; Documental Sentences; The Prophecy of the Spirit of Love; The publishing of Peace upon Earth. The Author H. N. they could by no means be persuaded to reveal; yet was it found afterward to be Henry Nicholas of Leiden, who with a blasphemous Mouth gave out, that he did partake of God, and God of his Humanity. For the timely suppressing of these by Law, the Queen, considering that Religion ought to be the chiefest care of Princes, commanded by Proclamation that the Civil Magistrate should be assitent to the Ecclesiastical, and that the Books should be publickly burnt.

About this time return'd into England, Francis Drake, abounding with great Wealth, and greater Renown, having prosperously sailed round about the World; being, if not the first of all which could challenge this Glory, yet questionless the first but Magellan, whom Death cut off in the midst of his Voyage. This Drake (to relate no more than what I have heard from himself) was born of mean Parentage in Devonshire, and had Francis Russel (afterwards Earl of Bedford) for his Godfather, who, according to the custom, gave him his Christian Name. Whilst he was yet a Child, his Father, embracing the Protestant Doctrine, was call'd in question by the Law of the Six Articles, made by Henry VIII. against the

Henry, he got a Place among the Seamen in the King's Navy, to read Prayers to 'em; and soon after he was ordain'd Deacon, and made Vicar of the Church of Upore upon the River Medway, (the Road where the Fleet usually anchoreth). But by reason of his Poverty, he put his Son to the Master of a Bark, his Neighbour, who held him hard to his Business in the Bark, with which he used to coast along the Shore, and sometimes to carry Merchandize into Zeland and France. The Youth being painful and diligent, so pleased the old Man by his Industry, that being a Batchellor, at his death he bequeath'd the Bark unto him by Will and Testament. Wherewith when he had got together a little Money, and heard that Sir John Hawkins was rigging certain Ships at Plimouth, and purpos'd a Voyage to America, which they call'd the new World, he sold his Bark, and going thither out of Kent with some other stout Seamen, in the Year 1567, he employ'd both his Pains and Fortunes unsuccessfully in that Voyage under Hawkins. For the English (as I have formerly said) being vanquish'd in the Haven of Saint John de Ullua by the Spaniards, he hardly escap'd with the loss of what he had. Five Years after, to wit, in the Year 1572, when he had gotten pretty store of Money by playing the Seaman and the Pirate, he, to lick himself whole of the Damage he had receiv'd of the Spaniards, (which a Divine belonging to the Fleet had easily persuaded him to be lawful) set sail again with a Man of War which was call'd the Dragon, and two Pinnaces, for America, acquainting his Companions only with his Purpose. Nemibre de Dios, a Town in the Isthmus of Darien, he took, and soon after lost it again. Afterwards being advertis'd by certain fugitive Negroes, (Cimarons they call 'em) that there was a great quantity of Gold and Silver to be brought on Mules from Panama, he robb'd 'em by the way, brought the Gold to his Ships, but the Silver, because he could not well carry it over the Mountains he left behind, and some he hid under Ground. Then he fired a rich Store-house of Merchandize upon the River Chirage, called the Cross. And roving for a time up and down in the Parts adjoining, he descry'd from the Mountains the South Sea. Hereupon the Man being inflamed with ambition of Glory and hopes of Wealth, was so vehemently transported with desire to navigate that Sea, that falling down there upon his Knees, he implor'd the Divine Assistance, that he might at some time or other sail thither, and make a perfect Discovery of the same: And hereunto he bound himself with a Vow. From that time forward his Mind was pricked on continually Night and Day to perform his Vow.

Oxenham sailth into America. He being now grown very Rich, and brooding in his Mind privately upon this Design, John Oxenham, who had serv'd under him in his former Voyages, as a Soldier, a Sailor and a Cook, having gotten amongst the Seamen the Name of a Captain for his Valour, and privately scrap'd together good store of Money, to anticipate Drake both in his robbing the Muletters, and in navigating the South Sea, made a Voyage to the same Parts in the Year 1575, with one Ship and 70 Seamen: And consulting with the Negroes, when he understood that the Muletters were now bringing their Treasure from Panama with a Convoy of Soldiers, he drew up his Ship to Land in a private woody corner, and cover'd it with green Boughs which he had cut down; his great Ordnance and Provision of Victuals he buried under Ground; and with all his Men, and six Negroes for Guides, went forward to a River which runneth into the South Sea. There he cut down Trees, and building a Galliot, crossed over to an Island in the South Sea, called, Isla de Perlas, situate not far from the Land. In which Isle having tarried ten Days expecting the coming of Ships from Peru, he took one with sixty Pound weight of Gold, and another with an hundred Pound weight of Silver, and returned to the River with the Ships he had taken. The matter being now noised abroad by the Spaniards whom he had let go, John Ortega a Spaniard with 100 Men pursu'd after him. And whereas the River had three Mouths or Out-lets, he made a stop, doubting which of 'em to follow, till the Feathers of the Fowls which the Englishmen had eaten came swimming down the Stream, and shew'd 'em the way. The Spaniards taking this way, found the Gold amongst the Thickets, and the Englishmen at variance among themselves about dividing their Prey: Who notwithstanding join'd together for their common Safety, and made Head against the Spaniards, tho' far more in Number than they. But many of them were slain, and the rest taken, amongst whom Oxenham himself: Who being carried to Lima, and demanded whether he had the Queen's Authority for entering into the King of Spain's Dominions; when he could shew no such Authority, he was put to death as a Pirate and common Enemy of Mankind, together with the Master of the Ship, and some others; and so miscarried in this great and memorable Adventure.

Drake's second Voyage. Drake, not knowing what Oxenham had done, set sail from Plimouth the 13th Day of December, in the Year 1577, to navigate the South Sea, which still ran in his Mind, and to try his Fortune, with five Ships and 163 Seamen, of whom scarce any knew what he intended to do; which secret carriage in all Expeditions is the safest course. The 25th Day he came against Cantia a Cape of Barbary: And proceeding from thence, he refresh'd himself in the Isle of Mayo, being a pleasant Isle, and abounding with the sweetest Grapes. At St. Jago he took a Portugal Ship laden with Wine; and letting the Seamen go, carried the Vessel away, with Nonnis de Silva the Pilot, who might be of use to him for the Harbours and Watering-places on the Coast of Brazil, which he knew exactly well. From thence he sailed by the Isle of Fuogo, which casteth forth sulphurous Flames; and Brava, near which the Mariners report the Sea to be very deep. And now drawing near the Equator, Drake, being very careful of his Mens Health, let every one of 'em Blood with his own Hands; and there meeting with a great Calm, with much Thunder and Lightning, in almost three Weeks time he got little or nothing forward, and for 55 Days saw no Land, till Brazil presented itself to his view.

On the 26th of April, entering into the Mouth of the River of Plate, he saw an infinite Number of Sea-Calves. From thence sailing into the Haven of St. Julian, he found a Gibbet, set up (as is thought) by Magellan, for the Punishment of certain Mutiners. In this very place, John Doughty, an industrious and stout Man, and the next unto Drake, was called to his Tryal for raising a Mutiny in the Fleet, found Guilty by twelve Men, after the English manner, and condemn'd to death, which he suffer'd undauntedly, being beheaded, having first receiv'd the Holy Communion with Drake. And indeed the most impartial Persons in the Fleet were of opinion, that he had acted seditiously; and that Drake cut him off as an Emulator of his Glory, and one that regarded not so much who he himself excell'd

 Ann. 23. there not some who, pretending to understand things better than others, gave out that Drake had in charge from Leicester to take off Doughty upon any pretence whatsoever, because he had reported abroad, that the Earl of Essex was made away by the cunning Practices of Leicester.

On the 20th Day of August, he came with three Ships (for his two lesser he had before turn'd adrift, shipping the Men and Munition into the rest) to the Strait of Magellan, (as they call it) being a Sea thick set with Islands, and inclosed with high Cliffs or Mountains, the Air being extreme Cold, with Snow and Frost. On the 6th of September, having pass'd the Strait, he en-ter'd into the open South Sea, (which they call the Pacifick or Calm-Sea) but found it rough and turbulent above measure; and a terrible Tempest carried the Fleet about 100 Leagues Westward, and separated them. Here he observ'd an Eclipse of the Moon on the 15th of September, at Six of the Clock in the Afternoon, (which I Note for the Mathematicians sakes). He observ'd also, contrary to what some had written, that that part of the Heaven next to the Southern Pole, was bedeck'd with but few Stars, and those of a smaller Magnitude; and that there were but only three of any remarkable Bigness to be seen in that Hemisphere which England hath not beheld.
 But two small Clouds he observ'd, of the same colour with Via lactea, not far distant from the Pole, which our Men called Magellan's Clouds.

7. Winter
 the first that ever returned thro' the Strait.

Of those Ships that were carried away with the Tempest, one (whereof John Winter was Captain) came back through the Strait, and return'd safe into England, and was the first that ever re-turn'd through the said Strait. Drake himself, being now cast with one only Ship to the 55th Degree of Southern Latitude, having with much ado gotten up to the Latitude of the Strait, coasted along the Shore, and found those Coasts bending much more Eastward than they were before described in the Maps.

On the last of September he came to Mouch, an Island near the Shore; where one or two of his Seamen, whom he had sent out for fresh Water, were intercepted by the People of the Country.
 Setting sail from hence, he lighted upon a Barbarian Fishing in a small Boat, who, supposing our Men to be Spaniards, gave 'em notice, that a great Spanish Ship laden rode at Anchor at Villa Parizo, and directed 'em thither. The Spanish Mariners seeing the Englishmen coming, and supposing 'em to be their own Countrymen, rung
 a Bell, drew Wine of Chili, and drank full Cups to 'em. But they clapping the Ship aboard, thrust the Spaniards presently under Hatches, and sacked the Town of St. Fago hard by, together with the Chapel; the Prey whereof fell to Fletcher, a Sea-Chaplain. The Spaniards being set on Land, who were not above eight in Number with two Negroes) he carried away with him the Master, being by Nation a Grecian, and the Ship, wherein was 400 Pound weight of Baldivian Gold, so called of the Place, which was exceeding fine and pure.

Then went he on Land at Taurapasa, where he found a Spaniard sleeping securely upon the Shore, and by him thirty Bars or Wedges of Silver, to the value of 400000 Ducats; which he commanded to be carried away, not so much as once waking the Man. Afterwards entering into the Haven of Arica, he found there three Ships without Mariners, and in them, besides other Mer-chandizes, 57 Wedges of Silver, every one of which weighed 20 Pounds. From hence he sailed to Lima, where he found twelve Ships riding at Anchor, their Munition being all drawn on Land, and in them good store of Silks, and a Chest full of Money ready coin'd; but not so much as a Boy aboard. So great Security was there on that Coast, that they stood in no fear at all of Pirates, by reason of the great Remoteness of those Places, and the Unknownness of that Sea.

 And certainly never any Man after Magellan, before Drake, had navigated that Sea, except the Spaniards, who built there all the Ships which they had on that Coast. Having sent away these Ships to Sea, with all the sail he could make he gave chase to Cacofoga, a very rich Ship, which he understood had set sail from thence towards Panama. By the way he met a small Brigantine unarm'd, out of which he took fourscore Pounds weight of Gold, a golden Crucifix, some Emeralds of a Finger's length, and some Munition.
 On the first of March he overtook the Cacofoga; and having shot down her Fore-mast with the Shot of a Piece of Ordnance, he set upon her,
 and soon took her; and in her, besides Pearls and Precious Stones, fourscore Pounds weight of Gold, thirteen Chests full of Silver coin'd, and so great a quantity of other Silver, as would suffice to ballast a Ship. All which when he had taken into his own Ship, he let the Cacofoga go:
 The Master whereof is reported to have bidden him thus merrily farewell, saying, We resign the Name of our Ship to yours: Yours now may be call'd
the Cacofoga, that is, Shite-fire; and ours the Cacoplata, that is, Shite-plate. After this he met with no rich Booty. His China Dishes, with an Eagle of Gold, and a fair Negroess, given him for a Present by a Spaniard whose Ship he had spared, and the sacking a small Town call'd Aquatulco, I purposely omit.

Provides
 rich'd, and sufficiently satisfied for the private Injury done him by the Spaniards at the Haven of St John de Ullua, he began to think of returning.
 To return by the Strait of Magellan seem'd very dangerous, both by reason of the frequent Tempests, and the uncertain Shelves and Shallows;
 as also for fear the Spaniards should there lay wait for him against his coming back. And indeed Don Francisco de Toledo, Viceroy of Peru, had sent thither Peter Sarmiento with two Ships to intercept him as he return'd, and to fortifie such narrow Places of the Strait as he found. He held on this Course therefore Northward to the Latitude of 42 Degrees, to discover if there were any Strait on that side, by which he might return the next way home. But when he saw nothing but thick Clouds, sharp Cold, and naked Shores, cover'd only with Snow, he descended to 38 Degrees, and meeting with a Commodious Harbour, staid there a while. The People inhabiting there, were Naked, Pleasantly-disposed, Dancing daily in a Ring, offering Sacrifices,
 and, as it seem'd by the Signs they made, willing to chuse Drake, by a long Oration to be their King: Neither could he conjecture that the Spaniards had ever gone so far. This Country, being a fruitful Soil, and very full of Deer and Conies, it pleas'd him to name New Albion, setting up an Inscription upon a Post, which notified the Year of our Lord, the Name of Queen Elizabeth, and their arrival there; and putting under it some of Queen Elizabeth's Coin.

Comes to the Moluccas.

From this Coast he set sail and came in the Month of November to the Isles of the Moluccas, being kindly entertain'd by the King of the Isle of Ternate. From thence sailing forward in that Sea

1580. Sea thick bespread with Isles and Rocks, on the 9th of January his Ship struck upon a Rock which was hid under Water, and there stuck for the space of 27 Hours, and was given for lost by all the Company, who now fell devoutly to their Prayers, as if they should assuredly be cast away with all the Wealth which they had gotten with so great Labour and Hazard. But when they had laid their Hands to work, and thrown eight great Guns and some Merchandize over into the Sea, there came a bearing Gale of Wind on the one side, as if it were sent from Heaven, and clear'd the Ship of the Rock. Afterwards he arriv'd at Java Major, which was then grievously afflicted with the French Disease, which they cure by sitting in the open Air against the warm Sun to dry up that malignant Humour: where having receiv'd great Civility at the Hands of that petty King, he held on his Course to the Cape of Good Hope; which the English Mariners, who had never seen it before, commended for the fairest Promontory they ever saw. On the West-side thereof he landed for fresh Water, but could find no Spring. And now he had been distressed for lack of fresh Water, had he not providentially kept Rain-water before-hand in Vessels. But this Want he supplied at length at Riogrande. From whence he return'd with a prosperous Gale into England the 3d of November, in the Year 1580, arriving at the Haven of Plimouth, from whence he first set forth, having sailed round about the World in the space of three Years, or thereabouts, to the great Admiration of all Men, and without any Crime laid to his charge by his Adversaries, but only that he had put Doughty to death, that he had left a Portuguese, whom he had taken upon the Coast of Africa, to the Cruelty of the Spaniards at Aquasulco, and had inhumanely set that Negro-Maid before-mention'd on shore in an Island, after she was gotten with Child in his Ship.

The Queen receiv'd him graciously, and laid up the Treasure he brought by way of Sequestration, that it might be forth-coming if the Spaniard should demand it. His Ship she caused to be drawn up in a little Creek near Deptford upon the Thames, as a Monument of his so lucky sailing round the World, (where the Carkas thereof is to be seen). And having as it were consecrated it for a Memorial with great Ceremony, she was Banquetted in it, and confer'd on Drake the Honour of Knighthood. At this time a Bridge of Planks by which they came aboard the Ship, sunk under the crowd of People, and fell down with an hundred Men upon it, who notwithstanding had none of them any Harm. So as that Ship may seem to have been built under a lucky Planet.

In praise of Drake these Verses, amongst others, were set up the same Day upon the Main-mast, written by the Scholars of Winchester-School.

Verses in his praise. Plus ultra, Herculeis inscribas, Drace, Columnis, Et, Magno, dicas, Hercule major ero.

Digna Ratis quæ stet radiantibus inclita Stellis; Supremo Cæli Vertice digna Ratis.

Amongst the radiant Stars to stand Thy Ship well worthy were; Well worthy on the highest top Of Heav'n a place to bear.

But these Things may seem too light, and to proceed from an idle Brain, and not befitting the Gravity of an History.

Drake being now return'd, nothing troubled him more than that some of the chief Men at Court refus'd to accept the Gold which he offer'd them, as gotten by Piracy. Nevertheless the common sort of People admired and highly commended him, as judging it no less Honourable to have enlarg'd the Bounds of the English Name and Glory, than of their Empire.

Don Bernardino de Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador in England, storming hereat, very earnestly demanded the Goods again of the Queen, complaining of the English for failing in the Indian Ocean. To whom this Answer was given: That the Spaniards by their hard Dealing with the English, whom they had prohibited Commerce, contrary to the Law of Nations, had drawn these Mischiefs upon themselves. That Drake should be forth-coming, to answer according to Law, if he were convicted by good Evidence and Testimony to have committed any thing against Law and Right. That those Goods were laid by purposely that Satisfaction might be made to the Spaniard, tho' the Queen had spent a greater sum of Money than Drake had brought in, against those Rebels whom the Spaniard had rais'd and encourag'd against her both in Ireland and England. Moreover, she understood not why her or any other Prince's Subjects should be debar'd from the Indies, which she could not persuade herself the Spaniard had any just Title to by the Bishop of Rome's Donation, (in whom she acknowledg'd no Prerogative, much less Authority, in such cases, so as to lay any Tie upon Princes which could him no Obedience or Observance, or as it were to infeeble the Spaniard in that new World, and invest him with the possession thereof) nor yet by any other Claim, than as they had touch'd here and there upon the Coasts, built Cottages, and given Names to a River or a Cape; which things cannot entitle them to a Propriety. So that this Donation of that which is another Man's, which is of no validity in Law; and this imaginary Propriety, cannot hinder other Princes from trading into those Countries, and, without breach of the Law of Nations, from transporting Colonies into those Parts thereof where the Spaniards inhabit not, (forasmuch as Prescription without Possession is little worth) neither from freely navigating that vast Ocean, seeing the use of the Sea and Air is common to all. Neither can a Title to the Ocean belong to any People or private Persons; forasmuch as neither Nature nor publick Use and Custom permiteth any possession thereof.

Notwithstanding all this, a great sum of Money was afterwards paid to Pedro Sebur a Spaniard, (who pretended himself an Agent for retrieving the Gold and Silver, tho' he had no Letters of Credence or Commission so to do) which he never repaid to the right Owners, but employ'd it against the Queen, and converted it to the Pay of the Spaniards that serv'd in the Netherlands, as was at length, when 'twas too late, understood.

Whilst

1580. Whilst Drake was thus prosperously sailing round about the World, Jackman and Pett, two famous Pilots, being set out by the Londoners with two Ships, fought as unprosperously to discover a nearer way to the East-Indies by the Cronian or Frozen Sea. For having passed a few Leagues beyond the Isles call'd Waigatz, they met with such uncertain Tides, so many Shelves, and such Heaps of Ice piled together, that they could get no farther forward, and very much ado they had to return home.

The death of the Earl of Arundel, who first brought the use of Coaches into Engl. About the beginning of this Year, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel render'd his Soul to God, in whom was extinct the Surname of this most noble Family, which had flourish'd with great Honour for 300 Years and more, from the time of Richard Fitz-Allen, who being descended from the Albeneys, ancient Earls of Arundel and Suffex, in the Reign of Edward I. receiv'd the Title of Earl without any Creation, in regard of his being possessor of the Castle and Lordship of Arundel. This Henry, enjoying many Honours, was of the Privy-Council to all the Kings under whom he liv'd, and went through the highest Offices. Under Henry VIII. he was Governor of Calais, Marshal of the Army at the Siege of Boulogne, and Lord-Chamberlain. To K. Edward VI. he was Lord-High-Marshal of England at his Coronation. To Q. Mary likewise at her Coronation he was Lord-High-Constable, and afterward Steward of the Queen's Household, and President of the Queen's Council. And to Q. Elizabeth he was likewise Steward of her Household, with whom he fought to marry in his declining Years. He was in less favour after he had intermeddled in the Duke of Norfolk's Business, and when he afterwards openly oppos'd her Marriage with the Duke of Anjou. For, being a plain-dealing Man, he profess'd flatly, that he liked not the French, saying many times, That he had been taught by his Father, who was born in Suffex, a County neighbouring upon France, not to trust the French. By his Wife Katharine, Daughter to Thomas Grey Marquis of Dorset, he had three Children, and out-liv'd 'em all: Henry, a young Gentleman of great hopes, who died at Brussels; Joan, Wife to the L. Lumly; and Mary, married to Thomas Duke of Norfolk, to whom she bare Philip Earl of Arundel, of whom in his proper place.

L. Grey suppresses the Rebels in Ireland. Crusheth a Conspiracy. Nogen executed. Innocency a true Comfort. Arthur L. Grey, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, marching against the O-Conors, who attempted to raise new Troubles in Ophalie, put O-Moloy, a seditious-minded Man, to death by Law, quieted that Country, as also the Country of the Magobigans and O-Carol, and crush'd a dangerous Conspiracy in the very bud. For divers of noble Families in Leinster, most of 'em descended of English Blood, partly out of Affection to the Romish Religion, and partly out of Hatred against the new-come English, (who many times, contrary to the intent of the Law, excluded 'em as mere Irish from Offices of Government and Magistracy) had conspir'd together to seize on the Lord-Deputy with his Household, to take the Castle of Dublin by surprize, (where all the Provision for War lay) and to put the English in Ireland every Man to the Sword: And so close they were in carrying on their Conspiracy, that they never confer'd or discours'd about it more than two and two together. But amongst so many who were privy to it, it came at last to light, and was by the Execution of a few timely extinguish'd: The most remarkable of whom was J. Nogen, Baron of the Exchequer, a Man of a singular good Life and Reputation, who was merely circumvented (as the Irish report) by the Cunning of his Adversaries. He, relying upon the conscience of his own Innocency, when the Lord-Deputy faithfully promis'd him his Life if he would confess himself guilty, chose rather, being guiltless, to undergo an infamous Death, than by betraying his own Innocency to lead an infamous Life. Howsoever the truth were in this matter, certainly the Lord Grey incur'd great Displeasure with the Queen for putting these Men to death; which Displeasure was rais'd against him by Suffex his Adversary, (for rare it is to see great Captains love one another) who suggested as if by his Cruelty of late towards the Spaniards which had yielded themselves, and now towards her own Subjects, he had both eclips'd his Prince's Glory, and encreas'd the number of her Enemies. Nevertheless the Lord-Deputy by the terror hereof drew Turlogh-Leinigh to terms of Peace, who had now begun to raise Disturbances in Ulster. By this means also the O-Brines, the O-Moors and Cavenaghs, Rebels in Leinster, in all Humility and Submission craved Peace, offering Hostages. These Irish matters, tho' in time somewhat distantly acted, I have thought good to mention together, that they might the better be remember'd.

The Scots envy the Duke of Lenox. They accuse him in Engl. In Scotland, some Ministers of God's Word and certain Noblemen, observing that the Duke of Lenox, formerly mention'd, was in great Favour with the King, they first rais'd an Emulation in James Stuart of the House of Ochiltrey against him, who was Captain of the Guard and Earl of Arran, (for this Title he had usurp'd upon I know not what Resignation of James Hamilton E. of Arran, to whom being Lunatick he was appointed Guardian). But the Queen soon made 'em Friends again. When this succeeded not, they both wrought him what Hatred they could at home, and heavily Accus'd him to the Q. of England, as sent under-hand by the Guises to subvert Religion, to procure the captive Queen's Liberty, and to dissolve the Amity betwixt the Kingdoms of England and Scotland. These Men were easily credited, and a serious Consultation was held in England about the matter; tho' the Duke clear'd himself by his Letters to the Queen, and openly profess'd himself of the Protestant Religion.

Consultation against him. Rumours scatter'd to his prejudice. For the Council of England fearing lest he should oppress those Scots that maintain'd close Friendship with the English, favour Excursions upon the Borders, and entice the King of Scots to a Marriage in France or elsewhere, unknown to the English. Upon the confidence of which Marriage the young King might put England to Trouble, and when he came to riper Years, assume to himself the Title of the Kingdom of England, as his Mother had already done. Which if it should come to pass, greater Danger threatned from him than from his Mother; forasmuch as being born to an assured hope of both Kingdoms, he would procure himself many Favourers; and the Scots, being bred up in the Wars both at home and in the Netherlands, were now train'd up to the use of their Arms and Military Knowledge. Hereupon it was resolv'd, by all means to lessen Lenox's Favour and Authority with the King, or to drive him out of Scotland, and that without all delay: Forasmuch as Rumours were spread abroad, that he, to suppress Morton, had sent for Balfour out of France, (who had gotten I know not what Writing under Morton's Hand, whereby it was hop'd that Morton might be found guilty of the Murder of the King's Father) and also had obtain'd the Government of the Castle of Dunbri-ton, to no other intent but to let in forein Forces into Britain, or else to convey the King of Scots into France. It was reported also, that he persuaded the King to resign the Kingdom to his Mother, as if she had been unjustly, and by a very bad and dangerous Precedent, depos'd by her her Subjects, upon promise by her given, that he should immediately receive it back again from her by a lawful Resignation; by which means he should both strongly confirm the Kingdom to himself, and should be acknowledg'd of all Men for lawful King, and all Factions be utterly extinguish'd.

Sir Robert Bowes sent to accuse him.

Hereupon Sir Robert Bowes, Treasurer of the Garison of Berwick, was sent into Scotland to charge Lenox with these Matters before the King and Council, and to warn the King of the Mischiefs hanging over his Head. As soon as he came to Audience, he desir'd that Lenox might for the time withdraw from the place. This the Council flatly denied, for that it was a strange and unheard-of thing, that a Counsellor of the King should be remov'd from the Council without cause shewn. They question'd also whether he had any such express charge from the Queen, and willed him to shew his Instructions for the more credit. He refus'd to shew them to any but the King, and one or two others. Whereupon he was soon after call'd home again without being heard, and took his leave of the King when he little expected it, complaining of the rejecting the wholsom Admonitions and Advices of a Queen who had so well deserv'd of him.

Scots excuse themselves. Their Ambassador not admitted.

Shortly after, Alexander Humes was sent from Scotland to excuse the business, and to learn what those Mischiefs were which hung over the King's Head. But he was not admitted to the Queen's Prefence, but remitted to Burghly Lord-Treasurer, who in a grave and short Speech, suitable to his Age, told him, That it was not the Queen's pleasure to admit him to her Prefence; not that she slighted him, whom she had found to be very well affected to the true Religion, his Prince and Country, and to the Peace of both Kingdoms; but out of a just Resentment that her Majesty was so neglected, and the Credit of her Ambassador contemn'd and despis'd, who had kept himself within the prescrib'd Limits of his Embassy, and yet (which was a thing without example) was commanded to shew the Instructions of his Embassy. He laid all the blame upon the new and ill-advised Counsellors, excused the King by reason of his Age, which had not yet taught him Experience, and wished that he would hearken to the sound and wholsom Advice of the Queen, who bare a true motherly Affection towards him, and not neglect her for his French Cousin, a Subject of the French King's, and engag'd in Marriage with a French Woman, a Man zealously addicted to the Popish Religion, and who haply aspir'd (the Hamiltons being now banish'd) to be declar'd Heir-apparent next after the King. Let the King remember (saith he) that there is no Passion more violent than Ambition; and let the Scots remember what Troubles the French had caused in Scotland, had not the Queen by her Wisdom and Power prevented 'em.

Thus was Humes sent back into Scotland; and all this was done on purpose to strike a Terror into the King, and to make him believe that Lenox was engag'd in a dangerous Design against the King and Realm. Nevertheless, not long after, Morton, a Man most addicted to the English, was accus'd by Arran of Treason, and cast into Prison.

Morton, & against Lenox.

Hereupon, Mr. Thomas Randolph, chief Post-Master, was sent in the beginning of January, into Scotland, with Instructions, that, for Preservation of Religion, and Amity with the English, he should leave no means untry'd to procure that no violent Course might be taken against Morton, that Lenox might be removed out of Scotland, and that the Noblemen of the English Party might be encouraged. Randolph shew'd himself a good Intercessor for Morton, alledging the Man's Deserts with the King, Queen Elizabeth's Honour, (lest she, to whom the King and Realm was so much beholden, should suffer a Repulse in so just a matter) and the Malice of his Accusers. The King answer'd, That he could not but according to his Kingly Office leave the Man to his Trial, as being charged with High-Treason. The Queen's approved Kindness he acknowledg'd, and would do nothing (he said) which might any way give her just Offence.

Randolph having afterwards Audience in an Assembly of the States, reckon'd up Queen Elizabeth's Good Offices towards Scotland, and towards the King himself. Namely, 'That she had deliver'd their Kingdom from the French, with the Expence of the Blood of Englishmen: 'That she had defended their Religion and their King: That she never had so much as a Thought of conveying him out of the Land, (as was falsely reported) or of seizing upon so much as an Acre of Land in Scotland; whereas notwithstanding she had not wanted Opportunities to have conquer'd all Scotland, while the King lay crying in his Cradle, his Mother was a Prisoner in England, and the Nobility at Variance amongst themselves. But on the contrary, she had used all Care to preserve the King and his Kingdom in Safety, he being nearly ally'd to her in the strictest Bands of Blood, Neighbourhood, and Religion; of whose Love, as also of the Love of all the Regents, she was most assured, till such time as that Aubigny Duke of Lenox came into Scotland. For from that time he had carry'd a kind of commanding hand over the King, averted his Mind from Amity with the English to the French, (who yet had not to this day acknowledg'd him for King) removed the King's faithfullest Subjects, prefer'd others less faithful, dealt with Foreigners by his Letters (which Randolph produced) for the Invasion of England, stirr'd up the King to hate the Ministers of God's Word, as turbulent and railing Fellows, and taken no care for due administration of Justice betwixt the Borderers. Which things Queen Elizabeth could not but take very ill, when she saw a Prince of so great Vertue, and so strictly link'd to her in Friendship, alienated and estranged from her by cunning Practices. Yet was there nothing then done, either for Morton, or against Lenox, most Men suspecting that the Crimes alledg'd against him were false, and the Letters counterfeit.

Randolph therefore betook himself to other Artifices. Amongst Lenox's Adversaries and Morton's Friends, he bewails the unhappy Condition of Scotland; lays before 'em the Dangers that threaten the King, the Commonwealth, and them; complains that the Queen of England's Intercession was ungratefully slighted; and privily advises 'em to attempt by Arms, what they could not effect by other means, promising both Men and Money out of England. And by this means he had drawn to his Party Argyle, Montrose, Angus, Morton's Brother's Son, Marre, Glencarne, Ruthuen, Lindsey, and divers others. But they shortly after disagreeing among themselves, when they saw that the King wholly inclin'd to favour Lenox, and was not terrify'd with the English Forces upon the Borders, but had drawn up his own against them; most of them, reverencing the Royal Majesty, even in so young a Prince, attempted nothing against Lenox, and thought their Pity was all that Morton could claim. Yet Angus and Marre continued their secret Designs with Randolph for Morton, and against Lenox. Whereof when the King was advertis'd by Wittingham, Angus was commanded to withdraw himself beyond the River Spey, and Marre forthwith to surrender Sterlin-Castle into the King's Hands. Randolph, fearing the worst, retired secretly to Berwick, advis'd Angus and Marre, Matters being now grown desperate, to shift for themselves, either by procuring the King's Favour, or flying to the Protection of the Queen of England. And now were the English Forces call'd home from the Borders: and not long after was Morton found accessary to the Murder of the King's Father, and beheaded. For he confess'd, (as they report) that Bothwell and Archibald Douglass, acquainted him with the Plot for making away the King; and that he in so dangerous a time durst not reveal it. Neither could he deny, but that, after the Murder was committed, he esteem'd Douglass, who murder'd the King, amongst his intimate Friends; and that he had given his Faith under his hand, to defend Bothwell, if any Man should accuse him of the Murder of the King. 1581. Ann. 24. Angus and the rest who favour'd Morton, fled presently into England.

In the Low-Country-Provinces the Confederate States sent Colonel Norris with the English and other Forces, against the Count of Reneberg, who victoriously carry'd all before him for the Spaniard, and closely block'd up Steenwick, a Town of Friesland. When Norris gallantly and successfully brought Provisions into the Town twice, put Reneberg's Men to Flight, and rais'd the Siege. But afterwards joining Battle with Verdugo a Spaniard at Northorn, when the Victory was now as good as in his Hands, the Enemy's Troops being defeated by Sir Roger Williams, the Chance of War suddenly turn'd, he himself was wounded, and many of his Men slain; and amongst them (not to name others) Cotton, Fitz-Williams, and Bishop, stout Captains. How Captain Thomas, a Captain of the Epirots, at this time challenged General Norris to a single Combat, and Sir Roger Williams, his Lieutenant, accepted the Challenge, (because he, being General, might not accept it, by the Law of Arms) I know not whether it be worth the mentioning, considering that after they had try'd their Skill a little while, in the View of both Armies, and neither of them receiv'd a Wound, they drank a hearty Cup together, and so parted Friends. Yet this is not to be omitted, that the English, who of all the Northern Nations, had been till now the moderatest Drinkers, and most commended for their Sobriety, learn'd in these Netherland-Wars, first to drown themselves with immoderate Drinking, and by drinking others Healths to impair their own. And ever since, the Vice of Drunkenness has so diffus'd itself over the whole Nation, that in our days first, it was fain to be restrain'd by severe Laws.

While the States and the Spaniard contended in the Netherlands for petty Towns, the Spaniard seiz'd into his Hands the rich Kingdom of Portugal. For Henry King of Portugal dying the last Year an old Man, many Competitors laid Claim to the Crown, and amongst them Philip King of Spain, King Henry's eldest Sister's Son, who was, if not in Right, yet in Might the strongest. And yet he wanted not some Shew of Right: for of all the Competitors, he was nearest of kin to the deceased King, and of the Male Sex, and therefore (as he and his Friends thought) to be prefer'd in the Succession to the Crown, before the Females, who were both younger, and in Kindred more remote. The Savoyard was excluded, because he was born of the younger Sister; and Raimutio Farnuze, the Prince of Parma's Son, who was born of the eldest Daughter of Edward King Henry's Brother, and Catharina Duchess of Braganza, the other Daughter of the said Edward, because they grounded their Title only upon a Representation, as they call it; which being nothing but a Fiction, the Spaniards maintain'd, that it could not overthrow the true Right. As for Don Antonio, Prior of Crato, the Son of Lewis another Brother of King Henry, he was utterly rejected as illegitimate. However, the Spaniard offer'd these things several times to be discuss'd, both by Divines and Lawyers. And when they all with one Consent affirm'd his Title to be good, he sent the Duke of Alva, invaded the Kingdom, put Don Antonio to Flight, who was elected by the People; and in seventy days subdued all Portugal. But the Title which Katharine de Medicis Queen of France laid to Portugal, which was derived from Alphonso III. by the Earls of Bononia, above 320 Years before, was in a manner exploded both by the Spaniards and Portuguese, as an antiquated Title, not only now worn out, but injurious to as many Kings of Portugal, as had since reign'd; as if they had unjustly possess'd the Crown. Whereat being moved with Anger, and looking with a jealous Eye upon the growing Power of the Spaniard, which was far and wide extended hereby, and enrich'd with the Addition of Portugal, East-India, and many Isles, and mis-doubting the Condition of herself and her Posterity, she advis'd both other Princes and Queen Elizabeth, to curb his Ambition betimes, and restrain his too extensive Power within some reasonable Limits. And indeed Queen Elizabeth being carefully provident for herself and her Subjects, willingly hearkned to her, foreseeing how dangerous the over-swelling Power of her neighbouring Princes might be. But for Don Antonio, who was driven out of Portugal into France, and from thence sent over with Recommendations into England, she bountifully reliev'd him: which she thought she might do without Offence, in regard she acknowledg'd him her Kinsman, as descended of the Blood-Royal of England, and of the House of Lancaster; neither was there ever such a Proviso put into any League betwixt the Spaniards and the English, that the Portuguese should not be receiv'd into England.

And withal, the said Queen of France, and the King her Son, for a Foundation of a stricter Amity with Queen Elizabeth, urged more earnestly than ever before, the Marriage with her Son the Duke of Anjou. For the effecting whereof, there were sent into England, on a very honourable Embassy, Francis of Bourbon Prince of Dauphiny, Arthur Cesse Earl of Segondin, Marshal of France, Lewis of Lusignan of St. Gelasse, Seigneur of Lansac, Tanerge Venator of Corconge, Bertrand Salignac a Mota-Fenellon, Michael a Chasteau-neuf Seigneur Mauvaisier, Bernard Brissonius a Grenela President of the Parliament of Paris, (a Man of most excellent Learning) Claudius Pinarte first Baron of Valois, Pierre Claude Seigneur of Curats and Marchemont, and Jaques Vray Secretary of the Duke of Anjou's Treasury. These Honourable Persons were as honourably entertain'd, being nobly banquetted in a large Edifice built at Westminster, in all Haste, for this very purpose, richly and royally furnish'd; and after entertain'd with Tiltings, perform'd at a vast Expence by Philip Earl of Arundel, Frederick Lord Windsor, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil, who challenged all Comers: besides many other Courtly Sports and Pastimes, which are not so proper for an Historian to relate.

The Commissioners appointed to confer with them about the Marriage, were William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Lord High-Treasurer of England, Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln, Lord Admiral of England, Thomas Ratcliffe Earl of Sussex, Francis Russell Earl of Bedford, Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary. Betwixt these Commissioners Articles of Marriage were agreed upon to the following purpose.

'The Duke of Anjou and the Queen of England shall, within Six Weeks after the ratifying of these Articles, contract Marriage de presenti in England. The Duke and his Retinue, provided they be not Native Subjects of England, may freely exercise their Religion, in some certain place to be appointed within his Court, without Lett or Hindrance. He shall alter nothing in the Religion now receiv'd in England. After the Marriage consummated, he shall enjoy the Title and Honour of King, but shall leave the Management of Affairs wholly and solely to the Queen. Whereas he has demand'd, that presently after the Marriage he may be crown'd King, and enjoy that Honour, as well

1581. well while the Marriage lasts, as when it shall
 Ann. 24. be dissolv'd, during his Government of the Kingdom in the Minority of their Children;
 the Queen promises to communicate his Demand to the Estates of the Realm in the first Parliament, which she will call within fifteen days after the Ratification, and to promote it as far as shall lie in her Power. Letters Patents, &c. shall run in both their Names, as in the time of Philip and Mary. The Queen shall assign the Duke a yearly Pension, by Authority of Parliament; but how large it shall be, shall be left to her Pleasure; and she shall procure the Parliament to assign him a considerable Sum of Money yearly, if he survive the Queen.
 He shall make the Queen a Dowry to the yearly Value of 40000 Crowns de Soleil, out of his Dukedom of Berry, and shall presently put her in Possession thereof. What shall be concluded concerning their Children, in the Parliament of England, shall be ratified and confirm'd in the Parliaments of France, to this effect. The Males or Females shall succeed their Mother in the Inheritance of England. If there be two Males, the eldest shall succeed in the Kingdom of France, and the second in his Mother's Right to England. If there be but one Male, and he come to enjoy both Crowns, he shall reside in England eight Months in every two Years.
 And if the Duke never come to the Title of King of France, their Children shall succeed in his Appenage. If he out-live the Queen, he shall have the Guardianship of the Children;
 provided the Males be not above eighteen Years of Age, and the Females fifteen. If the Duke die before, their Guardianship shall be left to the Authority and Pleasure of the Parliament.
 The Duke shall prefer no Foreiner to any Office in England. He shall alter nothing in the Law, but shall maintain all the Customs of the Land. He shall not convey the Queen nor her Children out of the Realm of England, but by her own Consent, and the Consent of the Peers of the Realm. If the Queen die without Children, the Duke shall claim no Propriety in the Kingdom of England. He shall not transport the Crown-Jewels out of the Realm. He shall leave all the Places in the Kingdom in the Hands of Native Englishmen; neither shall he remove from thence any Warlike Stores. He shall not engage England in any forein War. He shall maintain the Peace betwixt England and other Kingdoms. The Queen alone shall bear the Superiority, and no Title shall accrue to the Duke as Tenant by the Custom of England. The Duke intends not by this Marriage to prejudice his Title in the Succession to the Crown of France. This present Contract shall be read, proclaim'd, and recorded in all the Courts of France and England, six Months after the Day of Marriage; and the Authority of the most Christian King shall be had for the Ratification of these Articles. There shall be a particular Treaty concerning a Confederacy and League betwixt England and France. All these things shall be ratified within two Months on the French King's part, upon his Faith and Oath, for him and his Heirs, &c. and as soon as may be he shall deliver Writings of Ratification, by which Assurance shall be given, that the things here concluded shall be observ'd bond fide.
 A Reservation also was added apart by itself,
 sign'd with the Hands of all the Commissioners, in these Words; 'But Queen Elizabeth is not bound to consummate the Marriage, till she and the Duke shall thoroughly satisfy one another in certain Points, and shall thereof certify the French K. in Writing, within six Weeks.

Before such time as those six Weeks were expired, John Somers, Clerk of the Council, was sent into France, about this matter. The King refuses to hear him, and presses that the Marriage already contracted may be solemniz'd out of hand, for that now there remain'd nothing else to be done. Somers shews to the contrary, by the Writings, that there was first a League defensive and offensive to be enter'd into. The French King denies it. Walsingham is dispatch'd to make up these Differences, who jointly with Henry Lord Cobham, Ambassador in France, and Somers, was to inform him of these things following, and some others of like nature.

That altho' the vulgar sort did rashly censure
 the delaying of the Marriage, yet did Queen Elizabeth at first incline to Marriage, upon no other Account, than to satisfy the Desires of her People, who importunately perswaded her to marry, that there might be an establish'd and certain Succession by her Children. And the Duke of Anjou, who fought to her for Marriage, she deservedly preferr'd before all others in her Love, both for his own Vertue, and his Noble and Royal Descent; which Love she still professes to be very great towards him. Nevertheless, she as yet forbears to give her Assent to the contracting of the Marriage, till she may perceive whether it be a thing pleasing to her People, lest she might seem after to repent too late. That at present many Impediments and Obstructions were in the way: namely, the Civil-War in France, and the Duke of Anjou's forlorn Condition, who had undeservedly lost the King's Favour. In England the Minds of the best Men were averse from the Marriage, which had been a means of delaying it so long;
 yet notwithstanding the Queen's Affection was still constant towards him. That the French King press'd the Consummation of the Marriage unseasonably at the present, whilst the Duke of Anjou was engaged in a War against the Spaniard, which he could not give over, without a Slur to his Honour, and great Disadvantage to both the Kingdoms of England and France, and the utter Undoing of the Netherlands, whilst the Spaniard's Power daily increas'd more than was convenient. Moreover, whereas the People of England desired nothing more than that by this Marriage the Realm might be preserv'd in Peace and Tranquillity, it would be by this means precipitated from a most serene and happy Peace, into a most dangerous War, considering that the Queen must of necessity be engaged in her Husband's Quarrel.
 Wherefore she would have no more treating of the Marriage, till the Duke of Anjou were disengaged from the War he had undertaken, and the League of mutual Defence and Offence were concluded betwixt England and France.
 Which in reality Queen Elizabeth desired above all things. The French King promis'd with all his Heart to enter into a League of Defence;
 but as for a League offensive, he flatly refused to hear any more thereof before the Marriage were solemnized.

Not long after the Duke of Anjou came himself into England, (who was now chosen Governor of the Netherlands by the States) after he had by the Help of Queen Elizabeth's Money happily rais'd the Siege of Cambray. For she had privately supply'd him with a great Sum of Money by Henry Seymour, Palatvicini, and Rexie a Frenchman.
 He had a strong Hope, that if he did not complete the Marriage while he stay'd here, yet at least he should gain thus much, that, being supported with Queen Elizabeth's Favour, he should be the more welcome to the Netherlanders, who honour'd

honour'd her as their tutelar Saint. He was receiv'd with as great Respect as he could hope for, and no Demonstration could there be given of Honour and Affection which she did not shew him to the full. Infomuch that in the Month of November, as soon as she had with great Pomp celebrated her Coronation-Day, the force of modest Love in the midst of amorous Discourse carried her so far, that she drew off a Ring from her Finger, and put it upon the Duke of Anjou's, upon certain Conditions betwixt them two. The Strangers-by took it, that the Marriage was now contracted by Promise: Amongst whom Aldegond Governor of the City of Antwerp, dispatched Letters presently away into the Netherlands to signify as much; and Antwerp testified her publick Joy thereat by Bonfires and Peals of Ordnance. At home the Courtiers Minds were diversly affected; some leap'd for Joy, some were seiz'd with Admiration, and others were dejected with Sorrow. Leicester, who had lately plotted and contrived to cross the Marriage; Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, and Walsingham, storm'd at it, as if the Queen, the Realm and Religion were now quite undone. The Queen's Gentlemen, with whom she used to be familiar, lamented and bewailed, and did so terrifie and vex her Mind, that she spent the Night in Doubts and Cares without Sleep amongst her weeping and lamenting Servants. The next Day she sent for the Duke of Anjou; and they two, all By-standers being remov'd, had a long Discourse together. He at length withdrew himself to his Chamber; and throwing the Ring from him, a while after took it again, taxing the Lightness of Women, and the Inconstancy of Islanders, with two or three biting and smart Scoffs.

The Queen pondering in her troubled Mind what Burghly and Suffex had told her: 'That unless she married the Duke of Anjou, no League offensive could be hoped for from the French King: That she of herself alone was too weak to withstand the Greatness and Power of the Spaniard, who if he should profer his Daughter in Marriage to the King of Scots, would easily draw to the Scottish King's Party all the Papists in England, all the Fugitives, all the Rebels, all that were weary of the present Government, and all of desperate Fortunes, of whom there were every where great Numbers. That the hopes of all good Men, who expected Issue from the Queen by this Marriage, would be frustrate; so that now, neglecting her, they would cast their Eyes upon some of the Competitors. Besides, she herself could not but incur very great Displeasure with the French King and the Duke of Anjou, who after having spent so long time in so many Consultations, sent such honourable Embassies, and disburs'd so much Money, would take it very hardly to be thus deluded, however they might dissemblingly conceal their Displeasure a while for their own Advantage, thereby to procure either Money at present for the D. of Anjou towards the Low-Country Wars, or a yearly Pension for the time to come. Neither did less Scruple stick in her Mind, if the Duke of Anjou, being thus neglected, should take a Wife out of Spain; (which some whisper'd into her Ears) for then she foresaw that Danger would threaten her both from France and Spain too.

In the midst of these perplexing Cogitations concerning Marriage, into which the consideration of the Times did necessarily ever and anon cast her, some were of opinion, that she was fully resolv'd in her Mind, that she should better provide both for the Commonwealth and her own Glory by an unmarried Life than by Marriage; as foreseeing that if she married a Subject she should disparage herself by the inequality of the Match, and give occasion to domestick Heart-burnings, private Grudges and Commotions; if a Stranger, she then should subject both herself and her People to a forein Yoke, and endanger Religion: Having not forgotten how unhappy the Marriage of her Sister Queen Mary with King Philip a Foreiner had been; also how unfortunate that Marriage of her Great Grandfather Edward IV. had prov'd, who was the first of all the Kings of England since the Norman Conquest, that ever took one of his Subjects to Wife. Her Glory also, which whilst she continu'd unmarried she retain'd entire to herself and uneclips'd, she feared would by Marriage be transfer'd to her Husband. And besides, the Perils by Conception and Child-bearing, objected by the Physicians and her Gentlemen for some private Reasons, did many times run in her Mind, and very much deter her from thoughts of marrying.

She was also much incens'd at a Book which was written and publish'd against the Marriage in a smart satyrical Stile, (out of a fear lest Religion should be changed) entitl'd, The Gulph wherein England will be swallow'd by the French Marriage. In which Book those of the Council who favour'd the Marriage are taxed as ungrateful to their Prince and Country; the Queen herself (in the midst of several flattering Expressions) is glanced at as unlike herself; the Duke of Anjou slander'd with unworthy Reproaches; the French Nation odiously defamed; and the Marriage itself, in regard of the difference of Religion, (as of the Daughter of God with a Son of Antichrist) with virulent Words condemn'd, as profane, dangerous to the Church, and destructive to the Commonwealth; and this proved out of the holy Scriptures, miserably wrested. Neither would the Queen be perswaded that the Author of the Book had any other intent but to procure the Hatred of her Subjects against her, (who had always no less regard of the Love of her People than she had of her own Authority, and (as Princes use to do) made it her chief Care to preserve her Reputation) and privately to open a Gap for some prodigious Innovation; considering that the Writer had not so much as mention'd the Security of the Queen and Realm, or prevention of Dangers to either, and that the States of the Realm had before with all Earnestness besought her to marry, as the most assured Remedy against the threatening Mischiefs. These things she declar'd by publick Proclamation; wherein, having condemn'd the Author of the Book as a publisher of Sedition, she highly commended the Duke of Anjou's good Affection towards her and the Protestant Religion, and express'd her Resentment that so great an Injury should be offer'd to so Noble a Prince, and one that had so well deserv'd, who had desir'd nothing to be alter'd either in the Commonwealth or Religion: And withal, she commended Simier, the Duke of Anjou's Agent, for his Wisdom and Discretion, whom some had loaden with Calumnies and Slanders. She also advertis'd the People, that the said Book was nothing else but a Fiction of some Traytors, to raise Envy abroad, and Sedition at home; and commanded it to be burnt before the Magistrate's Face.

From this time forward she began to be a little more incens'd against the Puritans, or Innovators, from whom she easily believ'd these kind of things proceeded. And indeed, within a few Days after, John Stubbs of Lincolns-Inn, a furious hot-headed Professor of Religion, (whose Sister Thomas Cartwright, a Ringleader amongst the Puritans,

Against whom Sentence was given, that their right Hands should be cut off, according to an Act of Philip and Mary, against the Authors and Publishers of seditious Writings. Tho' some Lawyers mutter'd that the Sentence was erroneous and void by reason of the false noting of the Time wherein the Law was made; and that that Act was only temporary, and died with Queen Mary. Of this number was Dalton, who often bawl'd it out openly, and was committed to the Tower; and Monson, a Judge in the Court of Common-Pleas, was so sharply reprehended, that he resign'd his Place: Forasmuch as Wray, Lord-Chief-Justice of England, made it appear, that there was no Mistake in noting the Time; and proved by the Words of the Act, that the Act was made against those who should abuse the King by seditious Writings, and that the King of England never dieth; yea, that that Act was renewed anno primo Elizabethæ, to be in force during the life of her and the Heirs of her Body. Hereupon Stubbs and Page had their right Hands cut off with a Clever, driven through the Wrist by the force of a Mallet, upon a Scaffold in the Market-place at Westminster. The Printer was pardon'd. I remember (being there present) that Stubbs, after his right Hand was cut off, put off his Hat with his left, and said with a loud Voice, God save the Queen; the Multitude standing about was deeply silent; either out of an horror of this new and unwonted kind of Punishment; or else out of commiseration towards the Man, as being of an honest and unblamable Repute; or else out of hatred of the Marriage, which most Men presag'd would be the overthrow of Religion.

These things were done presently after the Duke of Anjou's coming into England. During his stay here, the Queen, to take away the fear which had possess'd many Mens Minds, that Religion would be alter'd, and Popery tolerated, being overcome by importunate Entreaties, permitted that Edm. Campian afore said, of the Society of Jesus, Ralph Sherwin, Luke Kirby and Alex Briant, Priests, should be arraign'd. Who being indicted upon the Act for Treason made in the 25th of Edward III. and charg'd to have compassed and imagined the destruction of the Queen and Realm, to have adher'd to the Bishop of Rome, the Queen's Enemy; to have come into England to disturb the Peace and Quiet of the Realm, and to have rais'd Forces to that end, were condemn'd to die, and, persisting obstinately to defend the Pope's Authority against the Queen, were executed. For Campian, after he was condemn'd, being ask'd, first, Whether Queen Elizabeth were a right and lawful Queen? refused to answer: Then, Whether he would take part with the Queen or the Pope, if he should send Forces against the Queen? he openly profess'd and testified under his Hand, that he would stand for the Pope. Afterwards some others also were executed for the same reasons; whereas in full ten Years time after the Rebellion, there had been no more than five Papists put to death. But these things I leave to the Writer of the Ecclesiastical History: Yet let me, by his leave, give a brief touch here of some few things which are linked with matters that concern the Commonwealth. Such now were the Times, that the Queen (who never was of opinion that Mens Consciences were to be forced) complain'd manytimes, that she was driven of necessity to take these Courses, unless she would suffer the ruin of herself and her Subjects upon some Mens pretence of Conscience and the Catholick Religion. Yet for the greater part of these silly Priests, she did not at all believe them guilty of plotting the Destruction of their Country; but the Superiours were they she held to be the Instruments of this Villany; for these inferiour Emisaries committed the full and free disposure of themselves to their Superiours. For when those that were now and afterwards taken were asked, 'Whether by Authority of the Bull of Pius V. Bishop of Rome, the Subjects were so absolv'd from their Oath of Allegiance towards the Queen, that they might take up Arms against their Prince: Whether they thought her to be a lawful Queen: Whether they would subscribe to Sander's and Bristow's Opinion, concerning the Authority of that Bull: Whether if the Bishop of Rome should wage War against the Queen, they would join with her or him? They answer'd some of 'em so ambiguously, some so resolutely, and some by prevarication and silence shifting off the Questions in such a manner, that divers ingenuous Catholick began to suspect they were engag'd in traitorous Designs; and J. Bishop, a Man otherwise devoted to the Bishop of Rome, wrote against 'em, and solidly prov'd, That that Constitution obruded under the Name of the Lateran Council, upon which the whole Authority of absolving Subjects from their Allegiance, and deposing Princes, is founded, is no other than a Decree of Pope Innocent III. and was never admitted in England; yea, that the said Council was no Council at all, nor was any thing at all there decreed by the Fathers.

Suspitions also were daily encreas'd by the great numbers of Priests creeping more and more into England, who privately try'd the Minds of Men, spread abroad, that Princes excommunicate were to be deposed, and whisper'd in corners, that such Princes as profess'd not the Romish Religion, had forfeited their regal Title and Authority: That those who had taken holy Orders were, by a certain Ecclesiastical Privilege, exempted from all Jurisdiction of Princes, and not bound by their Laws, nor ought they to reverence or regard their Majesty: That the Bishop of Rome hath supreme Authority and absolute Power over the whole World, yea even in Temporal Matters: That the Magistrates of England were no lawful Magistrates, and therefore not to be accounted such; yea, That whatsoever was done by the Q.'s Authority since the time that the Bull declaratory of Pius V. was publish'd against her, was by the Laws of God and Man altogether void, and to be esteem'd of no validity. And some of 'em were not asham'd to own, that they were return'd into England with no other intent, than by reconciling Men at Confession, to absolve every one particularly from all his Oaths of Allegiance and Obedience to the Queen, just as the said Bull did absolve them all at once and in general. And this seem'd the easier to be effected, because they promis'd wical absolution from all mortal Sin; and the safer, because it was perform'd more closely, and under the Seal of Confession.

The Five and Twentieth Year of her Reign.

These things and the like extorted from the States of the Realm, which were assembl'd in the Month of January at Westminster, new and more severe Laws against the Papists, wherein they are declar'd guilty of High-Treason, 'whoever shall dissuade the Subjects from their Obedience to their Prince, and from the Religion establish'd in England, or shall reconcile them to the Church of Rome; as also, those who shall be so dissuaded or reconciled. Those also who shall say Mass are fin'd in 200 Marks, and Imprisonment for a Year, or longer, till they

This the Papists exclaim'd was unjustly interpreted of Lunar Months, who had hitherto redeem'd their Absence upon Sundays and Holidays for a Shilling to the Use of the Poor. But these things let the Ecclesiastical Historians handle more at large.

Anjou returns into the Low-Countries.

The Duke of Anjou, having stay'd in England full three Months, began his Journey toward the Netherlands in the Month of February. The Queen herself, to do him Honour, accompany'd him as far as Canterbury, and commanded the Earl of Leicester, Charles Howard, Hunsdon, Willoughby, Windsor, and Sheffield, Barons, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Francis Russell, Sir George Bouchier, and some other eminent Knights, to wait upon him as far as

Is made D. of Brabant, &c.

Antwerp; where he was made Duke of Brabant, Limburgh, Lorrain, &c. For the States of the Confederate Netherlands had before declared the Spaniard to have forfeited his Sovereignty, by violating their Laws; broken his Seals in pieces, thrown down his Arms in all places, and absolv'd the People from their Oath of Allegiance; so that they were at liberty to choose themselves another Prince. The Duke granted the Exercise of the Romish Religion to all that would swear Allegiance to him, and abjure the Spaniard. Then he earnestly apply'd himself to the War, lost Oudenard, and took Alost. Six hundred English, under the Leading of Thomas Norris, Barney, Cornish, and Gibson, revolted from him to the Spaniards, laying the Cause thereof upon the imperious Severity of Norris. These Men being expos'd to all dangerous Brunts, and slightly and contemptuously used, suffer'd condign Punishment for their Treachery, and too late repented of it, after they had undergone infinite Miseries. However

Some English revolt from him.

Norris, with 300 Horse and the Remainder of his Companies, gain'd singular Commendations amongst all Men, for his Valour and Military Skill. For he courageously receiv'd the Prince of Parma, who furiously charged him with great Forces, and made a discreet and orderly Retreat to the Walls of Ghent, while Anjou and the Prince of Orange from the Walls admired his martial Valour. But why do I dwell upon these things? The Duke of Anjou, having now spent in the Netherlands a great Mass of Money, that he receiv'd out of England, and that without Success, and found that they bestow'd upon him nothing but bare and empty Titles, whilst the Government and Management of Affairs remain'd wholly in the States Hands, attempted rashly and unadvisedly to force Antwerp and other Cities, but all in vain, and not without great Loss of his own Men; and shortly after left the Netherlands with Dishonour, as having achiev'd nothing memorable.

Anjou leaves the Netherlands with dishonour.

Let it suffice just to mention, in a Word only, a Comet or Blazing-star, seen in the Month of May, in the 12th. degree of Gemini, near the Star call'd the little Goat, with a radiant Tail streaming above and beyond the right Shoulder of Erichonius: as also an hideous Tempest in Norfolk, with much Lightning, Thunder, violent Force of Winds, and a great Storm of Hail, the Stones whereof were three Inches in Thickness, and fashion'd like the Rowels of Spurs.

Queen Elizabeth, to strengthen herself abroad against the Spaniard, whom she knew to be exasperated by that Supply of Money sent to the Duke of Anjou, chose Frederick II. King of Denmark, whom she had a long time respected as her loving Friend, into the Society of the Order of

St. George; and sent Peregrine Bertie, (whom she, as being very sparing in conferring of Honours, with much ado had admitted to the Title of Baron Willoughby of Eresby, before such time as he had given Proof of his Vertue, albeit his Mother were the only Daughter of the Duchess of Suffolk, and Heir to the Lord Willoughby) to invest him with the Ensigns of that Order. The King of Denmark gladly suffer'd the Chain or Collar of Roses to be put about his Neck, and the Garter to be ty'd about his Leg: the rest of the Ensigns he receiv'd to lay up and keep, but refused to put them on, because they were outlandish; and to take the Oath he absolutely deny'd, because he had done the same before, when he was admitted by the French King into the Order of St. Michael. Whilst Willoughby remain'd in Denmark, he represented to the King the Grievances of the English Merchants; who complain'd heavily, that the Customs were too much rais'd, whereas in times past they paid in passing the Danish Strait or the Sound, for every Ship but a Rose-Noble, that is, the fourth part of an Ounce of Gold, and as much for their Lading or Merchandize, with some small Allowance towards Fires by Night to direct their Course safely, and Barrels or Buoys to shew the Shelves and Rocks. He treated with him also in behalf of the Merchants, to release the Payment of Last gels, whereby was exacted the thirtieth part of all their Merchandize, by Way of Loan, during the Heat of the War betwixt the Kings of Denmark and Swedeland, with Promise of Repayment when the War ended. But these things, as being matters of great Weight, were put off to another time. For scarce do Princes ever abate of the Customs which they have once impos'd, judging that such Royalties (as they call 'em) belong as Rights and Privileges to every Kingdom, and are not subject to any foreign Abatement.

Queen Elizabeth also, for her better Security at home, purpos'd to compound matters with the Queen of Scots, by Sir Walter Mildmay. But finding that the Duke of Guise plotted secretly with certain English Fugitives, for her Delivery, and levy'd Forces, under pretence that they should serve under the Duke of Anjou in the Low-Countries, but indeed to be transported over into England, from Ayr or Ewe, an obscure Port-Town in Normandy, belonging to the Duke of Guise; (whereof the French King gave her the first Notice, and out of his Love to Queen Elizabeth prevented it) the matter was put off to another time, and she was neglected.

But yet to prevent the Duke of Guise's Attempts in Scotland, who was thought to use Lenox's Assistance to avert the King of Scots's Affection from the English, William Ruthven, whom the King had very lately created Earl of Gowry, rais'd some Troubles. This William, (not to degenerate from his Father, who bore a deadly Hatred against the King's Mother) with other Conspirators, employ'd all their Wits to remove Lenox and Arran from the King, pretending to provide for the Security of Religion, the King's Safety, and the Amity with England. And thus they went to work. Lenox, who was now made Chamberlain of Scotland, was perswaded to exercise with Rigour the old worn out Jurisdiction of Chamberlain; and this to no other intent, but that he might thereby (unawares and never dreaming of any such thing) incur the Hatred of the People; which Hatred the Clergy should more inflame by declaiming against him publicly out of the Pulpit, as a Papist, a Guisian, and a rigorous Executor of his Authority, and should openly prophesie his Destruction. When Lenox therefore was gone from Perth (where the King then lay) to 1582. Edinburgh, to exercise the aforesaid Jurisdiction, and Arran was out of the Way, Goury, Marre, Lindsey, and others, taking the Opportunity, invited the King to Ruthven-Castle, and there detain'd him against his Will, and terrify'd him so that he durst not stir abroad. All his faithfullest Servants they remov'd from him, Arran they carry'd to Prison, constrain'd the King to call home the Earl of Angus from Banishment, (at the Intercession of the Queen of England, who was acquainted with their Plot) and to send Lenox back again into France: who, being a Man of a very mild Spirit, did for the pulick Quiet sake surrender up Dunbriton, which he might easily have defended, and refused not to return into France; and this he did at the King's seeming Persuasion, which they had forced him to use with him. And not content with all this, they compell'd the King, against his Will, to approve of this their seizing of him, in his Letters to the Queen of England, and to declare an Assembly of the States summon'd by them to be just and legal. Yet could they not draw Buchanan to approve of this Fact of theirs, either by their Declaration, or by Messengers sent to persuade him; who now with Sorrow repented that he had formerly maintain'd the Cause of factious People against their Princes, and soon after died. A Man born, as he himself has written in a Poem, nec celo, nec solo, nec seculo erudito, that is, neither in a Climate, nor Countrey, nor Age of Learning; yet happily arriving himself at the Top and Perfection of Poetical Skill, so as he may deservedly be reckon'd Prince of the Poets of this Age.

Edin-

Force the King to countermand their doings. Buchanan disapproves them.

When the French King had certain Intelligence hereof, he dispatch'd away Mota-Fenellon through England, and Maningville by Sea, into Scotland, with one and the same Instructions, to wit, That they should take some course or other for procuring the King's Liberty: That they should confirm and encourage the French Faction, draw the King's Mind to embrace Amity with the French, and congratulate him upon this account, that the Queen his Mother, out of her motherly Piety, granted him the Royal Title, and very willingly admitted him into the Participation of the Kingdom, to wit, that he should be own'd for true and lawful King, by the Princes of Christendom, and all the People in Scotland, and that all Factions should be for the future taken away. The Queen of Scots in the mean time having her Mind full of Cares and Doubts, being overcome with Miseries, and languishing with the Calamity of a long Imprisonment without all Hope of Liberty, deplored her hard Destiny, with the sad Condition of her Son, in a long Letter written in French, to Queen Elizabeth, which her motherly Love and the Anguish of her Mind wrung from her, to this purpose, as I have abbreviated the same out of the very Original.

French K. sends Agents to procure the King's Liberty.

Whereas I have been certainly advertised that my Son is surprized by Rebels, (as I myself also was some Years since) out of a just Fear lest he should undergo the same common Condition of Infelicity with myself, I cannot but make my woful Complaints, and imprint the same (if it may be) in your Conscience, that so my Innocence may appear to Posterity, and their Ignominy by whose unjust Dealings I am most undeservedly brought into these Miseries. But seeing their cunning Practices and Devices (tho' never so wicked) have hitherto been of more Credit with you than my most just Complaints, and your Might may seem to overcome Right, and Force to oppress and bear down Truth among Men; I will appeal to the everliving God, in whom only I acknowledge a Power and Dominion over us that are Princes of equal Jurisdiction, Degree and Authority. And upon him will I call, (with whom there will be no place for Craft nor Fraud) that in the last day he will reward us according to our Deserts one towards another, howsoever my Adversaries know in the mean time how to cloak their treacherous Dealings before Men, (and haply before you.) In his Name therefore, and as it were before his Tribunal-Seat, I call to your Remembrance, by what cunning Artifices some who were employ'd in your Name drew the Scots, my Subjects, into Rebellion against me, whilst I liv'd in Scotland, and gave Rise to all those Mischiefs which have happen'd there ever since. Which (to omit other Proofs) is certainly known by evident Testimonies to be produced, and by Confession out of Morton's own Mouth, who was on that account advanced to * Honour. Against whom if I had proceeded according to Law and Justice, and you had not aided my Rebels, they could not have stood out long against me and my Friends. Whilst I was kept in Prison at Lough-Levin, Sir Nicolas Throckmorton was a means to persuade me in your Name to set my Hand to a Writing, and resign the Kingdom; which Writing he affirm'd would be invalid, and so the whole World has taken it to be, till you assisted the Authors of the said Instrument readily with your Favour and Countenance, as also with an arm'd Power. And tell me bonâ fide, would you acknowledge such an Authority and Power of your Subjects over you? Yet thereby was my Regal Authority taken from me, and that by your Advice and Assistance; and my Kingdom translated to my Son, who was then in respect of his Age uncapable thereof. And when I myself was not long since determin'd to confirm the Kingdom to him lawfully, he was forcibly seiz'd on by certain Traitors, who without question purposed to deprive him (as they had done me) of the Kingdom, if not of his Life also.

Q. of Scots Letter to Q. Eliz.

1582. Ann. 25.

After I had made an Escape out of Lough-Levin, and was now ready to give the Rebels Battle, I craved your Aid, sending back that Diamond which I had formerly receiv'd from you in pledge of your Love, with large Promises of Assistance against my Rebels, time after time renew'd; giving me also then your faithful Word, that if I would betake myself to you, you would come to the Borders, and assist me in your own Person. I, relying upon this your Promise so often repeated, (tho' those you employ'd had many times deceiv'd me with fair Words) resolv'd to fly to you in my Adversity, as to a sacred Anchor. And certainly so I had, had I found as easie Access to you, as my Rebels against me have always had. But before I could come to you, I was seiz'd upon, clapt into Custody, shut up in strong Holds, and have ever since endured Afflictions more bitter than Death itself.

* made Regent upon Q. Elizabeth's Recommendation.

I know you will hit me in the Teeth with what pass'd betwixt me and the Duke of Norfolk; yet I deny that that was any way prejudicial to you or your Kingdom. For it was approved of by the chief Counsellors of the Realm of England, and confirm'd by their Subscriptions, which may be produced, who also gave an assured Promise of your Consent. And how (I pray you) could Men of that Quality promise your Consent to that which would deprive you of Life, Honour, and your Diadem? yet would you have these things believ'd by all Men.

But when some of my said Rebels repented when it was too late, and perceiv'd more palpably, by the Conference between our Commissioners

1582. Ann. 25. Liding-son and Grange. missioners at Tork, how injuriously I was dealt withal, they were presently besieged by your Forces in the Castle of Edinburgh, and * two of the chief of 'em were miserably bereav'd of their Lives; one by Poison, the other by the Gallows. And this, after I had, at your Request, caus'd them more than once to lay down their Arms, in hopes of Peace, which God knows whether my Adversaries ever intended.

From that time forward I determined with myself to try whether I could by my Patience mitigate others Rigor, by bearing quietly all things which should be inflicted on a Captive-Queen: yet have I now for this whole Year been quite debarr'd from all Intercourse with my Son, either by Letters or Messengers; that so, if it were possible, the Son might be rent and divided from his Mother, by a sad and wo-ful Alienation of Affections.

Conditions of Peace and Concord to be made betwixt us I have often propounded. At Cha-tesworth, eleven Years since, with your Commissioners, and with yourself by the Ambassadors of the most Christian King and my own,
and the last Winter with Beale, have I dealt therein sincerely. But those Conditions have been always rejected, Delays sought and interposed, my Actions and Endeavours misconstrued, and the sincere Affections of my Mind still condemn'd. And of my long Patience I have reap'd no other Fruit, than that by a certain Prescription it grew to a Custom, that I was every day more roughly handled than other. These things verily I am no longer able to endure: and howsoever it fall out, if I die,
I will make known the Authors of my Death;
and if I live, I shall, I hope, cause all wicked Contrivances and Calumnies against me to cease, that I may pass the rest of my Life in greater Quiet and Tranquillity.

Wherefore, to take away all Misunderstandings betwixt us, let the Testimonies of the Spaniards that were lately taken Prisoners in Ireland, be produced against me; let the Examination of the Jesuites be brought forth; let every Man have liberty to accuse me publicly;
so as I in like manner may have liberty allow'd me to defend myself, and not be condemn'd unheard. The basest Malefactors and Prisoners are allow'd their Defence, and their Accusers brought before them Face to Face. And why am not I so dealt withal, who am an anointed
Q. in Blood most nearly ally'd to you, and next to you the lawful Heir to the Crown? And this last is what above all vexes and troubles my Adversaries, who labour to set us two at Variance. Alas! there is no Reason this should trouble them. I call God and my own Honour to witness, that I have for this long time thought of no other Kingdom but that of Heaven. Yet are you bound in Conscience, and obliged both in regard of your Duty and Justice, not to prejudice my Son's undoubted Title after my death, nor to further the secret Contrivances of those,
who, both in England and Scotland, labour tooth
and nail the Destruction of me and my Son;
as is more than too apparent, by the Carriage of your Messengers in Scotland, who have behaved themselves seditiously enough, (unknown to you, no doubt, tho' Huntington has busily bestirr'd himself therein.)

Is this Reason, that I, who am a Mother, should be prohibited, not only to advise my oppress'd Son, but so much as to understand in what Condition he is? Had those Messengers been sent for my Son's Good, haply, if they had taken my Advice along with them, they might have been more welcome to him for my fake; certainly you had obliged me the more closely to you. Neither was there any Reason why you should so carefully conceal their Sending, or quite take from me at that time all Use of my Liberty. But, to speak freely, I beseech you to employ no more such Ministers in Scottish matters. For tho' † Cary (I think) would † Lord undertake nothing unbeseeming himself and his Honour; yet can I promise myself no Good of Huntington, by reason of his bad Behaviour towards me.

Therefore I do earnestly intreat you, by the near Kindred that is betwixt us, to have a serious Care in my Son's Safety, to intermeddle no more in Scottish matters, without acquainting me or the French King; and to esteem those for no better than Traitors, who detain my Son in Custody, and constrain him, against his Will, to do what they list. In brief, I beseech you by the Cross and Passion of Christ our Redeemer, that I may now, after so many Years Restraint,
be restor'd to my Liberty upon reasonable Conditions, and may, for the small Remainder of my Life, refresh my decay'd Body, somewhere out of England, after so long Grief and Languishing in Prison. So shall you oblige me and mine, and especially my Son, to you for ever.
And this I will never cease to beg of you with all Earnestness, till you grant it me: and that which moves me so earnestly to crave it, is the afflicted State of my Body and Health. Take Order therefore, that I may hereafter be more courteously used; otherwise, in plain terms,
I shall not be able to endure it: and put me not off to any other Doom or Sentence than your own. Whatsoever hereafter shall befall me, Good or Ill, I shall take it to come from yourself alone. Vouchsafe me this Favour, that I may understand your Mind from yourself, either by a short Letter, or by the French Ambassador. I cannot rest satisfy'd with those things which the Earl of Shrewsbury tells me, considering that they are alter'd every day. When I wrote of late to your Council, you wish'd me to acquaint yourself only with my Business.
(But there was no reason for you to grant them so large an Authority over me, to trouble and afflict me.) Yet I cannot but fear that some of them who are my Adversaries have procured
this, lest the rest, when they should have heard my just Complaints, should oppose them, in regard as well of your Honour, as of their own Duty towards you. Now it remains that I make this special Request to you, that my Mind being taken up with the Thoughts of another Life, I may have some Reverend Catholick Priest allow'd me, who may direct me in my Religion, for my Soul's Health. This last Office is not to be deny'd to the poorest Wretches of the meanest Condition. To foreign Princes Ambassadors you allow the Exercise of their Religion, and I freely granted it to my Subjects of a different Religion. If this be deny'd me, (I hope) I shall be excused before God, but my Adversaries (I fear) will not escape unpunish'd. Certainly it will be a Precedent for other Princes of Christendom to use the like Severity towards their Subjects of a different Religion, if this Rigor be shew'd to me, who am an absolute Princess, and your nearest Kinswoman. For so I am, and so I shall be as long as I live, whether my Adversaries will or no, and tho' they be never so ill pleas'd and satisfy'd at
it. To have my Household increas'd I desire not, but I am necessitated to desire you that I may have two Waiting-Women allow'd me, whom I shall have need of in this my weak Condition:
and let not my Enemies satisfy their Malice
and

1582. and Cruelty; in hindring me of so small a Ann. 25. Courtessie. Whereas I am privately accused, by the Earl of Shrewsbury, that, contrary to what I promis'd to Beale, I have dealt with my Son, about conveying my Title in Scotland to him,
without your Privity; I beseech you believe not Beale's Suggestions: I promis'd nothing but on certain Conditions, to which I am not at all ty'd, unless those on your part be perform'd by
you. Since that time I have receiv'd no Answer, and a deep Silence has ensued touching those matters: but the Practices and Contrivances in Scotland, to the Destruction of me and my Son, have been continued. This so long a Silence
I could not construe any thing else but a flat Denial, which I signify'd to you and your Council by Letters. What the French King and his Mother imparted to me, I have truly and ingenuously acquainted you withal, and ask'd your Counsel in it; but I have not heard so much as a Word from you. To submit myself to your Advice touching my Affairs and my Country, before I knew what manner of Advice it would be, I never intended: for this might seem a piece of extreme Folly. How my Adversaries in Scotland triumph over me and my Captive-Son, is not unknown to you. For my part, I have attempted nothing there which may prejudice you: what I have done has been for procuring a solid Peace in that Kingdom;
whereof, sure, I should have as great a Care as your Council; for I am far more interest'd therein than they. I desired with all my heart to gratify my Son, by confirming to him the Title of King, and to bury all Discords in Oblivion. Is this to snatch away the Diadem from my Son? But my Adversaries and the Adversaries of my Family would not have it confirm'd to him. This they envy him, whilst they carry a Witness against themselves in their own Breast, and by reason of their guilty Conscience mistrust their own Condition.
Let not these and others my Adversaries so far blind your Eyes, as that, while you live and see it, they bring your nearest Kindred to their Graves, and undermine both Crowns: for to that purpose certainly do they carry on their wicked Practices against me, against my Son, and perhaps against yourself too. Can it be any Advantage or Credit to you, that by their means I and my Son, and you and I ourselves, are so long deprived of one another? Recalyourself to your innate Mildness and Lenity, resume your natural Disposition, and, as you are a Princess, soften your Spirit, and dispose it to lay aside all Displeasure towards me a Princess so nearly related to you in Blood, and so loving to you; that these matters being compounded betwixt us, I may the more quietly depart this Life, and the Groans and Sighs of my afflicted Soul may not ascend up to God.
To whose Majesty I offer up my daily Prayers, beseeching him that these my just Complaints and woful Lamentations may now at length find Regard with you. At Sheffield, Nov. 8.

1582.
Ann. 26

With this Letter Queen Elizabeth was variously affected, and (having first permitted Mota-Fenellon the French Ambassador, to go with Davison her own Ambassador into Scotland, watching the time on purpose that he might at unawares meet Lenox, as he return'd out of Scotland; and having herself after graciously receiv'd the said Lenox, and gently blamed him for the Errors he had committed in Scottish matters) sent Robert Beale, Clerk of the Council, a morose, ill-temper'd Man, to the Queen of Scots, to expostulate with her roundly about these Letters of Complaint, and together with the Earl of Shrewsbury, to treat with her about her Liberty, in regard she had very lately by other Letters earnestly requested, that, upon Security given to Queen Elizabeth,
she might at length enjoy the same, and be associated with her Son, in the Government of Scotland.

Lenox returns to France by England.

Concerning these things a serious Consultation was holden in the Council-Chamber of England; and most of the Council were satisfy'd that she might be set at liberty upon these Conditions: 'If she and her Son would promise to 'attempt nothing which might be prejudicial to 'Queen Elizabeth, or the Realm of England. If
'she would acknowledge that whatever was done
'by her Husband Francis II. King of France, a'gainst Queen Elizabeth, was done against her
'Will, and would utterly disclaim the same as 'unjust; confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh, and 'condemn all unfair Attempts ever since, by in'geniously renouncing them. If she would be 'bound to contrive or act nothing directly or in'directly against the Government of the King'dom of England, in either Ecclesiastical or Civil
'Matters, but oppose all such as should any ways
'attempt the same, as publick Enemies. If she 'would forbear to claim any Right to the King'dom of England, during Queen Elizabeth's Life;
'and afterwards be content to refer the Title of 'Succession to the Judgment of the Parliament
'of England. If (to the end there might be no 'place left for Prevarication, and that she might 'not hereafter alledge, that she condescended to
'these Conditions, being a Prisoner and con-
'strain'd thereto) she would not only swear to
'these Conditions herself, but would also pro'cure the Estates of Scotland to confirm them by
'publick Authority, and the King to ratify them
'by Oath and Writing, and Hostages to be gi'ven for the Performance of them. As for her being join'd with her Son in the Government, it was not thought meet that the Queen of England should be concern'd with it: but this they refer'd to the King of Scots himself, and the Estates of Scotland. And if they were so associated together, they should be dealt withal jointly about the League; if not, severally.

tion about

at liberty.
Upon what Conditions.

These things were deliberated and consulted of, but without Success; for the Scots of the English Faction utterly rejected the Conditions, crying out that some Scots, which were mortal Enemies to the English Nation, were, by the Advice of the Queen of Scots, call'd home out of France;
and that Holt, an Englishman, of the Society of Jesus, was sent privately into Scotland, to contrive a way for invading England.

There was now much striving in Scotland be-their Nation, and who should draw most Men to 1583. King carried himself evenly and indifferently betwixt them both, and intermeddled not in those factious Stirs which he labour'd rather to compose, well knowing how to temper and mix what was profitable with what was just and honest, and in the mean time not to be wanting to Religion or the Commonwealth. But the Clergy in Scotland were so inflam'd with a kind of Zeal against the French, that the same Day that Mota-Fenellon was feasted by the Citizens of Edinburgh, they appointed a Fast, and all the Day long rail'd upon the French King, the Duke of Guise, and the Ambassadors, out of their Pulpits; and had almost proceeded to excommunicate all the Guests that dined there. As these Ministers did thus openly, so also some Noblemen of the English Faction ceased not more closely to persecute and disturb the French Ambassadors, till first Mota-Fenellon, and afterwards Maningville, left the Court and departed, having notwithstanding first cunningly sown the Seeds of Dissention betwixt those who had got the King in their power.

The King applies himself to Q. Elizabeth.

Lenox's death.

The King frees himself out of Custody.

He deals gently with those that seiz'd him.

Recalls his Friends to Court.

As soon as they were gone, the King profer'd all Kindness and Respect to the Queen of England by Colonel William Stuart and John Colvill, and ask'd her Counsel and Advice for composing the present Commotions, and his contracting of Marriage. And now they which had possess'd themselves of the King took heart and courage when the French Ambassadors were remov'd out of Scotland, and more a while after, when they heard of Lenox's death. For he, having found but cold Comfort from the French King, who was embroil'd in Civil Wars, and now secretly applying himself to work into the Favour of Queen Elizabeth, died at Paris, and at the point of death openly profess'd (as he had done before) the Protestant Religion, confuting thereby the Malice of those who had falsly defamed him to be a Papist.

While the Surprizers of the King were triumphing for the Duke's death, as thinking themselves now sure and certain to keep the King in their power, the King, when they little thought of it, tho' he were scarce eighteen Years of Age, disdain'd (seeing he was an absolute King) to be under the Tutelage of three Earls, as he had before wisely yielded to the Time, so now, having got a fit Opportunity, he wrought his own Liberty, and withdrew himself with a few trusty Friends into the Castle of St. Andrews; taking occasion from a Rumour spread abroad that the Noblemen, bearing a deadly Feud and Hatred one against the other, were drawing together Bands of armed Men to attend them at the Convention which they had summon'd; and therefore he had cause to fear lest his Person should be expos'd to Danger amongst their tumultuous Scuffles. And to this purpose he wrote Letters to Queen Elizabeth, wherein also he promis'd that he would constantly maintain Amity with her, and follow her Counsel in settling of his Affairs. But this Accident (he said) happen'd so unexpectedly, that he could by no means ask her Counsel in it. Afterwards with good Words and a gracious Countenance he advis'd some of those Men by whom he was seiz'd upon to depart the Court for prevention of Disturbances, and promis'd 'em Pardon if they would ask it. But of them all Goury only ask'd it, and submitted himself, using this distinction, that that he had offended, not in matter, but in form. Then called he home Arran to the Court, whom he used in his most secret Counsels; and in the next place he seriously set himself to procure a good Agreement betwixt his Nobility, and to clear his Realm and Court from Civil Disorders.

Whilst he busied himself about these Matters, Sir Francis Walsingham arriv'd, sent from the Queen of England out of her great Care lest he should by corrupt Counsels now in his flexible Years be alienated from the amity of the English, to the damage of both Kingdoms. Walsingham found the King attended with the flower of his Nobility, and another manner of face and appearance of things in Scotland than he expected. At his Audience, he advis'd him at large the same things which the Queen had before by her Letters put him in mind of out of Isocrates, (namely, That it was the part of a Ruler to be so true and just in his Dealings, that more credit might be given to his Word than to others Oaths) And that he would have a great care of bad Counsellors, and be constant to himself. The King answer'd wisely and freely: That if he had written otherwise than he thought, he had done it unwillingly, against his Mind, and by constraint of those that compell'd him to it. That he, being a free Prince, was not to be reduc'd to such Streights that others must impose Counsellors upon him whom he liked not. That he had done nothing but what stood with his Honour, and was for his Security. That he had long since vow'd the First-fruits of his Friendship to his dearest Sister the Queen of England, and now he offer'd them gladly and deservedly; and more full demonstrations of his Friendship he should be able to give, when all his Nobility should be obedient to him, than when he himself was forced to obey one or two of them, and rul'd as it were but at their Will and Pleasure.

Afterwards Walsingham wish'd him not to impute to Queen Elizabeth those things which had lately fallen out in Scotland; then he shew'd him how advantageous to him and to both Kingdoms amity with England had been heretofore, and might be hereafter, if it were not neglected; and which he said would be firmly establish'd if the Differences betwixt the Nobility of Scotland were by Authority of Parliament buried in Oblivion, if those Noblemen that were remov'd from Court might be receiv'd again into Favour, Religion maintain'd inviolate, and a firm League betwixt both Kingdoms established. The King modestly answer'd, That he would maintain amity with England: That he would be wanting in no good Offices towards the Queen, and constantly defend the receiv'd Religion. And altho' he suspected Walsingham to be ill affected both towards him and his Mother, yet he graciously dismissed him; and being prudently mindful and careful of his Affairs beyond what his Age could promise, with great commendation for his Clemency, he offer'd a general Pardon to all that had surpriz'd and seiz'd upon him, if they would ask it within a time prescrib'd. But so far were they from asking it, that they secretly plotted to intercept and surprize him anew. Whereupon they were commanded to depart the Realm within a time prefix'd; of whom Marre, Glames, the Commendators of Driborough, Paslet, and some others, betook themselves to Ireland; Boyd, Zester-Wemes, Lochelvine, to the Low-Countries; and Dunfermelin into France. The Earl of Angus was confin'd within certain Bounds in Angus. Only Goury, hatching new Mischief, stay'd beyond the prefixed time, to his own Ruin, as we shall shew anon.

Thus they who expell'd Lenox against his will, were themselves, before the Year came about, expell'd against their wills out of Scotland. The King, as he loved Lenox whilst he lived, so being dead dead he had him in grateful Remembrance, and restor'd his good Name and Repute, which had by his Enemies been blemish'd and stain'd, suppressing certain infamous Libels against him. His Children he sent for out of France; his Son Lewis he made Successor in his Father's Honour, and his Daughters he match'd some time after to the Earls of Huntley and Marre. And to shew himself a King, and give early Proof how he could exercise his Kingly Authority, whereas the said Conspirators had in a Convention call'd by their own Authority, decreed their seizing of the King's Person to have been just, and had entred the same in the publick Records; he, on the contrary, in a full Assembly of the States, declar'd the same to have been traiterous: Tho' the Clergy, as if they were supreme Judges in the Kingdom, in an Assembly convoked by their own Authority, pronounced it to be most just, and thought them to deserve Excommunication who approv'd not of it.

It is not here to be forgot, how in these Days War growing hot betwixt the Muscovite and the Swede in the Northern Climate, John King of Sweden, unable to resist the Power of so great an Emperor, sent Eric of Wisimbrug, his Kinsman, Andreas Riche one of his Council, and Raschy his Secretary, on a noble Embassy to Queen Elizabeth, and by his Letters entreated her to mediate a Peace by her Ambassador: Which she did without delay, and persuaded the Muscovite to a Peace upon reasonable Conditions. For he dealt now afresh with the Queen about the League before-mention'd, and about his Refuge in England if any Disaster should befall him; and made suit also for a Wife out of England. Touching these matters, Sir Hierom Bowes Kt. was sent Ambassador thither, but could hardly satisfy him, for that the Muscovite with much importunity requir'd an absolute League written in his own Words; and would by no means hear that it was not the part of a Christian, nor allowable by the Law of Nations, to exercise Hostility without first denouncing War, or to come to Blows before such time as he that offer'd the Wrong were requir'd to give Satisfaction, and to abstain from doing farther Injury. The Queen design'd him for a Wife the Lady Anne, Sister to the Earl of Huntingdon. But when she certainly understood that he might, by the Laws of his Country, put away his Wives at his pleasure; she excus'd it again by the Lady's Indisposition of Health, and the tender Affection of her Mother, who could not endure the absence of her Daughter in a Country so far distant, and that she had no power to give the Daughters of her Subjects in Marriage without the consent of their Parents. Nevertheless the Ambassador prevail'd with him to confirm the Merchants Privileges; but his death ensuing the Year following, the Trade of the English in Russia withal decay'd by little and little, and the Ambassador was sent back, who returning not without danger of his Life, was receiv'd by the Queen with Favour and Commendations. He was the first (if an Historian may have leave to mention so trivial a matter) who brought into England the beast call'd a Machlis, never before seen here: It is like an Elk, in Latin Alce, having no Joints in the Legs, and yet wonderful swift. He brought also certain Fallow-Deer of admirable Swiftnes, which being yok'd together, would draw a Man sitting in a Sled with incredible speed.

Theodore Joannides, the Son of John Basilides, (to continue our relation of the Affairs of Muscovy) succeeded in that vast Empire; a Prince of a duller Spirit, but yet one that would hearken to them that gave him good Counsel. This Theodore granted to all Merchants of what Nation soever free access into Russia: And being oftentimes solicited by the Queen to confirm the Privileges granted by his Father to the Muscovia-Company of English Merchants, to wit, that only Englishmen of that Company should come in to or trade in the North Parts of Russia, and that Custom-free, in regard they were the first that discover'd the Passage thither by Sea. He thereupon desir'd her to give liberty to all the English to trade into Russia; for to permit some, and deny others, was Injustice. Princes, he said, must carry an indifferent hand betwixt their Subjects, and not convert Trade (which by the Law of Nations ought to be common to all) into a Monopoly to the private Gain of a few. As for his Customs, he promis'd to exact less by the one half of that Company than of the rest, because they first discover'd the Passage thither by Sea. In other matters he confirm'd their former Privileges, and added some few more out of his respect to the Queen, and not for any desert, as he said, of the Company, many of whom he found had dealt fallly with his People. And other answer than this could Giles Fletcher, Doctor of Law, who was afterwards sent Ambassador on the same account, get none. This Fletcher set forth a Book of the Russian Polity or Tyranny, wherein are many things worthy of observation. Which Book notwithstanding was quickly suppress'd, lest it might give offence to a Prince in amity with England.

Out of Polonia, a Country bordering upon Russia, came this Summer into England to see the Queen, Albert Alasco, Palatine of Siradia, a learned Man, well shap'd, with a long Beard, and very comely and decent Apparel: Who being graciously welcomed by her, and entertain'd by the Nobility with great Respect and Feasting, as also by the University at Oxford with learned Diversifements and several Comedies, after 4 Months stay here, withdrew himself privately, being run far in Debt.

In the County of Dorset there happen'd this Year no less strange a sight than did in Herefordshire in the Year 1571. For a piece of Ground of three Acres in Blackmore remov'd out of its place, with Trees and Hedges, and pass'd over other Land, leaving a great Pit, and stopping up an High-way which led to Cerne. Whether this happen'd thro' some such boisterous Wind under Ground, wherewith Seneca writeth that the Heads of the Gods were turned backward in Jupiter's great Couch; or by reason of much Moisture, the Springs there bubbling up in great abundance, considering that the Ground lay upon a shelving Hill; let others examine.

This was the last Year of Thomas Ratcliffe, the third Earl of Sussex of that Family; a Man of singular Fidelity to his Country, and of a very noble Extraction, his Mother being the Duke of Norfolk's Daughter, and his Grandmother Daughter to Henry Duke of Buckingham, Constable of England. Who having pass'd thro' the highest Honours, (having been sent Ambassador into Germany by Queen Mary to the Emperor Char. V. about the Marriage to be contracted with Prince Philip; and afterwards into Spain to the said Prince Philip about ratifying the Covenants thereof, and to the Emperor Maximilian about Queen Elizabeth's Marriage with Charles of Austria; having been Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord-President of the North-parts of England beyond the River of Trent, renown'd for his Victories against the Hebrilians, and the Scots who infested the Borders) at length, worn out with a tedious Sickness, died at London without Issue, (tho' he had had

This Year also died Henry Wriothesley Earl of Southampton, a Man as much devoted to the Romish Religion and the Queen of Scots as any, for which he incur'd his Prince's Displeasure, and endur'd Imprisonment in the Tower. He was Son to Thomas Wriothesley, (whom for his singular Vertue King Henry VIII. advanc'd to the Dignity of Baron Wriothesley of Titchfield, to the Order of the Garter, and to the high Honour of Chancellor of England, and made him one of the Overseers of his last Will and Testament; afterwards by Edward VI. raised to the Honour of Earl of Southampton). This Henry left by his Wife, the Daughter of Anthony Viscount Montacute, Henry his only Son and Successor, and a Daughter married to Thomas Lord Arundel of Wardour.

Sir Hum. Gilbert. Near the same time was swallow'd by the Ocean Sir Humphrey Gilbert Kt. a quick and lively-spirited Man, famous for his knowledge in matters relating both to War and Peace, in his return from the North-part of America, which we call Newfoundland, whether he had set sail a little before with five Ships, having sold his Patrimony in hopes to plant a Colony there. But after he had by an Herald or Crier proclaim'd that Country to belong to the English Jurisdiction, (for Sebastian Cabot was the first that discover'd it, in the Year 1497, being employ'd therein by Henry VII.) and had assign'd Lands to every particular Man of his Company; he suffer'd so much by Shipwrecks and want of necessary Provision, that he was constrain'd to give over his Enterprize, learning too late himself, and teaching others, that it is a difficult thing to carry over Colonies into remote Countries upon private Mens Purfes, than he and others in an erroneous Credulity had persuaded themselves, to their own Cost and Detriment.

His design at Newfoundland frustrate.

Colonies are hardly planted in far Countries by private Men.

Death of Grindal Archbishop of Canterbury.

Tamarisk first bro't into Engl.

Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury.

About that time died also Edmund Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England, being Blind and above sixty Years of Age; a religious and grave Man, who returning from his Banishment under Queen Mary, was made first Bishop of London, afterwards Archbishop of York, and lastly Archbishop of Canterbury, and flourished in great Grace with the Queen, till by the cunning Artifices of his Adversaries, he quite lost her Favour, under pretence that he had countenanced the Conventicles of some turbulent and hot-spirited Ministers, and their Prophecies, (as they call'd them) but in truth, because he had condemn'd the unlawful Marriage of Julio an Italian Physician with another Man's Wife, while Leicester in vain oppos'd his Proceedings therein. That little Wealth which he had gather'd he bestow'd upon the founding of a School at St. Bee's in Cumberland, where he was born, and towards the advancement of Learning in both the Universities. And to his care (if I may mention so small a matter) are the Englishmen beholden for Tamarisk, which, having found it by experience to be exceeding good to ease the hard Distemper of the Spleen, he first of all brought into England.

In his room succeeded John Whitgift, being translated to Canterbury from the See of Worcester; an excellent and very learned Man, who gain'd singular Commendation both by his Justice in the Vice-presidentship of Wales, and by maintaining the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England: Which Commendation he farther merited by his Fortitude, Prudence and Patience. Him the Queen (who, as in Civil matters, so also in Laws Ecclesiastical, was of opinion that no loose Remissness was to be us'd) gave in Charge, that he should take special care to restore the Discipline of the Church of England, and the Uniformity in the Service of God establish'd by Authority of Parliament, which thro' the Connivance of the Prelates, the Obstinacy of the Puritans, and the Power of some Noblemen, was neglected; while some of the Clergy closely impugn'd the Queen's Authority in Ecclesiastical matters, separated the Administration of the Sacraments from the preaching of the Word, us'd new Rites and Ceremonies at their pleasure in private Houses, utterly condemn'd the Liturgy and the Administration of the Sacraments establish'd, as contrary in some things to the holy Scriptures, as also the Order of Bishops, and therefore refused to come to Church, and made a downright Schism; while the Papists stood laughing at it, and drew many daily over to their Party, as if there were no Unity in the Church of England. To take away these Inconveniences, and restore Unity, he propounded these Articles to be subscrib'd to by the Ministers.

First, That the Queen had the chief and supreme Power over all Persons born within her Dominions of what Condition soever they were; and that no foreign Prince or Prelate had, or ought to have, any Power, Civil or Ecclesiastical, within her Realms or Dominions.

Secondly, That the Book of Common-Prayer, and another Book of Ordaining Bishops and Priests, contain'd nothing in them contrary to God's Word, but might lawfully be us'd; and that they should use that, and no other Form, either of Prayer, or Administration of the Sacraments.

Thirdly, That they approved the Articles of the Synod at London, publish'd by the Queen's Authority in the Year 1562, and believed the same to be consonant to God's Word.

On this occasion incredible it is what Controversies and Disputations arose, what Hatred, and reproachful Speeches he endur'd at the Hands of factious Ministers, and what Troubles, yea and Injuries also, from some Noblemen, who by promoting unfit and undeserving Men, caus'd distraction in the Church, or else gaped after the Revenues and Livings of the Church. Nevertheless thro' Constancy, Fortitude and Patience, he overcame all Difficulties at last, and restor'd Peace to the Church: So that not without good reason he may seem to have have chosen that Motto, Vincit qui patitur; that is, He overcometh who suffereth with patience.

And not only did these Men trouble the Church at home, but also some others, who sprung from these, did the like abroad; namely, Robert Brown a Cambridge-man, a young Student in Divinity, of whom the new Sectaries were call'd Brownists; and Richard Harrison, a petty Schoolmaster. For these two, presuming by their own private Spirit to judge of matters of Religion, did by Books set forth at this time in Zeland, and disperfed all over England, condemn the Church of England as no Church, and entangled many in the Snares of their new Schism; notwithstanding that their Books were suppress'd by the Queen's command, and solidly confuted by learned Men, and that two or three of the Sectaries were executed at St. Edmundsbury.

On the other side, the Writings of certain Papists against the Queen and other excommunicated Princes, drew some Men, who had the Pope's Power in great esteem, from their Obedience; and amongst others, they so distracted Somervill's attempt against the Q.

Strangles himself.
Ardern hang'd.
one Somervill, a Gentleman, that in all haste he took a Journey privately to the Queen's Court, and breathing nothing but Blood against the Protestants, furiously set upon one or two by the way with his drawn Sword. Being apprehended, he confest that he would have kill'd the Queen with his own Hands. Whereupon he, and upon his Impeachment Edward Ardern, his Wife's Father, a Man of a very ancient Family in the County of Warwick, Ardern's Wife, their Daughter Somervill, and Hall a Priest, as Accessaries, were arraign'd and condemn'd. Three Days after, Somervill was found strangled in Prison. Ardern was condemn'd, and the next Day after hang'd and quarter'd. The Women and the Priest were spared. This woful End of this Gentleman, who was drawn in by the cunning of the Priest, and cast by his Evidence, was generally imputed to Leicester's Malice. Certain it is that he had incur'd Leicester's heavy Displeasure; and not without cause, for he had rashly oppos'd him in all he could, reproaching him as an Adulterer, and defaming him as a new Upstart.

English betray Alost to the Spaniards.
Unhappy end of Traytors.
Thus went Affairs at home: But abroad, the English which lay in Garison at Alost, a Town in Flanders, being neglected, and having neither Pay nor Victuals, were the last Month of this Year driven to those Extremities, that Pigott who had the Command of them, and the rest of the Captains, breaking their Oath of Fidelity, betray'd the Town for a sum of Money to the Spaniards; and fearing the Disgrace thereof among their own Countrymen, join'd themselves with the Prince of Parma: From whom notwithstanding, when they found he kept not his Word with them, they slunk away by degrees. But the Authors of this Treachery came every one of them to unfortunate Ends. Pigott went into Spain in hope of Reward; but being slighted and laugh'd at, he return'd again into the Low-Countries, where he was taken by his own Country-men, and sent into England, and there died miserably in Prison. Dalton, of a Traytor becoming a Pirate was hang'd in England, and Vincent in Brabant. Tailour was stabb'd by the Earl of Westmoreland; and Walsh, after he had been tossed with a thousand Miseries, was slain in France. Thus God's Vengeance followeth Traytors at the heels; as Ireland this Year saw by more apparent Examples.

The E. of Desmond slain.
For that infamous Rebel and Traytor to his Country, Gerald Fitz-Gerald, or Geraldides, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of his Family, when his Men were spent with Famine and Sword, (and had barbarously vowed to forswear God before they would forsake him) and when he had scap'd the Hands of the victorious English for almost two Years, by lurking here and there in Corners, was now by a common Soldier found out in a little Cottage, tho' unknown to him, till having his Arm almost cut off he discover'd himself, and was slain by being run through the Body in many places. His Head was sent over into England, and set upon a Pole upon London-Bridge.

His Defeat, vast Estate and Relations.
Such was the End of this powerful Man in Ireland, who deriv'd his Pedigree from Maurice Fitz-Gerald of Windsor, an Englishman, and of great Renown amongst the first Conquerors of Ireland in the Year 1170. He had very fair Lands and Possessions, yea whole Provinces, with Kerry a County-Palatine, many Castles, a number of Vassals and Dependents, and of his own Kindred and Surname he had about 500 Gentlemen at his Devotion. Of all which, as well as of his Life also, he was bereft within three Years, very few of his Family being left, after he had once Sander's famili'd to death.

forfeited his Allegiance to his Prince, through the Persuasion of certain Priests. The principal of whom was Nicolas Sanders, an Englishman, who very near the same time was miserably famili'd to death, when forsaken of all, and troubled in mind for the bad success of the Rebellion, he wander'd up and down amongst Woods, Forests and Mountains, and found no Comfort or Relief. In his Pouch were found several Speeches and Letters made and written to confirm the Rebels, stuff'd with large Promises from the Pope and the Spaniard. Thus the Divine Justice (if a Man may judge) stop't that Mouth with Hunger which had been always open to encourage Rebellions, and to belch forth malicious Lies and Slanders. For (to omit other things) he was the first Man that broached that abominable Lye concerning the Birth of Queen Elizabeth's Mother, which no Man in those Days (tho' the Hatred and Malice of the Papists was then fresh against her, and might remember it) ever knew, England in full forty Years after never heard of, the computation of Time doth egregiously convince of Falshood and Vanity; and he, forgetting himself, (which a Lyar should not do) doth himself plainly confute. Yet are there some ill-disposed People who blush not at this Day to besur their Writings with this so impudent a Lye.

Baltin-glass the out of Ireland.
James Fitz-Eustace; that is, the Son of Eustace, Viscount Baltin-glass, a Man of great Interest amongst the Lords of Ireland, being terrified with the unhappy Fate of these Men, fled into Spain, where he miserably pined away with Sorrow. He had a little before, out of Zeal to the Romish Religion, taken up Arms with the Rebels against his Prince, and writing a short obscure Letter to the Earl of Ormond his Neighbour, (who deriveth his Descent from St. Thomas of Canterbury's Sister) amongst other things he with this piece of Wit exhorted him to do the like for the Romish Religion, Had not blessed Thomas of Canterbury died for the Church of Rome, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond. For, to expiate the Murder of the said Thomas, King Henry II. had in former time given to his Ancestors large Possessions in Ormond.

Perott Lord Deputy of Ireland.
Husbandmen sent into Munster.
Perott's good Service.
Sir John Perott Kt. who had born the Office of President of Munster with Commendation, being this Year made Viceroy or Lord-Deputy of Ireland, as soon as he had receiv'd the Sword, summon'd the States of the Realm to a Parliament, wherein several Laws were enacted, and Desmond, who was lately slain, was condemn'd of High-Treason, and all his Lands and those of the other Rebels in Munster confiscated. Which when the Queen was resolv'd to lease out at a very easie rate, thereby to invite Husbandmen thither, that so those fruitful Fields might not lie untill'd, (for the Rebellion had brought a miserable Devastation) some of those who were employ'd to enquire after the Estates of the Rebels, and others who took their Lands, began to turn the faithful and loyal Subjects out of their Possessions with violence and force, so that the Queen was fain to restrain them by Proclamation, lest the injurious Avarice of some private Persons should kindle a new Fire of Rebellion. Wherein the Lord-Deputy did good Service, tho he were now and then blamed by the English, as too favourable to the Irish, and too rigid to the English. But he, by administering Justice indifferently, and shewing equal Favour to the Irish and the English, restor'd the Country by little and little to a happy Peace and Tranquillity, and by fair and peaceable means reduc'd the fiercest and rudest of the Inhabitants under the power of the Laws. The Hebridian Scots, who had made an Irruption 1583. Irruption into Ireland out of the Isles, he sufficiently plagued. Donell Gormi, that is, the Blue, Ann. 26. and his Brother Agne Mac-Conell, who had seiz'd upon the small Country of Glimes, and Surley Boy, that is, the Tawney, their Uncle, who had invaded Rout, a neighbouring Tract, near the Isle of Ricnea, now Rachlin, he drove to those Straits, having by the Valour of Captain Meriman slain many of their Family, that they swore Allegiance to the Queen, and receiv'd from her, upon their Intreaty and Petition, certain Lands in that Corner of the Country; upon Condition, that they should serve the Kings of England only, in their Wars, and none else without their Leave; that they should find so many Horse and Foot in all Expeditions, and pay such a Number of Beeves and Hawks every Year. And thus went things in Ireland.

1584. The Seven and twentieth Year of her Reign.

New Stirr
in Scot-
land.

In the beginning of the Spring, certain Scots came privately home out of Ireland, according as they had before laid their Design with Goury, who was now upon new Projects with some others, for seizing upon the King's Person again. These Men gave out openly, that they aim'd at no other thing than the Glory of God, the Purity of Religion, the Security of the King and Kingdom, and the maintaining of Amity with the English, against those who by their cunning Artifices and Devices drew the King, whilst he was yet in his tender Years, to the Ruin of all. The King hearing hereof, forthwith commanded Colonel Stuart, with all possible speed, to seize Goury, the Contriver of the Conspiracy, who had already withdrawn himself to the Haven of Dundee, pretending as if he would depart the Realm. Goury, being guilty in his own Conscience, contentin'd the King's Authority, made an obstinate Resistance, and fought desperately to defend the House he was in; but within an Hour or two, he was taken and carry'd to Prison.

The Conspirators in the mean time took Sterlin, taking the Town by Surprize, and the Castle after, by Composition; but presently quitted them again, as well because the King had drawn forth his Army into the Field, and was ready in Person to advance against them, as because the Forces which were met, were far less than Goury had promis'd, and they had in vain expected Assistance out of England. And whilst every Man for Fear now shifted for himself, Marre, Glames, and Angus, (who had join'd with them) with some others, fled, and coasted the Country into England, beseeching the Queen to relieve them in their forlorn Condition, and to make Intercession for them to the King, in regard they had lost their Estates and the King's Favour for no other Reason, than because they stood for his Good and the Good of England. The King on the contrary accused them to the Queen of high Misdemeanours, and required to have them deliver'd into his Hands, according to the League. But there were in the Court those that persuaded the Queen, that they were Men dutiful and obedient to their King, and highly careful of his Safety, in regard they attempted nothing against him, while they had him in their Hands. And as for that Article for delivering up of Rebels, usually express'd in Leagues, it was long since grown out of use among Princes. These Men also went about to persuade the King of Scots to deal favourably with them, being so many in Number, and so considerable for Quality; lest they should by Despair be driven to worse Undertakings; alledging that Terror and Violence are but weak and unsuccessful Supports of Power, producing several sad Examples out of the Scottish History; and commending his Mother, and her Husband King Francis, that when the Civil-War began in France, they wink'd at the Miscarriages and Offences of the great ones.

When Walsingham, who extremely favour'd the Fugitives, sent his Letters, commanded that, for their Security, they should be receiv'd into Lincolne, or the Holy Isle; Hunsdon, who was of all Men the greatest Friend to the King of Scots, oppos'd it, judging that that Isle, being a place so strongly fortify'd, was not to be put in the Possession of those Scots, who might possibly prove Enemies, nor the Secretary to be satisfy'd herein, unless the Queen expressly commanded it by her own Letters; for that the Jurisdiction of the place did of right belong to him, as Warden of the East-March.

Hereupon grew a Dispute, whether the Secretary might not by his own Authority, without the Prince's special Warrant, and without acquainting the Governors of Places, direct and execute the Prince's Business upon all occasions. What was determin'd herein I find not: but certain it is, they were not admitted into the Isle. Yet was it thought good to shew them Favour, that they might be made use of against the contrary Faction in Scotland: for now the Clergy spread abroad Rumours in all places, that the King was ready to fall off from the Reform'd Religion; and this upon no other probable Argument, (tho' they pretended many) but because his filial Love and Obedience inclin'd him wholly towards his Mother, and because he receiv'd those into his closer Friendship, whom he knew to be most devoted to her.

In the mean time, Goury was try'd by his Peers at Sterlin. The principal Articles he was charg'd withal, were these. That whereas the King had rais'd him to his high Honours, Wealth, and Offices, and had reputed him as his Kinsman, he had notwithstanding enter'd into a new Conspiracy against his Person, whom he had before kept Prisoner in his House. That he had held Conspiracies by Night with Angus's Servants, for the possessing himself of Perth and Sterlin; had by Force and Arms resisted the King's Authority at Dundee; had conceal'd a Conspiracy on foot, for the Destruction of the King and his Mother; and lastly, had conspired with one Maclean a Witch. He, protesting his Innocence, and his sincere Affection towards the King, acknowledg'd his Favours, sharply tax'd the Earl of Arran as his Adversary, and a bloody-minded Man, complain'd that he was apprehended, through his subtil Contrivance, just as he was ready to depart the Land, and fraudulently persuaded, by the Hopes of Life and Pardon offer'd him, to confess the things objected against him, which therefore in Equity ought not now to be laid to his Charge, seeing they had been deceitfully extorted from him. The Reason why he made Resistance (he said) was, because he thought the Warrant for his Apprehension written with Arran's Hand, to be of less force than the Letters of Protection which he had under the King's broad Seal. And whereas he did for a short time conceal the Conspiracy against the King and his Mother, he was not so much to be blamed for that, as to be commended for revealing the same afterwards. Lastly, protesting that he hated and detested, from his Heart, all Magicians and Witches; he said openly, that if there were any such, he thought them to be for the most part in Princes Courts. But his Peers, after they had duly sworn that they had been no Instigators of the King's Advocate to accuse him, pronounc'd him guilty of High-Treason; and the same 1584. same Evening he was beheaded. His Head was presently sew'd to his Body by his Friends, which was afterwards bury'd.

Ann. 27. While the Scots with such ill Success enterprized these things against their King, for Queen Elizabeth's sake, (as they pretended) at the same time some Englishmen attempted no less matters, and with no better Success, against their own Q. for the Queen of Scots sake. Of whom the principal Man was Francis Throckmorton, eldest Son of John Throckmorton, a Justice of Peace in Cheshire (who not long before had, by Leicester's Policy, been turn'd out of the Commission, and fined, for having (if I be not mistaken in the Lawyers terms) supply'd or fill'd up some Words in a Fine or Judicial Instrument, transcribed out of an old worm-eaten original Copy, and had not produced it with all the Defects that were in it at first.) This Francis came into Suspicion, by means of a Letter to the Queen of Scots, which was intercepted. No sooner was he committed to Custody, and had confess'd some things, but Thomas Lord Paget, and Charles Arundel a Courtier, privately fled the Land, and withdrew themselves into France; where, with others devoted to the Romish Religion, they heavily bewail'd and complain'd amongst themselves, That the Queen was, without any Fault or Desert of theirs, alienated from them, by the subtil Artifices of Leicester and Walsingham: That they were unworthily disgraced, and ignominiously used: That strange kind of Tricks and Cheats were invented, and secret Snares so closely laid, that they must whether they would or no, and before they were aware, be involv'd in the Guilt of High-Treason; and that there was at home no hope at all of any Safety. And indeed there were at this time some subtil ways taken, to try how Men stood affected. Counterfeit Letters were privately sent in the Name of the Queen of Scots and the Fugitives, and left in Papists Houses: Spies were sent abroad up and down the Country to take notice of People's Discourse, and lay hold of their Words: Reporters of vain and idle Stories were countenanced and credited. Hereupon many were brought into Suspicion, and amongst the rest Henry Earl of Northumberland: his Son, Philip Earl of Arundel, was confined to his own House; his Wife committed to Sir Thomas Sherley's Custody. William Howard, the Earl's Brother, and Henry Howard, their Uncle, the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, were several times examin'd about Letters from the Queen of Scots, and from Charles Paget; and about one Mope, then unknown; and their Prudence and Innocence could hardly protect them. Neither yet are such ways for Discovery and so easie giving Credit to be esteem'd altogether vain, where there is a Fear for the Prince's Safety. Certain it is, at this time an horrid piece of Popish Malice against the Queen discover'd itself: for they set forth Books, wherein they exhorted the Queen's Gentlemen to act the like against the Queen, as Judith had done, with Applause and Commendations, against Holofernes. The Author was never discover'd, but the Suspicion lighted upon Gregory Martin an Oxford-Man, one very learned in the Greek and Latin Tongues. Carter a Book-seller was executed, who procured them to be printed.

Throckmorton's Treason. L. Paget fled into France. Complaint of the Catholics. Counterfeit Letters, Spies abroad, &c. Many suspected.

And whereas the Papists usually traduced the Queen as rigid and cruel, she (who was always very careful to leave a good Name and Memorial behind her) was highly offended with the Inquisitors that were to examine and discover Papists, as inhumanely cruel towards them, and injurious to her Honour. Insomuch as they thought it necessary to excuse themselves by a publick Writing; wherein they protested, That the Priests were more favourably dealt withal than they deserved: That they were never once question'd for their Religion, but only for dangerous Contrivances against their Prince and Country; and that upon vehement Suspicion, and probable Arguments and Evidence: That Campian was never rack'd so, but that he was presently able to walk, and subscribe his Confession: but Briant obstinately refusing to speak or write who it was that penn'd those obscure Papers found about him, was indeed deny'd Food, till such time as he ask'd it in Writing. But these things did not satisfy the Queen, who commanded the Inquisitors to forbear Tortures, and the Judges to refrain from putting to death. And not long after, she commanded 70 Priests, some of which were condemn'd, and others in danger of the Law, to be transported out of England: amongst whom those of chiefest Note were, Gaspar Heywood, Son to that famous Epigrammatist, who was the first of all the Jesuites that came into England; James Bosgrave, of the Society of Jesus also; John Heart, the most learned of them all; and Edward Rishon, that impious ungrateful Man to his Prince, to whom tho' he ow'd his Life, yet he soon after set forth a Book, wherein he vomited out the Poison of his Malice against her.

Her Mercifulness to them.

The Lord Paget and Arundel being come into France, Sir Edward Stafford, the Queen's Ambassador there, diligently observ'd them; yet could by no means discover what they were contriving. He dealt nevertheless with the French King, that they, Morgan, and other Englishmen, who were plotting against their Prince and Country, might be remov'd out of France. But he receiv'd no other Answer than this: 'That if they attempted any thing in France, the King would punish them according to Law; but if they had attempted any thing in England, the King could not take Cognizance thereof, nor proceed against them by Law. That all Kingdoms were free for Fugitives; and that it concern'd every King to maintain the Privileges of his own Kingdom: yea, that Queen Elizabeth herself had not long since receiv'd and harbour'd in her Kingdom, Montgomery, the Prince of Conde, and others of the French Nation; and that Seneguire, the King of Navarre's Ambassador, lay in England at this very time, hatching new Troubles against the French King.

In the mean time, Don Bernardino de Mendoza, Spanish the Spaniards Ambassador in England, secretly cross'd the Sea into France, in a great Rage and Fury, as if he had been thrust out of England, contrary to the Privilege of an Ambassador; whereas indeed, being a Man of a violent and turbulent Spirit, and abusing the sacred Privilege of his Embassy, by fostering and encouraging of Treason, he was commanded to depart the Land only, altho' by the ancient Rigour and Severity in such cases, he was to be prosecuted (as many thought) with Fire and Sword. For he had his Hand in these wicked Designs with Throckmorton and others, for bringing in of Foreigners into England, and deposing the Queen. And being gently reprimanded for the same, he was so far from clearing himself of the things objected against him, by any modest Answer, that he charged the Queen and Council, by way of Recrimination, with detaining the Genoeses Money, with assisting the States of the Low-Countries, the Duke of Anjou, and Don Antonio, and with the Depredations of Drake. But yet, lest the Spaniards should think that Mendoza's Misdemeanors were not hereby punish'd, but the Privileges of his Ambassador violated, William Waad, Clerk of the Council, was sent into Spain, to inform the Spaniards, plainly how ill he had perform'd the Duty of an Ambassador; and withal to let him know, (lest the Queen by thus commanding him away might seem to renounce the ancient Amity that had been betwixt both Kingdoms) that all Offices of Kindness should by her be still shew'd, if he would send any other Person who should seem desirous to preserve Friendship, provided the like Kindness might be shew'd to her Ambassador in Spain. But the Spaniard not vouchsafing to give Waad Audience, but referring him to his Council; he, taking it in Disdain, boldly declared, That it was a thing usual and customary, even in the Heat of War, for Ambassadors to be admitted into the Presence even of a Prince an Enemy; and that the Emperor Charles V. the Spaniard's Father, admitted an Herald to his Presence, who declared War against him from the French King: and therefore he flatly refused to impart the Contents of his Embassy to his Council. And when Idiacio, the Spaniard's Secretary, could not, by all the Wit he had, learn from him what his Errand was, at length he understood the whole matter from Mendoza, who lay lurking in France. Then, laying aside his publick Quality, he in familiar Discourse told Waad, 'That he was sorry there were some that cunningly went about to break off the Amity that was betwixt both Princes, and to beget Misunderstandings. That Injury had been done to the Catholick King himself, rather than to his Ambassadors, to Dispey heretofore, and now to Mendoza: neither was there any Reason why he should accuse Mendoza farther to the King, who had already sufficiently smarted for his Fault, (if he were in any) by his disgraceful Expulsion from England; or that he should complain he was not admitted to Audience. For the Catholick King had but requited like for like, considering that Mendoza was dismiss'd by the Queen, without a Hearing; and as she had remitted Mendoza to her Council, so did the King in like manner refer him to Cardinal Granvel. And though Waad answer'd, that there was a great Difference betwixt him, who had never done any thing against the Catholick King, and Mendoza, who notoriously offended the Queen, insolently refusing for a long time to come at her, and having done things unbeseeming an Ambassador; yet could he not be admitted, but return'd home unheard. The greatest part of the Crimes which he would have charged upon Mendoza, were taken out of Throckmorton's Confession.

For when Throckmorton was to be apprehended, he had secretly sent away a Cabinet of private Papers to Mendoza. The rest of his Coffers being searched, there were found two Catalogues, in one whereof were written the Names of the Ports in England, that were convenient to land Forces at; in the other, the Names of those Gentlemen all over England, that embraced the Romish Religion. As soon as he saw these two Catalogues produced, he cry'd out that they were counterfeit, never seen by him before, and foisted in purposely for his Ruin: and this he said while he was upon the Rack. But being brought again to the Rack, he refused not to answer to his Knowledge what Questions were demanded of him. And being then ask'd touching those Catalogues, and to what intent they were written, he devised this Story. 'That going some few Years before to the Spaw, he had consulted with Jeney and Sir Francis Inglefield, how England might be best attempted by Foreigners, and the Form of Government alter'd: and to that end he had taken those Notes of the Havens, and the Gentlemens Names. That Morgan had given him to understand, by Letters out of France, that the Catholick Princes were now resolv'd, that England should be invaded, and the Q. of Scots set at liberty, under the Conduct of the Duke of Guise, who now wanted nothing but Money, and an auxiliary Army to be ready in England. That to procure these things Charles Paget was sent privily into Sussex, under the counterfeit Name of Mope, where the Duke of Guise purpos'd to land. That he had imparted the Matter to Mendoza, and shew'd him the Names of the Havens, and of the Gentlemen, who had already been made acquainted with them by the Conspirators. He deny'd not but he had promis'd his Assistance; and withal had told Mendoza what Gentlemen he might safely treat withal about these things, as being a publick Person, which he, being a private Man, could not do without Danger: and that he concluded with him of a way, how certain principal Men of the Catholicks might, as soon as the foreign Forces should arrive, raise Men, in the Queen's Name, to join with the Foreigners. These things he voluntarily then confess'd.

Nevertheless, being charged with these matters, at the Bar in Guildbal, London, he stiffly deny'd every particular, and affirm'd that they were vain Fictions of his own, purposely utter'd that he might not be put again to the Rack; and openly accused the Queen of Cruelty, and his Examiners of false dealing: imagining he should escape, by reason of the distance of time, between the Crime committed and his bringing to Trial. For in the Thirteenth Year of Queen Elizabeth, several Crimes were reckon'd up as High-Treason, for which yet no Man was to be call'd in question, unless the Delinquent were charg'd therewith, within six Months after the Fact committed, and the thing were prov'd by the Witness and Oath of two Men, or by the Party's voluntary Confession, without Constraint or Violence. But this time was long since expired, and therefore (he said) he was not to be call'd in question. But the Judges shew'd, that the matters objected against him were not of that sort there mention'd, but that he was indicted upon an ancient Statute of High-Treason, made in the Reign of Edw. III. which admitted of no Circumscription of Time or Proof. And according to this Law was Sentence of Death pronounced against him. Being afterwards perswaded, he cast himself upon the Queen's Mercy, and in Writing confess'd again at large all those things in a manner which he had done before: which yet (such was his Inconstancy) he again began to deny at the Gallows, but in vain.

William Waad, being return'd out of Spain, was sent about this time to the Queen of Scots, about a Treaty to be holden betwixt her and Sir Walter Mildmay, which was propounded two Years before, and interrupted, as I have said formerly. To whom she protested, with many Asseverations, how sincerely she had dealt concerning this Treaty, and withal vow'd herself and her whole Ability to the Queen, and promis'd to depend wholly upon her, if she would vouchsafe to shew her so much Love and Honour. Moreover she religiously promis'd, if this Treaty did proceed, to mediate, yea to engage, that her Son should receive Angus and the rest of the Scottish Noblemen into Favour; as also that the Bishops of Ross and Glasgow, her Agents in France, should attempt nothing to the Prejudice of the Queen or the Realm of England; and that they should from thenceforth have nothing to do with the English Rebels and Fugitives.

These things Queen Elizabeth was glad to hear: and whereas at very near the same time Angus, Marre, J. Hamilton, and Glames were fled into England, 1584. England, she, laying hold on the Opportunity, sent Beale to the Queen of Scots, in concert with the Earl of Shrewsbury, to let her know, that if she continued in the same Mind which she had express'd to Waad, Mildmay should come shortly to her, and treat with her about her setting at liberty: and farther, to persuade her in the mean time, to mediate with her Son, for the Restoring of the Scottish Fugitives, and inform her that they had design'd nothing against the King, but only against certain violent Counsellors, who had seduced him by their evil Advice: and, lastly, that he might learn from her, as near as might be, the Attempts and Designs of the Duke of Guise. She very prudently answer'd, 'That she much desired the Treaty might proceed, and this she earnestly crav'd of Queen Elizabeth, as of her elder Sister, to whom she tender'd all Respect and Honour. That she had propounded nothing to Waad but what was limited with Conditions; and that he could say no other, whom she took to be an upright, honest Man. That to the Restoring of the Fugitive Scots, her helping Hand would be very necessary, and thereof they should not fail, if she could certainly find that any Advantage would come thereby to her and her Son; provided they would humbly submit themselves to the King, and become obedient to him: otherwise she would not appear for them, but assist her Son to bring them to their Duty. Further, she deny'd not but that, when she found herself grow sickly, she committed herself and her Son to the Protection of the Duke of Guise, her dearest Kinsman: That she understood nothing of his Attempts; neither, if she did, would she discover it, unless she had good Assurance given her of her Deliverance: for it were no point of Wisdom, to forsake certain Friends upon uncertain Hopes. She pray'd that she might be no more hardly dealt withal, (being a free Princess) than Queen Mary dealt in times past with Queen Elizabeth, being then her Subject and Prisoner; or than the French King dealt of late with the King of Navarre, his Subject also, and up in Arms against him. She pray'd also, that the Treaty might be completed before any Commissioner were appointed in Scotland, touching that matter. And whereas the most Christian King had acknowledg'd her Ordinary Ambassador, and Seton, who was sent from her Son into France, as Ambassadors from Princes of the same Authority, and associate in the Government, she offer'd the Queen the Honor to publish this Association of her and her Son in Scotland, and besought her that she would no ways prejudice the same. These things had a Hearing, but were soon laid aside, and the whole Business defeated, by means of certain Fears cast in the way by those who knew how to increase Suspensions between Women that were already displeas'd with one another; but principally by the Discovery of certain Papers which Chreighton a Scottishman, of the Society of Jesus, passing into Scotland, and being taken by some Netherland Pirates, had torn in pieces: the torn Pieces whereof being thrown over-board, were, by the Wind, blown back again, and fell by Chance into the Ship, not without a Miracle, (as Chreighton himself said.) These being put together by Waad, with much Pains and singular Dexterity, discover'd new Designs of the Pope, the Spaniard, and the Guises, for invading England.

Hereupon, as also upon occasion of Rumours from all parts, that great Dangers were at hand and threatned, to prevent the wicked Designs and treacherous Practices of Seditious People, and to provide for the Queen's Safety, upon which the Welfare both of the Realm and Religion depended, many Men of all Degrees and Conditions throughout England, by Leicester's means, and out of their own publick Care and Love, whilst they stood not in Fear of her, but were full of Fear for her, bound themselves in an Association, by mutual Vows, Subscriptions, and Seals, to prosecute to the death, as far as lay in their power, all those that should attempt any thing against the Queen.

The Queen of Scots, who easily perceiv'd that her Destruction was aim'd at by this Association, being weary of her long Misery, and fearing harder Measure, propounded these things following to the Queen and Council by Name her Secretary. That if her Liberty might be granted her, and she might be assured of Queen Elizabeth's sincere Affection and Love towards her, she would enter into a closer Amity with the Queen, affectionately love and observe her above all other Princes in Christendom, forget all by-past Displeasures, acknowledge her to be the true and rightful Queen of England, forbear to pretend or lay Claim to the Crown of England during her Life, attempt nothing against her directly or indirectly, flarty renounce the Title and Arms of England, which she had usurp'd by the Command of King Francis her Husband, as likewise the Pope's Bull for her Deposing; yea and enter also into the aforesaid Association for the Queen's Security, and into a League defensive, (so far as might stand with the ancient League betwixt France and Scotland) provided that nothing should be done during the Queen's Life, or after her Death, which might prejudice her, her Son, and their Heirs, in the Succession, before such time as they were heard by the Parliament of England. That for Confirmation hereof, she herself would stay a while in England, as an Hostage: and if she were permitted to depart out of England, she would deliver other Hostages. Moreover, that she would alter nothing in Scotland, provided she and her Family might be allow'd the Exercise of their Religion. That she would also bury in Oblivion all Injuries done to her in Scotland, (howbeit upon the Condition, that whatsoever had been enacted to her Disgrace and Disparagement, might be repeal'd.) That she would recommend such Counsellors to the King, as were well-affected to Peace with England; and reconcile unto him, as far as lay in her Power, such of his Nobility as were fled, if they would submissively acknowledg their Fault, and that Queen Elizabeth would pass her Word and Promise to aid the King against them, if at any time they should fly off from their Duty and Obedience. That she would do nothing about her Son's Marriage, without acquainting the Queen: and as she would do nothing without the Advice of her Son, so she desired that her Son might be included in this Treaty, that so it might be the more strongly and solidly confirm'd. She doubts not but the King of France would be her Surety in the Business, and pass his Word, together with the Princes of the House of Lorain, for Performance of Covenants. She pray'd that a speedy Answer might be return'd hereto, lest any Inconveniences should fall out in the mean time. And lastly, she besought that she might be kept in freer Custody, that thereby the Queen's Love towards her might be more plainly discern'd.

These things, as favouring of much Respect and Honour, Queen Elizabeth seem'd to take great Pleasure and Contentment in; and it was believ'd she was then really purpos'd to set her at Liberty, tho' there wanted not some in England, who, by laying new Fears before her, deterr'd her from it. But the Business, which was as good as concluded, was quite hinder'd and dash'd by the Scots of the contrary Faction, who cry'd out, 'That there was no Hope of Queen Elizabeth's Safety, if she were set at Liberty;

A Conference on the Borders.

And not content with this, some Ministers in Scotland bitterly inveigh'd against the Queen, and loaded her with unworthy Calumnies, both from the Pulpit, and in their ordinary Meetings; and withal notoriously bespatter'd the King and his Council; for which being commanded to appear before them, they refused with a disdainful Contempt, as if the Pulpits were exempted from the Authority of Kings, and Churchmen were not subject to the command of the Prince, but to the Presbytery; flatly contrary to the Laws made this Year in an Assembly of the States, whereby the King's Authority over all his Subjects, as well Ecclesiastical as Civil, was establish'd for ever. By which Laws the King and his Council were made competent Judges in all Causes; and those who declined their Judgment, were to be reputed guilty of High-Treason: The Assemblies of the Presbyteries, (as also the Conventions of Laymen) as well general as particular, were prohibited, which had assumed and arrogated to themselves a boundless Authority, both to assemble at their pleasure without the King's Consent, and to prescribe Laws to the King himself and the whole Realm: The popular Equality also of Ministers was taken away, and Bishops restor'd to their Dignity and Jurisdiction, whose Order the Presbyters had condemn'd as Antichristian: Also scandalous and defamatory Writings against the King, the King's Mother, and his Council, and particularly George Buchanan's History, and a Dialogue of the Right and Privilege of the Scottish Kingdom, were prohibited and suppress'd, as containing in them many scandalous Passages not fit to be read.

These things some of the Ministers took so heinously, that they voluntarily departed the Land, and filled all England with their Clamors and Complaints, as if the true Religion of Christ were now quite driven out of Scotland. But Queen Elizabeth hearken'd not to them, but neglected them as Innovators and Men given to change, neither suffer'd she them to Preach in England; yet now and then she us'd their help, lest Religion in Scotland should receive any Prejudice. And when Arran, who was in high Trust and Favour with the King, officiously offer'd his Service with all Respect to maintain Amity with the English, she thought it a fit time to make use thereof, that neither the Scottish Fugitives might be proscrib'd in the Parliament of Scotland now at hand, nor the King's Mind alienated from the Friendship of the English. Whereupon a Conference was appointed between Arran, and Hunsdon Governor of Berwick, upon the Borders of both Kingdoms. But before this Conference came to be held, the Fugitives and all those that were present at the Attempt upon Sterlin (the meeting of the Parliament being hasten'd) were proscrib'd: And at the Conference, which follow'd presently upon it, Arran charg'd them with great and weighty Crimes; and amongst other things, That they had very lately plotted the Destruction of the King. But he promis'd most religiously, that he would be wanting in nothing whereby he might give the Queen Satisfaction; and that he would not do any thing which might prejudice her, as long as he was in Grace and Credit with the King. Notwithstanding within a Month the Scottish Borderers, through the secret Wiles of the Spaniard, (who labour'd all he could to divert Queen Elizabeth from the Low-Country War) invaded Rhedefdale, using all manner of Hostility; and not long after the English Borderers sharply revenged the Wrong they had receiv'd by Fire and Sword all over Liddefdale.

Now came Ambassador from Scotland, Patrick Grey, Heir of that Family, a quaint young Gentleman, and one that thought himself able for the weightiest Business, if not more. The chief Heads of this Embassy were, about restraining of Incursions on both sides; about restoring of Goods taken by Piracy; and about either sending back the Scottish Fugitives, according to the League, or removing them farther from the Borders of Scotland, they with others in Scotland daily plotting new Treasons against the K. For the more easie obtaining of these things, and to win the Queen's Affection more fully to the King, he made her believe he would reveal some secret Conspiracies against her. To the first and second Points he receiv'd the Answers he desir'd. As for sending back the Scots, the Queen answer'd, That she was verily persuaded that those Gentlemen had not so much as imagined the least Mischief in their Hearts. That those things which fell out of late in Scotland, proceeded not from any ill-will of theirs towards the King, but from mutual Differences arising amongst the Nobility always in the Minority of their Kings, which it concern'd their King to make up with all speed, and to bind his Subjects to him in one common Band of Obedience, and suppress all Factions amongst them. Nevertheless, in some part to satisfy the King's just Request, and that she might come to know what were those secret Practices which he spake of, she commanded that the Scottish Fugitives should remove farther from the Borders. What Discovery soever he made, the Queen made shew as if she understood it all before; and many Men accus'd Grey, as if, corrupted with Money, he had blabbed forth somewhat to the prejudice of the King and his Mother, and had hinder'd the accepting of those so reasonable Conditions which were propounded by Narve from the King's Mother.

Whereupon she, whose Patience had now for a long time been abused, began to fall into great Sorrow and Indignation, and, out of a desire of her Liberty, to open both her Heart and her Ears as well to the treacherous Counsels of her Adversaries, as to the dangerous Advices of her Friends. And the rather, because, as she had persuaded herself that the late Association was made for her Ruin and Undoing, so now she had heard that she was (through the crafty Contrivance of some) to be remov'd from the Custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury, (who was a down-right honest Man, and favour'd not their Attempts) and committed to new Keepers. Which that it might be done the more handsomly, and the Fidelity of the Earl of Shrewsbury, which had been thoroughly tried and approved, might not seem to be suspected, (for it was not thought good openly to blemish so great a Man's Reputation, which notwithstanding they had stained secretly by Calumnies ground'd upon the false Accusations of his ill-condition'd Wife) Suspicions were laid hold on, as if there were a Plot already laid to set her at Liberty; and those rais'd upon occasion of certain Emblems sent unto her. The Emblems were these: Argus with many Eyes lull'd asleep by Mercury sweetly piping, with this short Sentence, Eloquium tot lumina claudit; that is, So many Eyes hath Eloquence fast clos'd: Mercury cutting off Argus's Head, who was Io's Keeper: A Scion grafted into a Stock, and bound about with Bands, yet budding forth fresh, and thus written about, Per Vincula cresco; that that is to say, By Bands I grow: A Palm-Tree pressed down, but rising up again, with this Sentence, Ponderibus innata Virtus resistit; that is, 'Gainst Weights doth inbred Virtue strive. This Anagram also, Veritas armata; that is, Truth armed, according to her Name Maria Stuarta, the Letters being transposed, was taken in an ill sense. There were also Letters produced, as if they had been intercepted; wherein the Friends of the captive Queen complain'd, that all hope of delivering her was quite cut off, if she were once committed to the Puritans Keeping. Under pretence hereof she was remov'd from the Earl of Shrewsbury, who had many times earnestly desired the same, and committed to the Custody of Sir Amias Poulet and Sir Drue Drury, and that purposely, (as some thought) that, being thereby driven to Despair, she might be apt to take rash Counsels and Resolutions, and be the more subject to be ensnared. For the Earl of Shrewsbury had kept her for fifteen Years with such Wariness and Circumspection, that he had prevented all possible ways of attempting any thing either for or against her. But now not only the with importunity solicited the Bishop of Rome and the Spaniard by Sir Francis Inglesfield to hasten what they had in hand with all speed, whatever should become of her; but also Leicester (who, as People thought, contrived and studied how to prevent her lawful Succession) privately sent certain cut-throat Murderers (as some report) to take away her Life. But Drury, being a sincere honest Man, and detesting from his Heart so foul a Deed, denied them access to her. Nevertheless there were some employ'd underhand to her, and several Letters secretly sent her, as well counterfeit as true ones, whereby her weak Sex might be thrust forward to her own Destruction, as we shall shew afterwards.

To alienate Queen Elizabeth wholly from her, it was whisper'd in her Ears, that Allen for the Romish Churchmen of England, Inglesfield for the Laiety, and the Bishop of Ross for the Queen of Scots, had with unanimous consent resolv'd, with the assent also of the Bishop of Rome and the Spaniard, 'That Queen Elizabeth should be depriv'd of her Crown, the King of Scots disinherited of the Kingdom of England, as being both of 'em notorious Hereticks; and the Queen of Scots married to some English Catholick Nobleman: That this Nobleman should be elected King of England by the English Catholicks, and the Election confirm'd by the Bishop of Rome: That his Children by the Queen of Scots should be proclaim'd lawful Successors to the Crown. And all this was taken upon the credit of Hart a Priest. But who this Englishman should be, Walsingham enquir'd with all imaginable diligence, but could never find out. But the Suspicion lighted upon Henry Howard, the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, who was a Man of noble Blood, a Batchellor, a furious Catholick, and therefore in very great Credit and Repute amongst the Papists.

Within the compass of this Year Charles Nevil, that traitorous Rebel against his Prince and Country, the last Earl of Westmorland of this House, ended his Life obscurely in a miserable Exile. From this Family, fruitful in Nobility, there sprung (besides six Earls of Westmorland) two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, an Earl of Kent, a Marquis Montacute, a Duke of Bedford, a Baron Ferrers of Ousley, Barons Latimers, Barons Abergavenny, one Queen, five Dutcheses; to omit Countesses and Baronesses, an Archbishop of York, and a great number of inferior Gentlemen.

In England died this Year Edmund Plowden, than whom no Man is more worthy to be remembered; who as he was singularly well learned in the common Laws of England, whereof he deserved well by his Writings; so for Integrity of Life he was second to no Man of his Profession.

And in France died Francis Duke of Anjou, of Sickness which he contracted through Grief and Trouble of Mind. And in Holland, William Prince of Orange, being treacherously shot with three Bullets out of a Gun by Balthazar a Burgundian.

For the sad loss of these two, Queen Elizabeth was very much troubled, and sent B. into France, to let the King understand how heavily she took the Duke of Anjou's Death, whom she had alway found to be a most faithful and dear Friend to her; and withal to put him in mind what a sad Condition the Netherlanders now were in, the Prince of Orange being slain, and how formidable the growing Power of the Spaniard was; for all the Princes in Italy were at his beck, the Bishop of Rome was wholly addicted and engaged to him, the Cardinals were as it were his Vassals, all the ablest Persons for matters both of War and Peace were his Pensioners; in Germany the House of Austria, an House extending and branching far and wide, and other Houses allied to the same by Marriages, did as it were attend upon him and his Service; his Wealth also and Strength were so much encreased, both by Sea and Land, since the late addition of Portugal and East-India, that he was far more Powerful and Formidable than ever his Father Charles V. was; and if he should once reduce the Netherlanders under his Power, there was nothing to hinder but that the rest of the Princes of Christendom must of necessity stoop to his Greatness, unless it were timely prevented.

The Eight and Twentieth Year of her Reign. 1585.

Queen Elizabeth, that she might bind the French King to her in the firmer Tie of Amity, having the last Year chosen him into the Order of the Garter, now sent Henry Earl of Derby with the Robes and Ensigns of that Order into France, solemnly to invest him therewith. The King receiv'd them with great Respect and Esteem, being invested at Even-song, (the English refusing to be present at Mass) and religiously promis'd to observe the Laws of the said Order, which were not repugnant to the Laws of the Holy Ghost and St. Michael, to which he was before formally sworn.

At this time a Parliament was holden, and William Parry, by Nation a Welshman, born of obscure Parentage, and of mean Estate, by Title a Doctor of the Law, (though but indifferently learned) a Man neat, spruce, and very proud; when a Bill was prefer'd in the Lower-House against the Jesuits, was the only Man that stood up to speak for them, pleading that the said Law was cruel, bloody, desperate, and of pernicious Consequence to the English Nation. Being desir'd to shew his Reasons, he obstinately refused, unless it were before the Queen's Council; whereupon he was committed to Custody: But his Reasons being after heard, and submission made, he was admitted again into the House. Shortly after, the same Parry was accused by Edmund Nevil (who claim'd the Inheritance of the Nevils Earls of Westmorland, and the Title of Lord Latimer as next Heir-Male) to have been engaged in a secret Design for taking away the Queen's Life.

Ann. 28.
This Parry, (to search the matter a little higher) returning out of Italy above two Years since, had, to win Favour and Credit with the Queen, privately reveal'd what Morgan and other Fugitives had wickedly plotted and agreed on, for the taking away of her Life; pretending that he had gone along with them for no other intent, but only for the Queen's Safety. Hereupon she did not lightly give Credit to Nevil's Information; yet commanded the Walsingham to ask Parry, Whether he had dealt about this matter with any malecontented and suspected Person, to feel his Inclination in the Business. He flatly deny'd that he had; and being otherwise a Man quick-sighted enough, yet saw he not the Evasion which the Queen's Lenity had laid before him. For if he had but given the least inkling that he had dealt with Nevil to feel him, whom he had already told the Queen to be a suspected and malecontented Man, he had without doubt avoided the Danger. But a wicked Deed once resolv'd upon does many times infatuate the sharpest Wits. Then whereas Nevil had no Witnes to make good his Accusation, Parry was brought to confront him; when after some tart biting Words against one another, Parry began to relent a little, and, being sent to the Tower of London, voluntarily confess'd these things, which I shall briefly relate.

He sees not a fair Evasion when offer'd.
His Confession.
In the Year (says he) 1570. I was sworn one of the Queen's Servants, and continued entirely devoted to her Majesty, till the Year 1580. at what time I came into Danger of losing my Life with great Disgrace. (For he had broken into Hugh Hare's Chamber, in whose Debt he was, and had wounded him; for which he was by the Law condemn'd, but had his Life saved by the Queen's gracious Pardon.) From that time I continued troubled in my Mind, and, having procured a Licence, withdrew myself into France; not with any intention to return hither again, for I had devoted myself to the Catholick Religion. At Paris I was reconciled to the Church of Rome. At Venice I had Conference with Benedict Palmio a Jesuite concerning the distress'd Catholicks in England; and I gave him some Hint that I had found out a way to relieve them, if the Pope or any learned Divines would justify it to be lawful. Palmio extoll'd this as a pious Design, and me he recommended to the Pope's Nuncio at Venice, whose Name was Campeius, and Campeius recommended me to the Pope. I besought by Letters that I might come to Rome with a safe Conduct. Letters of safe Conduct were sent me from the Cardinal of Como, but not large enough: afterwards others were sent me more large and full: but then I was return'd to Paris. There I lighted upon Morgan, who told me, that it was expected by divers, that I should do some notable Service for God and the Catholick Church. I answer'd, that I was ready to kill the greatest Subject of England. But (said he) why not the Queen herself? And this (said I) might easily be done, if it might appear to be lawful. For Wattes a Priest (with whom I had Conference about it, concealing Persons Names) affirm'd flatly, it was not lawful. (And Chreighton also, the Scottish Jesuite, avouch'd the same; teaching, That Evil was not to be done that Good might come of it: That God was better pleas'd with Adverbs than with Nouns; and more approv'd what was done well and lawfully, than what was otherwise Good: and, That many Souls were not to be redeem'd with the Destruction of any one, without the express Command of God.) Notwithstanding I, having engaged myself both by Letters and Promises, while I was in Italy, thought it an heinous Sin to give over my Enterprize, in case the Pope should approve it by his Letters, and grant me a plenary Pardon, which I begg'd of him by Letters I sent to him by Ragazonio his Nuncio in France, who highly commended my Design, and sent my Letters to Rome. Being return'd into England, I procured Access to the Queen, to whom, in private, I discover'd the whole Conspiracy, howbeit cloak'd with the best Art I could. She heard me without being daunted: I departed not without being terrify'd; and cannot now forget what she then said, That no Catholicks should be call'd in question merely for Religion or the Pope's Supremacy, so that they shew'd themselves good Subjects. In the mean time, whilst I was a daily Suitor in the Court for the Mastership of Saint Katharine's, I receiv'd Letters from the Cardinal of Como, wherein my Enterprize was commended, and myself absolv'd in the Pope's Name. These Letters I imparted to the Queen. What Effect they wrought with her I know not; to me certainly they added Courage, and took away all Scruple. Yet was I not minded to offer her any Violence, if she could by any means be perswaded to deal more favourably with the Catholicks. And therefore, left I should commit the Murder, I laid away my Dagger still as often as I had Access to her. When I seriously consider'd her and her truly royal Vertues, I was distracted with doubtful Thoughts; for my Vows were recorded in Heaven, my Letters and Promises amongst Men. These things I often ponder'd with an unquiet Mind: I was never much beholden to her for any thing: my Life indeed she once pardon'd me; but to have taken it away upon that Occasion had been cruel and tyrannical. Hereupon I departed from the Court much unsatisfy'd with my Condition. I lighted upon Dr. Allen's Book against the Justice of Britain, where he taught that Princes excommunicate for Heresie were to be deprived of Kingdom and Life, which Book did strongly encourage me to prosecute my Attempt. This Book I read to Nevil (whom I sometimes invited to my Table) six whole Months before he accus'd me. Afterwards he came to me and said, Let us venture upon somewhat, since we can get nothing from the Queen: and he propounded several things about the Delivery of the Queen of Scots. But I have (said I) greater Business in my Mind, and of more Advantage for the Catholick Church. The next day, he came and swore upon the Bible, that he would conceal and constantly pursue any thing that should be for the Good of the Catholick Religion: and I swore the like. We then resolv'd with ten Horsemen to set upon the Queen, as she rode abroad to take the Air, and to kill her. All which Nevil conceal'd till now. But having heard that the Earl of Westmoreland was dead, whose Estate he had already swallow'd in Hopes, he presently broke his Oath, and accus'd me of these things. All this he confess'd before the Lord Hunston, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham, all three of the Privy-Council. He acknowledg'd also his Fault, and begg'd Pardon for the same by his Letters to the Queen, to Burleigh Lord-Treasurer, and to Leicester.

Some few days after he was arraign'd at the King's-Bench-Bar in Westminster-Hall: where the Articles of his Indictment being read, he confess'd himself guilty. And when his Confession was recorded, and Judgment demanded against him, Hatton thought it necessary, for the Peoples Satisfaction there present, that his Crime should be clearly and fully represented, out of his own Con-

Confession, which Parry acknowledg'd to be voluntary, and pray'd the Judges that he might read it himself. But the Clerk of the Crown read both it, and also the Cardinal of Como's Letters, and Parry's own to the Queen, to Burleigh, and to Leicester; which he confess'd to be the very Letters themselves. Yet did he deny that ever he was resolv'd to kill the Queen. Being now commanded to speak, if he had any thing to say, why Judgment should not be given against him, he gave a confused Answer, as if he were troubled in Conscience for the foul Fact he had undertaken, I see I must die, because I have not been constant to myself. Being will'd to declare more plainly what he meant, My Blood (said he) be amongst you. Sentence of Death being pronounced, he in a Fury cited the Queen to the Judgment-Seat of God. The fifth day after, he was laid upon an Hurdle, and drawn through the midst of the City to Westminster. At the Gallows, when he had made his Boasts how faithful a Preserver and Keeper of the Queen he had been, he said he was never fully resolv'd in his Mind to take away the Queen's Life. Thus this vain-glorious Man, not so much as in the least commending himself to God, suffer'd the Death of a Traitor, by the Law, in the Court-yard of the great Palace at Westminster, where was then a full Assembly of the Estates of the Realm, met in Parliament.

In this Parliament some there were, who, out of a Desire either of Innovation or Reformation, struck deeply at the Ecclesiastical Order, (tho' the Queen had forbid it) by bringing in of Bills for Restraining the Episcopal Jurisdiction in granting of Faculties, in conferring of Holy Orders, in Ecclesiastical Censures, and in the Oath ex officio; and Proposing a new Oath to be taken by the Bishops, in the Chancery and the King's-Bench, viz. that they should act nothing contrary to the Common-Law of England: also requiring Residence from the Clergy, that every Minister should be resident at his own Cure; and exclaiming as if the Church of England were destitute of able and learned Pastors, which without doubt had more learned Pastors at this present than any other Age, or any other Reform'd Church, could shew. But the Queen, who had a high Esteem of moderate Church-men, and disliked Innovators, as always changing for the worse, * utterly rejected these Attempts, as tending to overthrow her Prerogative, and the supreme Authority granted to her in Ecclesiastical matters. But the Association which I mention'd before was now confirm'd by the general Consent and Approbation of all. And it was Enacted, 'That twenty four or more, of the Privy-Council and House of Lords, to be deputed by the Queen's Commission, should make Inquisition after all such as should invade the Kingdom, raise Rebellion, or attempt to hurt or destroy the Queen's Person, for or by whomsoever employ'd, that might lay Claim to the Crown of England. And that he for whom or by whom they should attempt the same, should be utterly incapable of the Crown of England, deprived wholly of all Right and Title to it, and prosecuted to Death by all faithful Subjects, if he should be judg'd by those four and twenty Men, to be guilty of such Invasion, Rebellion, or treasonable Attempt, and by publick Proclamation so declared.

Laws also were made for Preservation of the Queen's Person against all Jesuites and Popish Priests who should ground any villanous Plots and Designs upon the Bull of Pius Quintus; to wit, 'That they should depart the Realm within forty days. That those who should afterward return into the Kingdom, should be guilty of High-Treason. That he who should wittingly and willingly harbour, relieve and maintain them, should be guilty of Felony. (So they call all Capital Crimes under the degree of Treason.) That those who were brought up in Seminaries, if they return'd not within six Months after Notice given, and submitted not themselves to the Queen, before a Bishop or two Justices, should be guilty of High-Treason. And if any so submitting themselves should within ten Years approach the Queen's Court, or come within ten Miles thereof, their Submission should be void. That those who should by any means whatsoever send or convey over any Money to Students in such Seminaries, should incur the Penalty of a Premunire, (that is, perpetual Exile, and Loss of all their Goods.) That if any of the Peers of the Realm, that is, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Viscounts, or Barons of Parliament, should offend against these Laws, he should be brought to his Trial by his Peers. That if any should know of any such Jesuites or other Priests abovesaid, lurking within the Realm, and should not discover them within twelve days, he should be fined and imprison'd at the Queen's Pleasure. That if any Man should be suspected to be a Jesuite or Priest as aforesaid, and not submit himself to Examination, he should for his Contempt be imprison'd till he did submit himself. That he who should send his Children, or any others, to Seminaries and Colleges of the Popish Profession, should be fined in an hundred Pounds of English Money. And that those who were so sent thither, should not succeed as Heirs, nor enjoy any Estates, which should any way fall to them: the like for all such as should not return home from the said Seminaries within a Year, unless they did conform themselves to the Church of England. That if the Wardens or Officers of the Ports should permit any others besides Seamen and Merchants, to cross the Seas, without Licence of the Queen or six Privy-Counsellors, they should be put out of their Places, and the Masters of such Ships as carry'd 'em, should forfeit their Ships and Goods, and suffer Imprisonment for a whole Year.

With the Severity of these Laws (which notwithstanding seem'd necessary for the present time) the Papists in England were very much terrify'd; and amongst them Philip Howard Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Norfolk's eldest Son, in so much as he purpos'd to fly the Land, lest he should offend against them. This Philip had thro' the Queen's Grace and Favour been restored in Blood three Years before, and having soon after lost her Favour, through the secret Accusations of some great Persons, had privily reconciled himself to the Popish Religion, living likewise a very austere Life. Hereupon he was call'd once or twice before the Council, and clear'd himself of the matters objected against him; nevertheless he was confined to his own House. After about six Months, he had his Liberty again, and came to the Parliament: yet he withdrew himself the first day from the Assembly, while the Sermon was preaching. The Parliament rising, he, being now resolv'd to be gone, wrote a Letter to the Queen, (which notwithstanding he appointed to be deliver'd her after his Departure) wherein he made a long and sad Complaint of the Malice of his potent Adversaries, whereunto he was necessitated to give place, whilst they triumph'd over his Innocence. He recounted the fatal Ends of his Ancestors, namely, his Great-grand-father, who was condemn'd without being heard; his Grand-father,

And added, That he for his part, left he should be the Heir of his Forefathers Infelicity, and that he might the better attend the Service of God, and provide for his Soul's good, hath quitted his Country, but not his Allegiance to his Prince. Before such time as this Letter was deliver'd, he was gone into Sussex; and being now ready to embark himself in an obscure Creek, he was apprehended through the treachery of his own Servants and the discovery of the Master of the Vessel, and thrown into the Tower of London.

The E. of Arundel apprehended, and sent to the Tower.

The E. of Northumberland found dead.

Causes of his Imprisonment.

In the same Tower was Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland at this time kept Prisoner, a Man of a lively and active Spirit and Courage, (Brother to Thomas who was beheaded at York) which Henry was suspected to have plotted secretly with Throckmorton, the Lord Paget and the Guises, for invading of England, and setting the Queen of Scots at Liberty, whom he always highly favoured. In the Month of June he was found dead in his Bed, shot with three Bullets near his left Pap, his Chamber-door being barr'd on the inside. The Coroner's Inquest from the Neighbourhood impannell'd and sworn, according to custom, and having view'd the Body, consider'd the Place, found the Pistol with Gunpowder in the Chamber, and examining his Man that bought the Pistol, and him that had sold it, gave their Verdict, that he had kill'd himself. The third Day after there was a full Meeting of the Peers of the Realm in the Star-Chamber, where Sir Thomas Bromley Lord-Chancellor of England briefly declared, that the Earl had been engag'd in traitorous Designs against his Prince and Country, which when he found once to be discover'd, he had laid violent Hands upon himself, being terrified with the guilty Conscience of his Offence. But to satisfy the Multitude, who are always prone to believe the worst in such cases, he commanded the Attorney-General and the Queen's Council, to shew plainly the Reasons why the Earl had been kept in Prison, and the manner of his Death. Hereupon Popham, the Queen's Attorney-General, beginning at the Rebellion in the North, sixteen Years before, shew'd out of the publick Records, 'That he had been called to his Trial about that Rebellion, and the Design for the delivering the Queen of Scots; and that he had acknowledg'd his Fault, submitted himself to the Queen's mercy, and was fined 5000 Marks. But that the Queen (out of her Clemency) had not exacted one Farthing thereof; and after the Execution of his Brother for the same Crime, had confirm'd him in the Honour of Earl of Northumberland. That he, notwithstanding all this, had engag'd himself in new Designs for delivering the Queen of Scots, the conquering of England, and the destruction of Religion and the Queen. That Mendoza the Spaniard had given notice to Throckmorton, that Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, had secretly confer'd with him in Sussex about these Matters; and that the Lord Paget had signified the same things in a manner to Throckmorton. That the same also did appear by the Papers of Chreighton a Scottish Jesuit; and that Charles Paget had told the same things to William Shelley, at his return out of France.

Then Egerton, the Solicitor-General, argu'd notably from Circumstances, and the Earl's extraordinary care to conceal the Business, that he was guilty thereof: Viz. 'That the Earl, when no Man in England could accuse him of these things but only the Lord Paget, (with whom Throckmorton was very familiar) within few Days after Throckmorton was taken, provided a Ship by Shelley's means for Paget, wherein he went over into France. That when Throckmorton had begun to confess some things, the Earl remov'd from London to Perworth, and, sending for Shelley, told him, that he was fallen into danger of his Life and Estate, and pray'd him to conceal all, and to send such out of the way as were privy to the Lord Paget's departure, and the coming of Charles Paget. Which was presently done; and he himself sent his Man aside whom he had employ'd to Charles Paget. The Solicitor added, 'That while he was in Prison, he had, by corrupting his Keepers, often dealt with Shelley to understand what he had confess'd. That after Shelley had let him know by a Woman, which was secretly employ'd as a Messenger betwixt them, that he could conceal things no longer; that their Conditions were not alike, for himself was to undergo the Rack, so was not the Earl in respect of his Place and Quality; and had sent him in Writing what Passages he had confess'd; the Earl fetch'd a Sigh, and forthwith said, (as Pantin who waited on him in his Chamber confess'd) That he was now undone by Shelley's Confession.

After all this the manner of his Death was related, from the Evidence of the Inquest, the Testimony of the Lieutenant of the Tower, some of the Warders, and Pantin his Servant: And thereupon it was concluded, that he had with his own Hands murder'd himself, out of a Fear lest his Family should be attainted and utterly ruin'd. Certainly many good Men were much affected that so great a Person died so miserable and lamentable a Death; as well because Men naturally favour Nobility, as that he had acquir'd singular Commendation for his Valour. What Suspicions the Fugitives mutter'd concerning one Bailiffe, that was one of Hatton's Servants, and a little before appointed to be the Earl's Keeper, I omit, as being a thing altogether unknown unto me, and I think it not meet to insert any thing upon mere Hearsays and Reports.

Whence the Seeds of these Mischiefs came which were sown in England, Queen Elizabeth was not ignorant, who had understood that the Guises had now openly entred into a dangerous Conspiracy against the Protestant Religion, the French King, and herself. She on the other side, to procure a League amongst the Protestants for defence of their Religion, sent Sir Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmark, the Elector-Palatine, the Dukes of Saxony, Wittenberg, Brunswick and Lunenburg, the Marquis of Brandenburg, and the Landgrave of Hesse; and amongst other things gave him Instructions to put the King of Denmark in mind by the by, that it principally concern'd him to prevent the Attempts of the Guises, considering that they stuck not to challenge the Kingdom of Denmark for their Cousin the Duke of Lorain, as Grandson to Christiern II. King of Denmark by his Daughter. Neither did the Lorainer himself dissemble or disown the same, when not long since he was a Suitor to Q. Elizabeth for Marriage.

But into Scotland (lest any Danger should break in upon England from thence as it were by the back Door) she sent Sir Edward Wotton, to let the King know how acceptable his Kindness towards her was, which he had declared of late by Patrick trick Gray and the Justice-Clerk; and moreover to draw him to a League of mutual Offence and Defence, by shewing him the Dangers which now threaten'd the Protestant Religion; and to offer unto him, as if he were her Son, as large a yearly Pension as her Father had allow'd her; (for the Revenues of the Scottish Crown were much lessen'd through the Negligence of the Regents) and to recommend unto him a Marriage with the King of Denmark's Daughter; as also earnestly to intercede in the Queen's Name for the Scots that stood exil'd in England, who she promis'd should be presently sent back if she found them guilty of the least Crime against the King. Wotton found the King's Mind inclinable enough to such a League, (notwithstanding that Arran and some of the French Faction labour'd to hinder it) and the States of Scotland, that so Religion might be secur'd, gave their Assent under their Hands to a Treaty concerning such a League; provided the Queen would pass her Royal Word, That she would not prejudice the King's Title to the Succession in England as long as he continu'd firm in Amity with her. But this Business was delay'd and hinder'd by the Murder of Sir Francis Ruffel, Son to the Earl of Bedford, which Earl died himself also the next Day after.

Who were suspected for it.
Manner of Proof on the Borders

For when Sir John Foster and Thomas Carre of Ferniburgh, Wardens of the Middle Marches betwixt the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, had appointed a Meeting on the 27th of June about certain Goods unjustly taken away, and Security was given on both sides by Oath, according to custom, and Proclamation made, that no Man should harm other by Word, Deed, or Look, (as the Borderers speak) the Scots came to the place of Meeting armed, in Battel-array, with Ensigns displayed, and Drums beating, contrary to custom and beyond expectation, being in Number about Three thousand; whereas the English were not above Three hundred. Scarce were the Wardens sat to hear the Complaints, when on a sudden, upon a Englishman's being taken pilfering, there arose a Tumult, and the Scots discharging a volley of Shot, slew Ruffel with some others, put the English to flight, and eagerly pursuing them the space of four Miles into England, carried off some Prisoners. Who was the Author of this Slaughter was not certainly known. The English laid the fault upon Arran, now Chancellor of Scotland, and upon Ferniburgh. The Queen press'd both by her Letters and Commissioners to have the Murderers deliver'd into her Hands; inasmuch as Henry IV. King of England had formerly deliver'd up into the Hands of James IV. King of Scots, William Heron and seven Englishmen, for killing Robert Carre of Chesford upon a Day of Meeting; and Morton the late Regent sent Carmichel a Scot into England for killing George Heron. The King protested his own Innocency in the matter, and promis'd to send not only Ferniburgh immediately into England, but the Chancellor too, if they could be convicted by clear and lawful Proofs to have premeditatedly infringed the Security, or procured the Murder. Fenwick an Englishman accus'd Ferniburgh of the Fact to his Face: He avoided it by a flat denial, because the other could produce no Scottishman for a Witness. For in these Trials on the Borders, according to a certain Privilege and Custom agreed upon amongst the Borderers, none but a Scot is to be admitted for a Witness against a Scot, and none but an Englishman against an Englishman; insomuch that if all the Englishmen which were upon the Place had seen the Murder committed before their Eyes, yet their Testimony had been of no value, unless some Scottishman also did witness the same. Nevertheless Arran was confined to his House, and Ferniburgh was committed to Custody at Dundee, where afterwards he died: A stout and able Warrior, ready for any great Attempts and Undertakings, and of an immoveable Fidelity to the Queen of Scots and the King her Son; having been once or twice turn'd out of all his Lands and Fortunes, and banish'd the sight of his Country and Children, which yet he endur'd patiently, and, after so many Crosses falling upon him together, persisted unshaken, and always like himself.

Whilst the enquiry after this Murder was protracted from Day to Day, and it was calmly debated, whether the yearly Money offer'd to the King under the Name of Aurei, was to be paid according to the English or French Account of Money, the Queen (who took with great Indignation Ruffel's Death and the breach of the Security, being persuaded by the Scots who were Arran's Adversaries, that he favour'd and cherish'd the Jesuits, and labour'd Tooth and Nail, both in France and Scotland, that the League might not be made with the English) suffer'd by way of Connivence, the Scottish Fugitives, viz. Angus, Scottish Fugitives sent home and assisted by the Queen, and those who by their common Condition of Banishment were reconcil'd and made Friends with him, namely John and Claudius Hamilton, and Marre, Glames, and the rest that were Exiles in England, to return into Scotland, supplying 'em with Money to suppress Arran.

The Earl Bothwell, the Lord Humes, Humes of Coldingknoll, and others in Scotland, had promis'd them their Assistance beforehand; but especially Maxwell, lately made Earl of Morton, who was in hope to escape Punishment for a Rebellion which he had rais'd in Anandale, if Arran were once suppress'd. Yea and in the King's Court also Patrick Gray, a sharp and bitter Adversary of Arran's, Belenden the Justice-Clerk, and Maitland Lord-Secretary, were drawn by Wotton's Policy to side against Arran.

The Exiles aforesaid upon their entring Scotland, set forth a large Proclamation, wherein they command all Men in the King's Name to lend their helping Hand for defence of the truth of the Gospel, for rescuing of the King from corrupt Counsellors, and for maintaining Amity with the English. Fawcirk was the place appointed for Rendezvous, where they muster'd Eight thousand Men.

Arran (who by the King's command had kept himself confined at Keneil upon suspicion of his murdering Ruffel) hearing hereof, posted to the King, and accus'd Gray as the Author of this Attempt, who fairly clear'd himself before the King. While Arran made all possible Preparation for defence of the Town, the Enemies were at hand ready to scale the Walls. He, knowing that his Head only was aim'd at, and suspecting the Fidelity of his own People, (for he began now to be hated by many) withdrew himself secretly with but one Man over the Bridge. The rest soon after abandon'd the Town, and retir'd into the Castle to the King. The Fugitives presently seize upon the Market-place, and make ready to attack the Castle. The King sent Gray to demand the reason of their coming. They answer, To submit themselves, and most humbly to kiss the King's Hand. He offers 'em restitution of all their Lands and Goods, if they would depart quietly. They send back word, that they little value their Goods and Lands in comparison of the King's Favour, and beseech him that they may be admitted to his Presence. The King consents upon these Conditions: That they should attempt nothing against his Person, or the

Some of 'em executed.

Having now by their faithful Obedience cleared themselves to the King of all those things that were scandalously and suspiciously objected against them by their Adversaries, all the Proscriptions of all Persons whatsoever, and for what Causes soever, from the King's Inauguration to that very Day, were in an Assembly of the States decreed to be for ever forgotten, (except those for the Murder of the King's Father, and those that were issued against the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishop of Ross, and the Bishop of Dunblane) and with general consent of all, the King had free Leave and Authority given him to enter into a League with the Queen of England, and to appoint Commissioners for that purpose. Only Maxwell abused this extraordinary Grace and Clemency of the King, who, having by the benefit of this general Pardon escap'd Punishment for a bloody Murder and Depredation committed against the Johnstons, was so bold and audacious, that, in contempt of the authority of the Laws, he commanded the Sacrifice of the Mass to be celebrated at Dunfreez, which had not been permitted in Scotland for these nineteen Years past. For which he afterwards suffer'd Imprisonment the space of three Months.

Neither was the neighbour Country of Ireland free in this turbulent Time from the Storms of Rebellion. For when the rest of the Provinces of this Isle enjoy'd a firm and perfect Peace, there brake forth a grand Rebellion in Connaught, the Western-part of Ireland, occasion'd by the restless and unquiet Disposition of that Nation, and their hatred against Sir Richard Bingham their Governor, who was (as they complain'd) over-sharp and rigid in his Government. He, when he saw the great Lords of Ireland exercise such heavy Tyranny over the silly People, that they durst acknowledge no other Prince but them, left nothing unessay'd that he might restrain this tyrannical Lordliness, and confirm the Queen's Authority amongst 'em, tho' he were every foot accus'd to the Queen and the Lord-Deputy, and render'd Odious for his Cruelty and Severity. Thomas Roe-Burk, of the noble English Family of Burgh, was the first that oppos'd him; and being summon'd to the Assizes in the County of Mayo, he refus'd to appear. The Governor dissembl'd the matter a while; but afterwards he commanded him and one or two turbulent Men more of that Family to be seiz'd on, lest they should break forth into Rebellion. Thomas died in fight before he would be taken; Meilery and Theobald a Burgh were taken and hanged. And the Rebellion had been now suppress'd in its very first breaking forth, had not some Englishmen who were dissatisfy'd with the Governor, given secret Notice to the rest of that Family to beware of the Governor, and by no means to come near him. They, upon this Encouragement, persuaded the Foyes and Clandonels, who were Men powerful in Followers and Adherents in that Tract, that the Governor would deal no better with them, but by little and little weaken and take away their Power also. And they so handled the matter by their Friends, that the Lord-Deputy commanded the Governor to deal no more so roughly with that noble (tho' degenerate) Family, without his Knowledge and Approbation.

Mean while, during the Governor's absence in Twomond, (where he slew Mahon O-Brean, who was up in Commotion, and took his Castle) the Sons of Edmund a Burgh of Castle Barry, and Richard the Son of Richard, (who for his wicked Deeds was furnamed by the Irish, the Devil's Hook) gathering together a multitude of lewd Fellows, seiz'd upon two Castles in Lough-Mask, and fortify'd 'em: Out of which the Governor soon drove them into the Woods and Mountains, and commanded Richard a Burgh, Brother to Thomas, who came in and humbly submitted himself, to be hang'd up as a Spy and treacherous Person. And when he had so closely pursued the rest, who wander'd and straggled up and down the Woods, that scarce any of 'em appear'd, the Lord-Deputy commanded him to pursue 'em no longer, but take Hostages of 'em, and receive 'em into his Protection. Within a short time after, while the Governor lay at Dublin, and Levies of Men were making all over Ireland for the Low-Country War, they took up the Banner of Rebellion again, and many that refus'd to serve in the Low-Country Wars, as namely the Clangibbons, Clandonnells and Foyes, join'd themselves with 'em in great numbers. And being now increased both in Number and Strength, they openly gave out, that (according to their ancient custom) they would have their Mac-William, that is, a principal Lord of that House de Burgh chosen by a popular Election to govern the Country; or else they would send for some other Head and Ruler out of Spain: That they would not admit a Sheriff amongst 'em, nor appear at the Sessions or Assizes. Neither would they return to their Duty, tho' the Archbishop of Tuam, Birmingham Baron of Ashenry, and Dillon, being sent from the Governor, propounded reasonable Conditions to 'em; but began on a sudden to harass the Country Villages in the open Champaign Country, burning and plundering all before 'em, and razing the Forts and Strong-holds. To the Hebridian Scots they sent John Iseleave and Walter Kittagh a Burgh, to persuade and invite 'em to enter into Connaught with their auxiliary Forces, whilst there were now but few Garison-Soldiers left in the Country, promising them large Possessions if they would drive out the English, and assist the Rebels.

The Lord-Deputy hearing hereof, at length commanded the Governor to march against the Rebels, who, gathering his Forces together, sent the Earl of Clan-Richard, the principal Man of the House of a Burgh, and Birmingham, to treat with 'em about Peace: Which when they flatly refus'd to hear of, he put the Hostages to death, and without delay, (as knowing that nothing was more prejudicial to the English than a lingering War, and nothing more advantageous to the Irish) he and the Earl of Clan-Richard with the Horse protected the Champaign Country from the Depredations of the Rebels; and John Bingham the Governor's Brother entering the Woods with the Foot, hunted them so closely at the Heels from place place to place, driving away about 5000 Head of Cattel, (the greatest part whereof was shared amongst the Soldiers Man by Man, according to the manner of the Country) that after forty Days or thereabouts, being grievously famish'd and spent for want of Food, they crept out of their lurking Holes, scarce knowing one another by their Faces, and humbly submitted themselves, giving fresh Hostages. Only the Sons of Edmund a Burgh of Castle Barry (whom they had determin'd to make their Mac-William) persisted in their Rebellion till their Father was taken and put to death, (having been found guilty by the Law for exciting his Children to Rebellion) and his Lands confiscated. And now the Governor had certain intelligence that 2000 Hebridian Scots, under the command of Kittagh and Iscleave a Burgh, were just ready to break into Connaught. These Scots, with an Army of Men hastily gather'd and pick'd up, and those Garison-Soldiers he had, he diligently chased and hunted Night and Day through By-ways and difficult Passages with indefatigable Labour, while they one while lurked in woody Forests near Lough Earne, and another while spent their time in marching forward and backward, winding this way and that way, and he at their Backs, in the Front, and on both Sides, constantly watch'd their Motions, waiting a fit Opportunity to engage 'em. At the last he dissimbl'd a Retreat, as if he were too weak for them; when they presently marching on more confidently towards Ardunar upon the River Moine, proclaim'd themselves Lords of the Country. He being by his Scouts soon advertis'd of their March, found 'em near Ardunar, where they put themselves in Battel-array, advanced their Banners, and founded their Bagpipes. He held them in play a while with light Skirmishes, still retreating till he had drawn 'em from the Bogs into the firm Land, and that all his Forces with great secrecy were come together. Then he charg'd 'em stoutly, and having slain many, made 'em give Ground. Shortly after his small Shot charg'd 'em in the Front, and he himself with his Horsemen set upon 'em so courageously in the Flank, that he routed their main Battel, and forc'd 'em to take the River, where they were all slain and drowned but fourscore, who swam over into Tiraul, and some who went the Day before another way to fetch in Booty, but were afterwards almost all slain by John Bingham and the Inhabitants of the County of Slego. There were slain about 3000 Men, and amongst 'em their principal Leaders, Donel Gormay and Alexander Carrogh, the Sons of James Mac-Connell, who had for a long time infested these Parts, as also those of the House of Burgh, which had drawn 'em to this unhappy Expedition. Of the English few were slain, but many wounded. This was doubtless a notable Victory, and of great Consequence both at present and to future Times, the Title of Mac-William in Connaught being hereby quite extinct, and the Insolency of the Island-Scots in Ireland suppress'd, which in former Times was so intolerable, that to harbour 'em in Ireland was accounted no less than High-Treason, and Perott, to restrain their Depredations, had formerly impos'd upon the great Lords of Ulster a certain number of Soldiers to be train'd up and exercis'd for War.

cient Enemies, should be strengthened and made more powerful by the addition of the Netherlands. * Pruney, the French Ambassador to the States, to divert 'em from applying to the English, aliedg'd, That the English were so remote and separated from them by means of the Ocean betwixt them, that they could not assist them upon every Occasion: That their way of Government was harsh and not to be endur'd, for which cause they were in former Times ejected out of France, and were now in danger of losing Ireland: That the Succession there was doubtful, and whether Mary Queen of Scots, or James her Son succeeded, the one, as well as the other, to establish and secure their own Affairs, would restore the Netherlands back to the Spaniards. But as for the French, their near Neighbourhood was convenient, their Government mild and gentle, and the Succession certain in the King of Navarre, a Prince of the same Profession with themselves.

They who favour'd the English argu'd the contrary: That the English were not at such a distance, but that they might conveniently enough relieve them, and no Man hinder them. What the Government of the French was in Times past in the Netherlands, may appear by Histories; and what it hath been of late, let Dixmuyd, Dunkirk and Dendermond speak, which were treacherously surpriz'd, as likewise Bruges, Alost, Newport and Antwerp, which were furiously and treacherously assaulted by them: And what their Fidelity hath been, which hath been so often oblig'd by Edicts, but still violated and broken, let their barbarous Massacres, committed in their Cities, witness. That the Succession in England was sure and certain in King James, a Prince very well affected to the true Religion. Besides, the English were of the same Religion, and exact observers of the ancient League with Burgundy; that their Traffick had brought infinite Wealth into the Netherlands, and their Havens were very convenient for the Netherlands. Nevertheless the States by an honourable Embassy crav'd Aid and Protection of the French King, by whom they were receiv'd with a kind of timorous Silence; and, as well out of Jealousy towards the English, as Hatred against the Spaniard, a long time put off with Delays; so that at length they return'd home without speeding; and the States having some hope upon account of the former Kindness of the Queen of England towards them, resolv'd to fly to her Protection.

Hereupon a Consultation was held in England, whether they were to be receiv'd into Protection. Some were of opinion, that they were forthwith to be receiv'd and assisted, lest the Spaniard, having subdu'd them, should from thence endanger England. There were also some who thought they were to be esteem'd as Rebels, and unworthy of Help, as having shaken off their Allegiance to their Prince. That the Spaniard had broken none of the Articles of his Joyful En-trance, which was the Pretence they had us'd for their Rebellion, and casting off their Prince. But if he had broken them, yet was he not liable therefore to lose his Principality. And tho' some think that Obedience is to be denied him for a time, till he have reform'd what hath been done amiss; yet others think that by the Law of God, to which the Law of Man must give place, Princes are to be obey'd merely for Conscience sake, as Powers ordain'd by God. That God hath given them the Authority of Commanding, and left to Subjects the Commendation of Obeying. That good Princes are to be wish'd for; but whofo-1585. Ann. 28. ever they are, they are to be born withal. That those Provinces were devolv'd to the Spaniard, not by popular Election, but by Right of Inheritance from his Ancestors, and the Donation of Emperors. Moreover that the Netherlanders themselves had receiv'd all the Privileges which they enjoy from Princes; and had forfeited the same again by their Treason, in formerly taking up Arms against their present Prince. That they who now intended to crave Protection were not the States of the Netherlands, but most of them of the vulgar sort of Men, under the Pretence and Name of the States. These therefore held it the wisest course, for the Queen to intermeddle no farther in the Netherlandish Affairs, but to strengthen and fortify her own Kingdom, to engage all her good Subjects daily more strictly to her by her Bounty and Clemency, to restrain the bad, gather Money, furnish her Navy with all sort of Provision, provide the Borders toward Scotland, with strong Garrisons, and maintain the ancient military Discipline of England, (as if the same were of late corrupted and adulterated by the Low-Country-War.) So would England become impregnable, and she on every side be secure at home, and a Terror to her Enemies. That this was the best way for those who had too powerful Neighbours to avoid and prevent War. For no Man would willingly provoke those whom he saw to be provided of Money and Strength, back'd with the Love of their Subjects, and ready and prepared to take Revenge. Great Indiscretion therefore it were, to spend Money and Soldiers, which are, as it were, the vital Spirits of War, in a foreign Quarrel, in behalf of other Princes, or indigent States, (and those Subjects to another) who will always be expecting fresh Relief; or else out of Necessity or Ingratitude, will at length provide for their own State and Security, and neglect their first Helpers. Whereof the English had heretofore had Experience in France, to their Cost, in the Quarrel of the Burgundian, and not long since also in the Defence of the Protestants there. But they who were of this Opinion incurr'd great Displeasure and Ill-will among the Military sort of Men, as Persons inclining to the Spaniard's Party, degenerate, and faint-hearted Cowards.

Netherlanders offer themselves to the Q.

She promises 'em some Assistance.

Antwerp lost.

The Q. deliberates seriously of the matter.

The States Deputies, as soon as they had Access to the Queen, earnestly besought her that she would accept of the Government of the Confederate Provinces of the Netherlands, and receive the People thereof, who were most unjustly and unworthily oppress'd, into her Protection and perpetual Vassalage. The Queen heard 'em graciously, but refused both their Government and Protection. Nevertheless, for the raising of the Siege of Antwerp, which was then closely press'd by the Prince of Parma, she agreed to send 'em forthwith 4000 Men, for which Sluis with the Ordnance and Ammunition in it should be deliver'd into her Hands as Caution. But whilst this was doing, Antwerp was yielded up on Composition, the River of Scheld having been secured by such strong Works, that no Relief could be brought into the City.

After the Queen had seriously and carefully for some time consider'd of things, and had thoroughly weigh'd the barbarous Cruelty of the Spaniards towards her Neighbours the Netherlanders, and their Hatred against England, and the Religion which she embraced; (for the Spaniard was certainly perswaded, that the Netherlands could never be reduced to his Obedience, unless England were first conquer'd;) lest the War should be brought home to her own Doors, (Scotland yet wavering) and the Spaniard's Power should too far extend and increase in Countries so near adjoining to her, and for Situation so convenient both for translating the War into England, and for the Trade of Merchants, as well by Sea, as up and down the River Rhine; as also for prohibiting the carrying of all Provision for Shipping to the Enemy; which Countries were likewise provided of a strong Fleet, and stout and able Seamen, insomuch that if they were join'd with the English Fleet, she might easily become Mistress of the Sea, and withal so rich and strong, that they had for a long time curb'd their insulting Enemies, without foreign Assistance; as also, lest they should put themselves under the Protection of the French: she resolv'd, that it was both Christian Piety to relieve the afflicted Netherlanders, Embracers of the same Religion which she profess'd; and good Wisdom also to provide for the Safety of the People committed to her Charge, by preventing the pernicious Designs of her Enemies; and that not out of any Desire of Glory, but out of meer Necessity, for the Preservation of her own and her People's Security. Hereupon she openly undertook the Protection of the Netherlanders, whilst all the Princes of Christendom admired at such manly Fortitude in a Woman, which durst, as it were, declare War against so puissant a Monarch: insomuch as the King of Sweden said, That Queen Elizabeth had now taken the Diadem from her head, and adventured it upon the doubtful Chance of War.

Between her and the Confederate States these Conditions were agreed upon. The Queen shall send the Confederate Provinces an auxiliary Force of 5000 Foot and 1000 Horse, under a Governor-General, an honourable Person, and shall find 'em Pay during the War, which the States shall repay when a Peace shall be concluded; namely, in the first Year of the Peace, the Expences disburs'd in the first Year of the War, and the rest in the four Years next following. In the mean time, Flushing and the Castle of Rammekins in Walcheren, and the Isle of Briel, with the City and two Forts, shall be deliver'd into the Queen's Hands for Caution. The Governors of these Places shall exercise no Authority over the Inhabitants, but only over the Garrison, who shall pay Excise and Impositions as well as the Inhabitants. The said Places, after the Money is repay'd, shall be restored again to the States, and not deliver'd to the Spaniard, or to any other Enemy whatsoever. The Governor-General, and two Englishmen whom the Queen shall name, shall be admitted into the Council of the States. The States shall make no League with any, without the Advice and Consent of the Queen; neither shall the Queen, without the Advice of the States. Ships for the common Defence shall be rigg'd and set forth, in equal Number, by both Parties, and at the common Charges, to be commanded by the Admiral of England. The Havens and Ports shall be open and free to both sides. With other Articles which are to be had in print.

In Memory hereof the Zealanders, transported with Joy, coin'd Money with the Arms of Zealand on one side, namely, a Lion rising out of the Waves, and this Inscription, Luctor & emergo, that is, I struggle and get above Water; and on the other side, with the Arms of the several Cities of Zealand, and this Motto, Authore Deo, Ex-vente Regina, that is, God being the Author, a Queen our Favourer. The Queen also hereupon set forth a Book, wherein she shew'd, that Leagues and Associations had been made in former times between the Kings of England and the Princes Reasons of her so doing. See the Appendix.

Princes of the Netherlands, and the Cities thereof apart, for yielding one another mutual Protection and Assistance. Then she related the barbarous Cruelty of the Spaniards towards the miserable Netherlands, and their wicked Contrivances against her, who had study'd so much to make Peace betwixt them, and had been the principal means to hinder those People from an absolute and total Revolt. Neither had she any other Intention now in sending Forces to their Aid, but only that the Netherlands might peaceably enjoy their ancient Freedom, she and her Subjects their Security, and both Nations a free Trade and Commerce.

And withal, that she might not stay to expect the War at her own Doors, but give the Spaniard somewhat to do abroad, she sent Sir Francis Drake as Admiral, and Christopher Carlisle as General of the Land-Forces, to the West-Indies, with a Fleet of 21 Ships, whereon were embark'd 2300 Volunteers, besides Seamen; who unexpectedly surpriz'd the Town of S. Jago, in the Isle of S. Jago, near Cape Verd, the Town giving Name to the Island, and being situate in a low Valley: here with Peals of Ordnance they celebrated the day of the Queen's Inauguration, to wit, the seventeenth day of November. Having sack'd the Town, they found not the least Gold in it, but of Meal, Wine and Oil great Quantities. The 14th day after they departed from that Coast, and many of them who had lain abroad in the open Air, were taken with a violent Disease call'd a Calenture, and died thereof; which Disease is ordinary in that unwholsom Air to Strangers, that come thither, and lie abroad in the Evening. On the first of January they arriv'd at Hispaniola, and about ten Miles from the City of Santo Domingo the Soldiers were landed in a safe place, which was discover'd to them by a Spaniard whom they had taken; and there setting themselves in Battle-array, they march'd towards the City; and having beaten back 150 Spanish Horse which made head against them, and put certain Musqueteers to flight which lay in Ambush, they enter'd pell-mell with them into the City at two Gates which look Westward, and at the same time the Townsmen in great Fear ran all out of the City at the North-gate. The English march'd up in a Body to the Market-place near the great Church; and not being enough to defend so large a City, they fortify'd that part of it with Bulwarks, and afterwards possess themselves of other convenient Posts in it: and being now absolute Masters of the City, they stay'd there a full Month. And because the Townsmen offer'd but a small Sum of Money to redeem the Town, they began first to burn the Suburbs, and then to fire and demolish the fairest Buildings within the City itself, till such time as the Citizens redeem'd their houses with 25000 Ducats, which they could hardly make up amongst them. The Booty was not great, except Cannon, Meal and Sugar. For only brass Money, Glasses, and China-Dishes from the East-Indies, were in use and fashion there. In the Town-hall were to be seen, among other things, the K. of Spain's Arms, and under them a Globe of the World, out of which issu'd a Horse with his Fore-feet springing forward, with this Inscription, Non sufficit Orbis, that is, The World suffices not. Which was laugh'd at, and look'd upon as an Argument of the boundless Avarice and Ambition of the Spaniards, as if nothing could suffice them.

From hence they sail'd to the Continent of America, and landed five Miles from Carthagena: and while Drake with his Pinnaces and Boats well mann'd in vain attempted the Haven of the City, which was defended by a Fort, and chain'd up, Carlisle, putting his Men in Battle-array, led 'em in the dead of the Night all along the Shoar. A Troop of Horse shew'd themselves only, and presently retreated: whom Carlisle pursu'd till he came to a narrow Neck of Land, between the inner Road of the Haven and the Ocean, fenced from side to side with a Stone-Wall, thro' which there was but one Passage, and that scarce broad enough for a Cart to pass, and defended with Barricadoes and five Pieces of large Cannon, which were several times discharg'd against the very Front of the Army, but in vain. Carlisle knowing well how to avoid that Danger, by the Help of the dark Night, and taking Advantage of the ebbing Water, led his Men somewhat lower, over the Sand, to the very Entrance of the Passage, which the English manfully brake through, notwithstanding that two Gallies constantly play'd upon the Flank of them with eleven great Guns, and three hundred Musqueteers from the said inner Road. Then they soon master'd the Palisadoes, which the Enemy were so careful as to set up at the Entrance of every Street, putting the Spaniards and the Indians, who shot poison'd and envenom'd Arrows at them, to Flight, and so became Masters of the Town; where they stay'd six Weeks, compounding at last to spare the Town for 110000 Ducats, which were presently paid, and shared equally amongst the Seamen and Soldiers which had most need. Besides this they got but small Booty. For the Citizens, having Notice beforehand from Hispaniola, had convey'd away all their richest Treasure before their coming, to places more remote. The Calenture still raging amongst them, and daily lessening their Numbers, their Design for the taking of Nombre de Dios was laid aside, and they set sail homewards, by that Cape of the Isle of Cuba, which has its Name from Saint Antonio, where they took in fresh Rain-water out of the Ponds and Pits which they found.

Then coasting along the Shoar of Florida they seiz'd upon two Towns, S. Anthony's and S. Helen's, both of them quitted and forsaken by the Spanish Garrisons; and burnt them. Afterwards holding on their Course along a desolate Coast, they lighted upon certain Englishmen, who had planted themselves in Virginia, so nam'd in Honour of Q. Elizabeth a Virgin, whom Sir Walter Raleigh, who was in great Favour with Queen Elizabeth, had of late sent thither for a Colony; a Man never sufficiently to be commended for the great Pains he took to discover remote Countries, and to advance the Glory of the English Navigation. To Ralph Lane, their Captain, Drake offer'd all Kindness and Assistance, and a Ship or two with Provision of Victuals, also some Men, if he thought good to stay there, and prosecute his Enterprize; if not, he proffer'd to bring him back into England. But whilst they were shifting the Victuals into those Ships, a violent Storm carry'd them away, and so dispers'd the whole Fleet, that they met not again till they came into England. Hereupon Lane and those who were planted there, being in great Penury and Want, and out of all Hope of Provisions out of England, their Number also being much diminish'd, with one Voice besought Drake that he would carry them back again into their own Country, which he readily and willingly did.

And these Men, who were thus brought back, were the first that I know of, that brought into England that Indian Plant which they call Tabacca and Nicotia, or Tobacco, which they used against Crudities, being taught it by the Indians. Certainly from that time forward, it began to grow into great Request, and to be sold at an high Rate,

So that the Englishmens Bodies (as one said wittily) which are so delighted with this Plant, seem as 'twere to be degenerated into the Nature of Barbarians, since they are delighted and think they may be cured with the same things which the Barbarians use. In this Voyage 700 Men were lost, and all of them almost of the Calenture. The Booty was valu'd at 60000 Pounds of English Money; 240 Brasse and Iron Canon were gotten from the Enemy and brought home.

A new Passage sought to the East-Indies.

Whilst these things were doing in America under the Torrid Zone, John Davis with two Ships, set forth at the Charge of William Sanderfon, (one that hath well deserv'd of Geographical Learning by setting forth Globes) and other Londoners, searched for a Passage under the Frozen Zone, by the upper part of America, to the East-Indies. He held his Course Northward, and at 500 Leag. from the Southern Cape of Ireland, call'd Missen-head, got sight first of the Coast of Greenland and its high Mountains cover'd with Snow; the Island being compass'd about as it were with an icy Bulwark for the breadth of two Leagues from the Land, so that there was no access to it. Following therefore the Tract hereof, which winded first towards the West, and then towards the North, to the 64th Degree of Latitude; and having passed the Ice, he fell upon certain flourishing green Islands, and found there People of an indifferent Stature, with small Eyes, no Beards, and of a civiler Disposition than most of Northern People were. From hence he sail'd Northwestward, in a Sea without Ice, and at the 66th Degree of Latitude, discover'd a Land which by little and little extended itself to the West, with a Strait all the way of an equal Breadth; into which he entred, and sail'd about forty Leagues: But towards the end of August he set sail homeward, full of hope to perfect the Discovery. The next Year after, he entred again into the same Strait, sail'd eighty Leagues in it, and found that Sea every way full of scattering Islands, and in his return discover'd it to be very full of Fish. Hereupon this Voyage was undertaken the third time with two Ships to fish, and another to discover the Passage; wherewith having passed the 83d Degree in the same Strait, which he observ'd to be 40 Leagues wide, he return'd home.

A Procla-

In the mean time a Proclamation was set forth to restrain the Covetousness of some private Men in England, who converted arable Lands and the richest pasture Grounds to the sowing of the Herb Isatis, commonly call'd Wood, for the use of Dyers, to the great prejudice of Clothiers, and the Countrymen which fed on white Meats made of Milk. Whereupon they were forbidden to sow that Herb within eight Miles of any of the Queen's Houses, and within 4 Miles of Cities, Market-Towns, and all other Towns where Clothing was used.

And for the more advantageous and gainful vending of English Cloths, Licence was granted to Ambrose Earl of Warwick, and his Brother the Earl of Leicester, Thomas Starkey, Gerard Gore, and divers other Merchants of London, for the term of two Years, to trade with the Moors in the Eastern Parts of Barbary, to make good and repair the Losses they had before sustain'd in Africa; and all others were prohibited to trade upon those Coasts. These Merchants Muley Harnet the Xeriff took into his Protection.

In the beginning of this Year died Edward Clinton, Lord-Admiral of England, who was created Earl of Lincoln by Queen Elizabeth in the Year 1572, and lies buried at Windsor, being fallily surnamed Fiennes in the Inscription of his Tomb. (Which I note, not to tax others, but lest I be taxed myself.) Henry his Son succeeded him in the Earldom; in his Command at Sea, Charles Lord Effingham, Lord-Chamberlain to the Queen. And in the place of Lord-Chamberlain succeeded the Lord Hunsdon, Governor of Berwick, substituted in that Government some few Years since in the room of Francis Russell Earl of Bedford. Which Francis (who was the second Earl of Bedford of this Family, and a true lover of Religion and Vertue) having surviv'd three of his Sons, Edward, John and Francis, so that there remain'd but only one Son, William Lord Russel of Thornhaugh, and three Daughters, married to the three Earls of Warwick, Bath and Cumberland, died of a Gangrene the next Day after his Son Francis was slain (as I said before) upon the Borders of Scotland, and lies entomb'd with his Father at Cheimey in the County of Buckingham. After him succeeded Edward, his Grandson by his third Son Francis, being under Age.

Amongst these, tho' he were of less note, we must not pass Richard Caldwell over in silence, who died this Year, being of Brazen-Nose-College in Oxford, and a Doctor of Physick. This Man merited well of the Commonwealth, by giving a Surgery-Lecture to the College of Physicians in London, (which College was first founded by Thomas Linacre) and endowing it with a handsome Allowance; the Lord Lumley being admitted into a share of the Honour. He was buried in St. Bennet's Church not far from the place, and his Tomb adorn'd with the Sculpture of several Implements used by Surgeons.

At the latter end of this Year, the Earl of Leicester, tickl'd with an ambitious desire of Command and Glory, and being easily perswaded by those who sought their own Security and Power at Court more than his Honour, crossed the Seas into Holland, with the Title of General of the Queen of England's auxiliary Forces, and with some kind of Command over the Admiral of England and the Queen's whole Fleet. He set out with great Preparation and a splendid Retinue, being accompanied by the Earl of Essex, the Lords Audley and North, Sir William Russell, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Bassett, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gerwase Clifton, and other Knights, and a select Troop of 500 Gentlemen. At his departure, the Queen gave him in charge amongst other things, that he should not so much as think of any thing which would not stand with her Honour, and the Quality of the Place he bare; and that he should diligently inform himself what Garisons the States maintain'd, and by what means they did it, what way they went in raising and talling the Rates of Money, (for herein they surpass and are skill'd above all other Men) that so the Soldiers might not receive their Pay at one rate, and spend it at another. She charg'd him to cut off and hinder all Supplies of Provision from the Enemy, to restrain and curb the Pirates of Dunkirk; and most passionately and heartily she recommended to his care the Noblemen of those Parts, more especially the Prince of Orange his Children.

The Nine and Twentieth Year of her Reign.

The Earl of Leicester arriving at Flushing was entertain'd by his Nephew Sir Philip Sidney, Governor

1586. verner of the Place, and afterwards by the Cities of Zeland and Holland, with all manner of Honour, hearty Acclamations, triumphal Arches, Feastings, and the like publick acknowledgments of their Deliverance. Being come to the Hague in Holland, in the Month of January, the chief Government and absolute Authority over the Confederate Provinces was given him by a Grant in Writing from the States-General, (as they call them) with the Title of Governor and Captain-General of Holland, Zeland, the United and Confederate Provinces. And now being attended with a noble Guard, saluted of all Men by the Title of Your Excellency, and sooth'd up with Flatteries, as seated in the highest and most illustrious Degree of Honour, he began to take upon him as if he were a perfect King. But the Queen, taking it very ill that the States had confer'd so large Honour on him, and that he had accepted it, check'd his Ambition, and on a sudden reprov'd his swelling Pride by this one short Letter.

Q takes it ill. She expostulates with him. 'How contemptuously you have carried your self towards us, you shall understand by this Messenger, whom we send to you for that purpose. We little thought, that one whom we had rais'd out of the Dust, and prosecuted with such singular Favour above all others, would with so great contempt have slighted and broken our Commands in a matter of so great Consequence, and so highly concerning us and our Honour: Whereof tho' you have but small regard, contrary to what you ought by your Allegiance, yet think not that we are so careless of repairing thereof, that we can bury so great an Injury in silence and oblivion. We therefore command you, that, all Excuse set apart, you do forthwith, upon your Allegiance which you owe unto us, do whatsoever our Vice-Chamberlain Heneage shall make known to you in our Name, upon pain of farther Peril.

And with the States. In another Letter to the States-General she thus expostulates with 'em: 'That they had to her Disgrace, and without her Knowledge, confer'd the absolute Government of the Confederate Provinces upon Leicester, her Subject; whenas she had absolutely refus'd it herself, and by a publick Manifesto had declar'd to the whole World, that she intended only to relieve and succour her Neighbours in their Distress, and no ways to take upon her the Sovereignty over them. She admonishes them therefore to turn Leicester out of that absolute Authority, whose Commission she had limited; not that she thought their Cause unworthy to be favoured and assisted, but to provide for and secure her own Honour, which she esteem'd more dear to her than Life itself.

They excuse it. The States wrote back to her: 'That they were very sorry they had incur'd her Displeasure by granting absolute Authority to Leicester without her knowledge. They intreat her to be pacified, considering the necessity thereof; forasmuch as such an Authority was necessary to be granted to one or other, to avoid Troubles and Dissensions. Neither indeed was the Authority so great as the Word Absolute might seem to import, considering that the Principality itself, and the supreme Rule and Dignity of Dominion, remain'd wholly in the Peoples Hands. And to revoke the Authority already granted, were nothing else but to plunge the State of the Netherlands into extreme Dangers.

Q pacified. By these Letters of the States, and the sorrowful Lines of Leicester, who knew well enough how with Tears, and a pretended Trouble for what had pass'd, to reconcile the Favour of his mild Princess to himself, her Displeasure by little and little vanish'd away, and was forgotten.

Leicester in the mean time receives all the Contributions of the Provinces, maketh Military Laws, and while he goeth about to impose new Payments upon all Traffick and Merchandize, procures himself great Hatred among the People. At this time the Prince of Parma, Governor of the Netherlands under the Spaniard, besieged Grave (a Town of Brabant upon the River Maes) for several Months by Charles Count Mansfield, who had rais'd Works round about it. To relieve this Town the Earl of Leicester sent Count Hohenlo or Hollack, a German, and Sir John Norris General of the English Foot: But as soon as they had begun to build a Fort as near the Town as they could, that from thence they might victual and relieve the Town, the Spaniards fell upon them, and beat them from their Work; but the English Companies coming presently in, they were themselves beaten back with great slaughter of their Men, seven of their Officers were slain; and of the English, Norris lightly hurt. Count Hollack shortly after cutting through the Bank, and letting out the Waters, reliev'd the Town with Victuals and a fresh Supply of Men by Boats. As soon as the Prince of Parma himself was come, and had thunder'd a while into the Town with his great Ordnance, Van Hemart, Governor of the Town, a young Man, raw and unskill'd in military Matters, not so much as expecting an Assault, compounded for his own and the Townsmens Lives, and surrender'd the Place; whilst in the mean time Leicester drove the Spaniards out of the Betuwe, (which is properly call'd Batavia) an Island made by two Rivers, the Rhyne and the Waal, and near the Tolbuys erected a strong Sconce. For the delivering up of Grave, Hemart afterward suffer'd Death, for an Example and Terror to others.

The Prince of Parma marched next into Gelderland, and encamped before Venlo; where Skerck a Frieslander and Sir Roger Williams a Welshman, two venturous Men, undertook a desperate Exploit, to break through the Enemy's Camp at Midnight, and enter into the City: And indeed, after the slaughter of some of their Enemies, they made their way as far as the Prince of Parma's own Tent. But being there repell'd, they retreated without effecting their Design, yet not without Commendations amongst martial Men for their bold Attempt: And Venlo was shortly after surrender'd.

In the mean while the Lord Willoughby, Governor of Bergenopzoom, intercepted the Enemy's Provision of Corn; whilst in other Parts Sir Philip Sidney, and Grave Maurice the Prince of Orange his Son, surpriz'd Axle, a Town of Flanders. Encourag'd with this Success, Sidney made an Attempt by Night upon Gravelin, being fed with hopes and drilled on by some of the Garison, but found himself deluded; and having lost some few of his Men, slain by La Motte Governor of the Town, who had contriv'd the Plot, he escap'd himself in safety with the rest. Sir William Pelham, General of the English Horse, the whilst ranged all over Brabant. From Venlo the Prince of Parma took his march to Berck, garrison'd by 1200 English under the Command of Colonel Morgan, and laid siege to it. To raise this Siege Leicester made haste thither: But when saw himself to be too weak in Men, ill provided of Victuals, no place of Retreat near, and the Enemy's Camp very strongly intrench'd and fortifi'd, to draw the Enemy from the siege of it, he besieged Doesburg; and after he had with his Ordnance

Leicester takes Doesburg. But the Prince of Parma, fearing the Loss of Zutphen, a Town hard-by, commanded a Supply of Victuals to be convey'd thither. A second Convoy being dispatch'd thither in foggy Weather, the English in the Fog lighted upon the Spaniards that had convoy'd it. Whereupon there happen'd a Skirmish. The English being charg'd with two or three Volleys of Shot one after another, from a strong place of Advantage, yet stood their Ground, overthrew a Troop of Horse under the Leading of George Cressiac an Albanois, and took him Prisoner after he had been unhors'd by the Lord Willoughby, Hannibal Gonzaga with many others being slain. Of the English few were missing: but Sidney, one of more Value than many others, having his Horse kill'd under him, was shot into the Thigh as he was mounting again, and died the 25th. day after, leaving behind him a great Mifs of him amongst good Men. He died in the very Flower of his Age, having outliv'd his Father scarce four Months: for whom Leicester, his Uncle, at his Return into England, made a splendid Funeral after the military Fashion, at Saint Paul's Church at London. James King of Scots honour'd him with an Epitaph; both the Universities consecrated their Tears, and New-College in Oxford set forth a most elegant Description of his noble Acts. These things, and far more than these, his great Vertue, excellent Wit, most exquisite Learning, and sweet Conditions, deservedly merited.

The States complaints against Leicester.

Leicester, though full of Sorrow and Heaviness hereat, vigorously assaulted the Sconces near Zutphen: and the better to force the Town, he took the Island in the River, and in it the principal Fort. Then setting upon the lesser Fort, he took it through the Valour of Edward Stanley, who, catching hold of a Spaniard's Pike wherewith he charg'd him, held it so fast, that by the same he was drawn up into the Sconce: wherewith the Spaniards were terrify'd, and in great Haste and Fear quitted it. Leicester knighted Stanley for his Valour, gave him forty Pounds of English Money in hand, and a yearly Pension of one hundred Marks during his Life. The Night following, the Spaniards abandon'd the great Sconce, with all the Munition, and retired into Zutphen. Leicester thought it not good formally to besiege the same, which (it being now the Depth of Winter) he thought sufficiently block'd up by the Garrisons in the Towns round about it. For at Deventer, within six English Miles Northward, lay Sir William Stanley with 1200 Foot, English and Irish; in the Sconces of Zutphen next Deventer, lay Rowland York, with 800 Foot and 100 Horse; at Doesburg, within six Miles Southward, lay Sir John Boroughs with 800 Foot and 200 Horse; and to the Eastward were Garrisons put into Lochem, Sherenburg, and Dotecum.

Leicester, after he had quarter'd the rest of his Men in the Towns, and the Prince of Parma was departed farther off, return'd to the Hague, where he was receiv'd by the States, with these expository Complaints: That the Money was ill managed; That he listen'd to corrupt and destructive Counsels; That the English Companies were not full; That foreign Soldiers had been levy'd, without Consent of the States; That military Discipline was neglected, Wagons and Pioneers were taken up by Force, the Privileges of the Provinces disregarded and slighted, and new kinds of Contributions invented. These things they pray him that he will prudently remedy in time. He, being now minded to go over into England, puts them in Hopes of Redress, and gives them fair Words. But when the Day came that he was to depart, he entrusted the Government of the Provinces to the Council of State; and the same day privately made another Act of Restriction, reserving to himself all the Authority over the Governors of Provinces, Cities and Forts; he also took from the Council of State and the Presidents of Provinces their wonted Jurisdictions; and so sail'd over into England the 3d. day of December. Thus went the English Affairs in home, the Netherlands all this Year.

But in England, Philip Earl of Arundel, who had now been Prisoner in the Tower a full Year, was accus'd in the Star-Chamber, That he had reliev'd several Priests, contrary to the Laws; That he held Correspondence, by Letters, with Allen and Parsons the Jesuite, the Queen's Enemies; That he had publicly in Writing question'd the Justice of the Kingdom; and, That he had Intentions of departing the Realm without Licence. The Earl protesting his Obedience to the Queen, and his Love to his Country, modestly excus'd himself, by his Affection to the Catholick Religion, and his Ignorance of the Laws, and, confessing his Fault, submitted himself to the Censure of the Bench; who fin'd him in ten thousand Pounds, and Imprisonment during the Queen's Pleasure. But of these things I am to speak more fully in the Year 1589.

At this time came over into England, from Frederick II. King of Denmark, Henry Ramely, Chancellor for German Affairs, in a military Equipage, and attended with a Guard of Musqueteers; who made a large Declaration of the King's good Affection towards the Queen and the Peace of Christendom. For the procuring whereof with the Spaniard, he promis'd his best Assistance; left (as he said) the Enemy of Mankind should any longer water the Seed of War, which he had sown in the Netherlands, with the Blood of Men. The Queen heard him very graciously, had often Conference with him, entertaining the Man with singular Courtesie, and highly commended the King of Denmark's pious Affection. But she made him Answer by the Lord Burleigh Lord-Treasurer, Charles Howard Lord-Admiral, Henry Lord Hunsdon Lord Chamberlain, and Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary, 'That she desired nothing more than to embrace a Peace with her Neighbour-Princes, provided there was no Fraud in it: but well understanding the Attempts of the Spaniard against her, she could not but provide for her own Safety, the Defence of the true Religion of Christ, and the preserving of the Privileges of her Confederate Neighbours inviolate. Much after the same rate also was Answer given to Bodellan, whom the Prince of Parma had privately sent into England, to try if he could procure a Peace.

In the mean time, she largely supply'd the King of Navarre with Money, by Sir Horatio Pallavicini, through whose Sides the Guisians struck at the Reform'd Religion in France. But there was nothing she was more careful and intent about, than to establish a firm and lasting Amity betwixt England and Scotland, and to join them in a League of mutual Defence and Offence, thereby to cut off all Hopes, not only from her foreign Enemies, but also from the Queen of Scots herself, of any Assistance out of Scotland. For she suspected that the said Queen, being vex'd in her Mind, did harbour dangerous Projects and Designs in her Breast, since the time that those Conditions which she had offer'd were rejected, the Association enter'd into, and she herself committed (as I said before) to the Custody of Sir Amias Poulet and Sir Drue Drury. And certain it is, as evidently 1586. Ann. 29. Fugitives & Jesuites differ in their Advice to the Queen. dently appears by the Adversaries own Writings, that the Jesuites on the one side, and the fugitive Noblemen on the other side, with different Affections and Purposes, suggested to her very dangerous Advice and Counsel. For the Jesuites, when they saw no hope remaining of restoring the Romish Religion, either by her or her Son, betook themselves to new Stratagems, and began to forge a new and pretended Title to the Succession of the Kingdom of England for the Spaniard, (whose Grandeur alone they labour'd to increase.) To this end they sent into England, (as Pasquier says) one Samier, (if the Name be not counterfeit) a Man of their Society, to draw Noblemen and Gentlemen to the Spaniard's Party, and thrust her forward to her own Danger, by telling her, that if she were troublesome, neither she nor her Son should reign; and by exciting the Guises, her Kinsmen, to new Attempts against the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde, that being engaged therein, they might not be at leisure to help her.

French oppose the League with the King of Scots. He would add to the former conditions. But to conclude the League which was begun by Wotton, (but interrupted by Russel's Death, and now endeavour'd to be hinder'd by Desneval, Ambassador from France, and Corcellie, a Man of a turbulent and unquiet Spirit, who had of late been disgracefully turn'd out of England) Mr. Thomas Randolph was sent into Scotland, whose Dexterity in Scottish matters was look'd upon as prudent and fortunate, tho' to the King he were not very acceptable, in regard of those Tumults which he had of late been the Author of in Scotland. Randolph propounded to the King the same Conditions of a League, which Wotton had propounded before. The King would have to be added to them, and set down in the Draught of the League, the Articles touching the annual Pension assign'd him, and about the not prejudicing him in his Title to the Crown of England. The Ambassador, according to his Instructions, promis'd that those two Points should be provided for in a particular Article by themselves, provided he would continue constant in maintaining Amity with England. The King also (out of his great Love to his Subjects) propounded farther, that the Scots might enjoy the same Privileges and Immunities in England, which the English themselves did. But when the Ambassador had shew'd him, that that could not be granted but by Act of Parliament, and that the Estates of England would not easily yield to it; he deliberately and particularly gave his Assent to the Articles propounded, and commanded the same to be imparted to the Nobility of his Realm, that they might be confirm'd by their Subscriptions also, altho' the French Ambassador endeavour'd to make him believe at first, that the Queen sought this League, not out of any Love or Respect to the King, but out of a just Fear, lest e'er long her Enemies which conspired against her should be too hard for her; and afterwards went about to terrify him with Threats, that the old Amity with the French, which had been so highly beneficial to the Scots, would be by this means dissolv'd; and lastly, besought him, that nothing might be done herein, without the Advice of the French King.

Is not terrified by the Fr. But he could work nothing upon the King, who knew these to be nought but vain Scarecrows, either to hinder or delay the matter. For he knew, that by the late Confederacy with the Netherlanders, the English were very much strengthen'd. He gave therefore this serious Answer, That he had put his Confidence in the Goodness of God, and not in the Amity and Friendship of those who were Enemies to God's Glory: and that it was as lawful for him to make a League with the Queen, without acquainting the French King, as for the French King to have made a League with the Queen, of late, without acquainting him. And though the Queen, being somewhat sparing, sent him less Money than he expected, lest she might be thought to buy the League, and gave him no express Assurance concerning the Succession: yet he, out of his Zeal to Religion, and his singular Affection and Inclination towards both her and the publick Peace, commanded both the League to be concluded, and (to satisfy her) the Carrs also, who were suspected of Russel's Death, to be sent into England. But they fled away and escaped, the day before they were to be sent.

Shortly after, in the beginning of June, there met at Berwick Edward Earl of Rutland, William Lord Evers, and Mr. Thomas Randolph, Commissioners sent by the Queen of England; and Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyd, and James Humes of Coldingknoll, Commissioners appointed by the King of Scots: who concluded a League of stricter Amity, (as they term'd it, the Word offensive not so well pleasing the Scots) which follows in these Words.

1586.

Ann. 29.

A League of stricter Amity concluded.

Articles thereof.

Whereas the Reign and Government of these Princes has fallen into such uncertain and dangerous times, wherein the Neighbour-Princes, who will needs be call'd Catholicks, acknowledging the Pope's Authority, do enter into mutual Leagues and Confederacies, for the rooting up and extirpating the true, pure and Evangelical Religion, not only out of their own Territories and Dominions, but also out of the Kingdoms of other Princes, and thereunto do bind themselves by faithful Vows and Promises: Lest those who profess the Evangelical Religion should seem to be less careful for the Defence and Protection thereof, than they who profess the Romish Religion are seriously labouring the Subversion of the same; the said Princes, for the greater Security of their own Persons, upon whose Safety depends the Safety of all their People, and for the Preservation of the true, ancient and Christian Religion, which they now profess, have thought meet that a stricter Alliance and mutual Confederacy be sincerely enter'd into, than ever hitherto has been between their Majesties Progenitors.

First therefore, to the end that this so necessary and pious a Purpose and Intention of both Princes, in this troublesome State of Affairs, may be brought to its wish'd Effect, for the publick Good and the Propagation of the Evangelical Truth, it is covenanted, agreed and concluded, That the said Princes shall, by this social and sacred League, provide for and endeavour the Defence and Preservation of the true, pure and Evangelical Religion, which they now profess, against all others whosoever, who shall enterprize, attempt or do any thing against either of them, in order to subverting the said Religion; and that they shall use their utmost Endeavour and Diligence, that the rest of the Princes who embrace the same true Religion, may be brought to associate with them in this so holy a Purpose and Confederacy, and with joint Forces maintain the true Worship of God in their Countries and Dominions, and defend and govern their People under the said ancient and Apostolical Religion.

Item, It is covenanted, accorded and concluded, That this social League for maintaining and upholding the Christian and Catholick Religion, which at this time is embraced by both Princes, and by God's Blessing receiv'd and countenanced through their Kingdoms and Dominions, shall be a League both of Defence

1586. and Offence against all men whatever, who shall hinder or any ways go about to hinder the free exercise thereof in their Kingdoms and Dominions; all Treaties, Alliances and Confederacies whatsoever formerly entered into betwixt either of them and the Disturbers or Adversaries of the said Religion, be they who they will, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Ann. 29. And if at any time it shall happen that any Prince or State whatsoever, of what Condition soever they be, shall invade or infest the Kingdoms, Dominions or Territories of either of the said Princes, or any Part thereof, or shall any way hurt or injure their Majesties Persons or their Subjects, or attempt the said things, or any of them, it is covenanted, accorded and concluded, That neither of these Princes, being certified from the Prince Invaded, or suffering such Injury or Hurt, shall at any time, openly or secretly, directly or indirectly, give or afford any Aid, Counsel or Favour to the said Invaders or Infesters, any Tie of Consanguinity or Affinity, Alliance of Amities or Confederacies formerly entered into, or hereafter to be entered into, notwithstanding: And this in what kind of Invasion soever it be, and by whomsoever it shall be made or attempted.

It is agreed, accorded and concluded, That the aforesaid Princes shall assist one another in manner as follows: That is to say, the King of Scots, in case the Realm of England be invaded or infested by a foreign Power in those Parts thereof that are remote from the Kingdom of Scotland, shall, after demand made by the Queen of England, without delay, send 2000 Horse and 5000 Foot, or any less number of Men, at the choice and demand of the said Queen; and shall cause the same to march, at the Queen's Charges, from the Borders of Scotland lying next unto England into any other Part of England whatsoever.

Item, It is covenanted, accorded and concluded, That if the Kingdom of England be invaded by any Man whatsoever in the Northern Parts, within 60 Miles of the Borders of Scotland, then the most illustrious King of Scots, being requested and called upon by the most Serene Queen of England, shall cause to be gathered, and shall without delay effectually gather, all the Power and Strength he can make, and shall join the same with the English Forces, and in hostile manner pursue and prosecute the Invaders of the Realm of England, and all their Abettors and Favourers whosoever, for the space of thirty Days together; and those Days being expired, if occasion or necessity require, of more, even for as long time as the Subjects of Scotland have anciently been accustomed, and at this Day in right are bound, to give their Service and Help for the Defence of the Kingdom of Scotland.

Item, That when the King of Scots shall be certified by the Queen of England of any Invasion or other Disturbance whatsoever in her Kingdom of Ireland, he shall not only forbid the Inhabitants of the County of Argyle, and the Isles and Places to the same adjoining, and of all other Parts of the Kingdom of Scotland whatsoever, to enter into the Kingdom of Ireland, and effectually hinder 'em from entering; but also, whensoever it shall hereafter happen that the Inhabitants of any Part of the Kingdom of Scotland shall enter, contrary to the meaning and intent of this Treaty, with any extraordinary or unusual number of Men, in an hostile manner, into any Part of the Kingdom of Ireland, the said King, being certified by the Queen of such their Entrance, shall by publick Proclamation declare such Infesters and Disturbers who shall in an hostile manner harra's that Kingdom, to be Rebels, Disturbers of the publick Peace and Traitors, and shall accordingly prosecute 'em as such.

Item, That neither Prince shall for the time to come, aid, favour, succour or relieve any Trator, Rebel, or him that shall openly revolt from his Prince, or suffer them any way to be aided, succoured and relieved by others, or permit them openly or secretly to make their Abode in his or her Dominions; but shall each of them, from the time of notice or first demand made by the Prince from whom they have revolted, without delay or procrastination, deliver up, or cause to be deliver'd, the said Traitors or Rebels, according to the Agreements express'd in former Treaties betwixt us and our Predecessors, or at leastwise compel 'em to retire from the Frontiers and Borders of their Dominions: And moreover, as long as the said Rebels or Traitors shall make their Abode in their said Dominions, shall make just and due Satisfaction for all Injuries and Mischiefs which may be done by the said Rebels.

Item, That for compounding and adjusting of all and every the Injuries and Controversies which have happen'd and arisen on the Borders, upon account of the Borders, or amongst the Borderers, from the time that the most illustrious King of Scots first took the Government of the Realm into his own Hands, and for the space of four Years going next before the said term, the two Princes respectively shall within six Months after the concluding of this League, send able and fit Commissioners, well-affect'd to the Peace, furnish'd and empower'd with Instructions meet and sufficient for that purpose, to some convenient place on the Confines of both Kingdoms, who shall compound and determine all Causes and Controversies by an honourable and friendly Treaty and Agreement.

Item, That neither of the said Princes shall contract Amity, or enter into any League or Confederacy with any other Prince, State or Society of Men, to the prejudice of this present League and Union, without the express consent of the other Confederate Prince, by Letters of the said Prince, subscribed with his own Hand, or sealed with his Privy Seal, first had and obtain'd.

Item, That both Princes, when either of them shall be duly requir'd by the Ambassadors or Commissioners of the other Prince so to do, shall both by their Oath and under their Great Seal, approve, confirm and ratifie this sacred League and Alliance; and moreover for the better strengthening thereof, shall, within a certain time to be appointed by the mutual Consent of both Princes, deliver or cause to be deliver'd, their Royal Instrument or Letters- Patents to the same purpose.

Item, That all former Treaties of Amities, Contracts and Agreements, made betwixt the Predecessors of the aforesaid Princes and their Kingdoms and Dominions, tho' they may seem to be antiquated and out of Date, shall still continue in their strength, force and vigour. As likewise, that this present Treaty of mutual Confederacy and stricter Amity and Alliance, shall in no sort derogate from former Treaties and Confederacies entered into by the said Princes with other their Confederates, or in any respect weaken or lessen the force and authority thereof, (the defence of the purer Religion, which the said Princes do now maintain Item, That the King of Scots shall, when he arrives at the full Age of 25 Years, as soon as conveniently may be, approve and confirm the present Treaty, and cause it to be approv'd and confirm'd by a publick Assembly of the States of his Realm. And the same also shall the Queen do and perform, and cause to be done and perform'd in Parliament, by the Nobility and other States of her Kingdoms of England and Ireland.

Conspiracy against Q. Eliz. The same Month that this League was ratified, a dangerous Conspiracy was discover'd against Q. Elizabeth; the Original and Progress whereof I will lay down as briefly as I can out of the voluntary Confessions of the Conspirators themselves. In the English Seminary at Rheims, some there were who most religiously admiring and reverencing the Omnipotency of the Pope, believ'd that the Bull of Pius V. against Queen Elizabeth was dictated by the Holy Ghost. These Men perswaded themselves, and others that eagerly desired and itched after the Glory of Martyrdom, that it was a meritorious Act to kill such Princes as were excommunicated; and farther, that they were Martyrs who lost their Lives on that account. These things Gifford, a Doctor of Divinity, Gilbert Gifford and Hodgefon Priests, impress'd so deeply upon one John Savage, (a Bastard by report) a Man ready for any Undertaking, that he willingly and readily vowed to kill Queen Elizabeth. At the same time they wrote a Book, (and that only on purpose to lull the Queen and Council fairly asleep in Security, while they privately made way for their wicked Designs) wherein they admonish'd the Papists in England not to attempt any thing against their Princess, but to fight against their Adversaries only with the Weapons of Christians, viz. with Tears, spiritual Arguments, daily Prayers, Watchings and Fastings: And withal they spread a false Rumor abroad by their Tale-bearers, that George Gifford, one of the Band of the Queen's Gentlemen-Pensioners, had sworn the Queen's Death, and in that respect had drawn a considerable Sum of Money from the Duke of Guise.

Ballard goes from England to France. A Design to invade England. Ballard sent back to Engl. About Easter, John Ballard, a Priest of the Seminary of Rheims, who had been visiting many of the Papists in England and Scotland, and feeling their Pulses, return'd into France in company with one Maud, Walsingham's Spy, (a notable crafty Dissembler, who had egregiously deceiv'd the unwary Priest) and tamper'd with Don Bernardino de Mendoza, the Spaniard's Ordinary Ambassador then in France; and with Charles Paget, a Man thoroughly devoted to the Queen of Scots, about invading England; judging it to be now a very fit time, whilst the Soldiery of England were absent in the Netherlands; neither could they ever hope for a fairer Opportunity, forasmuch as the Pope, the Spaniard, the Duke of Guise, and the Prince of Parma, were all resolv'd to set upon England, thereby to divert the War from the Netherlands. And tho' Paget demonstrated clearly, that it was in vain to invade England as long as Queen Elizabeth liv'd; yet was Ballard sent back again into England, having first been engag'd by Oath to procure Assistance with all speed to join with the Invaders, and to effect the Q. of Scots Liberty.

At Whitstide arriv'd in England this filken Priest in Soldier's Habit, call'd commonly by the borrow'd Name of Capt. Foscu. At London he brake

the business to Anthony Babington of Dethick in Derbyshire, a young Gentleman of good Birth, and rich, a Man of a ready Wit, and Learning above most of his Years; who being devoted to the Romish Religion, had a little before gone over into France, unknown, without Licence, and grew familiarly acquainted with Thomas Morgan, one that retain'd to the Queen of Scots, and with the Bishop of Glasgow her Ambassador. These two, by their continual extolling the heroical Vertues of so great a Queen unto him, had put him into an assured hope of acquiring great Honours by her Service; which the ambitious young Gentleman soon laid hold on. They recommended him also, without his knowledge, by Letters, to the Queen of Scots. For when he was return'd into England, he wrote several kind and respectful Letters to him. And from that time Morgan made use of his help in conveying Letters to her, till such time as she was committed to Sir Amias Powlet's keeping; for then the young Gentleman, perceiving the danger, gave over. To this Babington (I say) Ballard brake the Business aforesaid. He was flatly of opinion, that the Invasion of England would signifie nothing so long as Queen Elizabeth lived. But when Ballard had told him, that she would not live long, for Savage was now come into England, who had vowed to kill her; Babington was not satisfied that so weighty a Business should be entrusted to Savage alone, lest he should fail of the Enterprize; but rather to fix stout Gentlemen, of which number he would have Savage to be one, that so he might not break his Vow. Babington therefore contriveth a new Project for Invading the Realm by Foreiners, concerning the Havens where they should land, the Aid that should join them, the Delivering of the Queen of Scots, and the tragical Execution of the Queen, as he term'd it.

Whilst his Mind was wholly intent upon this Business, he receiv'd Letters by an unknown Boy in a Cypher familiar betwixt the Queen of Scots and him, wherein she gently blamed him for his long Silence, and desir'd him to send her with all speed a Pacquet of Letters come from Morgan, and deliver'd by the French Ambassador's Secretary. Which he did, and withal by the same Messenger sent a Letter of his own unto her, wherein he excus'd his Silence, in regard he wanted Opportunities of sending any thing to her ever since she was committed to the Custody of Sir Amias Powlet, a Puritan, a meer Leicestrian, (as he call'd him) and a most bitter Enemy of the Catholick Faith. He relateth what Conference he had had with Ballard; informeth her that six Gentlemen were made choice of to commit the tragical Execution; and that he himself with an hundred more would at the same time set her at Liberty. He pray'd her that the heroical Actors in this Business (for so he term'd them) might have Rewards assign'd, or else their Posterity, if they happen'd to perish in the Attempt. To this Letter answer was made the 27th of July: 'Babington's most entire Affection to the Catholick Religion and to her is recommended and applauded: But he is advis'd to go circumspectly and wisely to work, viz. That the Association amongst them should be entred into upon pretence that they stood in fear of the Puritans. That there should be no Rising before such time as they were assur'd of foreign Assistance. That some Disturbance should be rais'd in Ireland while the Stroke was giving on this side. That Arundel and his Brothers, and the Earl of Northumberland, should be wrought over to her Party; and, That Westmorland, Pa-

'Either by overthrowing a Cart in the Gate, or setting Fire on the Stables, or by intercepting her as she rode abroad for her Recreation in the Fields betwixt Chartley and Stafford. Lastly, Babington is commanded to pass his Word to the six Gentlemen and the rest, concerning their Reward for their Service.

Partners in the Conspiracy.

He had now associated to himself several Gentlemen who were very zealous for the Romish Religion; amongst whom those of most eminent Note were Edward Windfore, Brother to the Lord Windfore, a young Man of a softly Disposition; Thomas Salisbury, of a good Family in Denbighshire; Charles Tilney, a Gentleman of an ancient House, the only hopes of the Family, and one of the Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners to the Queen, whom Ballard had lately reconcil'd to the Romish Church, both of them young Gentlemen of comely Personage; Chidiock Tichburne of Southampton; Edward Abington, whose Father had been Under-Treasurer, or (as they commonly call him) Cofferer of the Queen's Household; Robert Gage of Surrey; John Travers and John Charnock of Lancashire; John Jones, whose Father was Yeoman or Keeper of the Wardrobe to Queen Mary; Savage, whom I have spoken of already; Barnwel, of a noble Family in Ireland; and Henry Dun, Clerk in the Office of First-fruits and Tenths. One Polly also insinuated himself into their company, a Man who perfectly understood the Affairs of the Queen of Scots, a cunning Counterfeit and Dissembler, who is thought to have revealed all their Consultations from Day to Day to Walsingham, and to have egged on the young Gentlemen in this desperate Undertaking, who were prone enough of themselves to what was bad; tho' Narwe, the Queen of Scots Secretary, had given them secret Warning to beware of him.

Every man's part assign'd him.

To these men Babington breaketh the Design, but not all parts of it to every one of them. To Ballard, Tichburn and Dun he sheweth his own Letters and the Scottish Queen's. Tilney and Tichburn he persuaded to be Executors of the Murder. They at first refuse to imbrue their Hands in the Blood of their Princess. Ballard and Babington labour to prove to 'em that it is lawful to kill Princes excommunicated; and if ever Equity and Justice be to be violated, it is to be done for the Promotion of the Catholick Religion. Being hereupon with much ado persuaded, they gave a kind of Consent. Abington, Barnwel, Charnock and Savage, took the Oath readily and cheerfully to commit the Murder. Salisbury could by no means be persuaded to have his Hand in killing the Queen, but voluntarily promis'd his Help for setting the Queen of Scots at Liberty. Over and above those before-named, Babington pitcheth upon one Tichenor to make up the Crew, of whose Fidelity and Boldness he was well satisfied; but he was at present absent a great way off. Babington chargeth them not to acquaint any Man with the business, but upon an Oath of Secrecy first taken. The Conspirators met ever and anon to confer about these matters, either in St. Giles's Fields, or St. Paul's Church, or in Taverns, where they every Day banquetted and feasted, being puffed up with Hope of great Honours; now and then commending the Valour of those Scottish Gentlemen who had not long before surpriz'd the King at Sterlin; and of Gerard the Burgundian, who murder'd the Pr. of Orange. And to such a height of foolish Vanity they proceeded, that they would needs have those men that were appointed to be the Assassines pictur'd

to the Life, and Babington in the midst of them, with this Verse,

Hi mihi sunt Comites, quos ipsa Pericula ducunt.

'These Men are my Companions, whom very Dangers draw.

But forasmuch as this Verse pleas'd them not, as being too open and plain, they put instead of it,

Quorsum hæc aliò properantibus?

That is,

'To what end are these things to Men that hasten to another purpose?

These Pictures (they say) were begun and privately shewed to the Queen, who knew none of them by their Favour, save only Barnwel, who had often come to her about Business of the Earl of Kildare's, in whose Service he was employ'd; but being by other Tokens put in mind of him, she remember'd the Man very well. Sure it is, that when upon a time she walked abroad and saw Barnwel, she beheld him undauntedly, and turning herself to Hatton, Captain of the Guard, and others, she said, Am not I fairly guarded, that have not a Man in my Company that wears a Sword? For so Barnwel himself related to the rest of the Conspirators, and shew'd them how easily she might have been made away at that time, if the Conspirators had been there in readiness. Savage also affirm'd the same.

Nothing now more perplex'd Babington, than lest the promise made of foreign Aid should not be perform'd. Therefore to make sure thereof, he resolv'd himself to go over to France; and to that purpose to send Ballard privately before, for whom, by his Money, under a counterfeit Name, he had procur'd a Licence to travel. And that there might not be the least suspicion of himself, he insinuated into Walsingham by means of Polly, whom I spake of before, and earnestly besought him to procure him a Licence from the Queen to travel into France, promising to do her extraordinary good Service, in pumping out and discovering the secret Designs of the Fugitives in behalf of the Queen of Scots. Walsingham commended the young Gentleman's Purpose, and promis'd him not only a Licence to travel, but also many and great matters if he perform'd what he undertook. Yet did he linger and delay him, sitting out in the mean time, by his own and other mens Cunning and Diligence, the whole Plot, when they thought that the very Sun was a stranger to it: But this he did principally thro' the Discovery of Gilbert Gifford a Priest.

This Gifford was born of a good Family at Chillington in the County of Stafford, not far from Chartley, where the Queen of Scots was Prisoner; and was sent about this time into England by the Fugitives, under the counterfeit Name of Lufon, to put Savage in mind of his Vow, and privately to lurk here as a Messenger to convey Letters betwixt them and the Queen of Scots: For so dangerous was that Service, that they could draw neither the Countess of Arundel, nor the Lord Lumley, nor the Lord Henry Howard, nor yet George Shirley, to undertake it.

The Fugitives, to make trial whether Gifford would be faithful in the safe conveying of their Letters, sent at first several blank Papers, made up like Letters; which when they found, by the Answers they receiv'd, to have been deliver'd, they then grew more confident of him, and sent frequently other Letters written in Cyphers concerning cerning their Business. But Gifford, whether 1586. prick'd in Conscience, or formerly corrupted with Ann. 29. Money, or terrified with Fear, had before this come to Walsingham privately, informed what he was, and to what purpose sent into England, offering him his best Service in love to his Prince and Country, and promis'd to impart unto him all the Letters he should receive either from the Fugitives, or from the Queen of Scots. Walsing- ham, laying hold on the Opportunity offer'd, entertain'd the Man kindly, sent him into Staff- ordshire, and wrote to Powlet, that he should con-nive at the corrupting of one of his Men by Gif- ford. Powlet, unwilling that any of his own Servants should (as he said) become a Traitor by such dissembling, denied it; yet permitted him to corrupt a Brewer or some such Man who dwelt hard by. Gifford with a few pieces of Gold soon corrupted the Brewer, who privately put in the Letters, and receiv'd Answers of them, through an hole in the Wall, which was stopp'd with a loose Stone; which Letters forthwith came to Walsingham's Hands by Messengers ready on purpose to carry them. Walsingham open'd them, wrote them out, found out the Cyphers

 by the singular Art and Skill of Thomas Philips, and by the direction of Arthur Gregory sealed them up again so cunningly, that no Man could ever judge they had been open'd, and so sent them to those to whom they were directed by the Superscriptions. Thus were intercepted those fore-mention'd Letters of the Queen of Scots to Ba- bington, and his in answer to her, and another of hers to him, wherein was cunningly added (after opening) a Postscript in the same Characters, desiring him to set down the Names of the six Gentlemen, (and it's likely other things too) also the Letters which were written the same Day and Date to Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, to Charles Paget, the Lord Paget, the Archbishop of Glasgow, and Sir Francis Inglesfield; all which were first copied out, and then sent over Sea.

Queen Elizabeth, as soon as she understood by these Letters that so dreadful a Storm hung over her Head, on the one side from her own Subjects at home, and the other side from Strangers abroad, gave Command for the timely suppressing of the Conspiracy, that Ballard should forthwith be apprehended. Him therefore they seiz'd on before he was aware in Babington's House, at the very Moment when he was ready to set forward on his Journey for France. Hereupon Ba- bington grew very much troubled and pensive, toss'd with a thousand Uncertainties of an un-resolv'd Mind: And while his Thoughts ran now this way now that way, at length he betook himself to Tichburn, and advis'd with him, what was best to be done. Tichburn's Counsel was, That the Conspirators should forthwith disperse themselves and fly. But Babington thought it the best course to send Savage and Charnock presently to execute the Murder. But first, that they might get the better access, he thought good to provide Savage of more handsom and courtly Apparel, and hereof he discours'd with them the same Day in St. Paul's Church. But presently his Mind alter'd, and, concealing the inward Anguish of his troubl'd Breast, he press'd Walsingham (then absent at Court) by Letters and earnest Intreaties, that he might now at length have his Licence granted to travel into France; and withal solicited him for the delivery of Bal- lard, who would be of special Use and Service to him in the Business he had undertaken. Wal- singham feedeth him with fair Promises from Day to Day. That Ballard was apprehended, he lay-eth the blame upon Young, that subtle Discoverer of Papists, and upon the Pursuivants; and, as it were out of Love and Friendship, warneth Ba- bington to beware of that kind of Men: And now he easily persuades the young Gentleman to lodge in his House at London till the Queen had sign'd his Licence, and till himself could return to Lon- don, that they might have the more secret and secure Conference about Matters of such Moment and Consequence, and that there might no Suspicion arise of him amongst the Fugitives

 when he should come into France, upon account of his frequent repair to his House. In the mean time Scudamore, Walsingham's Man, was commanded to have a diligent and watchful Eye upon him, and to keep him company in all places, under pretence of securing him from Pursuivants.

Thus far had Walsingham spun this Thread alone, without acquainting the rest of the Queen's Council; and longer he would have drawn it, but the Queen would not suffer it, Lest (as she said herself) by not heeding and preventing the Danger while she might, she should seem rather to tempt God, than to trust in God. A Note was therefore sent from the Court from Walsingham to his Man, that he should more strictly observe Babington.
 This Note being unsealed, was deliver'd so to him, that Babington, sitting at the Board next him, read it along with him. Hereupon his Conscience accusing him, and suspecting that all was come to light, the next Night, when he and Scudamore, and one or two more of Walsingham's Men had supped plentifully in a Tavern, he rose from the Board as if he intended to pay the Reckoning, and, leaving his Cloak and Sword behind him, made all the haste he could in the dark to Westminster, where Gage changed Cloaths with him, who presently stripped himself again in Charnock's Chamber, and put on Charnock's Cloaths; and immediately they withdrew into St. John's Wood near the City, whither also Barn- wel and Dun made their retreat. In the mean time they were publicly proclaim'd Traitors all over England. They were now fain to lurk in Woods and blind Corners; and having in vain tried to borrow Money of the French Ambassador, and Horses of Tichburn, cut off Babington's Hair, disguised and sullied the natural Beauty of his Face with the Rind of green Walnuts; and being hardly put to it by Hunger, they went to an House of the Bellamies near Harrow on the Hill, which Bellamies were furiously bigotted to the Romish Religion. There were they hid in Barns, there were they fed, and clothed in rude Country Habit. But the 10th Day after they were discover'd and brought to London, the City testifying their publick Joy by ringing of Bells, making Bonfires, and singing of Psalms; insomuch as the Citizens were highly commended and thanked by the Queen for these Testimonies of their good Affection.

The rest of the Conspirators were taken soon after, most of 'em in places near the City; Sal- isbury in Chester, having his Horse run through by those that pursu'd him, and with him Trevers, after they had swam over the River Wever. Jones was taken in Wales, who, being privy to the design'd Invasion, had conceal'd them in his House
 after he knew them to be proclaim'd Traitors;
 and had horsed Salisbury in his Flight, and changed Cloaks with his Man, which was a Priest.
 Only Windfore was not to be found. Many Days were spent in examining of them, who cut one anothers Throats by their Confessions, and dis-cover'd the whole truth of the business.

All this while was the Queen of Scots and her Servants kept by Powlet, with so strict a Watch, and so closely observ'd, that she was utterly ignorant

ignorant of all these Occurrences, tho' they were commonly known and talk'd of all over England. But as soon as these Conspirators were apprehended, Sir Thomas Gorges was sent to give her a brief Account thereof: which News he surpriz'd her with, and that of set purpose, just as she had taken Horse to ride a hunting. Neither was she permitted to return to the place of her Custody, but was led about (under a Shew of doing her Honour) from one Gentleman's House to another's, dwelling thereabouts. In the mean time, Sir John Maners, Sir Edward Aston, Sir Richard Bagot, and Mr. William Waad, (who was lately sent into those parts, and wholly ignorant of the matter) by Authority granted them under the Queen's Warrant and Letters, committed Nawe and Curle, her two Secretaries, to several Keepers, that they might have no Conference either with one another, or with the Queen. And then breaking open the Doors of her private Closet, they sent all her Cabinets wherein her Papers were kept, seal'd up with their own Seals, to the Court. Then Powlet (as he was commanded) seiz'd upon all her Money, lest she should corrupt any body with Bribes, and pass'd his Word for the true restoring the same. Her Cabinets being search'd before Queen Elizabeth, there were found many Letters from Persons beyond Sea, as also Copies of Letters written to several, Breviaries, and about sixty Indexes or Tables of private Cyphers and Characters; Letters also from some English Noblemen to her, full of Expressions of Love and Respect. Which notwithstanding Queen Elizabeth dissembled and conceal'd in Silence, according to that Motto which she us'd, Videō & taceo, that is, I see, but say nothing. But they having got some sort of Knowledge thereof, began from that time to shew themselves deadly Adversaries to the Queen of Scots, lest they might seem to have favour'd her before.

Now Gifford, having acted his Part thus far in this Scene, was sent away back into France, as if he had been banish'd hence; but first he left behind him with the French Ambassador in England, an indented Paper, with Direction that he should deliver the Letters he receiv'd from the Queen of Scots, or from the Fugitives, to no other Person but him that should shew the Counterpart thereof; which Counterpart was privily sent by him to Walsingham. This Gifford, being return'd into France, was after some Months cast into Prison for incontinent and dishonest living; and being withal suspected there of these things, he died miserably, freely confessing most of the Passages already mention'd, which were also found penn'd down in some Papers he had by him in his Coffers.

On the 13th. of September, seven of the Conspirators were arraign'd, confessed themselves guilty, and were condemn'd of High-Treason. The next day but one after, seven others were in like manner arraign'd, pleaded Not guilty, and submitted themselves to be tried by God and the Country, as the manner is; who were all found guilty out of their own Confessions, and condemn'd. Pollie only of the Number, though he were privy to all the Business, yet because he affirm'd that he had reveal'd several things to Walsingham, was not arraign'd. On the 20th. of the same Month, (a Gallows and a Scaffold being set up for that purpose in S. Giles's Fields, where they were wont to meet) the first seven were hang'd, cut down, their Privities cut off, their Bowels taken out before their Faces, while they were alive, and their Bodies quarter'd, not without more than usual Cruelty.

Ballard, the Arch-plotter and Contriver of this Treason, crav'd Pardon of God, and of the Q.

if so be he had sinn'd against her. Babington (who beheld Ballard's Execution, without being in the least daunted, while the rest turn'd away their Faces, and fell to Prayers upon their Knees) ingenuously acknowledg'd his Offence. Being taken down from the Gallows, and now ready to be cut up, he cry'd aloud several times in Latin, Parce mihi, Domine Jesu; that is, Spare, or, Forgive me, O Lord Jesus. Savage broke the Rope, and fell down from the Gallows, and was presently seiz'd on by the Executioner, his Privities cut off, and his Bowels taken out alive. Barnwell extenuated his Crime, upon the account of Religion and Conscience. Tichburne humbly acknowledg'd his Fault, and mov'd the Multitude to Pity and Commiseration of his Case. As in like manner did Tilney, a Man of a modest Disposition and comely Personage. Abington, a Man of a turbulent Spirit, sought to terrify them with Menaces and Threats of Blood which should, he said, be spilt e'er long in England.

The next day, the other seven were drawn to the same place, and suffer'd the same kind of Death; but somewhat more favourably, by the Queen's express Command, who detested the former Cruelty: for they all hung till they were quite dead, before they were cut down and bowell'd.

Salisbury was the first, who died very penitent, admonishing the Catholicks not to attempt to restore Religion by Force and Arms. In like manner did Dun, who next follow'd him. Jones protested that he dissuaded Salisbury from the Attempt, and utterly condemn'd Babington's proud and rash Headiness, and the Design for Invasion. Charnock and Travers, having their Minds wholly fix'd on Prayer, recommended themselves to God and the Saints. Gage extoll'd the Queen's great Grace and Bounty to his Father, and detested his own perfidious Ingratitude towards his Princess, to whom he was so deeply engaged. Hierom Bellamy, who had conceal'd Babington, after he was openly proclaim'd Traitor, (whose Brother was guilty of the same Crime, and strangled himself in Prison) with Confusion and deep Silence brought up the Rear.

These being thus executed, Nawe a Frenchman Queen of and Curle a Scot, who were the Queen of Scots Secretaries, being examin'd about the Letters, Copies of Letters, Notes and Ciphers, found in the Queen's private Closet, voluntarily acknowledg'd, and subscribed to it, that the Letters were of their Hand-writing, as they were dictated from the Queen's own Mouth in French to Nawe, and translated into English by Curle, and so written in Ciphers. Neither did they deny but she had receiv'd Letters from Babington, and that by her Command they had written back to him to the same purpose as I have before related. Whether these Secretaries were bribed to confess this, I cannot say: Yet this appears out of some Letters, that when Curle about this time claim'd Promise of Walsingham, Walsingham tax'd him as un-mindful of the extraordinary Favour he had done him, and told him he had confess'd nothing but what he could not deny, because Nawe his Fellow justify'd it to his Face.

Shortly after was Sir Edward Wotton sent into France, to inform the King of the whole Management of the Conspiracy, and to shew him the Copies of the Letters of the Queen of Scots and others, attested by the Depositions of certain Noblemen of England, to justify the Truth thereof; that so the French King might see into what great Dangers the Queen of England had been brought, by the Practices of Morgan, Charles Paget, and others in France.

And

1586. And now, what should be done with the Q. of Scots, the Council were of several Minds and Opinions. Some thought that no new rigorous Course was to be taken with her, but only that she was to be committed to closer Custody, both because she was not the Author of the Mischief, but only accessary to it; as also because she was sickly, and not like to live long. Others were of Opinion, that for the Security and Preservation of Religion, she was forthwith to be put to death, and that by Law. Leicester thought rather by Poison, and sent a Divine privately to Walsingham, to satisfy him that it was lawful. But Walsingham protested he was so far from consenting that any Violence should be done to her, that he had of late cross'd Morton's Counsel, who advis'd that she should be sent back into Scotland, and put to death in the very Frontiers and Borders of both Kingdoms. Then they differ'd in their Opinion, by what Law she should be proceeded against, whether by the Statute of 25 Edward III. (whereby he is made guilty of Treason, who shall compass or imagine the Destruction of the King or Queen, raise War in his or her Kingdom, or adhere to his or her Enemies) or by the late Act of 27. Queen Elizabeth, whereof I have made mention before. At length it was carry'd by those who thought she was rather to be try'd by this last Act, as being made for this very purpose and occasion, and therefore to be put in execution. To the end therefore that Process might be made, and Sentence pronounc'd, according to this Act, made the last Year, against all such as should raise Rebellion, invade the Realm, or attempt any Violence towards the Queen, several of the Privy-Council and other Noblemen of England, were made Commissioners, by the Queen's Patent, for her Trial. Whose Names (because it may concern Posterity to know the Rank and Titles of the Noblemen of England) I have thought good to set down out of the very Original, which runs thus in the ordinary Form of the Court.

Commission, and Commissioners Names. Elizabeth, by the Grace of God, of England, France and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c. And by what Law she should be try'd.

Resolv'd to try her by the late Act of Treason.

Commissioners appointed to try her.

Commission, and Commissioners Names.

1586. Ann. 29.

1586. of our Reign, divers things have been com-Ann. 29. pass'd and imagin'd, tending to the Hurt of our Royal Person, as well by Mary Daughter and Heir of James V. King of Scots, and commonly call'd Queen of Scots, and Dowager of France, pretending a Title to the Crown of this Realm of England, as by divers other Persons, with the Privy of the said Mary, as we are given to understand; And whereas we do intend and resolve, that the aforesaid Act shall be in all and every part thereof duly and effectually put in Execution, according to the Tenor of the same, and that all Offences aforesaid,
 in the Act aforesaid mention'd, as afore is said,
 and the Circumstances of the same, shall be ex-amin'd, and Sentence or Judgment thereupon given, according to the Tenor and Effect of the said Act: To you, and the greater part of you, we do give full and absolute Power, Licence and Authority, according to the Tenor of the said Act, to examine all and singular matters compass'd and imagin'd, tending to the Hurt of our Royal Person, as well by the aforesaid Mary, as by any other Person or Persons whatsoever, with the Privy of the said Mary, and all Circumstances of the same, and other Offences whatsoever aforesaid, in the Act aforesaid (as afore is said) mention'd, and all Circumstances of the same, and of every of them; And thereupon, according to the Tenor of the Act aforesaid, to give Sentence or Judgment, as upon good Proof the Matter shall appear to you. And therefore we command you, that you do at such certain days and places, which you or the greater part of you shall for that purpose set and agree upon, diligently proceed upon the Premises, in form aforesaid, &c.

They

 Fortherin-gay-Castle.

Queen of Scots answers extempore to the Queen's Letters.

The greatest part of these Commissioners met on the 11th of October, at Fotheringhay-Castle in the County of Northampton, seated upon the Bank of the River Nen, where the Queen of Scots was then in Custody. The next day the Commissioners sent to her Sir Walter Mildmay, Powlet and Edward Barker Publick-Notary, who deliver'd into her Hands Queen Elizabeth's Letters: which when she had read, with a Countenance becoming her Royal Dignity, and with a quiet and fe-date Mind, she thus deliver'd herself: 'It grieves me much that the Queen, my most dear Sister, is mis-inform'd of me; and that I, after so many Years close Confinement in Prison, and my being grown lame in my Limbs, have lain wholly neglected, tho' I have offer'd so many reasonable Conditions for my Liberty. Tho'
 I have given her full and faithful Notice of feveral Dangers that threaten'd, yet has no Credit been given to me, but I have been still con-temn'd and slighted, tho' I be so nearly ally'd to her in Blood. When the Association was enter'd into, and the Act of Parliament made thereupon, I foresaw that whatsoever Danger should happen, either from forein Princes abroad, or from ill-disposed People at home, or for Religions sake, I must bear all the Blame, having so many mortal Enemies in the Court.
 Certainly I might take it very ill, and that not without just Reason, that a League has been lately made with my Son, without my Knowledge or Privy: But such matters I omit. As for this Letter, it seems strange to me, that the Queen should command me as a Subject, to submit myself to a Trial. I am an absolute Queen, and will do nothing which may be prejudicial either to Royal Majesty, or to other Princes of my Place and Rank, or my Son.
 My Mind is not yet so far dejected, neither will I faint or sink under this my Calamity. I refer myself to what I have formerly protested before Bromley, now Chancellor, and the Lord La-ware. The Laws and Statutes of England are to me altogether unknown; I am destitute of Counsellors; and who shall be my Peers I cannot tell. My Papers and Notes are taken from me, and no Man dares appear to be my Advocate. I am clear from being guilty of any thing against the Queen, I have stirr'd up no Man against her, and am not to be charg'd but upon my own Words or Writings, which I am sure cannot be produced against me. Yet can I not deny, but I have recommended myself and my Condition to forein Princes.

The next day Powlet and Barker return'd to her from the Commissioners, to let her know, that this Answer of hers was put in Writing, and to ask her, Whether she would own it, and stand to it? When she had heard it distinctly read, she acknowledg'd to be rightly and truly taken, and said she would stand to it. 'But this (said she)
 I have quite forgotten, which I would now have to be added. Whereas the Queen writes that I am subject to the Laws of England, and to be try'd and judg'd by them, because I have liv'd under the Protection of them; I answer, that I came into England to crave her Aid and Assistance, and have been ever since detain'd in Prison, so that I could not enjoy the Protection or Benefit of the Laws of England; nay, I could never yet understand from any Man what manner of Laws those were.

In the Afternoon came to her some that were chosen and deputed from amongst the rest of the Commissioners, together with Men learned in the Civil and Canon-Law. The Lord-Chancellor and the Lord-Treasurer justify'd their Athority, by their Patent and Commission, and shew'd that neither her Imprisonment nor her Prerogative of Royal Majesty could exempt her from answering in this Kingdom, with fair Words advising her to hear what should be objected against her: otherwise they threaten'd, that by Authority of the Law they both could and would proceed against her, tho' she were absent. She answer'd, 'That she was no Subject, and rather would she die a thousand Deaths than acknowledge herself a Subject, considering that by such an Acknowledgment she should both wrong
 the Sublimity of Regal Majesty, and withal confess herself to be bound by all the Laws of England, even in matter of Religion. Nevertheless she was ready to answer all things in a free and full Parliament: as for this Meeting and Assembly, it was (for ought she knew) devised against her (being already condemn'd and forejudg'd to die) purposely to give some Shew and Colour of a just and legal Proceeding. She warn'd them therefore to look to their Consciences, and to remember that the Theater of the whole World is much wider than the Kingdom of England. Then she began to complain of the Injuries done her. But the Lord-Treasurer, interrupting her, began to reckon up Queen Elizabeth's Kindnesses towards her: namely, That she had punish'd divers who had oppos'd and de-ny'd her Title to the Crown of England; and had been a means to keep her from being condemn'd by the Estates of the Realm, for endeavouring Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, for the Rebellion in the North, and several other matters. All which when she seem'd to make little Esteem and Account of, they return'd back to the rest of their Fellow-Commissioners.

Within few Hours after they sent her by Pow-let and the Solicitor the Contents of their Commission, and the Names of the Commissioners, that 1585. that she might see they were to proceed according to Equity and Reason, and not upon any cunning Niceties of Law, or take any extraordinary Course. She took no Exception against the Commissioners, but objected strongly against the late-made Law, upon which the Authority of their Commission solely depended; as, that it was unjust, devised of purpose against her, that it was without Example, and such whereunto she would never subject herself. She asked by what Law they intended to proceed? If by the Civil or Canon-Law, then (said she) you must send for Interpreters of it from Pavia or Poitiers, or some other foreign University, for in England are none to be found fit for it. She added also, That it was manifest by the plain Words of the Queen's Letters, that she was already fore-judg'd to be guilty of the Crime, before she was heard; and therefore there was no reason why she should appear before them. She farther requir'd to be satisfy'd touching some Scruples she had concerning several things in those Letters, which she had for her own Satisfaction confusedly and in haste taken Notice of, but would not deliver them in Writing: For it stood not (she said) with her Royal Dignity to play the Scribe.

She scruples some things in the Q's Letters.

She requires to have her Protestation admitted. She asks by what Authority and Law they'd proceed.

Justifies herself.

Refuses to appear.

Touching this Matter, the formerly-deputed Commissioners were sent unto her again; whom she told, that she did not well understand what those Words meant, Seeing she is under the Queen's Protection. The Lord-Chancellor answer'd, That it was plain to every one that understood any thing; yet was it not for Subjects to interpret what the Queen's meaning was, neither were they Commissioners for that end and purpose. Then she requir'd to have her Protestation, which she had formerly made, shew'd and allowed. It was answer'd, That it had never been, nor now could be, allow'd, because it was prejudicial to the Crown of England. She asked by what Authority they would proceed? It was answer'd, By Authority of their Commission, and by the Common-Law of England. But (said she) ye make Laws at your pleasure, whereunto I have no reason to submit myself, considering that the English in times past refused to submit themselves to the Salick Law of France. And if they would proceed by the Common Law of England, they should produce Presidents and like Cases, forasmuch as that Law consisteth much of Cases and Custom. And if by the Canon Law, none else ought to interpret the same but the makers thereof. It was answer'd, That that they would proceed neither by the Civil nor Canon Law, but by the Common Law of England: That it might nevertheless be proved both by the Civil and Canon Law, that she ought to appear before them, if she would not refuse to hear it. And indeed she refused not to hear it, provided (as she said) it were by way of Interlocution and Discourse, not Judicially.

After that she fell into other Discourses: 'That she never had any Thoughts tending to the Destruction of the Queen: That she had been provoked and incensed with several Injuries and Indignities: That she should be a Stone of Offence to others, if she were so unworthily handl'd: That by Nawe she had offer'd her best Assistance for revoking the Pope's Bull: That she would have justified her Innocency by Letters, but she was not allow'd to do it: And finally, That all the Offices of Kindness and Good-will which she had tender'd these twenty Years, had been rejected and slighted. While she thus wander'd from the Business by these Digressions, they recall'd her back, and prayed her to speak plainly, whether she would answer before the Commissioners, or not? She reply'd, 'That the Authority of their Commission was founded upon a late Law made to in-trap her: That she could by no means away with the Queen's Laws, which she had good reason to suspect: That she had still a good Heart full of Courage, and would not derogate from her Progenitors the Kings of Scotland, by owning herself a Subject to the Crown of England; for this were nothing else but openly to confess them to have been Rebels and Traitors. Yet she refus'd not to answer, provided she were not reduc'd to the Rank of a Subject. But she had rather utterly perish than to answer as a criminal Person.

Ann. 29.

To this Hatton, Vice-Chamberlain to Queen Elizabeth, answer'd: 'You are accus'd (but not condemn'd) to have conspir'd the Destruction of our Lady and Queen anointed. You say you are a Queen: Be it so: However in such a Crime as this, the Royal Dignity itself is not exempted from answering, neither by the Civil or Canon Law, nor by the Law of Nations, nor of Nature. For if such kind of Offences might be committed without punishment, all Justice would stagger, yea fall to the Ground. If you be Innocent, you wrong your Reputation in avoiding Trial. You protest yourself to be Innocent, but Q. Elizabeth thinketh otherwise, and that not without good Ground, and is heartily sorry for the same. To examine therefore your Innocency, she hath appointed Commissioners, honorable Persons, prudent and upright Men, who are ready to hear you according to Equity and Favour, and will rejoice with all their Hearts if you shall clear yourself of what you are charg'd with. Believe me, the Queen herself will be transported with Joy, who affirm'd unto me at my coming from her, that never any thing befel her that troubl'd her more, than that you should be charg'd with such Misdemeanors. Wherefore laying aside the fruitless claim of Privilege from your Royal Dignity, which now can be of no use unto you, appear to your Trial, and shew your Innocency; lest by avoiding Trial you draw upon yourself a Suspicion, and stain your Reputation with an eternal Blot and Asperion.

Hatton persuades her to it.

'I refuse not (said she) to answer in a full Parliament before the States of the Realm lawfully assembl'd, provided I may be declar'd the next in Succession; yea before the Queen and her Council, so that my Protestation may be admitted, and I may be acknowledg'd the next of Kin to the Queen. To the Judgment of mine Adversaries, with whom I know all Defence of mine Innocency will signifie nothing, I will by no means submit myself. The Lord-Chancellor ask'd her, Whether she would answer, if her Protestation were admitted? I will never (said she) submit myself to the late Law mention'd in the Commission. Hereupon the Lord-Treasurer concluded, 'We notwithstanding will proceed in the Cause to Morrow, tho' you be absent and continue refractory. Examine your Consciences, (said she) be tender of your Honour; God reward you and yours according to your Judgment upon me.

She stands out.

On the Morrow, which was the 14th of the Month, she sent for certain of the Commissioners, and pray'd 'em that her Protestation might be admitted and allowed. The Lord-Treasurer ask'd her, Whether she would appear to her Trial, if her Protestation were only received and entred in Writing, without Allowance? She yielded at last, but with much ado and an ill will, lest she should seem (as she said) to derogate from her Predecessors or Successors; but was very desirous to clear herself of the Crimes objected against her, being persuaded by Hatton's

She is content to appear.

Reasons, which she had seriously weighed and considered.

1586. Ann. 29. Soon after those Commissioners that were there assembled themselves in the Presence-Chamber. At the upper end of the Chamber was placed a Chair of State for the Queen of England under a Canopy of State. Overagainst it, below and at some distance, near the Transeome or Beam that ran cross the Room, stood a Chair for the Queen of Scots. By the Walls on both sides were placed Benches, upon which sat, on the one side the Lord-Chancellor of England, the Lord-Treasurer of England, the Lords of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, and the Lord Viscount Montacute: On the other side, the Barons Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Stafford, Grey, Lumley, Stourton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordant, Saint-John of Bleteshoe, Compton and Cheiney. Nigh unto these sat the Knights that were of the Privy-Council, Sir James de Croftes, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Ralph Sadleir, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Amias Poulet. Right before the Earls sat the two Chief-Justices, and the Chief-Baron of the Exchequer; and on the other side two Barons, the other Justices, Dale and Ford Doctors of the Civil Law: And at a little Table in the midst sat Popham the Queen's Attorney, Egerton the Queen's Solicitor, Gawdy the Queen's Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Notaries.

The Lord-Chancellor's speech to her. When she was come in, and had placed herself on her Seat, after Silence commanded, Bromley Lord-Chancellor, turning towards her, spake briefly to this effect: The most Serene Queen Elizabeth being inform'd (not without great Grief and Trouble to her Mind) that you have conspir'd the Destruction of her Person and the Realm of England, and the Subversion of Religion, hath according to her Place and Duty, lest she might seem to neglect God, Herself and her People, and out of no Malice of Heart at all, appointed these Commissioners to hear the Matters which shall be objected against you, and how you can clear yourself of them, and make your Innocency appear to the World.

Her Protestation. She then rose up, and said, 'That she came into England to crave the Aid which had been promis'd her, and yet had she been ever since detain'd in Prison. She protested, that she was no Subject of the Queen's, but had been, and was, a free and absolute Queen, not to be constrain'd to appear before Commissioners, or any other Judge whatsoever, for any Cause whatsoever, but before God alone, the highest Judge; lest she should derogate from her own Royal Majesty, the King of Scots her Son, her Successors, and other absolute Princes. Yet that she now appear'd personally, to refute and wipe off the Crimes objected against her. And hereof she prayed her own Attendants to bear witness.

The ansr. The Lord-Chancellor, not acknowledging that any Aid had been promis'd her, answer'd, That this Protestation was in vain, for whosoever (of what Place, Quality and Degree soever he be) should offend against the Laws of England in England, he was subject to the said Laws, and was to be examined and tried by the late Act. The said Protestation therefore, being made in derogation of the Laws and Queen of England, was not to be admitted. The Commissioners nevertheless commanded, that as well her Protestation, as the Lord-Chancellor's Answer, should be recorded.

Her Protestation recorded. She expects against the Act. After the Commission was openly read, which was grounded upon the Act so often already mention'd, she boldly and resolutely offer'd her Protestation against the said Act, as made directly and purposely against herself; and herein she appeal'd to their own Consciences.

When answer was made by the Lord-Treasurer, 'That every Person in the Kingdon was bound by the Laws, tho' never so lately made, and that she ought not to speak against the Laws; and that the Commissioners were resolv'd to proceed according to that Law, what Protestations or Appeals soever she interposed: She said at length, That she was ready to bear and answer touching any Fact whatsoever committed against the Queen of England.

Gawdy now opening the Statute from Point to Point, affirming that she had offended against the same; and hereupon he made an historical Discourse of Babington's Conspiracy, and concluded, That she knew of it, approv'd it, assented to it, promis'd her Assistance, and shew'd the way and means for effecting it.

She answer'd with a stout Courage, 'That she knew not Babington: That she never receiv'd any Letters from him, nor wrote any to him: That she never plotted the Destruction of the Queen; and that to prove any such thing, her Subscription under her own Hand ought to produc'd: That for her part she never so much as heard a word thereof: That she knew not Ballard, nor ever reliev'd him: But understanding by some that the Catholics in England took many things very hardly, she had advertis'd the Queen by Letters of it, and besought her to take Pity on them: That divers who were utterly unknown to her had offer'd her their Help and Assistance, yet had she excit'd or encourag'd no Man to any unlawful Attempt; and being shut up in Prison, she could neither know nor hinder what they went about.

Hereupon it was urg'd out of Babington's Confession, That there had been intercourse of Letters betwixt her and Babington. She confess'd that there had passed Letters betwixt her and many Men, yet could it not be thence gather'd that she was privy to all their wicked Designs. She requir'd that her Superscription under her own Hand might be produc'd; and ask'd what hurt it were for her to demand the Letters again which had been kept from her almost a whole Year. Then were read the Copies of Babington's Letters to her, wherein the whole Conspiracy was contain'd.

As for these Letters (said she) it may be that Babington wrote them, but let it be prov'd that I received them. If Babington or any other affirm it, I say plainly, they lye. Other Mens Faults are not to be thrown upon me. A Packet of Letters which had been kept from me almost a whole Year, came to my Hands about that time, but by whom it was sent I know not.

To prove that she had receiv'd Babington's Letters, there were read out of Babington's Confession the chief Heads of certain Letters which he had voluntarily confess'd that she had wrote back to him. Wherein when mention was made of the Earl of Arundel and his Brothers, and the Earl of Northumberland, the Tears burst forth, and she said, Alas! what hath that noble House of the Howards endur'd for my sake? And presently, having wiped away the Tears, she answer'd, That Babington might confess what he list, but 'twas a flat Lye that she had contriv'd any such means to escape: That her Adversaries might easily get Ciphers which she had made use of to others, and with the same write many things forgedly and falsly: That it was not likely she should make use of Arundel's Help, whom she knew to be shut up in Prison; or Northumberland's, who was so very young, and to her altogether unknown.

There were read also several things pick'd out of Savage's and Ballard's Confessions, who had confess'd 1586. confessed that Babington communicated to them several Letters which he had received from the Queen of Scots.

Ann. 29. She affirm'd, ' That Babington receiv'd none from her; nay, that she was very angry and offended with some who had secretly given her Advice concerning the invading of England, and had charg'd them to beware what they did.

Next was produced a Letter wherein Babington's Plot was commended and approved. Hereof she desir'd a Copy, and affirm'd, ' That it came not from her, but haply might be written by her Alphabet of Ciphers in France. That she had used her best Endeavours for the recovery of her Liberty, as very Nature itself allows and dictates, and had solicited her Friends to get her Deliverance; yet to some, whom she list'd not to name, when they offer'd her their Help for her Delivery, she gave not the least Answer. Nevertheless she had a great desire to divert the storm of Persecution from the Catholics, and for this she had been an earnest Suitor to the Queen. For her part, she would not purchase the Kingdom with the Death of the meanest ordinary Man, much less of the Queen. That there were many which attempted dangerous Designs without her knowledge; and by a Letter which she had very lately received, she was ask'd pardon by some if they should enterprize any thing without her privacy. That it was an easie matter to counterfeit the Ciphers and Characters of others; as a young Man did very lately in France, who gave himself out to be her Son's base Brother. That she was also afraid this was done by Walsingham, to bring her to her End, who (as she heard) had practis'd both against her Life and her Son's. She protested that she never so much as thought of the Destruction of the Queen: That she would gladly and freely rather lose her own Life, than that the Catholics should be so afflicted and persecuted in Hatred of her, and undergo so heavy Punishments for her sake. And here the Tears gushed forth abundantly.

But (said the Lord-Treasurer) no Man that hath shew'd himself a good Subject, was ever put to death for his Religion: Some indeed have been for Treason while they maintained and avouched the Pope's Bull and Authority against the Queen. Yet I (said she) have heard otherwise, and have read it also in Books set forth in print. The Authors (replied he) of such Books as those write also that the Queen hath forfeited her Royal Dignity.

Walsingham, who found himself just before so openly taxed by her, took this Opportunity, and rising up, protested that his Heart was free from all Malice. I call God (said he) to witness, that as a private Person I have done nothing unbecoming an honest Man; neither in my publick Condition and Quality have I done any thing unworthy of my Place. I confess that, out of my great Care for the Safety of the Queen and Realm, I have curiously endeavour'd to search and sift out all Plots and Designs against the same. If Ballard had offer'd me his Assistance, I should not have refus'd it, yea I would have rewarded him for his Pains and Service. If I have tamper'd any thing with him, why did he not discover it to save his Life?

With this Answer (she said) she was satisfied. She prayed him ' not to be angry that she had spoken so freely what she had heard reported; and that he would give no more credit to those that slander'd her, than she did to such as accus'd him. Spies (she said) were Men of doubtful and little Credit, who make shew of one thing, and speak another; and desir'd him, That he would not in the least believe that ever she had consented to the Queen's Destruction. And now again she burst forth into Tears; ' I would never (said she) make Shipwreck of my Soul, by conspiring the Destruction of my dearest Sister. It was answer'd by the Lawyers, that this should soon be proved by Witnesses. Thus far in the Forenoon.

In the Afternoon, to prove this, was openly produced the Copy of a Letter which Charles Paget had written, and Curle one of her own Secretaries testified she had receiv'd, concerning a Conference betwixt Mendoza and Ballard about the Design for invading of England, and setting her at Liberty. This (she said) was nothing to the purpose, and prov'd not that she had consented to the Destruction of the Queen.

The Lawyers proceeded to prove farther, That she was both privy to the Conspiracy, and also actually conspir'd the Destruction of the Queen; and that by Babington's Confession, and by Letters that had passed betwixt her and him, wherein he had call'd her his most Dread and Sovereign Lady and Queen. And by the way they took notice of a Plot that was laid for conveying the Kingdom of England to the Spaniard. She confess'd that a Priest came to her and said, That if she would not concern herself in the business, she and her Son both should be excluded from the Inheritance. But the Priest's Name she would not tell. She added, That the Spaniard did lay Claim to the Kingdom of England, and would give place to no Title but hers.

Then they press'd her with the Testimonies of her Secretaries, Nave and Curle, out of Babington's Confession, and the Letters and Answers betwixt her and Babington; the entire credit of which Proofs rested upon their sole Testimony, yet were they never brought face to face. ' Curle she acknowledg'd to be an honest Man, but not a competent Witness against her. As for Nave, he had been for some time a Secretary (she said) to the Cardinal of Lorain, and recommended to her by the French King, and might easily be drawn, either by Reward, or Hope, or Fear, to give a false Testimony, for he had several times taken rash Oaths; and Curle was so pliable to him, that at his beck he would write whatsoever he bad him. It might be (she said) that these two might insert some things into her Letters which she never dictated to them: It might be also that such Letters came to their Hands, which notwithstanding she might never see. And then she brake forth into such Expressions as these: ' As well the Majesty as the Safety of all Princes must fall to the Ground, if they depend upon the Writings and Testimonies of Secretaries. I dictated nothing to them but what Nature prompted me to, that I might at last recover my Liberty. And I am not to be convicted but by mine own Words or Hand-writing. If they have written any thing prejudicial to the Queen my Sister, they have written it altogether without my knowledge, and let them bear the punishment of their inconsiderate Boldness. Sure I am, if they were here present, they would clear me of all blame in this case. And, if my Notes were in my Hands, I could answer particularly to these things.

Whilst she was thus speaking, the Lord-Treasurer charg'd her, that she had Intentions to send her Son into Spain, and to convey her Title and Claim in the Kingdom of England to the Spaniard. To this she answer'd, That she had no Kingdom to dispose of or convey; yet was it lawful for her to give those things which were hers at her pleasure, and not to be accountable to any for what she did.

When her Alphabets of Ciphers, which were 1586. sent over to Babington, the Lord Lodowick and
 Ann. 29. Fernihurst, were objected to her out of Curle's Testimony; She denied not but she had written out many, and amongst others that for the Lord Lodowick, when she had recommended him and another to the Dignity of Cardinal, and that (she trusted) without offence; since it was as lawful for her to hold Correspondence by Letters, and to negotiate her Concernments with Men of her Religion, as for the Queen to do it with the Professors of another Religion.

Then they again urged her closer with the Testimonies of Nave and Curle, which agreed together. And she return'd her former Answers, or else contradicted their Testimonies by a flat Denial; protesting again that she neither knew Babington nor Ballard.

The Lord-Treasurer here saying, that she knew Morgan well enough, who had sent Parry over privately to murder the Queen, and that she had assign'd him a yearly Pension; she replied, That she knew not whether Morgan had so done, but she knew that Morgan had lost all for her sake, and therefore it concern'd her in Honour to relieve him; and she was not bound to revenge an Injury done to the Queen by a Friend that had deserv'd so well at her hands: However she had endeavour'd to deter him from any such wicked Attempts. On the other side, (said she)
 I am sure Pensions have been allow'd in England to Patrick Gray and other Scots, Enemies both to myself and to my Son. The Lord-Treasurer answer'd:
 When the Revenues of the Kingdoms of Scotland were by the Negligence of the Regents much diminish'd and impair'd, the Queen conferr'd somewhat out of her noble Bounty upon your Son the King, her near Kinsman.

Afterwards were produced the principal Heads of several Letters sent to Inglesfeld, to the Lord Paget, and to Bernardine de Mendoza, about foreign Assistance. But when she had answer'd, That these things tended not to the Destruction of the Queen;
 and if Foreigners endeavour'd to set her at Liberty, it was not to be laid to her charge; and that she had several times plainly let the Queen know that she would seek to procure her own Release; the matter was put off till the next day following.

The next Day she insisted upon her former Protestation, and requir'd to have it recorded,
 and a Copy thereof deliver'd to her; lamenting,
 That those so reasonable Conditions which she had many times propounded to the Queen were still rejected, even then when she promis'd to deliver her Son and the Duke of Guise's Son for Hostages, that the Queen or Kingdom of England should receive no Prejudice nor Detriment by her; by which she then saw herself quite out of all hope of obtaining her Liberty.
 But now she was most unworthily dealt withal, whilst her Honour and Reputation was called in question before ordinary Lawyers, who by wrested Conclusions drew every Circumstance into a Consequence; whereas Princes anointed and consecrated are not subject to the same Laws that private Men are. Moreover, whereas the Power granted to the Commissioners was, to examine Matters tending to the Hurt of the Queen's Person; the Cause was now so handled, and Letters so wrested, that the Religion which she profess'd, the Immunity and Majesty of foreign Princes, and the private Intercourse betwixt Princes, were called in question, and she herself made to stoop and descend beneath her Royal Dignity, and to appear as a Criminal before a Tribunal-seat; and all this to no other purpose, but that she might be quite excluded from the Queen's Favour, and her own right to the Succession; whereas she only made a voluntary Appearance, to clear herself of the Matters objected against her, lest she might seem to neglect the Justification of her own Honour and Innocency. She called also to their minds, how Queen Elizabeth herself was formerly brought into question about What's Conspiracy, whereof notwithstanding she was perfectly Innocent; religiously affirming, That tho' she wished with all her Heart the Safety of the Catholics might be provided for, yet

 she desir'd not that it should be brought to pass
 by the Death and Blood, tho' but of one Man.
 For her part, she had rather act the Part of Hester than of Judith; make Intercession to God for the People, than deprive the meanest of the People of his Life. She expostulated, That her Enemies had divulged abroad that she was Irreligious. But time was (said she) when I would have been instructed in the Protestant Religion, but some would not suffer me to be so, as if they cared not what became of my Soul. And now concluding; When ye have done all ye can (said she) against me, and have excluded me from my Right, ye may chance fail of your Hope and Expectation.
 And withal making her Appeal to God, and to the Princes who were her Kinsmen, and again renewing her Protestation, she prayed that there might be another meeting about this Matter, and that an Advocate might be allow'd her to plead her Cause, and that, seeing she was a Princess,
 she might be believ'd upon the Word of a Princess. For it were extreme Folly (she said) to stand to their Judgment whom she saw so evidently and notoriously to be arm'd with Prejudice against her.

To this the Lord-Treasurer answer'd: Whereas I bear a double Person and Quality, one of a Commissioner, the other of a Counsellor, hear me first a few Words as I am a Commissioner. Your Protestation is recorded, and a Copy thereof shall be deliver'd you. Our Authority is granted us under the Queen's Hand and the Great Seal of England, from which there lies no Appeal. Neither do we come with Prejudice, but to judge according to the exact Rule of Justice. The Queen's learned Council do aim at nothing else but that the Truth may come to light how far you have offended against the Queen's Person. Full Power is given us to hear and examine the Matter, altho' you were absent; yet were we desirous you should be present, lest we might seem to have derogated from your Honour. We pur-posed not to charge you with any thing else
 but what you were privy to, or have yourself attempted, against the Queen's Person. The Letters which have been read, were read to no other purpose, but to make out your Offence against the Queen's Person, and the Things relating to it, which are so interlaced with other Matters, that they cannot be se-ver'd. The whole and entire Letters therefore,
 and not parcels picked out here and there, have been openly read, because the Circumstances do make appear what Things you dealt with Babington about.

Here she interrupted him, and said, The Circumstances might be proved, but never the Fact. That her Integrity depended not upon the Credit and Memory of her Secretaries, tho' she knew 'em to be honest and sincere Men. Yet if they had confess'd any thing out of fear of Torments, or hope of Reward and Impunity, it was not to be admitted, and that for just Reasons, which she would shew elsewhere. Mens Minds (she said) are variously 1586. Ann. 29. mov'd and led with Affections : and those Men would never have confes'd such things against her, but for their own Advantage or Hopes. Letters may be directed to others than those to whom they are written, and many things have been often inserted which she never dictated. If her Papers had not been taken away, and she had her Secretary with her, she could the easilier confute the things objected against her.

He proceeds. But nothing (said the Lord-Treasurer) shall be objected but since the 19th. day of June : neither would your Papers do you any good, seeing your Secretaries, and Babington himself, without putting to the Rack, have affirm'd that you sent those Letters to Babington : which though you deny, yet whether more Credit be to be given to an Affirmation than to a Negation, let the Commissioners judge. But to return to the Matter : This which follows I speak to you as a Counsellor. Many things you have propounded time after time concerning your Liberty. That they have fail'd of Success, it is long of you, or of the Scots, and not of the Queen. For the Lords of Scotland flatly refused to deliver the King in Hostage. And when the last Treaty was holden concerning your Liberty, Parry was sent privately by Morgan, a Dependent of yours, to murder the Queen.

Her letters again produced. Ah ! (said she) you are my Adversary. Yea, (said he) I am Adversary to all Queen Elizabeth's Adversaries. But enough of these things : let us now proceed to Proofs. Which when she refused to hear ; Yet we (said he) will hear them. And I also (said she) will hear them in another place, and defend myself.

Now were her Letters to Charles Paget read again, wherein she shew'd him that there was no other way for the Spaniard to reduce the Netherlands to Obedience, but by setting up such a Prince in England, as might be useful and serviceable to him : also her Letters to the Lord Paget, to hasten his auxiliary Forces for the Invasion of England ; and Cardinal Allen's Letter, wherein he call'd her his most dread Sovereign Lady, and told her that the Business was recommended to the Prince of Parma's Care.

She interposes. As these Letters were reading, she interposed the following Expressions. 'That Babington and her Secretaries had accused her, to excuse themselves. That she never heard of the Six Murderers ; and that all the rest was nothing to the purpose. As for Allen, she held him for a reverend Prelate ; and she acknowledg'd no other Head of the Church but the Bishop of Rome. In what Rank and Quality she was had and reputed by him and forein Princes, she well knew ; neither could she hinder it, if in their Letters they call'd her Queen of England. As for her Secretaries, seeing they had done contrary to their Duty and Allegiance sworn to her, they deserv'd no Credit. They who have once sworn themselves, tho' they swear the next time with never so serious Oaths and Protections, are not to be credited. Neither did these Men think themselves bound by any Oath whatsoever in Court of Conscience, inasmuch as they had sworn Fidelity and Secrecy to her before, and were no Subjects of England. That Nashe had many times written otherwise than she had dictated to him, and Curle wrote whatsoever Nashe bade him. But, for her part, she was willing to bear the Blame of their Miscarriage, in all things but what might lay a Blot and Stain upon her Honour. And haply also they confes'd these things to save themselves, supposing that they could do her no Hurt by confessing, who they thought would be more favourably dealt withal, as being a Queen. As for Ballard, she never heard of any such Man, but of one Hallard, who had offer'd her his Service ; which notwithstanding she refused, because she had heard that he had also engaged his Service to Walsingham.

Afterwards, when some short Passages out of her Letters to Mendoza (which Curle had confest himself to have written in Ciphers) were read, and from thence she was charged as if she had purpos'd to convey her Right in the Kingdom to the Spaniard, and that Allen and Parsons lay now at Rome, for that purpose ; she, still complaining that her Secretaries had broken their Allegiance whereto they were bound by Oath, answer'd as follows : 'I being a close Prisoner, oppress'd and languishing with Cares and penfive Thoughts, and without all Hope of Liberty, no Probability appearing of effecting those things which many people expected by my means, who declined daily through Age and Indisposition of Body ; it seem'd good to some, that the Succession to the Crown of England should be establish'd on the Spaniard, or else some English Catholic. And a Book was sent me to justify the Spaniard's Title ; which not being approv'd of by me, I incurr'd Displeasure with some Men. But now, all my Hopes in England being desperate, I am fully resolv'd not to reject forein Help.

The Solicitor put the Commissioners in mind what would become of them, their Honours, Estates and Posterities, if the Kingdom were so convey'd. But the Lord-Treasurer shew'd, that the Kingdom of England could not at all be convey'd, but was to descend by Right of Succession, according to the Laws ; and ask'd her, if she had any more to say.

She required to be heard in a full Parliament, or that she might in person speak with the Queen (who would, she hoped, have regard of a Queen) and the Council. And now rising up with great Prefence of Countenance, she had some Conference with the Lord-Treasurer, Hatton, Walsingham, and the Earl of Warwick, apart by themselves.

These things being done, the Court adjourn'd till the 25th of October, to the Star-Chamber at Westminster. Thus far touching this Matter, out of the Commentaries and Memorials of Edward Barker, principal Register to the Queen's Majesty, Thomas Wheeler Publick-Notary, Register of the Audience of Canterbury, and other Persons of Credit, which were there present.

On the said 25th day of October, all the Commissioners met, except the Earls of Sbrensbury and Warwick, who were both of them sick at that time. And after Nashe and Curle had upon Oath, viva voce, voluntarily, without Hope or Reward, avow'd, affirm'd and justify'd all and every the Letters and Copies of Letters before produced, to be true and real, Sentence was pronounced against the Q. of Scots, and confirm'd by the Seals and Subscriptions of the Commissioners, and recorded in these Words. 'By their unanimous Assents and Consents, they do pronounce and deliver this their Sentence and Judgment, at the Day and Place last above-recited, and say, That since the Conclusion of the aforesaid Session of Parliament, in the Commission aforesaid specify'd, namely, since the aforesaid first day of June, in the 27th Year aforesaid, and before the Date of the said Commission, divers Matters have been compass'd and imagin'd within this Realm of England, by Anthony Babington and others, with the Privy of the said Mary, pretending a Title to the Crown of this Realm of England, tending to the Hurt, Death and Destruction of the Royal Person of our said Lady the Queen. And also, that since the aforesaid first day of June, in the 27th Year aforesaid, and before the Date of the Commission aforesaid, the aforesaid

The Eſtates alſo of the Realm, having by their Votes approv'd and confirm'd the Sentence given againſt the Queen of Scots, did with unanimous Aſſent preſent their Petition to the Queen, by the Hands of the Lord-Chancellor, wherein they inſtantly beſought her, that, for the Preſervation of Chriſt's true Religion, the Quiet and Security of the Realm, the Preſervation of the Queen's Perſon, and the Safety of themſelves and their Poſterity, the Sentence given againſt Mary Q. of Scots, according to the Law, might be publiſh'd.
 Their Reaſons were drawn from the Dangers that threaten'd Religion, the Queen's Perſon, and the Realm, by means of her, who having been bred up in the Popiſh Religion, and ſworn
 a Confederate in the Holy League, for the Extirpation of the Proteſtant Religion, had now for a long time arrogated to herſelf the Kingdom,
 while the Queen liv'd, whom, as being Excommunicate, ſhe held it lawful to do Miſchief to,
 as far as lay in her Power, and to take away her Life a thing meritorious; one who had overthrown and ruin'd ſeveral flouriſhing Families in the Kingdom, and cheriſh'd all the reaſonable Deſigns and Rebellions in England. To ſpare her therefore were nothing elſe but to ſpill the People, who would take all Impunity in this caſe very much to Heart, and would not think themſelves diſcharged of their Oath of Aſſociation, un-leſs ſhe were puniſh'd according to her Deſerts.
 Laſtly, they call'd to her Remembrance, how fearful the Examples of God's Vengeance were upon King Saul for ſparing Agag, and upon King Abab for ſparing the Life of Benbadad. Theſe things the Eſtates of the Parliament urg'd to her.

The Queen, with great Maſteſty both of Countenance and Speech, answer'd to this purpoſe: 1586.
 So many and ſo great are the unmeaſurable Ann. 29.
 Graces and Benefits beſtow'd upon me by the Almighty, that I muſt not only moſt humbly Queen E. acknowledge 'em as Benefits, but admire 'em as Elizabeth's Miracles, being in no ſort able to expreſs 'em. Answer.
 And tho' none alive can more juſtly acknowledge himſelf bound to God than I, whoſe Life he has miraculoſly preſerv'd from ſo many Dangers:
 yet am I not more deeply bound to give him
 Thanks for any one thing, than for this which I will now tell you, and which I account as a Miracle; namely, That as I came to the Crown with the hearty Good-will of all my Subjects, ſo now, after twenty eight Years Reign, I perceive in 'em the ſame, if not greater, Affection towards me; which ſhould I once loſe, I might perhaps find myſelf to breathe, but never could I think that I were alive. And now tho' my Life has been dangerously ſhot at, yet I proteſt
 there is nothing has more griev'd me, than that one who differs not from me in Sex, one of like Quality and Degree, of the ſame Race and Stock, and ſo nearly related to me in Blood, ſhould fall into ſo great a Miſdemeanor. And ſo far have I been from bearing her any Ill-will,
 that upon the Diſcovery of ſome treaſonable Practices againſt me, I wrote privately to her,
 that if ſhe would confeſs and acknowledge them
 by a Letter betwixt her and me, they ſhould be wrapp'd up in Silence. Neither did I write this with a purpoſe to intrap her; for I knew already as much as ſhe could confeſs. And even yet tho' the matter be come thus far, if ſhe would truly repent, and no Man would undertake her Cauſe againſt me, and if my Life alone depended hereupon, and not the Safety and Welfare of all my People, I would (I proteſt unfeignedly) willingly and readily pardon her.
 Nay, if England might by my Death obtain a more flouriſhing Condition and a better Prince, I would moſt gladly lay down my Life. For,
 for your ſakes it is, and for my People's, that I deſire to live. As for me, I ſee no ſuch great Reaſon (according as I have led my Life) why
 I ſhould either be fond to live, or fear to die.
 I have had good Experience of this World; I have known what it is to be a Subject, and I now know what it is to be a Sovereign. Good Neighbours I have had, and I have met with bad; and in Truſt I have found Treason. I have beſtow'd Benefits upon Ill-deſervers; and where I have done well, I have been ill-requited and ſpoken of. While I call to mind theſe things paſt, behold things preſent, and look forward toward things to come, I count them happieſt that go hence ſoooneſt. Nevertheleſs againſt ſuch Evils and Miſchiefs as theſe, I am arm'd with a better Courage than is common in my Sex; ſo as whatſoever befalls me, Death
 ſhall never find me unprepar'd.

And as touching theſe treaſonable Attempts,
 I will not ſo far wrong my ſelf, or the Laws of my Kingdom, as not to think but that ſhe, having been the Contriver of the ſaid Treasons, was bound and liable to the ancient and former Laws, tho' the late Act had never been made;
 which notwithstanding was in no ſort made to prejudice her, as divers who are inclined to favour her have imagined. So far was it from being made to intrap her, that it was rather intended to forewarn and deter her from attempting any thing againſt it. But ſeeing it had now the Force of a Law, I thought good to proceed againſt her according to the ſame. But you Lawyers are ſo curioſous in ſcanning the nice Points of the Law, and proceeding according 1586. Ann. 29. to Forms, rather than expounding and interpreting the Laws themselves, that if your way were observ'd, she must have been indicted in Staffordshire, and have holden up her Hand at the Bar, and have been try'd by a Jury of Twelve Men. A proper way, forsooth, of trying a Princess. To avoid therefore such Absurdities, I thought it better to refer the Examination of so weighty a Cause to a select Number of the noblest Personages of the Land, and the Judges of the Realm: and all little enough. For we Princes are set as it were upon Stages in the Sight and View of all the World: the least Spot is soon spy'd in our Garments, the smallest Blemish presently observ'd in us at a great Distance. It behoves us therefore to be careful that our Proceedings be just and honourable. But I must tell you one thing, that by this last Act of Parliament, you have reduc'd me to such Straits and Perplexities, that I must resolve upon the Punishment of her who is a Princess so nearly ally'd to me in Blood, and whose Practices against me have so deeply affected me with Grief and Sorrow, that I have willingly chosen to absent myself from this Parliament, lest I should increase my Trouble by hearing the Matter mention'd; and not out of Fear of any Danger or treacherous Attempts against me, as some think. But I will now tell you a farther Secret, (tho' it be not usual with me to blab forth in other cases what I know.) It is not long since these Eyes of mine saw and read an Oath wherein some bound themselves to kill me within a Month. Hereby I see your Danger in my Person, which I will be very careful to prevent and keep off.

The Association you enter'd into for my Safety I have not forgotten, a thing I never so much as thought of, till a great Number of Hands and Seals to it were shew'd me. This has laid a perpetual Tie and Obligation upon me, to bear you a singular Good-will and Love, who have no greater Comfort than in your and the Commonwealth's Respect and Affection towards me. But forasmuch as the Matter now in hand is very rarely exampled, and of greatest Consequence, I hope you do not look for any present Resolution from me: for my manner is, in Matters of less Moment than this, to deliberate long upon that which is but once to be resolv'd. In the mean time, I beseech Almighty God, so to illuminate and direct my Heart, that I may see clearly what may be best for the Good of his Church, the Prosperity of the Commonwealth, and your Safety. And that Delay may not breed Danger, we will signify our Resolution to you with all Convenience. And whatever the best of Subjects may expect at the Hands of the best Princess, that expect from me to be perform'd to the full.

She prays them to find out some other Expedient. On the 12th day after, when she had thoroughly weigh'd the Matter in her Mind, being distracted with doubtful Cares and Thoughts, and as it were in some Conflict with herself, what to do in so important a Business, she sent the Lord-Chancellor to the Upper House, and Puckering to the rest in the Lower House, advising them to enter anew into the serious Consideration of so weighty an Affair, and to find out a more pleasing Expedient, whereby both the Queen of Scots Life might be spared, and her own Security provided for.

After long and serious Deliberation, judging that both the Welfare and Detriment of the Prince concern'd all the Subjects, they unanimously concurr'd again in their former Opinion; and that for these Reasons. The Queen's Safety

(they said) could no way be secured, as long as the Queen of Scots liv'd, unless she should either seriously repent and acknowledge her Offence; or were kept with a closer Guard, and sufficient Security given by Bond and Oath, for her good Demeanor; or deliver'd Hostages; or else departed the Realm. As for her Repentance, they were out of all Hopes of it, considering that she had so ill requited the Queen who had saved her Life, and would not yet acknowledge her Fault. As for a surer Guard, stricter Custody, Bonds, Oath, and Hostages, they esteem'd them all as nothing worth, because if the Queen's Life were once taken away, all these would presently vanish. And if she should depart the Realm, they fear'd lest she should presently take up Arms and invade the same.

These Reasons the Lord-Chancellor, and Puckering Speaker of the Lower House, explain'd and open'd more at large, pressing hard that the Sentence might be put in Execution: because, as it were Injustice to deny Execution of the Law to any one of her Subjects that should demand it; so much more to the whole Body of her People of England, unanimously and with one Voice humbly and instantly suing for the same. The Queen answer'd as follows.

Very unpleasant is that Way, where the Setting out, Progress and Journeys End yield nothing but Trouble and Vexation. I have this day been in greater Conflict with myself, than ever I was in all my Life, whether I should speak, or hold my peace. If I should speak, and not complain, I shall dissemble: if I should be silent, all your Labour and Pains taken were in vain: and if I should complain, it might seem a strange and unusual thing. Yet I confess, that my hearty Desire was, that some other means might have been devised, to provide for your Security and my own Safety, than this which is now propounded. So that I cannot but complain, tho' not of you, yet to you, since I perceive by your Petition, that my Safety depends wholly upon the Ruin of another. If there be any that think I have spun out the time on purpose to get Commendation, by a seeming Shew of Clemency, they do me Wrong undeservedly, as he knows who is the Searcher of the most secret Thoughts of the Heart. Or if there be any that are persuaded the Commissioners durst pronounce no other Sentence for fear they should thereby displease me, or seem to fail of their Care for my Preservation, they do but burden and wrong me with such injurious Conceits. For either those whom I put in Trust have fail'd of their Duties: or else they acquainted the Commissioners in my Name that my Will and Pleasure was, that every one should act freely, according to his Conscience; and what they thought not fit to be made publick, that they should communicate to me in private. It was of my favourable Inclination towards her, that I desired some other way might be found out, to prevent this Mischief. But since it is now resolv'd, that my Security is desperate without her Death, I find a great Reluctancy and Trouble within me, that I, who have in my time pardon'd so many Rebels, wink'd at so many Treasons, or neglected 'em by Silence, should now seem to shew myself cruel towards so great a Princess.

I have, since I came to the Government of this Realm, seen many defamatory Libels and Pamphlets against me, taxing me to be a Tyrant. Well fare the Writers Hearts; I believe their Meaning was to tell me News. And News indeed it was to me to be branded with the Note of Tyranny. I would it were as great News to hear of their Wickedness and Impiety. But what is it which they will not venture to write 1586. Ann. 29. write now, when they shall hear that I have given my Consent, that the Executioner's Hands should be imbrued in the Blood of my nearest Kinswoman? But so far am I from Cruelty, that, tho' it were to save my own Life, I would not offer her the least Violence: neither have I been so careful how to preserve my own Life, as how to preserve both hers and mine: which that it is now impossible to do, I am heartily troubled. I am not so void of Sense and Judgment, as not to see my own Danger before my Eyes; nor so indiscreet, as to sharpen a Sword to cut my own Throat; nor so egregiously careless, as not to provide for the Safety of my own Life. This I consider with myself, that many a Man would hazard his own Life to save the Life of a Prince: but I am not of their Opinion. These things have I many times thought upon seriously with myself.

But since so many have both written and spoken against me, give me leave, I pray you, to say somewhat in my own Defence, that ye may see what manner of Woman I am, for whose Safety and Preservation ye have taken such extraordinary Care. Wherein as I do with a most thankful Heart discern and read your great Vigilance; so am I sure I shall never requite it, had I as many Lives as all you together.

When first I took the Scepter into my Hand, I was not unmindful of God the Giver, and therefore I began my Reign with securing his Service, and the Religion I had been both born in, bred in, and, I trust, shall die in. And tho' I was not ignorant how many Dangers I should meet withal at home, for my altering Religion, and how many great Princes abroad of a contrary Profession would in that Respect bear an hostile Mind towards me: yet was I no whit dismay'd thereat, knowing that God, whom alone I ey'd and respected, would defend both me and my Cause. Hence it is that so many Treacheries and Conspiracies have been attempted against me, that I might well admire to find myself alive at this present day, were it not that God's holy Hand has still protected me beyond all Expectation. Next, to the end I might make the better Progress in the Art of Ruling well, I had long and serious Cogitations with myself what things were most worthy and becoming Kings to do: and I found it absolutely necessary that they should be completely furnish'd with those prime capital Vertues, Justice, Temperance, Prudence and Magnanimity. Of the two latter I will not boast myself; my Sex does not permit it, they are proper to Men. But for the two former and less rough, I dare say, (and that without Ostentation) I never made a Difference of Persons, but high and low had equally Right done them: I never preferr'd any for Favour whom I thought not fit and worthy: I never was forward to believe Stories at the first telling; nor was I so rash as to suffer my Judgment to be forestall'd with Prejudice, before I had heard the Cause. I will not say but many Reports might haply be brought me, too much in favour of the one side or the other: For a good and a wary Prince may sometimes be bought and sold, whilst we cannot hear all ourselves. Yet this I dare say boldly, My Judgment (as far as I could understand the Case) ever went with the Truth. And as Alcibiades advised his Friend, not to give any Answer till he had run over the Letters of the whole Alphabet; so have I never used rash and sudden Resolutions in any thing.

1586. Ann. 29. And therefore as touching your Counsels and Consultations, I acknowledge 'em to have been with such Care and Providence, and so advantageous for the Preservation of my Life, and to proceed from Hearts so sincere and devoted to me, that I shall endeavour what lies in my Power, to give you Cause to think your Pains not ill-bestow'd, and strive to shew myself worthy of such Subjects.

And now for your Petition, I desire you for the present to content yourselves with an Answer without Answer. Your Judgment I condemn not, neither do I mistake your Reasons: but I must desire you to excuse those thoughtful Doubts and Cares, which as yet perplex my Mind; and to rest satisfy'd with the Profession of my thankful Esteem of your Affections, and the Answer I have given, if you take it for any Answer at all. If I should say I will not do what you request, I might say perhaps more than I intend: and if I should say I will do it, I might plunge myself into as bad Inconveniences as you endeavour to preserve me from: which I am confident your Wisdoms and Discretions would not that I should, if ye consider the Circumstances of Place, Time, and the Manners and Conditions of Men.

After this the Parliament was prorogued.

About this time were the Lord Buckhurst and Beale sent to the Queen of Scots, to let her know that Sentence was pronounced against her; and that the same was approv'd and confirm'd by Authority of Parliament, as just and lawful, and the Execution thereof instantly desired by the Parliament, out of a due Regard of Justice, Security and Necessity: and therefore to persuade her to acknowledge her Offences against God and the Queen, and to expiate them before her Death by Repentance; letting her understand, that as long as she liv'd, the Religion receiv'd in England could not be secure. Hereat the seem'd to triumph with a more than wonted Alacrity, giving God Thanks, and rejoicing in her Heart, that she was taken to be an Instrument for the re-establishing of Religion in this Island. And earnestly she besought, that she might have a Catholick Priest allow'd her, to direct her Conscience, and administer the Sacraments unto her. A Bishop and a Dean, whom they commended to her for this purpose, she utterly rejected, and sharply tax'd the English Nation, saying, That the English had many times put their own Kings to death; no marvel therefore if they now also shew their Cruelty upon me, who am issued from the Blood of their Kings.

The Publication of the Sentence was stay'd for some time by the Intercession of L'Aubespine the French Ambassador: but in the Month of December, through the earnest Instance of some Courtiers, it was publicly proclaim'd all over the City of London, the Lord-Mayor, the Aldermen, and principal Officers and Citizens being present, and afterward throughout the whole Realm. In this Proclamation the Queen seriously protested, that this Publication was extorted from her, to the exceeding Grief of her Mind, by a kind of Necessity, and at the earnest Prayers and Intreaties of both Houses of Parliament: tho' there were some that thought this to proceed from the Art and Guile of Women, who, though they desire a thing never so much, yet will always seem rather to be constrain'd and forced to it.

The Publication of this Sentence of Death being made known to the Queen of Scots, so far it was she from being dismay'd thereat, that with a settled and steadfast Countenance, lifting up her Eyes and Hands towards Heaven, she gave Thanks to God for it. And tho' she were by 1586. Ann. 29. Powles her Keeper divested of all the Badges of Dignity and Royalty, and made no more account of than the poorest Woman of the meanest Condition; yet she endur'd it with great Patience of Mind. And having with much ado obtained leave of him to write, she by a Letter sent to Queen Elizabeth the 19th of December endeavour'd to clear herself from all hostile Malice against her; and thanked God for the Sentence of her Condemnation, who was now pleased to put a period to her woful and lamentable Pilgrimage in this Life. She prayed her that for the Kindnesses and Favours follow'd she might be beholden to herself, and to none else, (for from those zealous Puritans, who now bare the chief sway in England, she could expect no good). First, That when her Adversaries were glutted and satiated with her innocent Blood, her Body might be conveyed by her Servants into some Holy Catholick Land to be buried; she would willingly into France, where her Mother's Soul rested in peace. For in Scotland the Sepulchers of her Ancestors were violated, and the Churches either demolished or profan'd; and in England, among the ancient Kings, the common Progenitors of them both, she could have no hope to be interr'd with Catholick Rites and Ceremonies. So might her Body at length rest in peace, which as long as it was joined with the Soul could never find any rest or quiet. Secondly, (in regard she feared the secret Tyranny of some) That she might not be put to Death in private without Queen Elizabeth's knowledge, but in the sight of her Servants and others, who might give a true Testimony of her Faith in Christ, her Obedience toward the Church, and her Christian Departure, to prevent those false Reports which her Adversaries might otherwise throw out and asperse her with. And, Thirdly, That her Servants might freely and peaceably depart whither they pleased, and enjoy those Legacies which she had bequeath'd them by her Will and Testament. These things with most earnest Prayers she intreated of her in the Name of Jesus Christ, by their near Kindred, by the Soul and Memory of Henry VII. the common Progenitor of them both, and by the Royal Dignity which she had born. Then she complain'd, That all her Regal Ornaments were taken from her by command of some of the Council, by which she suspected that their Malice might break forth to greater matters. She added, That, if they had shew'd her Letters and Papers which were taken from her, fairly and without any Fraud, it might have plainly appear'd by them, that there was no other cause of her Ruin, but the Over-carefulness and Solitude of some for Queen Elizabeth's Safety. Lastly, She earnestly besought her, that she would write back a few Words to her touching these matters with her own Hand.

Powlet

Variety of Opinions concerning her Case. Whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth's Hands, I cannot say. But divers Discourses were rais'd about this Affair, according to the several Affections and Dispositions of Men; to say nothing of the Declamations and Exclamations of the Churchmen on both sides, who for the most part are very fiery and vehement.

For her. Some indifferent Censurers there were, who thought she was too sharply dealt withal, and had hard measure, in regard she was a free and absolute Princess, and had no Superiour but God alone: They said, 'She was Queen Elizabeth's very near Kinswoman, who had also by Henry Midlemore made her a large Promise, on the Word of a Prince, of all Courtesie and kind Hospitality, as soon as she was arriv'd in England, being thrown out of her Kingdom by her Rebels and yet on the contrary had kept her still in Prison, and violated the sacred Rights of Hospitality: That she could not be otherways reputed than as a Prisoner taken in War; and it was always lawful for such as were taken Prisoners in War, to use what means they could to work their own Safety and Liberty: That she could not commit Treason, because she was no Subject; and Par in parem non habet potestatem; that is, Princes of equal Degree have no Power or Sovereignty one over another; and thereupon the Sentence of the Emperor against Robert King of Sicily was disannull'd, because he was no Subject of the Empire: That Ambassadors, who are Princes Servants, if they conspire against the Kings to whom they are sent in Embassy, are not to be charg'd as guilty of Treason, much less Princes themselves; and, That the Purpose or Intention is not to be punish'd, unless the Effect follow. Moreover, That it was a thing never heard of, that a Prince should be subjected to the Stroke of an Executioner. Also, that she was condemn'd contrary to the Law of God, the Civil Law of the Romans, and the Common Law of England; yea contrary also to the first Act of Parliament made in the 13th Year of Queen Elizabeth, by which it is enacted, That no Man is to be arraigned for intending the Destruction of his Prince's Life, but by the Testimony and Oath of two lawful Witnesses to be produced face to face before him; whereas in this Trial no Witness was produced, but she was over-born with the Testimony of her Secretaries, who notwithstanding were absent from the Trial. Much more arguing also there was about the Credit and Validity of the Testimony of Servants, Prisoners and Domesticks. And that Saying of the Emperor Hadrian was commended: Testibus non testimoniis credendum; Witnesses, not witnessings, are to be believ'd.

These Men farther mutter'd and complain'd, That Spies and Emisaries were employ'd, by crafty Diffimulation, counterfeit Letters, and other cunning Devices, to circumvent her, (being a Woman easily to be wrong'd and abus'd, and very desirous of her Liberty) to fish out her secret Counsels, and to encourage and put her on to dangerous Designs, which never would have entred into her Thoughts, if she had been kept with that care as was requisite, and such cunning Fellows had not been privately sent to her on set purpose to intrap her. That in all Ages it hath still been ordinary with great Courtiers, to thrust forward those whom they hate, even against their Wills and Inclinations, to such Attempts as shall bring them within the compass of Treason, and treacherously to plunge the suspectless Innocent, if once imprison'd, into inextricable Dangers.

Others there were who took her not to be a free and absolute Queen, but a titular Queen only, because she had resign'd her Kingdom, and when she first came into England had put herself under the Protection of the Queen of England; after which, as by carrying herself well she enjoy'd the benefit of the Laws; so by Misdeemeanor she was subject to the Equity and Justice thereof, according to that Rule of the Lawyers, He deserveth not the benefit of the Law who offendeth against the Law. Otherwise, better were the Condition of a foreign Prince, if he might do what he list'd in another Prince's Kingdom, than his that reigneth never so well. They reputed her also to be a Subject, tho' not originally, yet pro tempore, because two absolute Princes with Regal Authority cannot be in the same Kingdom at one time. That it was a received Opinion of the Learned in the Laws, A King

King out of his Dominions (except it be upon a war-like Expedition) is but a private Person, and therefore can neither confer Honours, nor exercise any Royalty. Moreover, That she by her Misdemeanors had lost merum Imperium, her absolute and just Power and Sovereignty; and that such as are Subjects by their Abode only and place of Habitation, might commit Treason. As for her Kindred; That no Kindred is nearer nor dearer than our Country: Our Country is to us as another God, and our first and greatest Parent. And as touching the promised Offices of Civility and Hospitality, That they could not privilege her to offer Wrongs and Mischiefs afterwards with Impunity: That those Promises were to be understood, things continuing in the same state, and not altered. He which shall afterwards commit a Crime deserves not to enjoy the Security which was before promis'd him. Sacred indeed are the Laws of Hospitality, but more sacred are the Laws of our Country. That Princes, as well as the Pope, do never bind their own Hands. And all Men are more strongly tied and engaged to the Commonwealth than to their own Promises. And for her being dealt withal as a Prisoner taken in the Wars, they alledg'd, out of I know not what Author, That only such Prisoners of War are to be spared, from whom we need to fear no disturbance of the Peace; others not: And, That a Prince hath Power and Jurisdiction over another Prince that is his Equal, whenever that other Prince makes himself subject to the Judgment of his Equal, either by express Words, or private Contract, or by trespassing within the Jurisdiction of his Equal. That the Pope repeal'd the Emperor's Sentence against Robert King of Sicily, because the Fact was not committed within the Emperor's, but within the Pope's, Territories. That Ambassadors are by the Law of Nations privileg'd in respect of the necessity of their Embassy to be free from Violence; but so are not Kings that shall attempt Mischief and Disturbance in another King's Dominions. Again, That in case of Treason the Purpose and Intention is to be punish'd, though it never be brought to Effect; and that to attempt the Death of the Prince, yea to know of such an Attempt and conceal it, comes within the Compass and Guilt of Treason. That many Kings have been condemn'd and put to Death, namely, Rhesus King of Thrace by Tiberius, Licinius and Maximianus by Constantine the Great, Bernard of Italy, and Conradine of Sicily, &c. And, to conclude, (which is instead of a thousand Arguments) That the Safety of the People is the supreme Law; and no Law is more sacred than the Safety of the Commonwealth. That God himself hath given and ordained this Law, That all things which are good and profitable for the Commonwealth, should be accounted just and lawful. Yea, that the very Popes, not so much for the Publick as their own Security, have put to death several Ecclesiastical Princes: As Boniface VIII. caused Celestine V. after his deposing from the Popedom, to be put to death, fearing lest for his singular Piety he should be called again to the Papacy; and Urban VI. caused five Cardinals to be sow'd up in Sacks and thrown into the Sea; others he beheaded; and the Bodies of two he commanded to be dried in an Oven, and carried about upon Mules for a terror to others. Farthermore, That her Secretaries were not to be accounted of as Servants; and that domestick Evidences were to be admitted concerning those things that were done privately and secretly at home. That it was a mere Nicety to make question, whether those Accusers that were voluntarily sworn, and themselves accessory to the Crime, were to be brought face to face to maintain their Accusation in criminal Cases. To be short, That there was no great and notable Example extant which did not carry with it some Colour and Appearance of Injustice. These things and the like to these we then heard familiarly bandied to and fro.

In the mean time the King of Scots (such was his singular Piety toward his Mother) laboured all that possibly he could by William Keith to save her Life, and omitted nothing that became a most dutiful and pious Son, and a prudent King: But without any Success at all; for the Scots were rent into Factions amongst themselves, and more there were in the Interest of Queen Elizabeth than of the captive Queen: Insomuch that some of them secretly solicited Queen Elizabeth by Letters to hasten her Execution: And the Scottish Clergy, being commanded by the King to recommend his Mother's Preservation to God in their Prayers at Church, peremptorily refus'd to do it; such was their hatred to the Religion which she profess'd. Nevertheless the King, as he had before by frequent Messages and as frequent Letters made Intercession for her to the Queen; so now by repeated and more importunate Letters and Messages he again solicited for her. Wherein he complain'd, That it was great Injustice and Indignity, that the Nobility, Council and Subjects of England should give Sentence against a Queen of Scots, that was also descended of the Blood-Royal of England: And no less Injustice to think that the States of England can by Authority of Parliament exclude the true and undoubted Heirs from their Right of Succession and lawful Inheritance, (as some for a Terror now and then threatned).

He sent also Patrick Grey and Robert Melvin, to let the Queen know, That out of his singular Love and Friendship he could not believe but she, who had by her Vertues, and especially by her Clemency, purchased herself all over the World so renowned a Name, free from all blot and imputation of Cruelty, would still preserve the same, and not by any means stain it now with the Blood of his dear Mother, who was of the same Regal State and Condition, of the same Blood, the same Sex with herself, and whom (forasmuch as he was bound in Conscience to have a pious and religious Care of his Mother's Life) he could not forsake, or leave to the Cruelty of those who had now for a long time gaped after his Destruction as well as his Mother's.

In other Letters to her, after he had at large declared with what thoughtful Care and Anguish of Heart he was perplex'd about so weighty a Business, which nearly concern'd and touch'd him in regard both of Nature and Honour, and into what Straits and Hazard of his Reputation amongst his own People he should be plunged, if any Violence should be offer'd to his Mother; out of an inward sense of Sorrow and his filial Affection, he propounded to Queen Elizabeth these things following to be seriously weigh'd and considered by her: How much it concerned him in Honour, who was both a King and a Son, if his dearest Mother, and the absolute Princess, should be put to an infamous Death by her who was so nearly allied and engaged to her both in Blood and League of Amity? Whether by the Law of God there could be any just Proceeding by Law against those whom God hath appointed to be his supreme Ministers of Justice, whom he hath call'd Gods on Earth, whom he hath anointed, and once anointed, hath forbidden to be touch'd, and will

will not suffer 'em to go unpunish'd that shall do them Violence? How strange and monstrous a thing it would be, to subject an absolute Prince to the Judgment of Subjects? How prodigious, if an absolute Prince should be made so dangerous a Precedent for the profaning and vilifying her own and other Princes Diadems? And moreover, What should drive her to this Rigor and Severity? Honour or Profit? If Honour, she would purchase more Honour by sparing her; for so would she, with eternal Commendations of her Clemency, oblige unto her by this Favour both himself and all the Princes of Christendom, whose Affections otherwise she could not but alienate from her, with the loss of her Fame, and incur the brand of Cruelty. And if Profit were the thing that mov'd her to it, it was to be consider'd whether any thing were profitable which was neither just nor honest. He concluded with this Request, That his Ambassadors might bring him back such an Answer as might beseeem a most religious Queen to give, and not be unfit for a King and a loving Kinsman to receive. But his Ambassador unseasonably mingling Threatnings with Entreaties, they were not very welcome; and indeed after a few Days were dismiss'd with small hope of succeeding in what they came about.

French interceded by his Ambassadors.
Monsieur Pompon de Bellieure, who was sent from the French King upon this Occasion, having got access to the Queen in company with L'Aubespine a Chasseau-neuf the Ordinary Ambassador, and briefly signified with what contrary Affections the French King was distracted, on the one side out of his singular Respect towards her, and on the other side by reason of the strict Alliance betwixt him and the Queen of Scots, propounded these and the like Considerations in Writing several times to the Queen in her behalf.

Bellieure's Reasons for the Q of Scots.
That it very much concern'd the most Christian King of France, and all other Kings, that a Queen, a free and absolute Princess, should not be put to death.

That the Queen's Safety would be more endangered by the death of Queen Mary, than it would be by her Life: That if she were deliver'd out of Prison, she would probably attempt nothing against the Queen, being now in a sickly Condition, and having but a short time to live.

That altho' she had laid Claim to the Crown of England, she was not to be blam'd for it, but it was wholly to be imputed to her young and tender Years, and to bad Counsellors.

That she came at first a Suppliant into England; and therefore having been unjustly detain'd, she was now at length to be either ransom'd, or mercifully dealt withal. Moreover, That an absolute Prince was not to be call'd in question; which made Tully say, So unusual a thing is it for a King to be put to death for any Crime, that before this time it was never so much as heard of.

That if she were innocent, she was not to be punish'd; if guilty, she was to be spared. For this would turn to far greater Honour and Advantage, and would be recorded eternally as an Example of the English Clemency. That the Story of Porfenna in this Case was to be remember'd, who snatch'd the right Hand of Mutius Scævola out of the Fire, and set him at Liberty, tho' he had conspir'd his Death.

That it was a prime Rule and Precept for well-governing, To be sparing of Blood: That Blood crieth for Blood: That to use the Extremity of Rigor towards her could not but seem a cruel and bloody part.

That the French King would do his best to repel and frustrate the Attempts of all Men whatsoever who should offer Violence to the Queen: And, That the Guises, the Queen of Scots near Kinsmen, would engage themselves to do the like by Oath and Covenant under their Hands; who, in case she should be put to Death, would take it very hardly, and haply not leave her unreveng'd.

Lastly; They requir'd that she might not be proceeded against according to so rigorous and extraordinary a Sentence; otherwise the French King could not but take very great Displeasure thereat, howsoever other Princes should happen to resent it.

To these Reasons Answer was made from Point to Point in the Margin as followeth.

That the Queen of England trusted the most Christian King of France would have no less a Regard and Respect for her than he had for the Queen of Scots, who had practis'd the Destruction of an innocent Princess, her near Kinswoman, and a Confederate with the French King. That it was expedient and necessary for Kings and Commonwealths, that wicked Attempts (especially against Princes) should not go unpunish'd.

That the English, which acknowledge the Sovereign Authority of Queen Elizabeth only in England, could not acknowledge two supreme free and absolute Princes in England at one time; or account any other Person whatsoever equal to her in England as long as she lived. Neither indeed did they see how the Queen of Scots, and her Son who at present reigneth, can be reputed both at one time for supreme and absolute Princes.

Whether the Queen's Safety would be exposed to greater Danger upon her being executed, depended upon future Accidents and Contingencies: The States of England, upon serious deliberation of the Matter, thought otherwise. There would never be Occasions wanting for bad Attempts, especially when the matter was now come to that pass, that the one had no hope of Safety unless the other were ruin'd; and this Saying they might call to mind, Aut ego illam, aut illa me; Either I must take away her Life, or she will take away mine. The shorter the time to come of her Life was, the sooner and more eagerly would the Conspirators hasten the Queen's Danger.

That the Title which she claimed to the Crown of England she would not yet renounce, and therefore she was with good Reason detain'd in Prison, and so to be detain'd (tho' she came a Suppliant into England) till she had renounc'd the same. And the Crimes which she had committed since she was a Prisoner she ought to suffer for, whatever were the cause of her first casting into Prison.

That the Queen had formerly most graciously spared her Life, when by unanimous Consent of the States she was condemn'd for a Rebellion rais'd about an intended Marriage between her and the Duke of Norfolk; and to spare her again were but unadvised and cruel pity. That no Man was ignorant of that Saying of the Lawyers, A Man offending in another's Territory, and there found, is punish'd in the place of his Offence, without regard to his Dignity, Honour or Privilege.

And that this was both justifiable by the Laws of England, and by the Examples of Licinius, Robert King of Sicily, Bernard King of Italy, Conradine, Elizabeth Queen of Hungary, Joan Queen of Naples, and Dejotarus; for whom Tully pleading, said, It was no unjust thing that a King should be found guilty and put to death, tho' it were not usual.

1586. usur. For thus the Words run, Which I speak
first touching a King's forfeiture of Life and Estate.
 Ann. 29. Which thing tho' it be not unjust, especially when thy Life is in danger from him, yet is it so unusual, &c.

That she ought to be punish'd, having been found guilty upon a just and legal Trial; considering that what is just, the same is honest; and what is honest, is also profitable and expedient.

That the Story of Porfenna suited not with the present Case; unless a Man should imagine a numerous Combination of Men to have laid wait for the Queen's Life, and should thereupon persuade her to let the Queen of Scots at Liberty without any Hurt, out of a fear of 'em, and with some regard to her own Honour, but none to her Safety. as Porfenna discharged Mutius after he had affirmed that Three hundred like himself had conspir'd and vowed his death. Moreover, Mutius attempted this against Porfenna in a just and declar'd War; and when Mutius was let go, Porfenna verily persuaded himself that all the Danger was over: But the case here is quite otherwise.

That Blood indeed is to be spar'd, but it must be innocent Blood: This God hath commanded. True it is indeed, that the Voice of innocent Blood crieth for Blood; and this can France, both before and since the Massacre at Paris, well witness and testify.

That Death that is justly inflicted, cannot seem bloody; as neither is Phyllick, prepared duly and as it ought to be, esteemed violent.

That howsoever the Guises, the Q. of Scots Kinsmen, might take the matter, yet it highly concern'd the Queen to regard rather the Safety of herself, the Nobility and People of England, (upon whose Love and Affection she wholly depended) than the Displeasure of any whosoever. That the matter was come to that pass, that what was said of old concerning two Princesses, Conradine of Sicily and Charles of Anjou, might now be spoken of two Queens, it might now be truly said, The Death of Mary is the Life of Elizabeth, and the Life of Mary is the Death of Elizabeth.

That the French King's or the Guises Promises could not secure the Queen and Realm, much less make Satisfaction for her Life, if she should be made away.

That the French King could neither discover nor hinder secret Plots against himself at home; much less was he like to hinder those against the Queen of England: For Treason is plotted in secret, and therefore hard to be prevented. If the Fact were once committed, what would it avail to claim their Promises? How should an incomparable Prince's Death be made amends for? And in so sad and woful a Confusion of all things, what Remedy could be found for the languishing Commonwealth?

That the Obligations and Oaths of the Guises were of small value, who judged it meritorious to kill the Pope's Adversaries, and could very easily procure Dispensations for their Oaths. And what Englishman, if Queen Elizabeth were slain, and the Queen of Scots of the House of Guise advanc'd to the Crown, durst accuse them of Murder? And if any should accuse them, could they thereby make her alive again?

And the Ambassadors in calling this a rigorous and extraordinary Sentence, have spoken rashly and unadvisedly, (forasmuch as they have seen neither Process nor Proofs) and have more sharply than is fitting taxed the States of the Realm of England, Men eminent for their Nobility, Vertue, Prudence and Piety: Yea, they have very inconsiderately uttered such Words in the French King's Name, as if they meant by Threats to terrify the Queen and the States of the Land. The Englishmen use not to be terrified by the Frenchmen's Threats from taking Courses to secure their own Tranquillity, when they in the mean time could direct them no proper way to avoid the instant and threatening Dangers.

The Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

While these things, either out of Hatred or French Affection, were curiously and copiously argued according to Mens apprehensions of Things, L'Aubespine the French Ambassador Leiger in England, a Man wholly devoted to the Guise Faction, supposing it the best way to provide for the captive Queen's Safety and Preservation, not by Arguments, but by underhand Practices and Artifices, tampered about taking away Queen Elizabeth's Life (at first more closely) with William Stafford a young Gentleman, and ready to catch at new Hopes of Advancement, whose Mother was one of the Queen's honourable Bed-chamber, and his Brother at that time Ambassador Leiger in France; and afterwards more plainly and openly, by Trappy his Secretary, who promis'd him, if he would effect it, not only infinite Glory and a vast deal of Money, but also special Favour with the Pope, the Duke of Guise, and generally with all the Catholics. Stafford, as detesting the Fact, refus'd to do it; yet recommended one Moody, a noble Bravo, one ready for any mischief, as a Man who for Money would without doubt resolutely do the Business. This Moody lying then in the common Gaol of London, Stafford gave him to understand that the French Ambassador would very gladly speak with him. He answer'd, He was very ready so to do in case he were once out of Prison: In the mean time he desir'd that Cordalion, the Ambassador's other Secretary, with whom he was well acquainted, might be sent unto him. The next day Trappy was sent, accompanied by Stafford. Trappy, after Stafford was remov'd a little aside, conferreth with Moody about the best way of killing the Queen. Moody propounds either to do it by Poison, or by a Bag of Gunpowder of 20 Pounds weight to be put under the Queen's Bed, and secretly fired. These two ways pleased not Trappy, who wished that such another resolute Fellow could be found as that Burgundian who murder'd the Prince of Orange.

These things were soon after reveal'd to the Queen's Council by Stafford. Whereupon Trappy, intending suddenly to go for France, was seiz'd upon; and being question'd touching these Matters, confess'd what I have said. Upon this the Ambassador himself was sent for the 12th of January to Cecil's House, whither he came in the evening; where were present, by the Queen's appointment, Cecil Lord Burghley Lord-Treasurer of England, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, and Davison one of her Secretaries. They let him know, that they had sent for him to inform him for what reason they had apprehended Trappy his Secretary as he was going for France: And they acquainted him with all things particularly which Stafford, Moody, and Trappy himself had confess'd, and commanded them to be call'd in to witness the same to his Face. The Ambassador, having heard all the Story with great Impatience and a frowning Countenance, now rose up and said, That he, being the King's Ambassador, would not bear any Accusation to the Prejudice of the King.

King his Master, and against the Privileges of Ambassadors. When it was answer'd, That they were not produced as Accusers, but that he might see these things not to be feign'd and pretended, and that he himself might have liberty to charge Stafford with Falshood, he was satisfy'd. As soon as Stafford was brought in, and began to speak, he interrupted him, railing upon him, and affirming that Stafford was the first Man that propounded the matter; and that he had threaten'd him, unless he would desist, to send him bound Hand and Foot to the Queen; but yet had spared him out of his singular Love to Stafford's Mother, Brother and Sister. Stafford, falling upon his Knees, deeply protested upon his Salvation, that the Ambassador first propounded the matter to him. The Ambassador being now more vehemently moved, Stafford was commanded to withdraw, and Moody was not brought in.

And when Burleigh had gently reprov'd the Ambassador, as conscious or accessory to the plotting of so foul a Fact, both by his own Words and Trappy's Confession; he answer'd, Altho' he had been accessory to it, yet seeing he was an Ambassador, he ought not to discover the same to any, but the King his Master only. When Burleigh reply'd, That if it be not for an Ambassador to make any such Discovery when a Prince's Life is by wicked Contrivances brought into Danger, (which notwithstanding is a thing controverted) yet it is the Duty of a Christian to repel and hinder such Injuries, and that where the Safety not only of a Prince, but also of any private Christian, is concern'd. This he strongly deny'd, and withal told him, how a French Ambassador not long since in Spain, having Knowledge of a Design against the King of Spain's Life, discover'd it not to the King of Spain, but to the King his Master, and was therefore commended by the King and his Council. But Burleigh gravely advis'd him to beware how he committed Treason any more, or forgot the Duty of an Ambassadour, and the Queen's Clemency, who should not by punishing a bad Ambassador prejudice the good: and that he was not acquitted from the Guilt of the Offence, tho' he escaped the Punishment.

By means of this Attempt, such as bare a mortal Hatred against the Queen of Scots took occasion to hasten her Death. And to strike the greater Terror into the Queen, (knowing that where a Man's own Safety lies at Stake, there Fear excludes all Pity) they caus'd false Rumors and terrifying Reports daily to be spread all over England: viz. That the Spanish Fleet was already arriv'd at Milford-Haven; That the Scots were broken into England; That the Duke of Guise was landed in Suffex with a strong Army; That the Queen of Scots was escaped out of Prison, and had rais'd an Army; That the Northern Parts were up in Rebellion; That there was a new Conspiracy on foot to kill the Queen, and set the City of London on Fire; yea, That the Queen was dead; with other such like Stories, which Men either crafty for their own ends, or really fearful, are wont to feign to themselves, and to make worse, out of a natural Propensity they have to cherish and increase Rumors, which Princes lightly credulous do easily entertain.

With such Scare-crows and affrighting Arguments as these, they drew the Queen's wavering and perplex'd Mind to that pass, that she sign'd a Warrant for putting the Sentence of Death in Execution. And one of the principal Persuaders to it (as the Scots report) was Patrick Gray a Scot, sent purposely by the King of Scots to dissuade the Queen from putting his Mother to death; who many times buzz'd into the Queen's Ear that Saying, Mortua non mordet, that is, A dead Woman bites not.

Yet she, being a Woman naturally slow in her Resolutions, began to consider in her Mind, whether it were better to put her to death, or to spare her. Against putting her to death these things had great Weight: 'Her own innate Clemency, lest she should seem to shew herself cruel to a Woman, and that a Princess, and her Kinswoman; Fear of Infamy with Posterity in after-Histories; And imminent and certain Dangers, as well from the King of Scots, who would now be advanced to a Step higher in his Hopes of England, as from the Catholick Princes and desperate Men, who would now adventure upon any thing. On the other side, if she should spare her, she foresaw that no less Dangers threaten'd her. 'The Noblemen that had given their Sentence against the Queen of Scots would endeavour underhand to get into Favour with her and her Son, not without manifest Hazard to herself; The rest of her Subjects, who had been so careful for her Safety, seeing she had frustrated their Pains and Care, would take it very ill, and for time to come neglect her Preservation; Many would turn Papists, and entertain greater Hopes, when they should see her preserv'd as it were by Fate to a Probability of enjoying the Crown; The Jesuites and Seminaries, whose Eyes are upon her only, seeing her sickly, and fearing that she would not live long, would leave no means untry'd to hasten Queen Elizabeth's Death, that so their Religion might be restored.

The Courtiers also continually suggested to her these things following, and the like: 'Why should you spare her, when she is guilty and justly condemn'd, who, tho' she subscribed to the Association for your Safety, yet presently after resolv'd unmercifully to ruin you who were altogether innocent, and by destroying you to destroy Religion, the Nobility, and People? Clemency and Mercy is a Royal Vertue, but not to be extended to the merciless. Let the vain Shew of Mercy give place to wholesome Severity. Have a care that your unseasonable Mercy and Favour involve you not in the greatest Misery. It is Commendation enough of your Clemency, to have spared her once: to spare her again were nothing else but to pronounce her guiltless, condemn the Parliament of Injustice, encourage her Favourers to hasten their wicked Designs, and discourage your faithful Subjects from their Care for the Commonwealth. Religion, the Commonwealth, your own Safety, the Love of your Country, the Oath of Association, and the Care of Posterity, do all with their joint Prayers beseech you, that she who endangers the Subversion of all these may forthwith be put to death: and except they may prevail, Safety itself will never be able to save this Commonwealth; and Historians will leave it recorded to succeeding Ages, that the bright Sun-shine and glorious Days of England under Queen Elizabeth, ended in a foul, cloudy and dark Evening, yea, in an eternal Night. Posterity will blame us for lack of Wisdom, that could foresee these Mischiefs, (which adds to the Misery thereof) and yet could not prevent them; and will impute the Mass and Heap of future Calamities, not so much to the Adversaries Malice, as to the gross Carelessness of these Times. The Life of one Scottish and Titular Queen ought not to weigh down the Safety of all England. In so important a matter there ought to be no Delay; for Delay brings Danger: nor any space of time allow'd to Plotters of Mischiefs, who will now have their last Refuge and Recourse to bold Attempts, since besides Impunity

The Mischiefs which threaten from Foreiners, the Cause being once taken away, will be all taken away with it; neither can they do England any Harm but by her. Whatsoever mind or power the Pope hath to hurt us, will fall to the Ground with her. The Spaniard can have no just cause to be offended, who for his own Security put to death his only Son Charles, and now for ambitious Ends layeth wait for the Life of Don Antonio of Portugal. The French K. most religiously maintaineth Amity with England, and him it highly concerneth that by the timely death of the Q. of Scots the Hopes of the Guisians should be quashed, who, presuming upon the expected future Power of their Kinswoman, do at present insolently insult over their King. The King of Scots indeed may by the force of natural Affection, and out of a respect to his Honour, be deeply troubl'd for his Mother: But his Wisdom will carry him rather to expect the Succession of things themselves leisurely and with Security, than to be over-hasty in compassing them with Danger. And the nearer he is to the height of his Hope, the farther will foreign Princes be from assisting him; it being a thing usual with them by any means to hinder the growing Power of another.

And by Examples. They produced also Examples at home in our own Country, (for whatever is done by Example is done more excusably) how the Kings of England for their own Security have carried themselves toward their Kinsmen and Competitors; namely, Henry I. toward Robert his eldest Brother; Edward III. or rather his Mother, toward Edward II. Henry IV. toward Richard II. Edward IV. toward Henry VI. and his Son the Prince of Wales, and toward his own Brother George Duke of Clarence; Henry VII. toward Warwick, the Duke of Clarence his young Son; and Henry VIII. toward De la Pool Earl of Suffolk, Margaret Countess of Salisbury, and Courtney Marquis of Exeter: All which were for light Causes (if their Faults be compared with hers) taken off. And not only did the Courtiers use these Persuasions with the Queen, but some Preachers also with more Bitterness than was fit, and some of the vulgar sort, (either out of Hope or Fear) more sawcily than became 'em, exercis'd their Wit at their pleasure upon this Subject.

Her doubtful suspense. In the midst of these doubtful and perplexing Thoughts, which so troubl'd and stagger'd the Queen's Mind, that she gave herself wholly over to Solitariness, fate many times melancholy and mute, and frequently sighing, mutter'd this to herself, Aut fer, aut feri; that is, Either bear with her, or smite her; and, out of I know not what Emblem, Nè feriare, feri; that is, Strike, lest thou be stricken; she deliver'd a Writing to Davison, one of the Secretaries, signed with her own Hand, commanding a Warrant under the Great Seal of England to be drawn up for the Execution, which should lie in readiness if any Danger chanced to break forth in that time of Jealousie and Fear; and commanded him to acquaint no Man therewith. But the next Day, while Fear seem'd to be afraid of her own Counsels and Designs, her Mind changed, and she commanded Davison by William Killegrew that the Warrant should not be drawn. Davison came presently to the Queen, and told her that it was drawn and under Seal already. She was somewhat mov'd at it, and blam'd him for making such haste. He notwithstanding acquainted the Council both with the Warrant and the whole matter, and easily persuaded them, who were apt to believe what they desir'd, that the Queen had commanded it should be executed. Hereupon without any delay, Beale (who in respect of Religion was of all others the Queen of Scots most bitter Adversary) was sent down, with one or two Executioners, and a Warrant, wherein Authority was given to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others, to see her executed according to the Law; and this without any knowledge of the Queen at all. And tho' she at that very time told Davison that she would take another Course with the Queen of Scots, yet did not he for all that call Beale back.

As soon as the Earls were come to Fotheringhay, they, together with Sir Amias Powlet and Sir Drue Drury, to whose Custody she was committed, came unto her, told her the cause of their coming, reading the Warrant, and in few Words admonish'd her to prepare herself for Death, for she was to die the next Day. She undauntedly and with a composed Spirit made this Answer: I did not think the Queen my Sister would have consented to my Death, who am not subject to your Law and Jurisdiction: But seeing her pleasure is so, Death shall be to me most welcome: Neither is that Soul worthy of the high and everlasting Joys above, whose Body cannot endure one Stroke of the Executioner. She prayed them that she might have Conference with her Almoner, her Confessor, and Melvin the Master of her Household. For her Confessor, it was flatly denied that he should come at her; and the Earls recommended to her the Bishop or the Dean of Peterborough to comfort her; whom she refusing, the Earl of Kent, in the heat of his Zeal for the Reformed Religion, turning towards her, brake forth into these Words amongst other Speeches; Your Life will be the Death of our Religion, as contrariwise your Death will be the Life thereof. Mention being made of Babington, she constantly denied his Conspiracy to have been at all known to her, and the revenge of her Wrong she left to God. Then enquiring what was become of Narve and Curle, she asked, Whether it were ever heard of before, that Servants were suborned and accepted for Witnesses against their Master's Life. When the Earls were departed from her, she commanded Supper to be hasten'd, that she might the better dispose of her Concernments. She supped temperately and sparingly, as her manner usually was. Being at Supper, and spying her Servants, both Men and Women, weeping and lamenting, she comforted them with great Courage and Magnanimity, bad them leave mourning, and rather rejoice that she was now to depart out of a World of Miseries. Turning to Burgoyn, her Physician, she asked him, Whether he did not now find the force of Truth to be great? They say (quoth she) that I must die because I have plotted against the Queen's Life; yet the Earl of Kent tells me, that there is no other cause of my Death, but that they are afraid for their Religion because of me. Neither hath my Offence against the Queen, but their Fear because of me, drawn this End upon me, while some under the colour of Religion and the Publick Good, aim at their own private Respects and Advantages. Towards the end of Supper she drank to all her Servants, who pledg'd her in order upon their Knees, mingling Tears with their Wine, and begging Pardon for their neglect of their Duty; as she also in like manner did of them. After Supper she perused her Will, read over the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and wrote down the Names of those to whom she bequeathed every Particular. To some she distributed bured Money with her own Hand. To her Confessor she wrote a Letter, that he would make Intercession for her to God in his Prayers. She wrote also Letters of Recommendations for her Servants to the French King and the Duke of Guise. At her wonted time she went to Bed, slept some Hours; and then awaking, spent the rest of the Night in Prayers.

The fatal Day now being come, which was the 8th of February, she dressed herself as gorgeously and curiously as she was wont to do upon Festival-Days; and calling her Servants together, commanded her Will to be read, prayed them to take their Legacies in good part, for her Ability would not extend to giving them any greater matters. Then fixing her Mind wholly upon God in her Oratory or ordinary place of Prayer, with Sighs, Groans and Prayers she begged his Divine Grace and Favour, till such time as Thomas Andrews, Sheriff of the County, acquainted her that she must now come forth. And forth she came with State, Countenance and Presence majestically composed, a cheerful Look, and a matron-like and modest Habit; her Head cover'd with a Linen Veil, and that hanging down to the Ground; her Prayer-beads hanging at her Girdle, and carrying a Crucifix of Ivory in her Hands. In the Porch she was received by the Earls and other Noblemen, where Melvin her Servant falling upon his Knees, and pouring forth Tears, bewailed his hard Hap, that he was to carry into Scotland the woful Tidings of the unhappy Fate of his Lady and Mistress. She thus comforted him: 'Lament not, but rather rejoice; thou shalt by and by see Mary Stuart freed from all her Cares. Tell them that I die constant in my Religion, and firm in my Fidelity and Affection towards Scotland and France. God forgive them who have thirsted after my Blood as Harts do after the Fountain. Thou, O GOD, who art Truth itself, and perfectly and truly understandest the inward Thoughts of my Heart, knowest how greatly I have desired that the Kingdoms of England and Scotland might be united into one. Commend me to my Son, and assure him that I have done nothing which may be prejudicial to the Kingdom of Scotland; admonish him to hold in Amity and Friendship with the Queen of England; and see that thou do him faithful Service.

To the Earls in behalf of her Servants.
And now the Tears trickling down, she bade Melvin several times farewell, who wept as fast as she. Then turning to the Earls, she pray'd 'em, 'That her Servants might be civilly dealt withal; That they might enjoy the Legacies she had bequeathed them by her Will and Testament; That they might stand by her at her Death, and might be sent back into their own Country with Letters of safe Conduct. The former Requests they granted; but that they should stand by her at her Death, the Earl of Kent shewed himself somewhat unwilling, fearing some Superstition. 'Fear it not (said she) these harmless Souls desire only to take their last farewell of me. I know my Sister Elizabeth would not have denied me so small a matter, that my Women should be then present, were it but for the Honour of the Female Sex. I am her near Kinswoman, descended from Henry VII. Queen-Dowager of France, and anointed Q. of Scots.

When she had said thus much, and turned herself aside, it was at last granted that such of her Servants as she should name should be then present. She named Melvin, Burgoin her Physician, her Apothecary, her Surgeon, two Waiting-women, and others; of whom Melvin bare up her Train. So the Gentlemen, two Earls and the Sheriff of the County going before her, she came to the Scaffold, which was built at the upper end of the Hall; on which was placed a Chair, a Cushion, and a Block, all cover'd with black Cloth. As soon as she was set down, and Silence commanded, Beale read the Warrant. She heard it attentively, yet as if her Thoughts were taken up with somewhat else. Then Fletcher Dean of Peterborough began a long Speech to her touching the Condition of her Life past, present, and to come. She interrupted him once or twice as he was speaking, praying him not to trouble himself, protesting that she was firmly fixed and resolved in the ancient Catholick Roman Religion, and for it was ready to shed her last Blood. When he earnestly persuaded her to true Repentance, and to put her whole Trust in Christ by an assured Faith; she answer'd, That in that Religion she was both born, bred, and now ready to die. The Earls said they would pray for her: To whom she said, That she would give them hearty Thanks if they would pray with her; but to join (she said) in Prayer with you who are of another Profession, would be in me a heinous Sin. Then they appointed the Dean to pray: With whom, while the Multitude that stood round about were praying, she fell down upon her Knees, and holding the Crucifix before her in her Hands, prayed in Latin, with her Servants, out of the Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

After the Dean had made an end of praying, she in the English Tongue recommended the Church, her Son, and Queen Elizabeth, to God, beseeching him to turn away his Wrath from this Island; and professing that she repos'd her hope of Salvation in the Blood of Christ, (lifting up the Crucifix) she called upon the celestial Quire of Saints to make Intercession to him for her: She forgave all her Enemies, and kissing the Crucifix, and signing herself with the Cross, she said, As thy Arms, O Christ, were spread out upon the Cross, so receive me with the stretched-out Arms of thy Mercy, and forgive my Sins. Then the Executioners asked her Forgiveness, which she granted 'em. And when her Women-servants had taken off her upper Garments, (which she was eager and hasty to have done) wailing and lamenting the while, she kissed them, and signing them with the Cross, with a cheerful Countenance bade them forbear their womanish Lamentations; for now she should rest from all her Sorrows. In like manner turning to her Men-servants, who also wept, she signed them likewise with the Cross, and smiling, bade 'em farewell. And now having covered her Face with a Linen Handkerchief, and laying herself down to the Block, she recited that Psalm, In thee, O Lord, do I trust, let me never be confounded. Then stretching forth her Body, and repeating many times, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit, her Head was taken off at two Stroaks; the Dean crying out, So let Queen Elizabeth's Enemies perish; the Earl of Kent answering, Amen, and the Multitude sighing and sorrowing. Her Body was embalmed, and ordered in a decent and fitting manner, and afterwards interr'd with a Royal Funeral in the Cathedral-Church of Peterborough. A pompous Obsequies was also perform'd for her at Paris by procurement of the Guises, who, to their great Commendations, perform'd all the highest Offices of Kindness to their Kinswoman both alive and dead.

This lamentable End had Mary Queen of Scots, Daughter to James V. King of Scots, Great-grand-daughter to Henry VII. King of England, by his eldest Daughter; in the six and fortieth Year of her Age, and the eighteenth of her Imprisonment. A Lady fix'd and constant in her Religion, of singular Piety towards God, invincible Magnanimity of Mind, Wisdom above her Sex, and admirable Beauty; a Lady to be reckoned

King of England, for his Son Prince Edward; and by Henry II. King of France, for Francis the Dauphin; both of them striving who should have her to his Daughter-in-law. At five Years old, she was convey'd into France; and at fifteen, marry'd to the Dauphin. She was Queen of France a Year and four Months. After the Death of her Husband, she return'd into Scotland, was marry'd again to Henry Stuart Lord Darly, and bare James, the First Monarch of Great-Britain. By Murray her base Brother, and other her ungrateful and ambitious Subjects, she was much toils'd and disquieted, depos'd from her Throne, and driven into England. By some Englishmen, who were careful for preserving their Religion, and providing for the Queen's Safety, she was (as indifferent Censurers have thought) circumvented; and by others, that were desirous to restore the Romish Religion, thrust forward to dangerous Undertakings; and overborn by the Testimonies of her Secretaries, who seem'd to be bribed and corrupted with Money. Near her Tomb this Epitaph following was set up, but soon after taken away.

AN EPITAPH.

MARY Queen of Scots, a King's Daughter, the King of France's Widow, the Queen of England's Kinswoman and next Heir, a Princess accomplish'd with Royal Vertues and a Royal Soul, having many times (but in vain) demanded the Privileges belonging to a Crown'd Head, is, by barbarous and tyrannical Cruelty, extinct; who was the Ornament of our Age, and a Light truly Royal; and by one and the same wicked Sentence is both Mary Q. of Scots doom'd to a natural Death, and all surviving Kings, being made as Common-People, are subjected to a civil Death. A new and unexampled kind of Tomb is here extant, wherein the Living are inclosed with the Dead: for know, that with the Sacred Ashes of Saint Mary here lies violate and prostrate the Majesty of all Kings and Princes. And because (Reader that travellest this way) the inclosed Remains of Royalty do most sufficiently admonish Kings of their Duty, I say no more.

Instance of Divine Providence.

By this so lamentable a Fate of this great Princess appear'd most conspicuously (as some understanding Persons have observ'd) the wise Disposition and Ordering of the Divine Providence. For those things which both the Queens, Elizabeth and Mary, most of all desired, and in all their Councils propounded to themselves, were hereby attain'd. Queen Mary (as she said just before her Death) desired nothing more ardently, than that the divided Kingdoms of England and Scotland might be united in the Person of her dear Son: and there was nothing which Queen Elizabeth wish'd for more earnestly, than that the true Religion might be preserv'd in England, together with the Safety and Security of the People. And that the high and great God granted them both their Prayers, England now sees with unexpected Felicity, and most joyfully acknowledges the same.

As soon as the Report was brought to Queen Elizabeth's Ears, who little thought of such a thing, that the Queen of Scots was put to death, she heard it with great Indignation, her Countenance alter'd, her Speech falter'd and fail'd her, and through excessive Sorrow she stood in a manner astonish'd: insomuch as she gave herself over to passionate Grief, putting herself into Mourning-Habit, and shedding abundance of Tears: her Council she sharply rebuk'd, and commanded them out of her Sight, causing them to be examin'd: Davison she commanded to appear and be try'd in the Star-Chamber. And as soon as Grief would give her leave, she wrote this following Letter in haste, with her own Hand, to the King of Scots, and sent it by Robert Cary.

' My dearest Brother,

' I would to God thou knewest (but not that thou feltest) the incomparable Grief my Mind is perplex'd with, upon this lamentable Accident, which is happen'd contrary to my Meaning and Intention, which, since my Pen trembles to mention it, you shall fully understand by this my Kinsman. I request you, that as God and many others can witness my Innocence in this matter, so you will also believe, that if I had commanded it, I would never deny it. I am not so faint-hearted, that for Terror I should fear to do the thing which is just; or to own it when it is once done: no, I am not so base nor ignobly minded. But as it is no Princely Part, with feign'd Words to conceal and disguise the real Meaning of the Heart; so will I never dissemble my Actions, but make them appear in their true and proper Colours. Persuade yourself this for Truth, that as I know this is happen'd deservedly on her part, so if I had intended it, I would not have laid it upon others: but I will never charge myself with that which I had not so much as a Thought of. Other Matters you shall understand by the Bearer of this Letter. As for me, I would have you believe, there is not any which loves you more dearly, or takes more Care for the Good of you and your Affairs. If any Man would persuade you the contrary, you may conclude he favours others more than you. God preserve you long in Health and Safety.

Whilst Cary was upon his Way with this Letter, Davison was brought into the Star-Chamber before certain Commissioners chosen for that purpose: namely, Sir Christopher Wray Knight, Chief-Justice in the King's-Bench, who for that Occasion was made Lord Privy-Seal; the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York; the Earls of Worcester, Cumberland, and Lincoln; the Barons Grey and Lumley; Sir James Croftes, Comptroller of the Queen's Household; Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir Gilbert Gerard, Master of the Rolls; Sir Edmund Anderson, Chief-Justice at the Common-Pleas; and Sir Roger Manwood, Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Before these Commissioners, Popham, the Queen's Attorney, charged Davison with Contempt towards the Queen's Majesty, Breach of his Allegiance, and Neglect of his Duty, in that, Whereas the Queen (according to her innate Clemency) never intended that the Queen of Scots, tho' condemn'd, should have been put to death, for Causes best known to herself alone, and not to be search'd into by others, nor could by any means means be persuaded to consent thereto, either by the Estates of the Realm, or by the repeated Instances and Reasons of the Council; notwithstanding that she had, for preventing of Dangers, commanded a Warrant for Execution to be drawn up, and committed it to Davison's Trust and Secrecy: He nevertheless, being her sworn Secretary, forgetting his Allegiance and Duty, and in Contempt of her Majesty, contrary to what the Queen had commanded him, had acquainted the Council therewith, and put the Warrant in Execution, without her knowing any thing at all of it.

His answ. Davison, according to his singular Discretion, answer'd sedately, with great Presence of Mind, 'That he was very sorry, that in so just a Cause concerning the Queen of Scots, and the Sentence given against her, a Sentence of all others the most weighty and serious, he should now again trouble the Commissioners; and that, if not with the Loss, yet at least with the Impairing, of his Credit, which to him was as dear as all things else. But most heavily of all he took it, that he was charged to have offended contemptuously against her Majesty, who by how much she had been the more gracious and bountiful to him, and he the more engaged to her for her singular Favours, so much the more heinous might his Offence seem. If he should confess himself guilty of the Crimes objected against him, he should wrong his own Reputation, which was more precious to him than his Life. And if he should contest with the Queen in his own Defence, he should do that which was unbefitting the Obedience of a Subject, the dutiful Behaviour of a Servant, and the Faith and Place of a Secretary. He protested before God and the Commissioners, 'That he had done nothing in this matter wittingly and willingly, but what he had persuaded himself was the Queen's Will and Pleasure, wherein if he had wrong'd himself either through Ignorance or Negligence, he could not but be exceedingly troubled at it, and be ready patiently to undergo the Commissioners Censure.

As to Particulars, he affirm'd, 'That when the Queen blamed him for making such Haste to get the Warrant under the Great Seal, she gave some Signification, but no express Command, that he should keep it in his own Hands. Neither does he believe himself to have offended against his Trust of Secrecy, seeing he never spoke a Word of the Business to any but the Council. Whereas he recall'd not the Warrant after the Queen had told him that she had changed her Resolution, he affirm'd, That it was agreed by all the Council, that it should be presently sent away, and Execution done, lest the Commonwealth or the Queen should receive any Hurt.

He's prest with his own Confession. Hereupon Egerton, the Queen's Solicitor, began to press Davison with his own Confession, reading a Piece thereof. But Davison pray'd him to read the whole, and not Parcels pick'd out here and there: but he had rather (he said) it should not be read at all, because there were contain'd in it some Secretes not fit to be divulg'd abroad; saying withal, That as he would not contest with the Queen, so could he not endure, that his Modesty should prejudice the Truth and his own Integrity.

Gaudy and Puckering, Serjeants at Law, now charged him home and sharply, that he had craftily abused the Wisdom of the Queen's Council, and that by the Confession of Burleigh Lord-Treasurer, who doubting whether the Queen had absolutely resolv'd to have Execution done, Davison confidently affirm'd it; as he likewise did to the rest that subscribed the Letters for the manner of the Execution. Davison here pray'd the Queen's learned Council, with Tears running down his Cheeks, that they would not urge the matter any farther, but remember that he would not contest with the Queen, to whose Conscience, and the Commissioners Censure, he wholly submitted himself.

Judges Censure of him. Manwood, in the first place, made an historical Relation touching the Queen of Scots, beginning from her Usurping the Arms of England in her tender Age, quite down to Babington's Conspiracy; commended and approved the Sentence given against her, according to the Law; extoll'd the Queen's Clemency, which because Davison had inconsiderately prevented, he censur'd him to be fined in Ten Thousand Pounds, and imprison'd during the Queen's Pleasure.

Then Anderson argu'd, that he had done the thing which was just, tho' he had not done it after a due and just manner: otherwise he thought him to be no bad Man.

Of the same Opinion was Gerard.

Mildmay (having first declar'd with what mature Deliberation, and serious Gravity, the Trial against the Queen of Scots was manag'd, and by how earnest Intreaties and Obsecrations of the People, Queen Elizabeth was persuaded to publish the Sentence) made use of that place of Scripture against Davison, The heart of the king is in the hand of the Lord; and therefore no Man, much less an Officer and a Servant, ought underhand and deceitfully to prevent Princes of their Purpose; without whose Knowledge and Consent nothing was to be done, especially in matters of so great Importance as is the Death of a Princess. He clear'd him of Malice, but tax'd him with Unskilfulness in State-Affairs, and condemn'd him of Rashness and too much Haste in preventing the Queen's Intention. And that Men of his Place and Rank might not for the future dare to commit the like Offence, he agreed in Opinion with the rest, concerning his Fine and Imprisonment.

Croftes blamed him for his Unadvisedness in revealing things which ought to have been conceal'd; considering that Princes, what they impart to one of their Council, that many times they do not let the rest know of.

The Lord Lumley was of Opinion with the Judges, that the Sentence was justly pronounc'd against the Q. of Scots. But he affirm'd withal, 'That never in any Age was there such a Contempt against a Prince heard or read of, that the Queen's Council, in the Queen's Palace, in the Council-Chamber near the Queen, who was, as it were, President of the Council, should resolve upon a matter of such Consequence, without her Advice or Knowledge, when both they and Davison might have had so easie Access to her. Protesting, that if he had but one only Son, and he were in the same Fault, he would censure him to be severely punish'd. But being persuaded of the Man's ingenious and honest Intention, he would inflict no heavier Punishment upon him, than the rest had done before.

After him follow'd the Lord Grey, who in a Grey's Defence of him. set Speech, as being enflamed with a religious Zeal, thus sharply deliver'd himself: 'Davison (said he) is charged to have demean'd himself contemptuously towards the Queen, and that Contempt is aggravated with these Circumstances; That he has caus'd the Queen of Scots to be put to death, has divulg'd certain Secrets, and conceal'd from the Queen the sending away of the Warrant. But what Queen was it whom he caus'd to be put to death? Even she from whom, as long as she liv'd, Danger daily threaten'd our Religion, our Queen, our Commonwealth, and every particular Man of us; and by means of whom, though she be 1587. Ann. 30. now executed, we are at this day put to this Trouble. So that he who has deliver'd England from so great Dangers may seem worthy rather to be honor'd and esteem'd. I do not take him to have reveal'd Secrets, who imparted the Business to no other than the Council and Managers of the weightiest Affairs, whom it specially concern'd to know such Matters; and the Queen herself had already acquainted one or two of them with the thing. If Davison have offended, he is most to be blamed for this, that when the Queen was entring upon a new Resolution, he did not let her know that the Warrant was not already sent away. But he, without question, was divided in doubtful and perplex'd Thoughts, whether he were best venture the Queen's Favour, by sending away the Warrant without her Knowledge, or by recalling it endanger the Queen's Safety anew. Who remembers not how turbulent a time it was, and what frightening Rumours were spread abroad in all places? If any Violence had then been offer'd to Religion or the Queen, or her Life had been taken away while the Warrant was in his Hands, should not he have born the Blame of it? should not we ourselves, our Wives and Children, have fallen violently upon him? should we not have imbrued our Hands in his Blood? should we not have curs'd his Indiscretion to the Pit of Hell? and should we not, to his eternal Infamy, have erected a Monument of his Inconsiderateness, engraven with Letters of Blood? Whatsoever either Punishment or Fine ye lay upon him shall not displease me; but to be sure he shall never, with me, lose the Esteem of a good and honest Man. These things Grey continu'd to press copiously, eloquently, and boldly.

The three Earls concurr'd with the rest touching Davison's Penalty; but concerning his Reputation, with Grey.

The Archbishop of York reason'd theologically concerning his Disobedience proceeding from the Blindness of his Understanding, and Corruption of his Mind.

The Archbishop of Canterbury approv'd the Fact, commended the Man; but the Manner and Way of doing it he utterly condemn'd.

Wray, Lord Privy-Seal, having summarily repeated the Opinions of the Commissioners, confirm'd the Penalty inflicted: and withal signify'd, that albeit the Queen had been offended (and that not without just Cause) with her Council, and had left them to Examination; yet now she forgave them, and withal acknowledg'd, that they had been very careful and diligent in their Actions and Counsels for the Preservation of Religion and the Common-wealth, and for preventing of all Dangers.

Davison's Request.

Davison pray'd the Commissioners to be a means to the Queen, not for the honourable Office of Secretary which he formerly held, nor for his Liberty, nor the Abatement of his Fine, but that he might be restored to her Favour. Which notwithstanding he never recover'd, tho' she sometimes reliev'd his Wants.

Thus was Davison, a Man of good Ingenuity, but not well-skill'd in Court-Arts, brought upon the Court-Stage, on purpose (as most Men imagin'd) to act for a time this Part in the Tragedy; and soon after, the Part being acted, and his Stage-attire laid aside, as if he had fail'd in the last Act, he was thrust down from the Stage, and, not without the Pity of many, shut up a long time in Prison.

What was done publickly against Davison I have said already: but how he excus'd himself in private, take here a compendious Account upon his own Credit, and out of an Apologetical Discourse of his to Walsingham.

The Queen, (says he) after the Departure of the French and Scottish Ambassadors, of her own Motion commanded me to deliver her the Warrant for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots: when I had deliver'd it, she sign'd it readily with her own Hand: when she had so done, she commanded it to be seal'd with the Great Seal of England; and in jesting manner said, Go tell all this to Walsingham, who is now sick; altho' I fear he will die for Sorrow, when he hears it. She added also the Reasons of her deferring it so long; namely, lest she might seem to have been violently or maliciously drawn thereto, whereas in the mean time she was not ignorant how necessary it was. Moreover she blamed Powlet and Drury, that they had not eas'd her of this Care; and wish'd that Walsingham would feel their Pulses touching this matter. The next day after it was under the Great Seal, she commanded me by Killegrew, that it should not be done: and when I had inform'd her that it was done already, she found fault with such great Hasten; telling me that in the Judgment of some wise Men, another Course might be taken. I answer'd, that that Course was always best and safest which was most just. But fearing lest she would lay the Fault upon me, (as she had laid the putting of the Duke of Norfolk to death upon the Lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, protesting that I would not plunge myself any deeper in so great a Business. He presently imparted it to the Lord Burleigh, and the Lord Burleigh to the rest of the Council; who all consented to have the Execution hasten'd, and every one of them vow'd to bear an equal Share in the Blame, and sent Beale away with the Warrant and Letters. The third day after, when, by a Dream which she told of the Queen of Scots Death, I perceiv'd that she waver'd in her Resolution, I ask'd her, Whether she had changed her Mind? She answer'd, No; but another Course (said she) might have been devis'd: and withal she ask'd me, Whether I had receiv'd any Answer from Powlet? Whose Letter when I had shew'd her, wherein he flatly refused to undertake that which stood not with Honour and Justice; she, waxing angry, accus'd him and others (who had bound themselves by the Association) of Perjury and Breach of their Vow, as those that had promis'd great Matters for their Prince's Safety, but would perform nothing. Yet there are (said she) who will do it for my sake. But I shew'd her how dishonourable and unjust a thing this would be; and withal into how great Danger she would bring Powlet and Drury by it. For if she approved the Fact, she would draw upon herself both Danger and Dishonor, not without Censure of Injustice: and if she disallow'd it, she would utterly undo Men of great Desert and their whole Posterity. And afterwards she gave me a light Check the same day that the Queen of Scots was executed, because she was not yet put to death.

How high a Displeasure soever against Davison, and how great Grief Queen Elizabeth either conceiv'd or pretended, for the Death of the Queen of Scots, certain it is that the King of Scots, her only Son, who respected his Mother with the greatest Piety that could be imagin'd or found in a Son, took exceeding great and hearty Grief, mixt with deep Displeasure, at the same, and very much lamented and mourn'd for her. For he did not think that Queen Elizabeth, in regard of the mutual Love betwixt them, and the League

1587. Ann. 30. Refuses Cary Entrance into Scotland. League of stricter Amity but lately contracted, would have neglected all the Intercessions and Mediations of Princes, and brought his Mother, a Princess of equal Majesty with herself, and so nearly ally'd to her in Royal Blood, under the Hand of a base Executioner. Robert Cary, the Lord Hunsdon's Son, who was sent out of England to excuse the Queen, and lay all the Fault upon her Council and Davison, he suffer'd not to enter into Scotland, scarce would give him the Hearing by another, and with much ado receiv'd the Letters which he brought. He revoked the Commission of his Ambassador in England, and breathed nothing but Revenge. For there wanted not some that went about to persuade him, that the Princes of Christendom would never suffer so great an Affront done to the Royal Majesty and to the Name of Kings, to escape unreveng'd.

Indignation of the Scots. Divers Counsels suggested to the K. The Estates of Scotland, who were now assembled in good number, profess'd that they were ready to spend both their Lives and Fortunes in Revenge of his Mother's Death, and the Defence of his Title to the Crown of England, and that they could by no means brook this Injury, done not so much to the King, as to the whole Nation of the Scots. There were some who persuaded the King to desire an Assistance of Shipping from the King of Denmark, whose Daughter he now sought in Marriage, against the Crown of England. Others, addicted to the Popish Religion, advis'd him that he should rather join with the Spaniard, the French King, and the Pope; by which means he might easily possess himself of England. Above all things, that he should give no Credit nor rely upon the Protestants of England; for they now ruled all, and secretly plotted his Destruction; using that Saying against them, He will not spare the Son, who has destroy'd the Mother. Others there were, who privately advis'd him to declare himself openly for neither Party, but to hold both Papists and Protestants in suspense. For if he stood openly for the Protestants, all the Papists of Europe would level their Designs against him, as their Mark to shoot at, and would erect another Prop and Buttress for themselves in England, which would prove dangerous and prejudicial to him. There were also some, who persuaded him to maintain a strict and religious Amity with England, not to hazard his certain Hopes upon the uncertain Chance of War, and to be firm and constant to himself in the receiv'd Religion; wherein if he once waver'd, he should neither get himself Friends, nor rid himself of Foes. These things Men persuaded him, every Man as his private Advantage led him. The King, being a wise Prince, and apprehensive above his Years, consider'd all things seriously with good and long Deliberation by himself alone, and advis'd also with some few others, using no Haste in the Business, which is always blind, but a mature and due Consideration.

Q. Elizabeth endeavors to pacify him. But Queen Elizabeth throwing all the Blame upon Davison, and the unadvised Credulity of her Council, sought to assuage his Grief by little and little, lest unreasonable and sudden Consolations might more irritate him; and waited till his Sorrow were lessen'd by longer Time, and would suffer itself to be easilier dealt withal. And when she perceiv'd that the French eagerly excited the young King to avenge his Wrongs, fearing lest by their cunning Wiles and his own boiling Heat to take Revenge, he might be drawn away from the Protestant Religion and the Amity of the English, she bent herself with all her Art and Skill to pacify his exulcerated and already alienated Mind by all possible means not unbecoming a Princess.

1587. Ann. 30. Reasons for her so doing. By her Favourers therefore in Scotland, and shortly after by the Lord Hunsdon Governor of Berwick, she propounded these things following to be consider'd by him. First, of how dangerous Consequence it would be for him to break out into a War against England for this Reason, when all the Estates of England had judg'd the late Proceeding most necessary for the Safety of the whole Island, and also in itself just. Secondly, Whether he were able to undertake such a War, since England was never better provided of Martial Men, Forces and Wealth; and Scotland never weaker, as having been exhausted by Civil-Wars. If he rely'd upon foreign Aid, how hardly and too late he might obtain it, his Mother's Condition might teach him, who so often crav'd it in vain. And if he should obtain any, what Success could he hope for? since England, joining with the Fleets of Holland and Zealand, fear'd not the Attempts of the most potent Kings of Europe. In the French King or the Spaniard what Confidence could he put? since his own Power being once increas'd by the Addition of England, would oppose all their Designs; and his Religion is directly contrary to their Profession, that they cannot aid him without Damage to themselves. Neither would the French King be well contented to see the King of Scots made stronger by the Addition of England, lest he should then prosecute anew the ancient Title of the English in France, or assist the Guises his Kinsmen, who now aim at the Kingdom of France. As for the Spaniard, he will, without Question, serve his own Ambition, considering that he boasts himself to be the first Catholick Prince of the Blood-Royal of England, and of the House of Lancaster, tho' falsely. In which Respect certain Jesuites and others went about, even in the Queen of Scots Life-time, to advance him to the Crown of England by Election, as the meetest Man to restore the Romish Authority in England, preferring him before his Mother and himself. Yea, they began also to persuade the World that she intended to bequeath the Kingdom of England by her last Will and Testament, to the Spaniard, in case her Son should continue to adhere to the Protestant Religion.

What these things tend to, and what Assistance may be hoped for from the Spaniard, let the King consider. And withal, if he revolt from the Religion he has been bred up in, with how great Ignominy he shall plunge his own Soul into eternal Perdition, and all Britain into Ruin and Destruction. Besides, he must consider with himself, if he purpose Revenge, whether the Estates of England, who gave the Sentence against his Mother, would not quite exclude him also by a new Sentence from his Title of Succession: whose Love he may easily purchase by yielding to Necessity, and bridling the Passions of his Mind, (seeing that which is done cannot be undone) and may in due time peaceably enjoy the most flourishing Kingdom of England; and in the mean time may live in Security, and be thought by all indifferent Men, to have sufficiently discharged his Honour, considering that while time was he omitted no Duty of a most pious Son toward his Mother. And let him really persuade himself this, that the Queen of England will most lovingly and kindly esteem of him as her Son, and bear a motherly Affection towards him. These things she caus'd to be inculcated into the King of Scots Ears: and to put him out of doubt that his Mother was put to death without her Privy and Intention, she determin'd to send him the Sentence against Davison, testify'd

Ann. 30.
by the Subscriptions of all the Commissioners, yea and by the great Seal of England; and another Instrument likewise (the more to pacify him) under the Hands of the Judges of England, affirming, That the said Sentence against his Mother would not in the least hurt or prejudice his Title to the Succession.

Drake sent to divert the Spaniards.
What he perform'd
With these and such like Reasons, while she gently sooth'd the King, she sent Drake (to prevent the War which she saw threaten'd her from the Spaniards) with four of her capital Ships and some others to the Coast of Spain, to surprize and destroy his Shipping in the Havens, and intercept his Provision. Drake, entering into the Port of Cadex, chased six Gallies (which made head against him) under the Forts; and sunk, took or fired about an hundred Vessels wherein was great store of Munition and Victual, and amongst them a great Gallion of the Marquis of Sancta Cruce, and another of Raguse laden with Merchandize. From thence returning to the sacred Promontory, called Cabo Saint Vincent, he assaulted three Forts, and took 'em by Composition; and firing the Fishermens Boats and Nets all along the Coast, came to Cascaies at the Mouth of the River Tago, where he challeng'd the Marquis Sancta Cruce to fight, who not once so much as mov'd against him, but suffer'd him freely to spoil the Coast, and take their Shipping without Interruption or Molestation. From thence setting sail towards the Isles of Azores, he lighted by chance upon a very great Merchant Ship, call'd a Carack, richly laden, and named the Saint Philip, returning from the East-Indies, and easily master'd it. Which Accident the Seamen on both sides, in regard of the Name of Philip, interpreted to presage some Disaster to Philip of Spain. Sure it is that from this short Expedition great Advantages redounded to the English. For the Spaniards, having sustained so great a loss of Provision and Munition for War, were constrained to give over their design for invading of England this Year; and the English ever after that time more courageously adventur'd upon those huge Castle-like Ships, which before they were afraid of; also they so fully understood by the Merchants Papers the rich value of the Indian Merchandizes, and the manner of trading in that Eastern World, that they afterwards set up a gainful Trade and Traffick thither, establishing a Company of East-India Merchants.

East India Company.
Cavendish sails round the World
At the same time, in another Part of the World, Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk, (who two Years before set sail from England with three Ships) passing the Straits of Magellan, fired many petty Towns of the Spaniards upon the Coasts of Chili, Peru and New Spain, took and pillaged nineteen Merchant Ships, and amongst them a very rich Ship of the King's near Callifornia, and returning home this Year by the Philippines, the Moluccaes, the Cape of Good Hope, and Saint Helena, with a rich Booty and great Glory, as being the second after Magellan who sailed round about the World. The Particulars of this Voyage if any Man desire, let him repair to the English Voyages exactly described in three Volumes by Richard Hackluit.

Stanley and York Traitors.
As Drake and Cavendish at this time purchased themselves great Fame and Commendations; so two other Englishmen, William Stanley and Rowland York, procured themselves the disgraceful and infamous Note of Traitors. This York was a Londoner, a Man of a loose and dissolute Behaviour, and desperately Audacious, famous in his time amongst the common Bullies and Swaggerers, as being the first that, to the great admiration of many at his Boldness, first brought into England that bold and dangerous way of Fencing with the Rapier in Duelling; whereas the English till that time used to fight with long Swords and Bucklers, striking with the edge, and thought it no part of a Man either to push or strike beneath the Girdle. This York, having receiv'd I know not what Injury at Leicester's hands, fled, and served a while under the Spaniard in the Netherlands; but at length was reconcil'd, and made Governor of a Fort near Zutphen. But scorning at his Heart to put up the former Disgrace, he soon contriv'd to be reveng'd; for being bribed with Money, he not only betrayed the Place to the Enemy, but also drew Stanley, who had served with singular Fidelity and Valour in the Irish War, to be Partner with him in his Treachery, affirming with several Oaths and Protestations, that by the Confessions of the Conspirators he was charged to be guilty of Babington's Plot, and was forthwith to be sent into England to be hang'd; and persuaded him to betray Deventer, a strong and wealthy City to the Spaniards, contrary to his Oath taken to Leicester and the States. But considering at last the notoriousness of his Offence, he satisfied himself in his Conscience against the imputation of Treason, in that he had restor'd the Place to the true Lord and Owner, which had been kept from him by Rebels; and, being a rank Papist, he soon after sent for Priests to instruct his Regiment, consisting of Thirteen hundred English and Irish, in the Popish Religion, giving out that this should be a Seminary Regiment of Soldiers, to defend the Romish Religion by their Swords, as the Seminary Priests did by their Writings. And indeed, for this purpose Allen, who was not long after made Cardinal, not only dispatched Priests to him with all expedition, but set forth a Book also, wherein, according to Pius V.'s Bull against Queen Elizabeth, he commended the Treason, and excited others to the like Perfidiousness, as if they were neither bound to serve nor obey an excommunicate Queen. But mark with what Success.

The Spaniards set York and Stanley together by their reward.
The Ears. York they poison'd, and rifled his Goods. His Body was three Years after digged up by the States, and hanged upon a Gibbet, where it rotted. Stanley and his Regiment were remov'd out of Deventer, and posted from place to place, exposed to Dangers, and so far neglected, that some of 'em perish'd miserably for lack of Food, and some ran away one after another. Stanley himself, in hope of Reward for his Service, went into Spain, and offer'd his farther Service for invading of Ireland; but he was neither receiv'd with that Honour he expected, nor was any Credit given unto him; for the Spaniards (they say) have this Proverb, A Traitor may have some Honour done him, but never any Credit given him. And now he found too late that he had in the first place betray'd himself.

These Traitors procur'd Leicester ill-will among the Confederate Netherlanders, because the Traitors were still very intimate with him; and also to the whole English Nation, whom therefore those who were more free and lavish of their Tongues reproached and scandalized, till it was forbidden by Proclamation. But the States in a long Letter to the Queen, accus'd Leicester of ill governing the Commonwealth in matters of Money, War and Trade; and to his Restriction and easie Creduloufness they imputed all Damages receiv'd by such kind of Traitors. The Queen for examining and compounding of the Matter, and to sound their Inclinations touching a Peace with the Spaniard, sent Thomas Sackvil Lord Buckhurst, (lately made one of the Privy-Council in Leicester's absence) Norris and Bartholomew Clerk, who faithfully manag'd these Matters. But whereas Commissioners sent to examine and compound Matters.

1587. Ann. 20. whereas Buckhurst's officious Diligence seemed to tend to the intrapping of Leicester, Leicester's Displeasure against him and settl'd Favour with the Queen prevail'd so far, that Buckhurst at his return was confin'd to his House for several Months.

The States send for Leicester to relieve Sluys. Sluys being afterward besieged by the Prince of Parma, Leicester was sent for out of England by the States to relieve it. This Town being furiously batter'd with 17000 great Shot, and a large Breach made, was defended a while by Sir Roger Williams, Sir Francis Vere, and Captain Nicolas Baskerville, with a Garison of *Walloon*s and English, with great Commendations for their Valour; but at length they were forced to surrender it, when Leicester, who was drawn near to succour them, being too weak for the Enemy, was fain to retire.

Sluys lost. And sure it is the States would not allow him a sufficient Army, who reserv'd to themselves in reality that great Power which they had conferr'd upon him in Name and Words only. And he himself disdain'd to be subject to private Men of meaner Quality under the notion of States, who pretended to carry the same Authority over him their Governor, which Charles V. held over his Governors of the Netherlands. Hereupon brake forth first Grudges, then open Enmities, on both sides; and far greater, after he once begun to mention a Peace with the Spaniards: For they could not endure to hear of the name of Peace, as a thing contrary and pernicious to their Designs. But when he perceiv'd his Authority daily to be slighted and contemned among them, he betook himself to more subtle and crafty Counsels, and attempted to bring Leiden and other Cities under his power. But being with the loss of some Men frustrated of his Hope, and having caused great Discontent, he was called home again into England by the Queen, resign'd his Government, and left the free Administration of the Provinces to the States, being derided by those that envied him, and the Title of His Excellency, which of all Englishmen he was the first that ever us'd, exploded and hiss'd off the Stage.

Leicester call'd home. At his departure he privately distributed amongst some whom he had drawn to his Faction certain Medals or Tokens made in Gold, on the one side whereof was his own Picture; and on the other side a Flock of Sheep, some Sheep straying, and a Dog ready to go away looking behind him. Near the Dog was, Invitus desero, that is, Unwillingly I forsake; and near the Sheep, non gregem sed ingratos, that is, not the Flock, but the Unthankful. And no doubt but he had it in his Head to usurp the Government. But these People have by their Policy and Wisdom not only retained their ancient Freedom, both against the Power of the Spaniards, who have the knack also to fight with Gold and other Arts, and the wily Subtilties of the French and English, and the crafty fox-like Fetches of the Prince of Orange; but also have incredibly increased the same, by means of the favourable Inclination of their Neighbours towards them: And (which is more strange) whereas other Nations are impoverish'd by War, they are the only Men that thrive and are enrich'd thereby.

The Title of His Excellency. Both which the Leicestrian Faction put to much Trouble. For the Garisons of Gertruydenberg, Naerden, Worcom, Huysden, and especially Medemblike, being addicted to the English, as if they had sworn Allegiance to the Queen, raised Tumults and Seditions. And Sir William Russel, Governor of Flushing, having drawn to his Party those of Armuyden and Campvere, was suspected by the States, who were very full of Jealousie and Mistrust, as if he had a design to reduce the Isle of Walcheren under the power of the English. And this Suspicion was increased by the coming of the Admiral of England; who tho' he labour'd to make up the matter, yet they, misdoubting themselves, bewray'd their Suspicion and Jealousie, both publickly, by coining Money with two Earthen Pots swimming in the Sea, (according to the old Fable) and wittily inscribing, Si collidimur, frangimur, that is, If we knock together, we are broken in pieces; and also privately, by Letters to the Queen. Who being very careful of them, and not neglecting herself, as foreseeing the Dangers by means of the Spanish Fleet now threatening her, commanded the Lord Willoughby to reduce the seditious People under their Obedience to the States: Which he, together with Grave Maurice, happily effected.

Leicester being return'd, and smelling that there was an Accusation framed against him by Buckhurst and others for ill managing of Affairs in Holland, and that he was to be summoned before the Council, cast himself down privately at the Queen's Feet, and with Tears craved her Protection; beseeching her, That whom she had sent forth with Honour at his first departure, she would not now receive with Disgrace at his return; and whom she had raised up from the Ground, she would not now bring alive to his Grave. And with such flattering Speeches he so mollified the Queen's offended Mind, that her noble Displeasure abated, and she received him into Grace and Favour. Inasmuch as when he was expected the next Day to come to his Answer, he took his Place in the Council, and did not kneel at the upper end of the Table, as the manner is; and when the Secretary began to read the Heads of his Accusation, he interrupted him, complaining that he was injuriously dealt withal in his absence, for that his publick Commission was restrain'd by private Instructions; and so appealing to the Queen, he avoided the whole weight of the Accusation, not without the secret Displeasure and Indignation of his Adversaries.

This Year, in the Month of January, departed this Life Henry Nevil Baron of Abergavenny, Great Grandson to Edward Nevil, who in the Reign of Henry VI. obtain'd his Title in right of his Wife, the only Daughter and Heir of Richard Beauchamp, or De bello campo, Earl of Worcester, and Baron of Abergavenny. By which Title, when the only Daughter of this Henry, the Wife of Sir Thomas Pene Kt. claim'd the Title of Baroness of Abergavenny, there grew a remarkable Suit for the Title betwixt her and the next Heir-Male, to whom the Castle of Abergavenny was bequeathed by Will and Testament, and the same Testament confirm'd by Act of Parliament.

There died also at this time, and all in the Month of April, four other Persons of honourable Note amongst us; viz. Ann Stanhope Dutches of Somerset, being ninety Years of Age, formerly Wife of Edward Seimour, Duke of Somerset, and Protector of England; who by her womanish contending with Katharine Parr Queen-Dowager of King Henry VIII. for Precedence of Worth and Dignity, was the cause of great Bustles in the Family of the Seimours, while she was persuaded by Dudley Earl of Warwick, (who plotted the Ruin of this noble and potent House) that she, being the Protector's Wife, ought not to bear up the Train of the Queen-Dowager, who was married to the Protector's Brother, or to give her Place: Sir Ralph Sadleir, Chancellor

Chancellor

1587. Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, a Man famous for so many and great Employments for the State, and the last Knight Banneret of England, to which Dignity he was raised at Musselborough-Field: Thomas Bromley, Chancellor of England, under sixty Years of Age, a famous Lawyer: And the 6th Day after, Edward Earl of Rutland, whom the Queen had design'd to be his Successor, being the third Earl of the House of Mamours, a profound Lawyer, and a Man accomplish'd with all polite Learning, leaving behind him one only Daughter, Elizabeth, Wife to William Cecil Grandson to the Lord-Treasurer Burghley.

Hatton made Lord Chancellor.

Sir Christopher Hatton, a Man in great Favour with the Queen, of a Courtier was made Lord-Chancellor; which the great Lawyers of England took very great Distaste at. For, ever since Churchmen were deny'd this Preferment, they had with singular Commendations for their Equity and Wisdom born this highest Place of gowned Dignity, which was bestowed in old time for the most part upon Churchmen and Noblemen. But Hatton was advanced to it by the cunning Court-Arts of some, that by his absence from Court, and the troublesome discharge of so great a Place, which they thought him not to be able to undergo, his Favour with the Queen might flag and grow less. Yet executed he the Place with the greatest State and Splendor of any that ever went before him; and what he wanted in Knowledge of the Law, he labour'd to make good by Equity and Justice.

Sir William Fitz-Williams the fifth time Lord Deputy of Ireland.

Sir John Perot being this Year called home out of Ireland, deliver'd up his Charge, leaving all things in a peaceable Condition, to Sir William Fitz-Williams, having first brought in such as were any way suspected, to deliver Hostages for their Fidelity, and that out of hand, lest, if they took Deliberation, they might seem to study a Revolt: The most Suspicious of all he providentially apprehended and committed to Custody, and put the rest in mind of their Allegiance towards their Prince in these doubtful Times; who, because of his Love towards the Irish Nation, readily and willingly hearken'd unto him therein.

Till this time (that I may digress a little) the Englishmen had very easie Wars in Ireland, 800 Foot and 300 Horse were held an invincible Army. Randolph with 600 English easily discomfitted O'Neal with 4000 Irish. Collier, in the Year 1571, with one single Company defeated a Thousand Hebridians in Connaught. Three hundred Horse overthrew the Butlers with a great multitude of Rebels. And (to omit other like Instances) two Companies of Foot won in one Day above twenty Castles from the Irish. But after they were by Perot's command exercised daily at home, taught to use their Weapons, and discharge their Guns at a Mark, that so they might be the more ready for Service against the Hebridians, and had afterwards been bred up in the Netherland-War, and learned the ways of Fortifications; they then troubl'd the English (as we shall after see) with a more difficult War.

The One and Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

The Admirable Year.

Preparations in Spain against England.

Now we are come to the Year of Christ One thousand five hundred eighty and eight, which an Astronomer of Koningsberg, above an hundred Years before foretold would be a Year of Wonders; and the German Chronologers presaged would be the Climacterical Year of the World. The Rumours of Wars, which before were but slight and small, began now to grow greater and greater daily. And now the Reports were no longer uncertain, but the universal belief of all Men carried it for certain truth, that a most invincible Armada was rigged and prepared in Spain against England, and that the famous Captains and expertest Leaders and Soldiers were sent for out of Italy, Sicily, yea and out of America, into Spain.

For the Pope, some religious Persons in Spain, and several English Fugitives, had of late called back the Spaniard to his former design for the Conquest of England, which had been interrupted by the space of ten Years before by the Portugal Wars; earnestly exhorting him, 'That seeing God had blessed him with such exceeding great Blessings and Benefits, Portugal with the East-Indies and many rich Islands being united of late to his Dominions, he in like manner would perform somewhat which might be pleasing and acceptable to God the giver of so great good things, and beseeching the Grandeur and Majesty of the Catholick King. But nothing could there be more acceptable to God, or more beseeching him, than to propagate and enlarge the Church of God. That the Church of God could not be more gloriously nor more meritoriously propagated, than by the Conquest of England, and replanting the Catholick Roman Religion, and abolishing Heresy there. This War (they say) would be most just, not only because it was necessary, but also because it was for the Maintenance of Christ's Religion; in regard that the Queen of England, being excommunicate, persisted contumacious against the Church of Rome, supported his Rebels in the Netherlands, annoyed the Spaniards by continual Depredations, surprized and sacked his Towns in Spain and America, and had very lately put the Queen of Scots to death, violating thereby the Majesty of all Kings. And no less profitable would this War be than it was just. For so should he add unto his Empire those flourishing Kingdoms, extinguish the Rebellion in the Low-Countries, which was kept alive as it were by the Breath it had from England, secure his Voyages to and from both Indies, and lessen his yearly Expences for Convoying his Indian Fleets forward and backward. And for a ready Proof hereof, they suggested, That the English Navy was neither for Number nor Bigness of Vessels, nor for Strength, comparable to that of Spain, especially the Portugal Fleet being now added to it: That England had no Forts nor Defences; that it was unprovided of Commanders, Soldiers, Cavalry and Munition, bare of Wealth and Friends; that there were many in all Parts of the Realm addicted to the Romish Religion, who would presently join their Forces with his. Briefly, that so great was the Strength of the Spaniard both by Sea and Land, and so matchless the Valour of the Spaniards, that no Man durst oppose him; so that they did confidently assure themselves of his Victory. Moreover, that now an Opportunity was as it were offered him by God himself, whilst he had no ground to fear any thing either from the Turk, having lately concluded a Truce with him; or from the French, who were now embroil'd in a Civil War. They made him believe also, That England was easier to be conquer'd than the Netherlands; in respect it was a shorter and convenienter cut from Spain to England, namely by a free and open Sea; but to the Netherlands, a longer and more difficult, by a Sea for a great part of it narrow and pent, and lying over-against England. Also, That the Low-Countries were as it were a continued Bulwark, fortified every-where with so many Cities and Castles; but England with none at all: So that it was an easie matter for them to pierce presently 1588. Ann. 31. sently into the very Bowels of the Land, as well as they had done of late into Portugal. And lastly, out of that military Axiome, That it is not good leaving an Enemy at our Back; That the English therefore, being inveterate Enemies to Spaniards, must necessarily be first conquer'd, upon whose Assistance the Netherlands relying, had so long a time sustain'd the burden of the War, and without whom they could not longer subsist. So as England being once conquer'd, the Low-Countries must of necessity be subdued.

Consultation about the manner of Invasion. These things being thus disposed, and the business resolv'd on, they enter into serious Consultation about the best way and manner of invading England. Don Alvarez Bassano, Marquis of Santa Cruce, to whom was committed the principal Charge and Conduct of the Armada, was of opinion, that first of all some Port-Town in Holland or Zeland should unawares be surprized by the Prince of Parma's Land-Forces and some Spanish Ships sent beforehand, where the Spanish Fleet might have safe Harbour and a Place of Retreat, and from whence it might conveniently attempt the Invasion; considering that the Fleet could not ride safely in the unquiet British-Sea, where the Winds often changed, and wherein the Tides were especially to be observed. With him agreed in opinion the Prince of Parma, who urged this Expedition tooth and nail. Others disliked this Project, as being a thing Difficult, full of Danger, requiring long Time, much Labour, great Expence, and the Success thereof like to be uncertain; adding, That it could neither be done secretly nor at unawares, but would easily be prevented by the English. These Men were of opinion, that England might easier be won with the same Charge; and that the Victory would be certain and sure, if a well-provided Army from Spain and the Low-Countries were landed by a powerful Navy at the Thames-Mouth, and London, the chief City, surprized by a sudden Assault. This seemed to them very easie to be effected, and therefore all concurr'd in this Opinion, that it was forthwith to be put in execution. Of these notwithstanding some thought it meet that War should be first proclaim'd by an Herald, and that to good and wise Purpose, as they thought; both to remove Suspicion and Jealousy out of the Neighbour-Princes Minds, and also to force the Queen to call in foreign Forces to her Assistance; hoping that they (according to the usual Insolency of Mercenaries) would mutiny and spoil the Country, and that she thereby would procure the ill-will of her Subjects, and all things would run into Confusion in England. But this was not hearken'd to by those who were puff'd up and eager with Confidence of their own Strength; for they held it sufficient to recommend the Cause, the Armada and Army, to the Pope, and to the Prayers of the Catholics to God and the Saints; and set forth a Book in print for a Terror, wherein the whole Preparation was particularly set down; which verily was so vast throughout all Spain, Italy and Sicily, that the Spaniards themselves were amazed at it, and named it The Invincible Armada.

The Invincible Armada. The Prince of Parma also in the Netherlands, by the King of Spain's command, built Ships, and many flat-bottom'd Boats, each of them big enough to carry thirty Horses, with Bridges fitted to 'em: Mariners he hired from the Eastern Parts of Germany, prepared Piles shapen'd at the nether end, armed with Iron, and hooked on the sides, and provided twenty thousand Barrels, and an infinite number of Faggots; and in the Sea-Towns of Flanders he had an Army in readiness of 10; Companies of Foot, and 4000 Horse, amongst which were 700 English Fugitives, who of all others were least esteemed. Neither was Stanley, who had the Command of them, nor Westmorland, nor others who offer'd their Service and Counsel, once heard; but for their Unnaturalness to their Country they were debarr'd from all Access, and as most inauspicious Persons worthily and with Detestation rejected. Pope Sixtus V. also, that he might not seem to be wanting to the Cause, sending Cardinal Allen, an Englishman, into the Low-Countries, renewed the Bulls declaratory of Pius V. and Gregory XIII. excommunicated the Queen, dethroned her, absolv'd her Subjects from all Allegiance, and publish'd his Croisado in print, as it were against Turks and Infidels, wherein, out of the Treasury of the Church, he granted plenary Indulgences to all that gave their Help and Assistance. Whereupon the Marquis of Burgoen, of the House of Austria, the Duke of Pastrana, Amadeus of Savoy, Vespasian Gonzaga, John de Medicis, and many Noblemen from all Parts, list'd themselves voluntarily for this Enterprize and Expedition.

Queen Elizabeth on the other side, that she might not be taken unprovided, prepared with all Diligence imaginable as strong a Fleet as she could, and all things necessary for War. And she herself (who was of a quick Judgment in discerning Mens Natures and Dispositions, and ever then most happy when she made her own free Choice, and trusted not to the Recommendations of others) assigned most excellent Men to every particular Place and Charge. The Command of the whole Fleet she gave to Charles Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord-Admiral of England; of whose fortunate Conduct she had a very great Persuasion, and whom she knew, by the sweetness of his Behaviour and bravery of his Conduct, to be skilful in Sea-matters, wary and provident, valiant and courageous, industrious and active, and of great Authority and Esteem amongst the Seamen of her Navy. Him she sent early to the Western Parts of England, where Drake, whom she appointed Vice-Admiral, join'd him. The Lord Henry Seimour, second Son to the Duke of Somerset, she commanded to lie upon the Coast of the Low-Countries with 40 Ships, English and Netherlandish, and to take care that the Prince of Parma put not out to Sea with his Forces. Tho' some there were who earnestly perswaded her to expect the Enemy's coming, and to welcome him with a Land-Battel, according as had been resolved in the Reign of Henry VIII. when the French with a strong Fleet threaten'd England.

For Land-Service there were disposed along the Southern-Coasts 20000 Men. Besides which, two Armies were rais'd of choice well-disciplin'd and experienc'd Men; the one under the Command of the Earl of Leicester, consisting of 1000 Horse and 22000 Foot, which incamped at Tilbury, not far from the Thames Mouth; (for the Enemy was fully resolv'd to set first upon London) the other under the Leading of the Lord Hunsdon, consisting of 34000 Foot and 2000 Horse, to guard the Queen's Person.

Arthur Lord Grey, Sir Francis Knolles, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, and Sir Roger Williams Knights, and excellent Soldiers, were made choice of to consult about the best way of managing the War at Land. These Men thought good, that the most convenient Landing-places for the Enemy, as well out of Spain as out of the Low-Countries, should be well manned and fortified, namely, Milford-Haven, Falmouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, that open Coast

And if the Enemy did land, to lay all the Country waste round about, and to spoil all things that might be of any use to them, that so they might find no Food but what they brought with them on their Shoulders. And to busie the Enemy night and day with continual Alarms, so as to give them no Rest: but not to put it to the Hazard of a Battle, till more Commanders with their Companies were come up to them. Of which Commanders they nominated one in every Shire to have the chief Command and Conduct. I think it needless to relate particularly what inland Shires they assign'd to aid this and that Coast, what Numbers, what Arms, and what manner of Fight they agreed upon.

And about the Papists at home. In this troublesome Season, some beat it many times into the Queen's Head, that the Spaniards abroad were not so much to be fear'd, as the Papists at home; for the Spaniards would not attempt any Hostility against England, but upon Confidence of Help from them: and that therefore, for better Security, the Heads of that Party were, upon some Pretence or other, to be taken off; alledging the Example of King Henry VIII. when the Emperor and the French King, by the Instigation of the Pope, were ready to invade England; for as soon as he had put to death the Marquess of Exeter, the Lord Montacute, Edward Nevil, and others, whom he suspected to favour their Enterprize, their Expedition presently was dash'd. But the Queen, disliking this as cruel Counsel, thought it sufficient to commit some of the Papists, and those not of the chief, to Custody, at Wusbeach in the Fens. And having her Eyes and Mind every way, she by frequent Letters excited and quicken'd the Parliament, who were not asleep the while. Sir William Fitz-Williams, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, she directed what he should do. The King of Scots she put in mind by her Friends in Scotland, and by Messengers, to be very wary of the Papists and the Spanish Faction. But he, not ignorant how great a Tempest and Destruction hung over his head, was of his own accord forward and careful, and, according to his continual good Affection to the true Religion and the Queen, had already refused to give Audience to the Bishop of Dumblane, (who was sent from the Pope) and had procured a Confederacy to be enter'd into by the Protestants of Scotland, for resisting the Spaniards: and he himself marching in Person with an Army into Annandale, forced Maxwell's Camp, who, contrary to his Faith given, was return'd out of Spain into Scotland, and favour'd the Spaniard's Designs, took him and threw him into Prison, declared the Spaniards Enemies, and made Preparation against them with great Chearfulness and Alacrity.

Treaty of Peace in the mean time. Amidst these great Preparations for War by both Parties, Projects for Peace are not quite laid aside. Two years before, when the Prince of Parma had consider'd with himself how difficult a matter it would be to bring the Low-Country-War to an Issue, as long as it was cherish'd with daily Supplies from the Queen, had dealt seriously by Letters, with the Help of Sir James a Croftes, one of the Privy-Council, a Man very denrous of Peace, Andrew van Loe, a Netherlander, and others, that there might be a Treaty of Peace, he being impower'd thereto by the King of Spain. The Queen fearing lest this were done politickly underhand to break off the Amity betwixt her and the Confederate Provinces, and to allure them cunningly to the Spaniard, deferr'd the matter a while. But now, to divert the War which threaten'd on both sides, she resolv'd to treat of Peace, but with the Sword in her Hand: neither indeed was the Prince of Parma against it.

In the Month of February therefore, Commissioners were sent into Flanders, viz. Henry Earl of Derby, William Brook Lord Cobham, Sir James a Croftes, Comptroller of the Queen's Household, Valentine Dale and John Rogers, Doctors of Law: who being receiv'd in the Prince's Name with all Courtesy and Civility, sent Dale presently to him, to understand his Mind about the Place of Meeting, and to see his Commission from the King of Spain. He appointed the Place near Ostend, not in Ostend itself, which was now held by the English against the King: and as for his Commission, he promis'd it should be shew'd 'em when they met. But he wish'd they would hasten the matter, lest any thing should happen in the mean time which might hinder the Treaty of Peace. But Richardot said plainly and expressly, that he knew not what might be attempted in the mean time against England. Not long after, Rogers was sent to the Prince by the Queen's express Command, to understand for certain, whether there were any Design for invading of England, as he and Richardot seem'd of late to give Hints of. He affirm'd, that he never had the least Thought of invading England, since he desired the Negotiation might be hastned; and was somewhat angry with Richardot, who deny'd that any such Words had fallen from him.

On the 12th day of April, there met with the English Commissioners in Tents near Ostend, Count Aremberg, Champigny, Richardot, Maes a Doctor, and Garnier, sent as Commissioners from the Prince of Parma; who voluntarily gave the English Commissioners the Precedency and upper Hand both in going and sitting. They affirming that the Prince had sufficient Power and Commission to treat of a Peace, the English propounded, that a Truce might first be concluded on. The other deny'd it, because it would be damageable and prejudicial to the Spaniard, (who had been at the Charge of maintaining a powerful Army for now full six Months) in case a Peace should not be agreed upon. The English insisted, that a Truce was promis'd before they came into the Low-Countries. They on the other side acknowledg'd that a Truce was promis'd six Months before, but not accepted; and that it was not in the Queen's Power to make a Truce for the Hollanders and Zealanders, who daily attempted Acts of Hostility. The English urged that the Truce might be general, for all the Queen's Dominions and the Kingdom of Scotland. They refused to grant it for any more than four Towns only in the Netherlands, which were in the Queen's Hands; that is to say, Ostend, Flushing, Bergen-op-Zoom, and Brill; and that only during the Treaty and twenty days after; and upon such Terms, as it should be lawful in the mean time for the Queen of England to invade Spain, and for the Spaniard to invade England out of Spain and the Low-Countries.

Whilst the time was spent and squander'd away from day to day, in arguing about the Truce and the Place of Treaty, which at length was appointed to be at Borbourg, Sir James Croftes, out of his singular Affection to Peace, made a Journey to Brussels, without acquainting the rest of the Commissioners, and there propounded certain Articles in private; for which he was afterwards, upon Leicester's Accusation, imprison'd; tho' in the Judgment of the rest of the Commissioners, 1588. Ann. 31. sioners, the said Articles were not to be mislik'd: but Commissioners must not pass the Limits of their Commission. At last, when the English Commissioners could by no means get from them that there should be an absolute Cessation of Arms, nor see the Prince of Parma's Commission to treat of Peace, they propos'd these things following.

Other Proposals to the Spaniards. That the ancient Leagues betwixt the Kings of England and the Dukes of Burgundy might be renew'd and confirm'd. That all the Netherlanders might fully enjoy their Privileges, and serve God with Liberty of Conscience. That the Spaniards and foreign Soldiers might be remov'd out of the Netherlands, so as neither the Netherlanders, nor the bordering Countries, might have cause to fear them. Which things if they might be granted, the Queen would condescend to reasonable Conditions concerning those Towns in the Netherlands, which she then had in Possession, (that it might appear that it was not for her own Advantage, but for the necessary Defence as well of the Netherlands as of herself, that she had taken up Arms) provided the Money which was due to her from thence might be repay'd.

Their Answer. They answer'd, That there would be no Difficulty in renewing the ancient Leagues, when they should once come to a friendly Conference together about the same. That there was no Reason why foreign Princes should take Care of the Netherlanders Privileges, which were most freely and bountifully granted not only to the Provinces and Towns that were reconciled, but even to those also which were reduced by Force of Arms. And for foreign Soldiers, they were retain'd upon urgent Necessity, as long as Holland, England, and France were in Arms. As for those four Towns, that had been taken from the King, and the Repayment of the Money which the Queen had expended, the Spaniard might in Reason demand as many thousands of Ducats to be repay'd him by the Queen, as he had disburs'd upon the Low-Country-War, from the time that she first supported the revolting Netherlanders, and took them into her Protection.

Exposition with the Pr. of Parma about a Book of Allen's. About this time Dale, by the Queen's Command, went to the Prince of Parma, and mildly expostulated with him about a Book lately set forth by Cardinal Allen an Englishman, wherein he exhorted the Nobility and People of England and Ireland to join with the Spanish Forces under the Conduct of the Prince of Parma, to execute the Sentence of Pope Sixtus Quintus, publish'd already by Bull, against the Queen of England, whereby she was declared an Heretick, Illegitimate, and tax'd of Cruelty against Mary Queen of Scots, &c. and her Subjects commanded to aid the Prince of Parma against her. (And indeed there were a great Number of these Bulls and Books printed at Antwerp, to be dispers'd all over England.) The Duke deny'd that ever he saw any such Book or Bull, neither did he undertake any thing upon the Pope's Account; but his own Prince he must obey. As for the Queen of England, he had so high an Esteem of her for her Royal Vertues, that next to the King his Master he honour'd her above all, and desired to do her Service. That he had perswaded his King to condescend to this Treaty of Peace, which would be more advantageous for the English than for the Spaniards. For if the Spaniards be overcome, they will soon repair their Loss; but if you (said he) be once vanquish'd, your Kingdom is quite lost by it. To whom Dale reply'd, Our Queen is provided of Strength sufficient to defend her Kingdom; and you yourself in your Wisdom may judge, that a Kingdom cannot easily be won by the Fortune of one Battle, seeing the King of Spain has not yet been able, after so long a War, to recover his ancient Inheritance in the Netherlands. Be it so, (said the Duke) these things are in the Hand and Disposal of the Almighty.

The Commissioners continu'd their Proposals, Answers and Replies to one another, and still spun as it were the same Thread over again. The English urging that a Toleration of Religion might be granted to the Confederate Provinces, at least for two Years; it was answer'd, As the Spaniard demanded it not for the English Catholics, so they hoped the Queen was so prudent as not to desire any thing which should be against the Honour, Oath and Conscience of the Spaniard. When they demanded the Money due from the States of Brabant; they answer'd, That it was lent without the King's Knowledge or Leave: but when the Accounts were cast up, how much the said Money was, and how much the King had disburs'd about the War, it would soon be known who had most due to them. With such Answers as these they dally'd with the English, till the Spanish Fleet was come upon the Coast of England, and the Thundring of the Ordnance was heard from the Sea. And then they receiv'd a safe Conduct from the Prince of Parma, (who had in the mean time drawn down all his Forces to the Sea-side) and were honourably conducted by his Commissioners to the Borders near Calais. Thus came this Treaty to nothing, which at first was begun by the Queen (as the wiser sort have thought) to divert the Spanish Fleet; and continu'd by the Spaniard, purposely to surprize England at unawares and unprovided. So as they seem'd on both sides to sow the Fox's Skin to the Lion's.

The said Spanish Fleet, being the best furnish'd with Men, Munition, and all manner of Provision, of any that ever the Ocean saw, and call'd by the arrogant Name of Invincible, consisted of 130 Ships: In which were 19290 Soldiers, 8350 Mariners, 2080 Galley-Slaves, and 2630 great Ordnance.

Don Alphonso Perez de Gusman, Duke of Medina Sidonia, had the principal Command thereof; (for Don Antonio Columna, Duke of Paliano, and the Marquess of Santa Cruce, to whom this Command was formerly design'd, died both of them while the Fleet was rigging) and under him John Martinez de Recalde, an experienced Seaman.

On the 29th of May, the Fleet set sail out of the River Tayo, and while it bent its Course towards the Groyne in Gallicia, it was totally scatter'd and dispers'd by an hideous Tempest, so that with much ado it met again together some few days after, at the Groyne and other Harbours thereabouts: three Gallies being convey'd into France, by the Policy of David Gwinn an English Slave, and the Treachery of the Turkish Rowers. It was reported to be so weather-beaten and distress'd, that the Queen was verily perswaded that this Fleet was not to be look'd for this year; and Secretary Walsingham wrote to the Lord-Admiral to send back four of the biggest Ships, as if the War were now at an end. The Lord-Admiral did not easily believe it, and therefore humbly desired that nothing might be rashly credited in so weighty a matter, and that he might retain the Ships with him, tho' it were at his own Cost and Charges. And taking the Benefit of a favourable Wind, he set sail toward Spain, to surprize the Enemy's weather-beaten Ships in their Harbours. When he was not far from the Coast of Spain, the Wind came about into the South, and he thereupon (who was commanded to defend the Coast of England, fearing lest with the same Wind they might arrive in England undiscover'd) return'd to Plymouth.

Puts to Sea again.

With the same Wind the Duke of Medina set sail with his whole Fleet from the Groyne the 12. day of July, according to the Account of the Julian Year: and after a day or two he sent Roderico Telie before into the Low-Countries, to advertise the Prince of Parma of the Coming of the Fleet, and to tell him what was best to be done. For he had Orders to join with the Prince of Parma's Forces and Shipping, and to conduct 'em under the Protection of his Fleet into England, and withal to send the Land-Forces ashore at the Thames-Mouth. And now will I give a brief Account, out of the most credible Relations, as well of the Spaniards as of our own Countrymen, what was done every day in this Expedition, that the Truth may the more plainly appear.

On the 16th day there was a great Calm, and a thick Fog till Noon: then the North-East Wind blew very strongly, and presently after the West-Wind, till Midnight, and then the East-South-East-Wind; insomuch as the Spanish Fleet being dispers'd thereby, was hardly gather'd together again till it came within Sight of England on the 19th day. Upon which day the Lord-Admiral of England, being certainly inform'd by Flamming, the Captain of a Pinnace, that the Spanish Fleet was enter'd into the British Sea, (which the Seamen ordinarily call the Channel) and was seen near the Point call'd the Lizard, tow'd out the English Fleet into the main Sea, not without great Difficulty, the Wind blowing stiffly into the Haven, but indeed with singular Diligence and Industry, and with admirable Alacrity of the Seamen, whom he encouraged at their Halber-Work, assisting them and the common Soldiers in the doing of it in person.

English

Fleet puts

to Sea.

The next day the English discover'd the Spanish Fleet with lofty Turrets like Castles, in Front like a Half-Moon, the Wings thereof spreading out about the Length of Seven Miles, sailing very slowly, tho' with full Sails, the Winds being as it were tired with carrying them, and the Ocean groaning under the Weight of 'em; which they willingly suffer'd to pass by, that they might chaic them in the Rear with a fore-right Wind.

On the 21th of July, the Lord-Admiral of England, sending a Pinnace before, call'd the Defiance, denounced War by discharging her Ordnance; and presently his own Ship, call'd the Ark-royal, thunder'd thick and furiously upon the Admiral (as he thought) of the Spaniards, (but it was Alphonso de Leva's Ship.) Soon after, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher play'd stoutly with their Ordnance upon the hindmost Squadron, which was commanded by Recalde, who labour'd all he could to stay his Men from flying to the main Fleet, till such time as his own Ship being much batter'd with Shot, and now grown unseviceable, he was fain himself, with much ado, to retreat thither also. At which time the Duke of Medina gather'd together his Fleet, which was scatter'd this way and that way; and, hoisting more Sail, held on his Course with what Speed he could. Neither could he do any other, seeing both the Wind favour'd the English, and their Ships would turn about with incredible Celerity and Nimbleness, which way soever they pleas'd, to charge, wind, and tack about again. And now had they maintain'd a smart Fight for the space of two Hours, when the Lord-Admiral thought not good to continue it any longer, because 40 of his Ships were not yet come in, being scarce got out of the Haven.

The Night following, the S. Katharine, a Spanish Ship, having receiv'd much Damage in the Fight, was brought into the midst of the Fleet, in order to be repair'd; and a vast Ship of Biscay, belonging to Oquenda, and having the King's Treasurer on board, was designedly set on Fire, by some Gun-powder laid for that purpose by a Dutch Gunner, who had receiv'd some ill Treatment: But the Flame was happily extinguish'd by some Vessels that came in seasonably to its Relief; among which a Galleon (the Master of her Don Pedro de Valdez) fell foul of another Ship, and sprung her Foremast; so that being left behind, by Reason the Night was so dark, and the Sea ran so high, that no Succour could come to her, she was taken by Drake, who sent Valdez to Dartmouth, and distributed the Cash found in her, as a Booty to his Men. Drake was order'd to carry a Lantern that night, but fail'd to do it, having at the same time in chase Five German Merchant-Men, which he took to be Enemies. This occasion'd almost all the English Fleet to lie by, because they could not discover the Light; nor did he or the rest of the Fleet get Sight of the Lord-Admiral, till the next Evening following; for he, with two Ships more, viz. the Bear and the Mary-Rose, stood after the Spanish Fleet, all the Night before. The Duke spent this whole day in disposing his Fleet into the best Order, and commanded Alphonso de Leva to bring the first and the last Squadron together; then he appointed every particular Ship his proper Station, according to the Platform agreed on in Spain, and made it Death for any one to abandon his Post. Glich an Ensign was dispatch'd to the Prince of Parma, to acquaint him with the State of the Navy; and Oquenda's Ship was turn'd loose to Sea, her Cargo being first taken out and disposed of into other Vessels: The very same day she was taken by the English, with about 50 Sailors, wretchedly bruise'd and burnt, and carry'd into Weymouth-Harbour.

On the 23th of this Month, the Spaniards, very early in the Morning, took the Advantage of a Northerly Wind, and bore down upon the English, who soon tack'd about and stood Westward. Both Fleets strove hard for some time to get to the Windward, and then prepared for the Engagement. It was managed with Confusion enough, and various Success. The English on the one hand rescu'd some Ships of London, that were surrounded by the Spaniards; and the Spaniards on the other as bravely brought off Recalde, when he was in equal Danger. The great Guns on both sides rattl'd like so many Peals of Thunder; but the Spaniards Shot flew for the most part over the Heads of the English, without doing Execution; Cock being the only Englishman that died bravely in the midst of his Enemies in a Ship of his own. The Reason of this was, that the English Ships being far less than the Enemy's, made the Attack with more Quickness and Agility; and when they had given a Broad-side, they presently sheer'd off to a convenient Distance, and levell'd their Shot so directly at the bigger and more unwieldy Ships of the Spaniards, as seldom to miss their Aim; though the Lord-Admiral did not think it safe or proper to L. Admi- grapple with them, as some advis'd, with much tal's Cure, more Heat than Discretion; because that the Enemy's Fleet carry'd a considerable Army within their Sides, whereas ours had no such Advantage. Besides, their Ships far exceeded ours in Number and Bulk, and were much stronger and higher-built; insomuch that their Men having the Opportunity to ply us from such lofty Hatches, must inevitably destroy those that were obliged, as it were, to fight beneath them: And he easily foresaw likewise, that the Damage and Disgrace of a total Defeat would weigh much heavier than the Advantage of a Victory, should he happen to compass

On the 24th day of the Month, there was a Cessation on both sides, and the Lord-Admiral sent some of his smaller Vessels to the nearest of the English Harbours, to fetch a Supply of Powder and Ammunition; then he divided the Fleet into four Squadrons, the first of which he commanded himself, the second he committed to Drake, the third to Hawkins, and the fourth to Forbisher. He likewise singled out of the main Fleet some smaller Vessels to begin the Attack on all sides at once, in the very dead of the Night; but a Calm happening spoil'd his Design.

On the 25th, being S. James's Day, the Saint Anne, a Galleon of Portugal, not being able to keep up with the Fleet, was taken by some English Ships, and Leva with Don Diego Telles Emriques attempted to rescue her with 3 Galeasses; but were so warmly receiv'd by the Lord-Admiral himself, and the Lord Thomas Howard in the Golden-Lion, who by reason of the Calm, had their Ships tow'd along with Boats, that the Galleon was got off, with much ado, and not without some Loss. However from that time the Galeasses durst not venture any new Engagement. The Spaniards reported, 'That the English did at the same time miserably batter the Spanish Admiral who lay in the Rear, with their great Guns, and that they came so near her, as to slay many of her Men and shoot her Main-Mast by the board; but Mexia and Recalde came up seasonably enough to beat off the English; That after this the Spanish Admiral, with the Assistance of Recalde and others, fell upon the English Admiral, who made his Escape, by the Advantage of the Wind's chopping about. That the Spaniards from that time gave over the Chase, and keeping on their Course, dispatcht a Messenger to Parma, to desire him to join the King's Armada with his own Squadron as soon as possible, and to send withal some great Shot for the use of the main Fleet. This was altogether a Secret to the English, who give this Account of the matter: 'That they tore down the Lantern from one of the Spanish Ships, robb'd another of her Bow-sprit, and did a considerable Damage to a third: That the Nonpareil and the Mary-Rose held a small Fight with the Spaniards, and that some other Ships retriev'd the Triumph, when she was in great Danger. Thus have we very different Accounts of the same Action, from those who were present on the spot, and made their Reports, every Man, according to his own Observation.

The next day, the Lord-Admiral knighted the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townsend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbisher, in Consideration of their good Service; and a Resolution was taken not to attack the Enemy from that time forward, till they came to the British Frith, or the Streights of Calais; where the Lord Henry Seymour and Sir Will. Winter expected their Arrival. Thus the Spanish Fleet sail'd forward with a fair and soft Gale at South-West and by South; and the English chased them close at the Heels; but so far was this Invincible Armada from alarming the Sea-Coasts with any frightful Apprehensions, that the English Gentry of the younger sort enter'd themselves Volunteers, and taking leave of their Parents, Wives, and Children, did, with incredible Chearfulness, hire Ships at their own Charge; and, in pure Love to their Country, join'd the Grand Fleet in vast Numbers; amongst whom were the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, Thomas and

Robert Cecil, Henry Brooke, Charles Blunt, Walter Raleigh, William Hatton, Robert Cary, Ambrose Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorges, and several others of good Quality.

On the 27th of this Month, the Spanish Fleet came to an anchor before Calais; their Pilots having acquainted them, that if they ventur'd any farther, there was some Danger that the force of the Current might drive 'em away into the Northern-Channel. Not far from them came likewise the English Admiral to an anchor, and lay within shot of their Ships. The English Fleet consisted by this time of 140 Sail; all of 'em Ships of force, and very tite and nimble Sailors; and easily manageable upon a Tack. But However, the main brunt of the Engagement lay not upon more than 15 or 16 of 'em. The Spaniards, as they had frequently done before, press'd the Duke of Parma by one Messenger after another, to send away forty Fly-boats, without which they could not well engage the English, by reason of the unweildy Bulk of the Spanish Vessels, and the Lightness and Activity of the English. They intreated him likewise, with great Earnestness, to put aboard his whole Army, which the Spanish Fleet would be sure to guard, according to the Resolutions already taken, till it was landed in England. But it seems he was not ready, and so could not answer their Summons. His flat-bottom'd Boats, which were fram'd for the Channel, were all leaky, his Provisions not ready, and his Sailors, who had been hitherto kept together against their wills, had made a shift to give him the slip, and get away. Besides, several Men of War belonging to Holland and Zealand, block'd up the very Mouth of the Harbours of Dunkirk and Newport, from whence alone he could put to Sea; and so well were they furnish'd with great Guns and small Arms, that he could not possibly get from Shoar, without running a very palpable Hazard of his Life. However, being a stout and experienc'd Soldier, he left no Method unattempted, out of an eager Desire of assisting towards the Conquest of England.

But Queen Elizabeth, by a wise Precaution, baff'd all his Attempts, and dash'd the forward Hopes of the Spaniard all at once: For, by her Majesty's Orders, the Lord-Admiral got ready eight of his worst Ships the very Day after the Spaniards came to an Anchor; and having bestow'd upon them a good plenty of Pitch, Tar and Rosin, and lin'd 'em well with Brimstone and other combustible Matter, they sent 'em before the Wind, in the dead time of the Night, under the Conduct of Young and Prowse, into the midst of the Spanish Fleet: The approach of which was no sooner discover'd by the Spaniards, and the prodigious Blaze which the Fire made all the Sea over, but they suspecting that these Fire-Ships were big with other Engines of Slaughter, besides the destructive Element that shew'd itself without, began to raise a most hideous Clamour, Cut your Cables, and get up your Anchors! and in a panick Fright put to Sea with all the Confusion and Precipitancy imaginable. One of the Fleet (a large Galleass) having broken her Rudder, floated up and down before the Wind; and the next Day making for Calais in a very piteous Plight, she at last struck upon the Sands, and after a smart, long and doubtful Engagement, was taken by Amias Preston, Thomas Gerard, and Hawey. The Captain of her, Don Hugo de Moncada, being first slain, and the Soldiers and Rowers, either drown'd or put to the sword; the English pillag'd a great quantity of Gold which she had on board, and the Ship and Guns fell to the Governor of Calais.

1588. The Spaniards reported, that the Duke, upon the approach of the Fire-Ships, order'd the whole Fleet to weigh Anchor and stand to Sea, but that when the Danger was over, every Ship should return to her Station. This is what he did himself, and he likewise discharg'd a great Gun as a Signal to the rest to do as he did: The Report however was heard but by very few, by reason their Fears had dispers'd 'em at that rate, that some of 'em ventur'd out to the Main Ocean, and others sail'd up the Shallows of Flanders.

4th Engagement.

In the mean time Drake and Fenner play'd briskly with their Canon upon the Spanish Fleet, as it was Rendezvousing over-against Graveling. They were not long after join'd by Fenton, Southwell, Beefton, Cross, Riman, and, in a little while, by the Lord-Admiral himself, the Lord Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield. The Duke Leva, Oquenda, Recalde, and the rest, got clear of the Shallows, with much ado, and stood the Brunt, as well as they could, but had the better part of their Ships miserably torn, and in several places shot through. The Galleon St. Matthew, under the Command of Don Diego Pimentelli, (as she came to the relief of Don Francisco de Toledo in the St. Philip, which had receiv'd great Damage from Seimour and Winter's shot, and after being driven almost as far as Ostend, had been as roughly treated by the Zelanders, and was at length made a Prize by some Ships of Flushing) was at last taken herself, and the whole Spanish Fleet closely Ply'd and in great Distress for the space of an whole Day.

St. Philip and St. Matthew taken.

On the last Day of the Month, the Wind blew hard at North-West early in the Morning, and the Spanish Fleet attempting to get back again to the Streights of Calais, was driven toward Zeland. The English then gave over the Chace, because, in the Spaniards opinion, they perceiv'd 'em making haste enough to their own Destruction. For the Wind lying at the W. N. W. Point, could not choose but force 'em on the Shoals and Sands on the Coast of Zeland. But the Wind happening to come about in a little time to S. W. and by W. they went before the Wind, and having got off the Shoals, in the Evening a Council of War was held: The general Resolution was to return into Spain by the Northern Channel; for they wanted many necessary Provisions, especially great Shot; their Ships were wretchedly torn and batter'd, and they had no Hopes at all that the Prince of Parma would come and join them. Being now therefore clear of Danger, in the Main Ocean, they steer'd Northward, and the English Fleet renew'd the Chace after them. Now and then the Spanish Fleet slacken'd their sail, and seem'd to tarry for the coming up of the English; so that 'twas generally thought their Fleet would tack about and return home.

The Spaniards fly Northward.

Q. Eliz. visits her Camp at Tilbury.

About this time Queen Elizabeth was pleas'd to take a view of her Army and Camp at Tilbury; and as she rode through the Troops drawn up on both sides of her, sometimes with a martial Pace and Posture, at other times more like her Sex and herself. 'Tis scarce to be thought what a Spirit of Bravery she infus'd into the Officers and Soldiers by her Presence and Direction.

On the very Day the last Engagement was between the two Fleets, the Prince of Parma, having paid his Addresses to our Lady of Hall, came to Dunkirk, tho' something of the latest; for which reason the Spaniards receiv'd him in a very reproachful manner, as if out of some regards to Queen Elizabeth, he had on purpose slipt so fair an Occasion of doing Wonders for the Service of his Country. The Duke, to appease this Storm, punish'd those who had the charge of Victualling his Fleet; tho' in the mean time he could not but secretly laugh at the saw-cy and insolent Brags of the Spaniards, whom he had heard talking at this vain rate, 'That where ever they turn'd their Sails, a most certain Victory waited upon their Course; and that the English would not have courage enough to look 'em in the Face.

And 'tis certain, that Don Bernardine de Mendoza was so ridiculous as to print a lying Poem in France, which proclaim'd the Triumph before the Victory was obtain'd. However, to block up Parma, so that he might not get out of Dunkirk, the Lord-Admiral order'd the Lord Henry Seimour and the Dutch to keep a very strict Eye upon the Coast of Flanders, whilst he himself pursued the Spaniards on the other side of Edinburgh-Frith, anciently called Bodotria. For some Suspicions there were, that they design'd to betake themselves to the King of Scots, who was already provok'd to an high rate, for his Mother's Death. Certain it is, that Ashby, the Queen's Ambassador in Scotland, the better to keep him in Temper, made him, this Month, very considerable Offers, viz. That he should be created a Duke of England, with a yearly Salary of 5000 Pounds to maintain the Title: That he should have a Guard maintain'd at the Queen's charge, besides some other Advantages. Whether this was done out of private Humour or by publick Authority, I can neither tell, nor will stand to examine in this place: However the blame lay at his door, and the Propositions were never made good.

But the Spaniards having now laid aside all the Thoughts and Hopes of returning to attempt the English; and peceiving their main Safety lay in their Flight, made no stay or stop at any Port whatever. And thus this mighty Armada, which had been three whole Years fitting out, and at a vast Expence, met in one Month's time with several Attacks, and was at last routed, with a vast Slaughter on their side, and but a very few of the English missing, and not one Ship lost, except that small Vessel of Cock's, it happening that the Enemy's Shot flew too high to do the English Ships any great damage. When therefore the Spanish Fleet had taken a large compass round Britain, by the Coasts of Scotland, the Orcaides and Ireland, and had weather'd many Storms, and suffer'd as many Wrecks and Blows, and all the Inconveniences of War and Weather, it made a shift to get home again, laden with nothing but Shame and Dishonour. This occasion'd the coining of several kinds of Money and Medals, some in memory of the Victory, with the Device of a Fleet flying under full sail, and this Inscription, Venit, vidit, fugit; i. e. It came, it saw, and fled. Others were stamp'd in Honour of the Queen, with Fire-Ships, and a Fleet all in Harry and Confusion, with this Motto, Dux Femina Facti; i. e. A Woman manag'd the Design. Certain it is, that several of their Ships perish'd in their Flight, being cast away on the Coasts of Scotland and Ireland, and that above 700 Soldiers were cast on shoar in Scotland, who by the Prince of Parma's Mediation with the King of Scots, and with Q. Elizabeth's Permission, were sent over about a Year after into the Low-Countries. As for those who had the ill Fortune to be drove upon the Irish Shoar, they met with the most barbarous Treatment; for some of 'em were butcher'd by the wild Irish, and the rest put to the Sword by the Lord-Deputy; who fearing that they might join with the Irish Malecontents, and observing that Bingham, Governor of Connaught, treated them with more Gentleness than he had several times order'd him to do, upon their surrender, he forth,

But this Rigor the Queen condemn'd and complain'd of as too extreme. However the rest being terrify'd by this way of Proceeding, tho' they were sick and half famish'd, yet chose to trust themselves to their shatter'd Barks, and the mercy of the Seas, and so were many of 'em a Sacrifice to the Waves.

Spaniards blame the Prince of Parma. The Spaniards, who got safe home, laid their Disparagement on the Prince of Parma's Negligence, and in some measure on the too nice Obsequiousness express'd on their side in making a scruple of receding in the least from their Instructions: For their Orders ran, not to make any Attempt before the Prince of Parma's Fleet had join'd theirs, and there was not an inch of discretionary Liberty lodg'd in their Hands; had things been manag'd at another rate, they made their Boasts that the English Fleet could never escape being seiz'd in their Harbours. And in truth it became a Dispute among Persons skill'd in the Discipline of War, whether Orders were not to be sacredly observ'd, whatever the Issue prov'd, lest otherwise Authority should lose its Force, and its proper Fruit too, Obedience? 'Twas likewise controverted, whether upon urgent Occasions, Men might not qualify or enlarge their Commissions, or suit 'em to the present Exigency, according as fresh Accidents arose, lest otherwise good Occasions were let slip, and matters of importance quite dash'd through an unseasonable Neglect. The King of Spain, for his part, bore the Defeat with a Patience that became him; and being sensible there was a Providence in it, he order'd a general Thanksgiving all over his Kingdom, to God and the Saints, that it was no greater; and shew'd moreover a most extraordinary Tenderness in the Relief of the distress'd Soldiers and Seamen.

R of Spain returns Thanks to God. Queen Elizabeth did likewise appoint a publick Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to be used throughout the whole Kingdom, and she was pleas'd to pass herself in a triumphant manner, and with a most splendid Retinue of Noblemen and others, through the Streets of London, which on this Occasion were hung with blue Cloth; (the City-Companies being drawn up on both sides the Way with their Banners) she was carried in a Chariot with a pair of Horses (Coaches being at that time but little in use) to St. Paul's Church, (where the Standards and Colours taken from the Enemy were hung up) and there she return'd Thanks to God, and heard a Sermon proper to the Occasion.

So did Q. Eliz. The Lord-Admiral had a Pension sett'd on him for his great piece of Service, and he and his Officers had the Honour of being consider'd by the Queen as Persons born for the Preservation of their Country. She was likewise pleas'd to use the freedom of saluting the other Commanders by their Names, whenever they happen'd to come in her sight, in consideration of their high and particular Merits; (a Reward as glorious as they were capable of desiring) and for the poor and disabl'd Seamen, on those she bestow'd handsom Pensions. The Learned both at home and abroad congratulated this happy Victory with transports of real Joy, and express'd the triumphs of their Hearts in Poems wrote in all Languages upon this Subject.

Publick Joy augmented by Sir Robert Sidney. This general Satisfaction receiv'd a farther increase on Sir Robert Sidney's return out of Scotland, who assured the Queen, that the King of Scots stood firm to her Interests, and would defend and assert those of the Protestant Religion. This Gentleman was sent over to him, when the Spanish Fleet lay Cruising on the Coasts of Britain, on purpose to Compliment him for his Respects towards the Queen, and to return him Thanks on that account, as likewise to acknowledge his generous and cheerful Adhesion to the common Cause; and to give him assurance of the like Assistance on her Majesty's part, should the Spaniards attempt to land in Scotland. He was moreover to remonstrate to him, how eagerly the King of Spain thirsted after the acquisition of all Britain, and what Diligence he had used with his Holiness to get him excommunicated, and by that means to deprive him at once of the present possession of the Crown of Scotland, and of his Title likewise to that of England in Reversion. Nor was he to conceal the menacing Expressions thunder'd out against him by Mendoza and the Pope's Nuncio, and that he could not therefore arm himself with too much Precaution against the Arts and Machinations of the Papiists in Scotland. At this I cannot but mention by the by, a pleasant Remark of the young King, viz. A pleasant saying of the K of Scots That he expected no other Favour at the Spaniards hands, than what Polyphemus promised Ulysses, That when he had devour'd all the rest, he would reserve him for the last morsel.

Nor did the death of Leicester (however sadly the Queen resented it) put any stop to the current of the publick Joy, who died on the 4th of September, on his way to Killingworth, of a continued Fever. He was the fifth Son of John Duke of Northumberland, and one of the Privy-Chamber to King Edward. Queen Mary restor'd him and his Brothers and Sisters to their Blood and Privilege, and made him Master of the English Ordnance at the Siege of St. Quintins: And in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, (who lov'd him at such a rate, as if a secret Conjunction of their Planets had form'd as mysterious a Sympathy between their Souls) he was made Master of the Horse, honour'd with the Orders of St. George and St. Michael, chosen one of the Privy-Council, made Lord-Steward of her Majesty's Household, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, Ranger of the Forests on this side the River Trent, Lieutenant and Captain-General of the English Forces in the Low-Countries, and this Year advanced to be General of the English Forces against the Spaniards: Nor did he in the last declension and period of his Life, drop the Hopes of new Honours and Advancements, by the accession of the high Character of acting as the Queen's Lieutenant in the Government of England and Ireland. Nay, this he had so far secur'd, as that the Letters-Patents were already drawn; but Burghley and Hatton put a stop to the matter, and the Queen saw in time the great hazard of intrusting so large a share of her own Prerogative into the Hands of a single Person.

His Character. He was reputed a most complete Courtier; was a Person of exact Neatness, a generous Patron of Arts and Arms, and one that knew how to nick a Juncture and manage a Turn to his best advantage. Besides, he was of a Temper pleasant and popular, very shy and reserv'd to his suspected Enemies, had in his youthful Days been very Complaisant to the Ladies, and when he grew almost past it, express'd a strange Fondness for Marriage. But as he prefer'd those two great Subjects of Envy, Power and Greatness, to solid Vertue; so did he of course draw upon himself the Malice and Reproach of inferior Persons, and could not avoid the Insults of libelling Pens, and infamous and false Reflections, even when he seem'd to be Fortune's and his Queen's chief Favourite. In a word, the Crowd caress'd him in publick with flattering Commendations, but in private they used quite another Language. And 1588. And whereas he was a Debtor to the Crown, his Effects were dispos'd of at a publick Sale: For however gentle the Queen might shew herself in other respects, yet did she very rarely remit what was owing to her Treasury.

Ann. 21. His Goods fold. Parma besieges Bergenop-zume. The Prince of Parma, tho' he had lost his aim of making a Descent into England, yet that he might purchase some degree of Honour with that powerful Army which had been rais'd against England, and that he might at the same time open a Passage into Zeland, and secure Brabant from hostile Incursions, he laid siege to Bergen upon the River Zume, a Town of Brabant, which Nature had fortified by an happy Situation, and Art by strong Works round about, and which had a Garison in it consisting of English for the most part. But this Project was likewise defeated by the timely Vigilance of the Lord Willoughby, and the stout Resistance of the Garison: For tho' during the heat of the Siege, there arose as vain a Dissention between them, some adhering to Sir William Drury, who was made Governor of the Town by the General, the Lord Willoughby; and some siding with Morgan, who had receiv'd the same Commission from the Queen's Hands. Nevertheless they buried their Differences in the common Safety, and by several brave Repulses, frequent Sallies, and other well-apply'd Arts of War, made a shift to give the Enemy such a warm Entertainment, that Four hundred of them being kill'd outright, taken Prisoners, or drown'd, (the same Persons having been trapann'd by Grimstone and Redbead, who pretended themselves Revolters by specious Oaths and fair Promises, into a Bulwark of the Town) the Prince of Parma quitted all his Hopes of Blocking up the Harbour or Winning the Town; and so the Winter approaching, and Provisions growing scarce, he e'en broke up the Siege, after it had been carried on for two Months. And that true Courage might not want its due Reward or Distinction, the L. Willoughby conferr'd the Honour of Knight-hood on Sir Francis Vere, whose Fame commenc'd from this Siege; as also on Sir Thomas Knolles, Sir Nicolas Parker, and Sir John Pooley, in regard to their good Conduct and Bravery.

Breaks up the Siege. Now was England harass'd, not only with foreign Wars, but disturb'd with Schismatics, those domestick Enemies; (for War is always the Nurse and Midwife of Church-Confusions) and certainly there never was a time, when the Discipline of the Church was run down with such a sawcy Pertness, and the Authority of her Officers so rudely and basely insulted. For the Q. refusing (as indeed she was consistent, and always the same) to listen to any Changes in Religion, or encourage those new Modellers, whose Design she believ'd to be no other, than to wound her Royal Prerogative through the Sides of the Hierarchy, some who had a profound Veneration for the Geneva-Platform of Church-Discipline, imagin'd there was no surer or nearer way for erecting it in England, than by loudly railing against the English Forms and Rites, and rendering the Names of Bishop and Prelate as odious as they could, to the Common-People. Their first Essay therefore was, to put out scurrilous Pamphlets against Church-Order and Prelacy; the Titles whereof were Martin-mar-Prelate, Minerals, Diotrepbes, A Demonstration of Discipline, &c. These Libels were stuff'd with such an Heap of scandalous and virulent Abuses, that the Authors of them appear'd rather to have learnt their Language from Billingsgate, than to speak the Sense of any Christian Community: Yet it seems Penry and Udall, the chief Scribblers, were of the Ministry; and another of 'em, Job Throckmorton, was a Man of Learning, and Master of a very facetious and satirical Vein. Their grand Patrons and Abettors were Sir Ri. Knightly and Wigston, Persons in other respects sober and pious, but drawn into the Party by some Instruments, that were to make a private Market by them. However the Knights had a pretty round Fine laid on them in the Star-Chamber; but the Archbishop of Canterbury was so generously good-natur'd as to procure a Remission of it at her Majesty's Hands.

Whilst these Engines were employ'd in railing at the Church of England Liturgy, and bringing the Geneva-Model into its Place, some of their Associates took the Boldness to practise it in private Assemblies, in spite of the Laws and Constitution; nay they went so far as to hold Synodical Conventions, and draw Presbytery into a Scheme. On this account were Tho. Cartwright, Edmund Snape, Andrew King, Budlow, Payne, and some others of the same Religious Brotherhood, call'd before their Superiours; but some of the Party, glowing with a fond Zeal for their Teachers, endeavour'd to rescue them from the hands of Authority. With what a strange Petulancy and sullen Haughtiness these Congregational Teachers managed themselves, maugre all the Tenderness and prudent Forbearance of the Archbishop, I leave to the Observation of Ecclesiastical Writers, whose proper Province it is.

By this time, that black Storm which threaten'd from the Spanish Quarter, was happily blown over; but some Remains of it seem'd to have been dissipated thorow Ireland and Scotland; tho' the most violent Tempest of all blew from England, and fell afterwards upon Spain, as shall be shewn anon. For Ireland, the Troubles and Commotions which sprang up there, did in some measure owe their Rise to the Mis-conduct of the Lord-Deputy Sir William Fitz-Williams, amongst other Causes, who made too strict Searches, and rigorous Demand of those Wrecks of Spanish Goods, which were cast ashore; and on that account went so far as to commit some Persons land to Prison, as Favourers of the Spaniards.

Daniel Rogers, who was some time ago sent into Denmark, to condole the Death of Frederick II. and to settle the same good Correspondence with his Son and Successor, began his Negotiation with the Regents of the Realm, with these Proposals: 'That no Danes might be permitted to assist the Enemy against the Queen of England. 'That no Arrests of Ships might be allow'd within the Streight of Denmark (call'd the Sound) for private Mens Faults. That the Island Fishing-Trade, which was, by the ancient Treaty, to be renew'd by a fresh Grant, every seven Years, might not be stopp'd or prevented on any new Design or Pretence whatever. 'That the English should pay no Customs within the Sound, except on their Return from the Baltick, and that in the usual Coin of Denmark. 'That the Owners of Ships should not suffer any Detriment, through the ill Dealings of the several Masters and Pilots. That all Bales of Cloth might be free from any Impost upon 'em, and that the Custom call'd Last-gelt might be remitted to the English. But in respect of the King's Minority, the Dispatch of this Business was deferr'd till another time; for the Danes were at present out of humour with the English, for sailing into Russia, not through the Sound, but by the Coasts of Norway, Finmark, Lapland, Scrikfinnia, and Biarmia. But Boris Theodorides who succeeded Theodore Joannides in the Empire of Russia, who died about the beginning of this Year, did all he could to countenance and encourage the English; and omitted no good Offices, which might ingratiate and recommend him to the Queen of England.

Queen of ENGLAND.

The Two and Thirtieth Year of her Reign.

Commotions in Scotland.

THE Spaniards, after the unhappy and disgraceful Disappointment of their Expedition against England, to patch up the Reputation they had lost, and to keep the English from attempting a Descent on any Part of the Spanish Dominions, they took up a new Resolution of invading England by the way of Scotland: And in the Conduct of this Secret, the principal Agent employ'd by them was Robert Bruce a Priest, with Chreiton and Hayes, both Jesuits, who found no difficulty in bringing over to their sides the Earls of Huntly, Arrol, and Crawford, Men bigotted to the Romish Persuasion, as likewise Bothwell, the Son of John Prior of Coldingham, the natural Son of James the fifth King of Scots, a Man of unsteady Principles, with a great many more. The substance of the Plot was, That they should in the first place seize on the Person of the King, and then bring in a foreign Power to Re-establish the Romish Religion, and invade England in pretended Revenge of the Queen of Scots Death. The Arguments used for summoning the Mob together, where of this sort: 'That the King was kept in Custody against his own Consent by the Lord-Chancellor Maitland, and the English Party: That the English, who had lately took off the King's Mother's Head in a very unwarrantable way, were at that very time levying Forces to destroy the Scotch Nobility: That on the other side, they took up Arms at the King's own Desire and Solicitation, to set him free from his Jaylor, the Chancellor, and their Country from that Ruin that threaten'd it. The King being one Day gone an Hunting, receiv'd the very same Day Messages, one upon the heels of another, That Bothwell on the one hand appear'd with several Troops rais'd from the Borders; and Huntly on the other, with a very powerful Army from the North. Hereupon a Proclamation was issued out, to declare them Traitors; and the King's faithful Subjects were summon'd in, all that were above 16, and under 60. This so frightened Bothwell, that his Gang forsook him, and himself slunk home as well as he could: But Huntly proceeded so far as to seize Glamis, the Captain of the King's Guard, between whom and himself there was a most inveterate profess'd Enmity.

Queen Elizabeth, who judg'd the English equally concern'd with the Scots, to quash this Attempt of the Spaniards, used all possible Arts with her Friends in Scotland that her Coin or good Sense could supply, to induce the King to put an end to these Disorders. He was very sensible of his Danger, and marched to encounter Huntly; who being arrived as far as the Bridge on the River Dee, with a potent Army, and hearing of the King's approach, set Glamis at liberty, and retir'd to his own House called Strathbolgy, situated amongst the rocky Mountains; whither being closely pursued by the King, who endur'd the Fatigue of the March, the Want of Provisions, and the Inclemency of the Season, beyond what might be expected from so green an Age; he first offer'd to surrender himself, provided his Life and Estate might be secure, and not long after yielded on Discretion when he found no Conditions were like to be offer'd him. The King, without hearing one Word of Apology, commanded him to Prison; but soon after order'd his Release; and to the great commendation of his Clemency, was pleas'd to pardon both him and his Adherents, upon their humble Submission.

The very same Month these Things were acting in Scotland against the Spanish Faction there, was Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, (who was, as I have said, sent to the Tower three Years before on suspicion of being too well inclin'd to Spain) arraign'd in Westminster-Hall, and tried by his Peers, before Henry Earl of Derby, who was created Lord-High-Steward of England on this particular Occasion.

The Persons summon'd to attend this Trial, Arundel's Trial, were these following Peers.

William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Lord High-Treasurer of England.
William Lord Marquess of Winchester.
Edward Earl of Oxford, Lord Great-Chamberlain of England.
Henry Earl of Kent.
Henry Earl of Sussex.
Henry Earl of Pembroke.
Edward Earl of Hertford.
Henry Earl of Lincoln.
The Lord Hunsdon.
The Lord Willoughby of Eresby.
The Lord Morley.
The Lord Cobham.
The Lord Grey.
The Lord Darcy of the North.

The Lord Buckhurst.
The Lord La-Ware. And
The Lord Norris.

Being order'd to hold up his Hand, he did so, and moreover used this Expression, Behold here a clean Hand, and an honest Heart! The Heads of his Impeachment were much the same with those mention'd before, An. 1586. viz. 'That he held a very strict Intimacy and Correspondence with Cardinal Allen, Parsons the Jesuite, and other Conspirators, who attempted the Ruin of their Prince and Country; by stirring up Foreigners and the Queen's natural Subjects to bring in Popery, to the total Destruction of both: That he had engaged by Letters convey'd by Weston, alias Burges, a Priest, to assist the said Cardinal in advancing the Catholick Cause, and to that purpose had design'd to withdraw privately out of the Kingdom: That he was privy to the Bull of Sixtus Quintus, which de-throned the Queen, and made over her Dominions to the Spaniard: That, when he was a Prisoner in the Tower, he had caus'd Mass to be said for the happy Success of the Spanish Armada, and had himself compos'd a special Prayer on that occasion.

Heads of his Charge.

Being demanded to answer, Whether he was Guilty, or Not Guilty? he turn'd himself to the Court and Judges, and made these Challenges one after another, Whether such a Number of Articles might lawfully be put into one and the same Impeachment? They answer'd in the Affirmative. Then he demanded, Whether Presumptive Arguments bore any Weight in an Indictment? He was answer'd, That he might except against them as far as he pleas'd. Another Demand was, Whether he could stand accus'd of those things charged to be Treason in the 13th of Queen Elizabeth, after the Time limited in the said Act? They then promis'd him, he should not be try'd upon any other Law or Act of High-Treason, but an ancient one of Edward III. In the last place, he demanded, If that were a fair Indictment, which fail'd grossly as to Circumstances both of Place and Time? The Answer was, That these things signify'd little, if the Matter of Fact were proved. After this, being ask'd a second time, Whether he were Guilty or Not? he answer'd, Not Guilty, and submitted himself to God and his Peers; but desired them to spare his Memory, which was impair'd by his Imprisonment, and ill Health, and not to over-charge it with too much Variety.

Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, open'd the first Part of the Charge, viz. That Cardinal Allen having engag'd with the Jesuites and others, against his Prince and Country, upon which account he was banish'd the Kingdom; yet he the said Earl had kept up a Correspondence with him by Letters, and had expressly written to him to advance the Catholick Interest, which by a fair and modest Construction, was a plain inviting of him to invade England. The Earl made Answer, That all he intended by it, was the Promotion of that Faith, by the Accession of new Profelytes. Popham, the Queen's Attorney-General, endeavour'd to prove, by the Confessions of Savage, Throckmorton, and Babington, that this could not possibly be understood of a free Conversion upon the Strength of Argument; but of a publick Invasion by Force of Arms. Shuttleworth, a Serjeant at Law, made it appear out of the Form of the Proclamations put out against the Jesuites and Seminary Priests, on what Designs they were sent into England: That they were Traitors he prov'd from the Earl's own Words; who, upon the Hearing of Valonger's Cause in the Star-Chamber, in relation to a scandalous Libel of his, said publickly, That an hearty Papist could not but be as thorow a Traitor. But for all this Men of this very Principle were among the Earl's greatest Intimates. 'Twas urg'd moreover, That he had espous'd the Faith of the Romish Church, and became of Consequence a Subject to the Romish See; but this he flatly deny'd, and demanded that any Evidence might be produc'd to prove him a profess'd Catholick. He acknowledg'd indeed, that he had in some Instances made Burges his Confessor; whereupon it was debated, That none were admitted to the Sacraments of the Church of Rome, but such as were reconciled to her Doctrine and Worship; but he was admitted by Gratley a Priest, and therefore a Papist before, at least in his Heart. This Popham labour'd to prove from his own Letters, and that he intended likewise to withdraw beyond Sea; That he was an absolute Creature of Cardinal Allen, and conform'd entirely to his Measures; for which he was guilty of High-Treason. He then produced Gratley's and Morgan's Letters to the Queen of Scots, and made from thence this Inference, That the Earl ow'd his Change in Religion more to Sourness and Spleen, than to Conscience and Conviction. Then was produced an Emblematical Piece found in the Earl's Cabinet, which had on one side an Hand shaking a Serpent into the Fire, with this Motto, If God be with us, who shall be against us? And on the other, a Lion Rampant, without Claws, and with this Inscription, Yet a Lion. He moreover added, That the Earl designing to quit the Kingdom, was perswaded by the Cardinal to alter his purpose, as being a Person likely to do the Church of Rome more Service by his Stay in England, than his Departure thence: That in a Letter to the Queen, the Earl had reflected severely on the Justice of the Laws, in reference to the Sentence of Death denounced against his Grand-father and Father: That the Queen of Scots had recommended him to Babington, as the great Patron of the Catholick Interest: That Allen had own'd that the aforesaid Bull was procured by the Applications of a Person of Figure in England; which could be no other than the Earl, because no one Nobleman besides, was so intimate with Allen as himself, and whom therefore Allen must needs know to be ill-affected to his Country, by what he had heard pass before, in the Star-Chamber. Then were read also the Confessions of the Lord William, the Earl's Brother, with those of his Sister the Lady Margaret, and his own Letters when he had Thoughts of leaving the Kingdom. And this gave occasion to magnify the Queen's Clemency afresh, who would not suffer him (at that very time) to be examin'd on an Article of Treason, but barely on a Point of Contempt. To these Charges the Earl answer'd in the gross, 'That as for the Picture, 'twas a Trifle presented him by his Man: That indeed he had promis'd to assist the Cardinal in the Promotion of the Catholick Faith, but never at the Expence of his Prince and Country: That what he had written in relation to the Sentence of his Grand-father and Father, was extant upon Record, and so any one might read it: That he was not at all concerned in what the Cardinal or the Queen of Scots might write about him, since he stood clear as to Fact: That it was impossible to restrain other Mens Pens: That he had indeed some Design of acting under the Prince of Parma, in 1589. Ann. 32. the Wars abroad, since the Rigour of the Laws against Catholicks made it not safe for him to stay at home: That the Attorney had manag'd the Letters and Confessions, at the same rate that Spiders do Flowers; that is, suck'd all the Poison out of them; but he, for his part, was able to extract out of them something more useful, might he be permitted to see 'em. Then were read Allen's Letters to the Queen of Scots, with those of the Bishop of Ross, about invading England, that very Year he design'd to quit it; and the Bull of Sixtus Quintus, and several Remarks made on Allen's Memorial to the English, printed at Antwerp, the Year before. He was likewise charged with having assumed this Title, Philip Duke of Norfolk, which was found among his Papers; and it was Allen's Advice, that he should in some degree mend his Title. These things were brought against him as Convictions of Treason before his Imprisonment. Egerton, the Solicitor-General, having summ'd up and repeated the Particulars of the Charge, proceeded upon a threefold Distinction of Time, viz. 'Before the Arrival of the Spanish Fleet; at the Instant of its Coming; and after it fled: And that he had been guilty of Treason since his Confinement: Before the Fleet appear'd, he had been guilty of Treason, in wishing it happy Success; when it was arrived, in making a Form of Prayer suitable to his Wishes, and causing the Mass of the Holy Ghost to be said, and a Course of Devotions to be used for 24 Hours together: And then when the Fleet was gone, in lamenting its Defeat, with all the Marks of an extraordinary Sorrow; as if he had fix'd his last Hope, and best Confidence, in the Spanish Armada, which was fitted out with a design to ruin his Prince and Country. These Particulars were all made out against him by Sir Tho. Gerard Knt. Will. Shelley, condemn'd for Treason Ann. 1586, Bennet a Popish Priest, and some other Prisoners. He then mutter'd in a broken and imperfect kind of Tone, That the Prayers he made, and the Masses he perform'd, were in order to deprecate a Massacre he had heard was design'd against the Catholicks. Gerard's Evidence he roundly deny'd; and as he adjured him to declare nothing but the Truth, and represented before him the dreadful Solemnity of the last Day, he so terrify'd and scared the Evidence, that he hardly was able to speak one Word to the purpose. Bennet's Attestations he endeavour'd to invalidate, as being a Man of a tarnish'd Reputation, and who had contradicted himself in his Confessions. The rest he tax'd as Persons impeach'd, and Prisoners, and Men likewise of a loose and profligate Character; who were far from deserving Credit, and who might be suspected to have the Liberty of using his Conversation, with a Design to ensnare him in the Quirks of the Law. Having receiv'd a Check for this, as too indecent and bold a Challenge upon the Evidence for the Queen, at the Solicitor's Motion, an ancient Law of Richard II. was read, whereby it was declared, that the Crown of England was under the Command of none but God alone, and that the Bishop of Rome had no manner of Authority over it. It now growing towards Night, and nothing being produced farther against him, the Earl was order'd to withdraw: He threw himself wholly upon the Judgment of his Peers, protesting his Obedience to the Queen, and heartily praying they might come to such an Issue, as might be most for the Glory of God, the Safety of the Queen, and the Integrity of their own Honour and Conscience. They then went aside, and held a Debate, which lasted an Hour, and in Points of Law they consulted the Opinion of the Judges and Serjeants. Being return'd to their Seats, the Clerk of the Crown demanded of them, Whether the Earl were Guilty or Not? At which every one of 'em, putting his Hand to his Breast, as the Custom was, declar'd upon his Honour and Conscience, that he was Guilty. Then being ask'd if he had any thing farther to say, why Sentence of Death should not pass upon him? he only said the same Words which his Father had done before him, in the same Place, God's Will be done. Sentence being pronounced, he desired Leave to speak with his Wife, and that he might see his young Son, who was born since his Confinement; that he might have the Liberty to speak with his Stewards, who had the Accounts of his Estate, and that his Debts might be discharged: He likewise humbly desired the Queen would take his young Son into her Favour and Patronage. Then the Lord-Steward brake his Staff, the Badge of his Place; and the Earl was carry'd back to the Tower, the Ax being carry'd before him, with the Edge towards him. There were a great many, that most heartily lamented the untimely Fall of this young Nobleman, (for he was not above 33 Years of Age at the most) and as many on the other side were ready to cry up the Queen's Wisdom and Caution, who by this Example had struck a kind of Terror into the more powerful Part of the Romish Faction. The Queen after all gave him his Life, and was well enough satisfy'd in having lessen'd the Power of so considerable a Man, and one who was so great a Bulwark of the Catholick Cause.

When she had shewn this Example of Terrour at home, to make herself equally fear'd abroad, and pursue the Victory which Providence had given her over the Spaniards; the Queen conceiving it to be both more safe and honourable to attack the Enemy, than to stand an Assault from them, suffer'd a Fleet to put to Sea, upon an Expedition against Spain. This Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake did generously and frankly undertake, at their own and some other private Mens Charge, and with very little Expence to the Queen's Purse, except the fitting out of a few Men of War; for indeed they were fully convinced that the Power of Spain lay rather in common Fancy and Opinion, than in any real Strength they were Masters of. The Agreement between them was this, That whatever Prizes they took, should be shared among 'em by a fair and equal Dividend. But it happen'd that there came not in so many to this Expedition, as was expected. The States added some Ships, altho' they were at present displeas'd with the English, because Wingfield Governour of Gertruydenburgh, and the English Garrison of that Place, had betray'd the Town to the Spaniard. The Fleet was reckon'd to consist of 11000 Soldiers and 1500 Sailors. Don Antonio, the Bastard, Prior of Crato, with a few Portuguese, join'd 'em; for he, it seems, laying Claim to the Crown of Spain, by a popular Election, (for by the Laws of that Kingdom Bastards are not excluded) had made the English mighty Promises, hoping, we may suppose, to recover the Kingdom, by the Help of these Forces, the Revolt of the Portuguese from the Spaniard, and the Assistance of Muley Hamet King of Morocco.

In April they sail'd from Plymouth, and arrived five days after at the Groyne in Galicia, (call'd by the Antients Flavia Brigantum) without any Opposition whatever. In their Passage towards the lower Town they receiv'd some Damage by several Shot, which play'd on them from an huge Vessel and two Gallies in the Harbour; till they were obliged to quit their Station, through the warm Salutes of some great Pieces planted on the Shoar. The day following, they made an Assault on the lower Town in three Places at the same time, Unton and Brett assisting the Attack from the Land, with 300 Men; and Sir Richard Wingfield and Sampson with 500 on the other side. They were at first roughly receiv'd by the Enemy, and once or twice beat from the Walls, as they attempted to scale them; but the other Forces made their way into the Town in the mean time, with little or no Loss. The Spaniards presently threw down their Arms, and got away, by the nearest and best known Avenues, to the upper Town. They that were in the great Ship made a shift to get ashore, having first set her on fire: She burnt two days together, and most of her Guns being too full charged, burst in pieces with a most frightful Noise. The Ammunition and Provision lodg'd there, for a new Expedition against England, were carry'd on board the English Ships.

From thence they march'd to the upper Town, which Sir John Norris observing to be situated on a Rock, not capable of mining, except in one Place; he order'd a Mine to be dug there, and on the other side made a Breach in the Walls with his great Cannon, resolving to storm it on both sides at once: But it prov'd fruitless, by reason the Fire broke out of the Mine on the Outside of the Walls. The Pioneers then carry'd on the Mine farther under the Walls; and setting Fire to the Powder, blew up one Part of the Bulwark, which falling some time before the other Part sunk, maim'd several of the English with the Fall. The rest, scared by this unexpected Accident, forsook their Commanders; whilst on the other side, they who made the Attack at the Breach, wanting a secure Footing, because the Rubbish gave way under them, were obliged to retire with a considerable Loss.

About this time, Norris receiv'd a most certain Intelligence, that the Conde di Andrada had got some Forces together at the Bridge of Burges, and that the Conde Altimira was upon his March with some Recruits; and that they intended to besiege the English in the lower Town, or to cut off their Retreat to their Ships: He, supposing it the best way to prevent them, march'd against them with Ten Companies. The Van was commanded by Edward Norris and William Sidney; the main Body by Norris himself, with Medkerck a Dutchman; and the Rear by Henry Norris, Huntley and Brett. The Spaniards attack'd 'em on this side the Bridge; but being beaten back by the Courage of the English, they quitted their Lines, and left the English a free and easie Passage over the River; who pursu'd them so hotly, that they fled in the utmost Confusion, and were slain 3 Miles together. After this the English burnt and plunder'd the Villages; and in two days return'd again to their Ships, without any Disturbance. As they sail'd for Portugal, the Wind happening to be in their Teeth, Robert Earl of Essex fell in with them. He was a young Gentleman, who partly from a Thirst of Glory, partly out of Hatred to the Spaniards, and Pity to Don Antonio, had quitted the Pleasures of a Court, to try his Fortune at Sea, without the Queen's Leave or Approbation, and had look'd out for the Fleet a long time. He could never hope to gain the Queen's Consent to this Expedition; because she was mighty averse from suffering any Persons of the first Quality, to run so great an Hazard: However, he flatter'd himself with the Honour of commanding in chief, by reason several of the Colonels and Captains had been obliged to his Brother for their Preferment. The second day after, the Sea being very rough, they arrived at

Peniche, a Town of Portugal, and became Masters of it, with the Loss of a few Men only, who were drown'd as they were getting ashore; and the Inhabitants flying at the same time, the Castle surrender'd to Don Antonio. From hence all the Foot, under the Command of Sir John Norris, march'd as fast as they could, by Land, to Lisbon, which lay about 60 Miles from thence; and Drake promis'd to follow with the Fleet up the River Tago. In their Passage they call'd a Council of War at Torres Vedras, and resolv'd to encamp on the East Side of the City, to prevent the Arrival of any Succours from Spain, and to facilitate the Portuguese Access to their King. After six days March, they came to the Western Suburbs of Lisbon, call'd S. Katharine's, without the least Opposition; where they made some Stay, contrary to their former Resolutions, and cast their Eyes on none but a few unarm'd People, who saluted them ever and anon with a God save King Antonio! For Albert of Austria, their Governor, had before this totally disarm'd the Portuguese. The next day, as the English, who were sick and fatigu'd with their long March, were giving themselves some Ease and Refreshment, the Spanish Garrison made a Sally, and Brett, with his Party, sustain'd the Brunt with a great deal of Bravery; till some of the English and Portuguese coming in to his Relief, drove them back into the City, Essex himself following them to the very Gates: Yet Brett, Carsley, and Carr, brave Commanders, and some common Soldiers, were slain. When they had been here two days, without any Hope of the Defection of the Portuguese, as Don Antonio had vainly promis'd himself, and boasted to others; and the King of Morocco failing, at the same time, to send them the Supplies he had promis'd; whereas on the other side Recruits came in from the Eastern Parts, the Sickness rag'd more and more in the Army, Provision and Powder grew scarce, and Drake fail'd to supply 'em with Cannon for Battery; the English mov'd off, and took their March towards Cascais, taking away nothing out of the Suburbs, which were well stock'd with foreign Wares; lest they should by that means alienate the Affections of the Portuguese. As they retir'd to this small Town, laying on the Mouth of the Tago, the Spaniards pursu'd them with a very slow Pace, and did not so much as cut off any of their Rear. Drake, who in the mean time had taken Cascais, was very much blamed, the English charging their Disappointment upon his Cowardice entirely, for that he did not follow with the Fleet, according to his Promise. He excus'd it from the Impossibility of the thing, there being no Passage thro' the Channel of Alcacova, by reason of the Shoals and Sands; and had he gone directly by the Port of S. Julian's, which was defended with 50 Pieces of Cannon, and had a great many Gallies riding in it, with their Heads towards him, he had then expos'd the Fleet to a most palpable Hazard; nor could they have hoped for any thing but Destruction, should the Enemies Ships have been brought down upon him in the mean time as he lay at the Mouth of the Tago. And had the Fleet miscarry'd by this Conduct, he made it appear, that the Army too must have undergone the same Fate. The Castle of Cascais was now surrender'd on Articles, and a great part of it blown up; and to make themselves some amends for their Expence, the English seiz'd about 60 Hulks belonging to the Hans-Towns of Germany, laden with Wheat, and all manner of Naval Stores, to equip out a new Fleet against England. These Vessels had sail'd round by the Orcades, the Hebrides, and the Coast of Ireland, and made a tedious and dangerous Voyage, to escape falling into the English
